Numerous castles and ruins we passed all the way up to Bingen, but I will not take the time to name them. Suffice it to say they are generally situated on the summits of the hills, or far up the sides where they would seem to be inaccessible, and must have been built under great difficulties. The getting up those steep acclivities with heavy rocks and other building materials must have been extremely laborious and difficult. I think the beauty of the scenery increased as we neared Bingen, but it got to be dark before we reached that beautiful locality. An accident befel one of the wheels of the steamer which took nearly an hour to repair, and while we were lying by, the peasants and urchins of the Rhine gathered along the bank in great numbers. They were a ragged, primitive-looking set indeed. The two men from Belfast remarked that they looked much like the rag-tag and bobtail from the backwoods and fens of Ireland.

We stopped for the night at Bingen, and I cannot say too much of the beauty of this place, though we could not realize it till the following morning, when the full view of the vineyards on the opposite slope struck our vision with peculiar and pleasing effect. The town is pretty, but has nothing remarkable about it, although the scenery in the vicinity is beautiful beyond description. Many years ago I heard a poetical recitation on Bingen on the Rhine, and at the end of every stanza Bingen on the Rhine was repeated. I would give it to you could I remember it, for it is beautiful in itself, and eulogizes a most beautiful point on the Rhine. From Bonn to Mayence there are many thousands of acres of vineyards. I think we must have seen ten thousand acres of vines during that day's ride. They run up the steep banks of the hills where it would seem almost impossible for men and women to climb, or for dirt enough to remain to keep a vine alive. But still on these steep hillsides grapes are cultivated almost exclusively, and perhaps nothing else will grow. In many instances, among the crags and on the tops of perpendicular rocks where a little earth can be found, there is cultivated the vine, there the wine-making grapes are grown. There the poor peasants climb day after day to their continuous toil, and even up the steep hillsides women carry basketfuls of dirt on their heads to enable the vine to grow. Walls and towers are built laterally on the hillsides to prevent the dirt from washing down, but still it has to be carried back by human force as I have said. And it is but a pitiful living that the poor peasants make by the culture of the vine. They are forced to sell their grapes at a very low figure; they live on the cheapest food, and eke out a miserable existence indeed. This is of course not the case with all who cultivate the vine, but with a large share it is.

We went to Mayence by rail, and passed through a succession of gardens where the hills recede from the river, as they do to the width of a few miles. At Mayence my Irish friends parted from me and proceeded at once to Strasburg, while I stopped to look and to diverge to Weisbaden.

I have now passed over the most celebrated portion of the Rhine, and feel competent to give an opinion as to its loveliness and grandeur. Poets have sung about it, and tourists have vied with each other in describing its great beauty. Thousands upon thousands visit it annually and doubtless will continue to do so for centuries to come. For centuries the vine has been cultivated here, and in centuries to come it will be the same. I do not think the scenery of the Rhine has been misrepresented; its loveliness has not been overdrawn. It is all that poets and admiring tourists have said of it; but while all this is true, I honestly think we have scenery quite as grand and quite as lovely in America. The Hudson has not the old castles and ruins; it has not the "vine-clad hills" of the Rhine; its villages are not so antique nor frequent, but its loveliness and grandeur are quite equal to the Rhine. The Palisades and the Highlands and the mountains of Westchester, Putnam, Dutchess, Rockland, and Greene counties cannot be surpassed on the Rhine; and the lovely banks of the Hudson, with its thriving, beautiful towns, will compare favorably with the Rhine. I always enjoy the scenery on the Hudson. I did even in July, 1879, when I was being conveyed to the prison at Albany. The reason for that journey was most loathsome to my feelings, but the scenery on the road filled me as ever with admiration.

The Rhine is a longer river than the Hudson, but it is not larger and is not prettier. When it comes to length and size both, the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio, throw the Rhine far into the shade. And when it comes to grand and wild scenery, the Erie Railroad, the Pennsylvania Central, and the Baltimore and Ohio present far more than all that Europe can produce.

The trade on the Rhine is extensive. Numerous steamers and barges, with some sailing craft, are plying back and forth well freighted with the produce of this productive country. Mayence is not the head of navigation, but is of the heaviest portion. Boats run up as far as Manheim, and even higher, but only of a smaller size.

Mayence, or Mainz, contains fifty-seven thousand inhabitants, and is the oldest-looking town I have seen. Its streets are very narrow and irregular, and some of them do not smell as sweet as a rose. Some of the older houses look as though they might have been built in the year 1. Many were built of rough stones and plastered over, some of which time has knocked off, showing the rough walls. The roofs of the houses are very steep, as in many European towns, and the poorer people live away up under the roofs, with very small windows, and of course with scanty light and few comforts. I have seen some of these high, steep roofs on buildings of considerable width, when there are four and five stories above the eves, the windows being but little larger than would be made for doves to go in at. I noticed several buildings in Strasburg yesterday with five stories under the roof besides the five below the roof. These were usually rather old buildings. Mayence has good buildings and some rather pretty streets, but they are few in number.

The cathedral, to a man of my known piety, was of course about the first point to be visited. It is one of the oldest in the country, or at least a part of it is, which was built in the tenth century. It is of red sandstone, and its exterior presents a rather singular appearance, with the inferior buildings and hovels closely surrounding it and backed up snug against it. The market square is also on one side, and of course, being as fond of fruit as I am, I had to patronize the market women before I entered the holy place. Somehow I like to chaffer with them and learn how to talk and count money.

Many and extraordinary have been the vicissitudes which have befallen the Mayence cathedral, both by bombardment and conflagration. The last time it was sacked and turned into a barrack by the forces under Napoleon. By the liberality of the wealthy citizens of the town the edifice has been more than restored. The interior is still being improved, and is very rich in frescoes, gilding, statues, and painting. It has fifty-six columns of magnificent proportions, and many very ancient tombs of prelates, electors, archbishops, and warriors. The town has an elevation of 324 feet. The sacristy contains some tenth century chalices, but none of the Virgin's underwear, nor any relics belonging to the Holy Ghost. Some of the chapels are finely decorated with statues, paintings, etc., but, I think, do not equal some I have seen.

Mayence has the honor of being the birthplace of Guttenberg, the father of printing, and the man who did more good to the world than all the popes, kings, and warriors who have lived for fifteen hundred years. A monument of bronze of Guttenberg himself is erected in Guttenburg Platz, and I gladly visited it and paid my respects to this great friend of man. The house in which he was born is still standing, but I did not see it. There are several places and buildings in Mayence worthy of notice, but I have seen so much finer elsewhere that I will not dwell upon them. The city is strongly fortified, the embankments and fortifications being easily seen from the cars, as well as some pleasant grounds and promenades.

I crossed the Rhine on the bridge of boats to Castel, and took the cars to Wiesbaden, some ten miles distant, in a northern direction, and a few miles from the Rhine. It is a most beautiful town, and in a most beautiful country. I visited the city partly with the view of meeting a friend and patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. G. E. Hoffman, who had invited me to call and see him, but upon arriving there I learned that he lived some five or six hours' ride in the province of Wiesbaden, and not in the city, and not being in the line of my route I omitted my visit to him.

I had also a letter from my friend Miss Anna Knoop, of New York, publisher of Meslier's "Superstition in all Ages," to her cousin, Mr. Theodore Knoop, of Wiesbaden. When making inquiry as to where to find him, the gentleman looked at me a little strangely and inquired, "Do you know who Mr. Knoop is?" I replied that I was aware he was a wealthy man. "Why," said he, "he isalmost the king of Wiesbaden, and is one of the richest men in Germany." That did not frighten me, so I proceeded to his palace, located in the center of some ten or fifteen acres of most beautiful grounds, filled with choice shrubbery, rare flowering and ornamental plants, and statuary and a handsome fountain. At the entrance at the lodge they showed a disinclination to let me pass, but, showing my letter, they allowed me to go on. I found the servants in rich livery, as though indeed I were in the palace of a king. And many a king has lived in a palace not nearly so fine as this. The walls were of large panels of most rare and polished marble, banisters and railings of Italian marble and highly polished, polished and variegated marble floors, with costly and elegant frescoes on the ceilings, and everything in proportion. I found the owner of the establishment had gone out and that the Madame was just ready to go out, the coach being already in waiting. I was requested to call next day, but as I did not remain till next day I did not call again, but left the letter. There was rather too much grandeur there to match with my humble tastes.

Wiesbaden contains 44,000 inhabitants, is the most popular watering-place in Germany on account of its hot springs of mineral water, and is visited by over 100,000 persons annually, and is decidedly one of the prettiest cities I ever saw of its size. The buildings are magnificent, the streets are mainly wide and regular, and there is a profusion of parks, beautiful grounds, and lovely promenades. Many of the richer inhabitants have beautiful residences with large lots ranging from two acres to ten acres, filled with beautiful shrubbery, flowers, and statues. Several streets of residences of this kind seem a perfect Elysium.

The Kursaal is a great point of attraction. The principal hall in it is 132 feet long, 60 feet wide, and 48 feet high, and is used for concerts, etc. In a wing is a very large reading-room, where all the principal papers of the world are to be found. I found the New York dailies and spent an hour very pleasantly in getting the news from my own country. In front of this building are the most beautiful grounds imaginable. I fear I cannot duly describe them. The main plot is about 500 feet by 250 feet; it has two splendid fountains, and great numbers of mounds and beds of exquisitely beautiful flowers and plants, arranged in most elaborate style. They excel what I saw at Kew Gardens, London, and what I admired so much in Paris. I must give the Germans the palm in beautiful, exquisite, artistic, skilful, and elaborate blending of flowers and delicate plants in out-door beds. I have never seen anything so nice, and I wish every one of you could see them, especially those of you who admire beautiful flowers. On each side of these beautiful grounds is a long building, each with fifty columns in front and some forty stores of fancy and neat merchandise, like jewelry, perfumery, pocketbooks, ornaments, and everything neat, nice, and attractively arranged. The space between the stones and pillars must be about forty feet, giving a fine place for promenade in rainy weather. Each of these long edifices makes a bazar of the most magnificent proportions. The stores are all separate, and are attended by both male and female clerks.

At the end of these grounds, opposite from the Kursaal, and in a public square, and also before the Opera House, is a statue—monument and bust in bronze—in honor of the great poet Schiller. I bowed reverently before it.

In the rear of the Kursaal is the Kurgarten—grounds well laid off for promenades, with a fountain, the jet of which throws a stream I judge to be 150 feet high, and a lake or reservoir of an acre or two in extent, on the surface of which skim light boats. The grounds are filled with flowering plants and shrubbery, with walks meandering and winding around. Here are also large shade trees, and under them thousands of chairs are placed for visitors to sit on and listen to the fine string and brass bands, which discourse the best of music. Tables are also numerous, and wine, beer, coffee, tea, with solid refreshments, are dispensed according to the taste and pockets of the visitors. A table d'hote is furnished those who wish it. I think this is the German idea of heaven—a band of forty musicians seated under an ornamental balcony; a fountain playing 150 feet high; swans swimming around in the artificial lake; some people drinking wine, some beer, and some the other fluids; some playing chess, some cards, some dominoes, and some other games, and all this for the sum of half a mark, or twelve and a half cents. Several hundred ladies and gentlement were present of very respectable appearance, and all seemed happy. I saw many invalids with rheumatism, gout, paralysis, and other diseases who came to these springs to be cured, and they were wheeled into this cheerful garden in their trundled hand-carriages. They listened and chatted as long as they pleased, and then were again wheeled to their boarding-houses. I passed two hours here very pleasantly, and rested besides.

This was once a noted place for gambling, and the sports gathered here from all parts of Europe, but the government broke up the gambling and it was moved to a small island south of France in the Mediterranean, a small principality by itself, where they can do about as they please, gambling or not as they like. Some thought driving the gamblers away would ruin Wiesbaden, but it has flourished more since than before.

I noticed on several houses signs like this, Badhaus. Now these are not bad houses by any means. On the other hand, they are good houses, for they are bath houses, bad houses being the German for bathhouse. So many go there to bathe and be treated with the hot medicated waters that many houses are necessary to accommodate all. Some hotels, of which there are a goodly number, and all very good, have their own springs, so that they can accommodate their guests within themselves. Others have springs who keep no hotels. I learn many cures are performed by those waters. In some of the springs the water is as hot as 150 degrees, which is about as warm as a person wishes to drink. They contain in slight quantities some twenty different chemicals, the principal of which is salt. The waters taste somewhat salty, but not unpleasant. At the Kursaal I met Mr. Hagen, a lawyer from Washington, who is there for his health. We talked politics some, but did not quite agree.

Wiesbaden has fine churches. I visited the Protestant church. It had before the preacher's place four large statues of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and had other appearances somewhat like the Catholic churches. They got all they have from the Catholics, and why not take the images also?

The town also has a museum, but I did not visit it, having pretty well satisfied myself in that direction, besides it was not open to the public the day I was there. The town lies in a beautiful natural basin, presenting a lovely view of the fertile country which surrounds the town. It is also but a short distance from the great Black Forest, into which interesting drives are made in pleasant weather. I shall long remember Wiesbaden as one of the pleasantest towns I ever visited.

At nine in the evening I returned to Mayence, to be ready for the train to Heidelberg in the morning, via Darmstadt, which is a ride of some three hours or more. The country is of a lovely character, and the scenery is hightened by the not distant view of the ridge of hills belonging to the Black Forest or Schwarzwald, which extends in the southeastern part of Germany and parallel with the Rhine, some eighty-five miles in length, twenty-five miles in breadth in the northern part and forty miles in the southern. It is called the Black Forest from the deep color of its pines, which are the principal growth. It is comparatively the wild portion of Germany, the inhabitants having made far less advance in fashionable civilization than other parts of Germany. They are said to hav changed but little in the last five hundred years. This romantic region is filled with beautiful scenery, and within the past ten or fifteen years has been largely visited by tourists and pleasure seekers, a great deal of interest being found within its borders of 290 square miles.

This range of hills bounding the Black Forest country is in sight nearly the whole distance, and often presents the very grandest scenery, with the ruins of the old castles of the past on the highest hills. On each side of the railroad is fine farming country, which is used to the best advantage.

Book Notice.

REV. MR. DASHWELL, THE NEW MINISTER AT HAMPTON. By E. P. B. American News Company, New York.

This neat work is a satire upon sensational preachers like Talmage and Fulton, and there are many preachers in and about New York of whom it is a faithful portrait. True religion commands respect, even if we deplore the folly of its dupes. But for the mountebankism which puts clowns in broadcloth instead of spangles, and places them in pulpits instead of sawdust-rings, no one can hav feelings other than contempt. The author of this book has made one mistake, however. He makes his principal character, Mr. Dashwell, slide into Unitarianism, when experience shows that ecclesiastical clowns are more prone to be violently orthodox than their more even-tempered brethren. The book is pleasantly written, and will neither strengthen nor destroy anybody's orthodoxy.

Thou Shalt Not Steal.

DEARLY BELUBBED BRUDDERN AN' SISTERN: De tex, on dis 'casion, am a mighty brief an' mighty good one, no matter whar it come from. It am simply, "Thou shalt not steal."

Jess peel your mind's eye 'way back, an' den reflect if it didn't occur to you dat his heah tex was supposed to be given by a God dat fust set de example of teft hisself. Dat, my dear chillun, am presactly what he did, cos in de fust portion of dat inspiration don't it say he chloroformed Massa Adam, an' den didn't he steal de rib bone, an' go sneakin' round de corner an' do de only good ting he was ever guilty of—make a woman? Why, bress your guileless hearts, of course he did, or else de inspiration wan't a gwine to say so.

Den nextly, bime by, he done come along an' speak to Moses in de language of dis tex. An' Mose an' God was terrible good friends when dey wan't a-fightin', an' Mose obeyed de tex, which he wrote on an ole tombstone, 'long with nine udders, which I tole you of in de sweet by an' by. Did Mose ever steal? Who ax dat silly question? Didn't God tell everyone not to? an' wan't Mose de original stepdaddy of all de ten little verses sculpted on de gravestone? Him steal! Well not presactly, but his pardner Aaron went snookin round an' got all de old women's jewelry dat was any account an' made a gold calf out of it, an' asses out of de folks dat done giv the jewelry. Mose an' God was up on a hill, having a high ole time, an' God, dat knows everything dat happens or is a gwine to, didn't know a single thing bout what Aaron was up to.

When it was finished den God thought it was time to get his dander up, so Mose came rushin' down de trail, busted up de gravestone book, an' tole de children of Israel to slew one anudder, if dey wanted to bress de Lord; so I reckon before supper time jess about three or four thousand ole second-hand clothes men an' pawnbrokers laid down an' forgot to get up for breffus next mornin', an ole Aaron goin' round happy as an oyster. Dis chap was promoted boss engineer of de tabernacle arterwards. It's jess a cussed shame de way Mose an' Aaron pull de wool ober de eyes of de poor Bible God. But as usual with me, Joe Cook, an' udders, I digress.

But we will bid a fond sjew to Mose an' Aaron, an' skip over de stealin' of David an' Solomon an' all de udder ole partridges an' come down to dose parts of de inspiration de Jews skip.

Once upon a time in de powerful imaginations of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, I reckon, de one-third of de ole Boss done hook de cawn out of a poor workingman's garden on a Sunday, when he should hav been in his pulpit teachin' of de people not to steal on Sunday, but wait till arly Monday morning, jess as de pious cusses of to-day do. Annuder time dis fraction of a God done elope with a stray mule, without advertizin' it, simply because he wanted to put on style a ridin' into Jerusalem; probably kase it was fair day, or a circus was in town

Den furdermore an' to go backly, de very idea of this Christ business was done stolen from a nation dat lived an had deir demigods in de form of Christna hundreds of years before dar was a Jewish Christ, or folks knew a virgin could hav children. Didn't de 'possels an' priests steal it openly, an' convert de so-called heathens' belief into a more accussed an' hideous form, in order to make mental an' bodily slaves of de mass of deir follow-humans, bof de white, black, an' red? Didn't dey jess want to scare dem into supportin' dem in deir laziness, an' keepin up deir tinseled show an' shallow fawmation? Course dey did. An' aint dat de most aggravatin' kind of stealin? As it was den so am it to-day—with amendments. Look round an' see de big, fat, oily, white-chokered followers of de Bible God, strainin' every nerve to get riches. Fust comes de salary. Den dey want donation parties; den de organ must be fixed, an' lots of improvements must be did, an' de money comes in, but de improvements only go on in de preacher's bank account. Den look at dat monstrous stealin', collectin' money for missionary purposes. What a mighty good thing it am dat de heathens liv in a country where half a shirt am a winter's wardrobe, 'kase if dey 'pended on receivin' any money of de millions given for deir benefit from churches, an lived in a colder climate, dar wouldn't be a heathen on top of de ground—outside of his bones. De idee of de thing am sublimely thin, even if dey did send de money dey stole from deir confidin' lambs to try an' convert races havin' a better form of religion dan any ole Jew could trump up, with all his shrewdness.

But I'se erring. De churches do send de money, kase I read deir missionary report de udder night—dat is, dey send some to de missionaries deirselvs fer deir own grub an' whisky, an' all de rest dey send to de headens across de sea—on paper. No, de pastors, priests, deacons, elders, and gospel sharps generally don't steal. Ob course out ob five hundred dar would be four hundred an' ninety exceptions. Stealin' in law, Bible law, am different from our ebery-day affairs. Now, if a poor weak woman takes a loaf ob bread to keep herself an' starvin' chillen alive for a few hours longer, dat's stealin'; but if dat Irishman, Archbishop Purcell, takes millions from hard-working families an' speculates wid it, an' turns up de wrong keerd, an' lands dem on de brink ob starvation, den de poor bald-headed follower of Jesus is prayed for, an' de pious howl to de pope ob Rome to pay twenty cents on de dollar for de ole man, when dey ought to pay twenty cents for a rope for de ole swindler.

It ain't stealin' when de Mefodis' Book Concern busted in a outrageous manner. It ain't stealin' when Uncle Sam gives Indian agencies to de Mefodis' church, an' de black-coated sharks stay out a year on a fifteen hundred dollar a year salary, an' come home an' build twenty thousand dollar houses. It ain't stealin' to git up fairs and hav games where de chances ob winnin' are all on de side ob de church, an' dose ob losin' on de side ob de precious lambs and cultured sinners. It ain't stealin'. No, it's a damity, damn, damn sight wuss. I can't hold out much longer on dis teme widout gettin' 'cited, so befo' I gits real fightin' mad, I'll close by askin' you to swell wid your silvery voices dat melodious stolen hymn,

I love to steal awhile away
What's trusted to my care.
Yes, steal whate'er I can by day,
Den make a great long prayer.

Sexual Intemperance.—No. 8.

"No breeder of live stock would rest content with seeing nearly one-half of his colts, calves, lambs, etc., die before they were one-quarter grown, and of those which came to maturity, a large per cent diseased, misshapen monstrosities; and others so vicious and ugly as not only to be useless but dangerous; and so sent to the pound or slaughter-house to keep them from mischief."—Loring Moody.

Yes, it is all only too true! Ninety-nine hundredths of our children are accidents, are unwished and unwelcome; are born under all manner of unfavorable circumstances, and of diseased and often vicious parents, and all because of sexual intemperance; because the great majority of the people think it a command of God "to increase and multiply," and that he sends the mouths and will supply the food even as he feeds the sparrows.

The "great unwashed," as well as many of the cultured, educated class, believe it natural, proper, and right to go straight ahead with sexual pleasures, so long as law and custom legalizes the act; and if children come as a consequence, it is no responsibility of theirs, but they are either given of God or come as a matter of necessity.

Now and then, all along through the generation of man, some keen-visioned thinker like Malthus, Owen, Knowlton, or Annie Besant sees the terrible fruits of careless, reckless begetting, and of over-population, and pleads for checks and preventivs. And others, like the Shakers, priests, and nuns, practice celibacy, but from selfish motivs and a wrong groundwork of opinion. Now checks and preventivs are like medicin for the sick. When the disease has come the remedy is a necessary evil. When the limb is irreparably injured the surgeon's knife is better than that the whole body be sacrificed. So if men and women will not see and cannot see that the sexual act is only legitimate when children are desired (and none should desire them who are too much diseased morally and physically to giv them good, pure, strong minds, in good, vigorous, perfect, and healthy bodies), they must content themselves with "preventivs" as necessary evils. For it is far better to prevent births—to use scientific checks—than for poor people to burden themselvs with large families which they find it impossible to rear in comfort or even in common decency. Many a father and mother hav spent all the best years of their prime in struggling for the barest means of existence for themselvs and eight or ten helpless little ones. They are physically exhausted and hav no time or inclination to read, study, or think of anything but how to liv and provide for pressing and imperativ wants. They cannot teach the children the moralities, the virtues, and the beauties of a true life, nor giv them the joys, pleasures, brightness, and sweetnesses that should always be the birthright of the young. No person who has not the means to provide comfortably for a child and giv it a chance for happiness, morality, and goodness has a legitimate right to beget one, and much more to create from ten to a dozen of them. Dr. Knowlton says, "Owing to his ignorance a man may not be able to gratify a desire without causing misery, therefore it would be wrong for him to do it, but with knowledge of means to prevent this misery, he may so gratify it that more pleasure than pain will be the result of the act, in which case the act, to say the least, is justifiable." He also says, "It is as much the duty of the physician to inform mankind of the means to prevent the evils that are liable to arise from gratifying the productiv instinct as it is to inform them how to keep clear of the gout or dyspepsia."

Now while the believer in sexual continence and purity feels these checks to be the only truly natural and legitimate ones, he also realizes that mankind has become so diseased through long ages of intemperance, lust, and passion that his desires are almost beyond his control, and he will risk all possible consequences rather than exercise that restraint and self-abnegation which are rendered imperativ by his unfortunate inheritance of transmitted sexual passion and that which personal indulgence has also fastened upon him. So, as a medicin for these unhealthful abnormal conditions, artificial checks and preventivs to conception are desirable and are the great demand of the age. Those who are morally and physically strong and well need no drugs. The natural checks of self-control, temperance, and continence are sufficient for them, but for the diseased we ask for help. We plead for the right to search out a scientific healthful preventiv of conception, and the right to make it known to all and free to all. We ask that its use shall be lawful and legitimate and without let or hindrance. And shall a government that legalizes millions of abortions produced by lawful sexual intemperance after conception, and makes it no crime to bring into existence idiots, lunatics, lepers, and other "diseased, misshapen monstrosities," do aught to hinder in this enlightened age the use of simple, harmless preventivs? Is there any reason in permitting the gardener to sow his seed and then forbidding him from weeding out the surplus while it is yet in embryo? In all earnestness and purity of heart we ask these simple questions of the men and women of the day, and demand of them that by their deeds they shall giv answer.

We ask them to read, study, think, and learn of all these things, and when convinced that our present laws relating to marriage and parentage are wrong, they shall frankly and honestly say so, let public opinion thunder its anathemas as it will, and a false, corrupt, diseased morality cry out, "obscene, coarse, and vulgar," if it chooses. Truth is what we want and what the ages will giv us if we seek it. We, the "great unwashed," are really our own law-makers. We control the elections and the choice of representativs, and it is for us so to wield our influence as to unmake bad laws and replace them with better ones as fast as we realize the wrongs that exist. See the right that is desirable. But "Nature's laws are laws unchanging.

Sweeping through the cosmos wide,
Dealing sorrow to us erring.
Bliss if we these laws abide."

Churches and Taxation.

A writer in the current number of the North American Review discusses the much mooted question of exempting the property of churches from taxation, taking as his starting point the action of Congress in regard to the matter in the District of Columbia. The general tax law for the district in 1874 made no express exemption, nor did it in terms repeal the exemption which previously existed. The Commissioners proceeded to assess the property of churches, and where the taxes were not paid, which was generally the case, it was advertised and sold, being bought in by the Commissioners in the name of the district. A committee took up the contest on behalf of the churches, and carried it before Congress, and at the last session an act was passed by a unanimous vote of both houses relieving the churches from the tax and restoring to them the titles to their houses of worship which had been sold. With the assent of the committee, the exemption now extends "only to church buildings in actual use for purposes of worship only, together with the ground on which they stand." All other property belonging to them and not thus used is subject to taxation. This is taken by the writer in the Review as establishing the right principle, with the sanction of the highest legislativ authority in the country. Whatever weight this sanction may hav as a matter of precedent or example, it does not, of course, affect the right of any state to deal with the question according to the ideas of its own people as to the considerations of justice and expediency involved.

The author of the article referred to, taking the moderate ground that only property occupied and used for purposes of worship should enjoy the exemption, proceeds to defend it with a variety of arguments, the chief of which is the familiar one that the work of religious societies is a benefit to the public, and, while they are paid nothing by the state for its support, they should not be required to pay a tax on the appliances for carrying it on. Without touching upon the general question of expediency, we may be allowed to point out the weakness of some of his reasoning. He admits the soundness of the principle that the state should hav nothing directly to do with maintaining the church or promoting institutions of worship as such. In short, complete separation of church and state is a sound political doctrin. Then he remarks on the exemption from taxation of charitable and educational institutions, and claims that the church is engaged in the same general work and should enjoy the same privilege for like reasons. Here is an evident confusion of the whole subject. It is universally conceded in this country to be the duty of the state to make provision for the support of the needy and helpless among its people, and for the education of the young within certain limits, in so far as this is not done by private means. If this is a work properly to be performed at the public expense, then does it follow logically that if any part of it which would otherwise devolve upon the state is done by private benevolent associations, the property necessary for carrying it on should at least be free from public charges. There is here a logical sequence which is entirely wanting in the plea put forth in behalf of churches. They are primarily for worship and for the promotion of the particular religious faith and opinions of those who build and maintain them, and it is admitted not to be in any sense the business of the state to fulfil those objects. Hence this argument appears to us to break down utterly. It does not, therefore, follow that the good to the community which results from the work of religious bodies is not a sufficient ground for the exemption claimed. That is the very question in dispute, and it certainly is not settled by arguing from an analogy with charitable and educational institutions, which does not exist, so far as relation to the state is concerned.

Against the argument based on beneficial effects upon the community at large is to be set that of the opponents of exemption, who claim that the primary object of the churches is worship and the propagation of certain forms of belief, and, so far as they are relieved from taxation, the burden is increased upon the property of those who take no part in the worship and do not share in the belief. In other words, the community is, in effect, taxed for the support of the church, and to that extent it is an institution favored and maintained at the expense of the state, which is inconsistent with the doctrin of an absolute separation of interests. But, after all, this question is for us a somewhat remote one. When it is reached it will be decided according to the views of policy and expediency which may then prevail. There is no doubt that the state has the right to tax or to exempt from taxation any class of property according as it may be deemed for the general interest and well-being to do so. But in this state we might as well get to the ditch before we attempt to jump over it. Churches and religiou associations own vast amounts of property free from taxation which is not actually used "for purposes of worship only." When the line of exemption is drawn a little more closely about houses of worship and "the ground on which they stand," it will be time to consider whether it shall be obliterated altogether. Not only are we exempting property belonging to churches which is not used for purposes of worship and is not at all necessary to that benefit to the community which is alleged as a reason for exemption, but we are paying considerable sums directly to at least one church for the support of its charities and its educational work with which its religious teaching is always intimately associated. Last year this city appropriated $935,000 for the benefit of certain asylums, reformatories, and charitable institutions, and $471,152, or considerably more than half the sum, was given to two Roman Catholic institutions, which also hold large amounts of property exempt from taxation. Considering the thoroughness with which Roman Catholics make all their charitable institutions places for worship and the propagation of their faith, this money is practically given to their church. It will be time to talk of taxing churches when we cease to exempt church property not used for worship and to devote the proceeds of taxes to the uses of a church.

Superstition.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: As this seems peculiarly an age for the analyzation of first principles, you will excuse me for troubling you with these few lines on the above subject. It is one boldly denounced in the wholesale, and its influence is universally contemned by our most astute and would-be-thought logical minds, and also by those who are great sticklers for science, without pausing, it almost seems, in their speaking on the topic so contemptuously, to understand its true basis.

I take the position that the love or expectation of immortality is an innate quality of our being, and that annihilation is an artificial outgrowth even in logical minds, arising from a settled disgust at the bold, arrogant, impudent, tyrannical, yea, and shameless, assumptions of priestcraft, at which I am not surprised.

To the enlightened thinker all religious observances evidently hav the same basic promptings, whether manifested as in fetichism, the barbaric sun-worship, the worship of hideous wooden or stone idols as in Chinese pagodas, or as in our numerous costly and elaborate towering, architectural Episcopal or Catholic cathedrals throughout what is called the Christian civilized world. All are based upon the same innate promptings. Thinkers, of course, are left to conjecture as to the earliest condition of primitiv man, but they are forced to conclude that he, like everything in nature, is the product of evolution from something lower than his present condition. Without going into the far remote they observe that in his crude state the animal or physical element of his being must hav predominated, but that it was in subjection to the primary stimulants, hope, love of power, fear, the affections, vindictivness, etc., etc., but that the controling animus of all his efforts was, as now, anticipation, ever-present, ever-impelling hope; a desire to delve into and control the events of the future. The thinker notices these facts, marks their results, and notes their application. The existence of the element of hope, the thinker observes, is hence universal, innate, and irrepressible. He invariably observes that this universal animus, although of necessity different in the barbarian as to its object, yet in force and strength of propulsion is the same as in the most cultivated civilian.

Proceeding onward, the thinker observes that the same operations and contentious conditions of the atmospheric and invisible elements of nature must hav existed in that early period as now. The barbarian was exposed to sudden tempests, lightning, and thunder, fearful earthquakes, unexpected gales, hurricanes, pestilences, drouths, consuming fires, and deluging floods, all which effects must hav produced a terrorizing dread of invisible and unseen influences upon his untutored mind. These invisible and atmospheric antagonisms must unavoidably hav increased his credulous sensibilities, which in turn would hav rendered him an easy victim to any fanciful conception in himself or others. The barbarian would observe that many unaccountable and unexpected events did occasionally occur to defeat his most mature plans and overturn his most secret enterprises. Strange coincidences would at times transpire, and hence how natural in the savage in his ignorance he should suspect until suspicion became a belief in the interference of malign or protectiv invisible agencies which his excited imagination could mold into any form and these forms made to possess any number of attributes as angels, fiends, or gods. Yea, these strange, unexpected, and direful events would, and probably did, occur ages before the inspired poet Burns gave expression to the idea that "the best laid schemes o' mice and men gang aft a-gley." The barbarian being forced to notice those unaccountable occurences in nature, how can the thinker avoid perceiving that it would take but little effort of the imagination to understand that cunning, artful, crafty men should be found among them who could and did, more or less successfully, take advantage of this natural and universal feeling of dread, doubt, and hope in relation to invisible influences, on which foundation hav arisen the innumerable gaudy manifestations of priestcraft.

There are other natural emotions which strongly enforce the spontaneous belief in a future, better or malign, invisible state of existence, which even the cold, chilling exactitude of what passes for science has never been able to animalize or demolish—the grand storehouse of memory.

Humanity, as a whole, cannot so far brutalize itself, so far destroy the affections or suffocate itself by the fumes of the scientist's crucible, as to render itself insensible to the ever-spontaneous hope that when we part at death with some once-loved relativ admired and cherished friend, we may again rejoin them in the vast "undiscovered country." Hence the thinker must conclude, that whatever may be the grotesqueness, the absurdity, the fanaticism, the architectural elegance, servility, or degradation of any religious organization, costly or humble, whether St. Peter's at Rome or St. Paul's in London, all such directions of religious thought are but so many evidences of man's innate belief in immortality.

The philanthropist is rejoiced to witness the onward march of Liberalism and the disinthralment of the human mind from the degrading influence of superstition, fanatical or cultivated, as a proud, arrogant priestly science. Still he cannot hold that Liberal a humanitarian or a philosopher who, with the world's opportunity of knowing better, of teaching the happiness of annihilation, of eternal sleep after death, leaves the overburdened heart of his fellow-mortal no alternativ but blank, despairing self-destruction, of which New York city alone furnishes her annual quota of from four to eighteen hundred hopeless suicides.

Liberal League Notes from Illinois.

I hav to report amounts received to assist me in the League work during the month of September, as follows: Received of W. W. Hall, for St. Johns League, $1 60; Mrs. Olive S. Hubbard, 50 cents; William Martin Bronson, 50 cents; S. Kelting, 50 cents; A. L. Rawson, $5; G. S. Baldwin, $1; William H. Crapser, 50 cents. Total, $9 60.

I hav traveled nearly three hundred miles, and taken applications for two auxiliary Leagues, one at Streator and one at Sandwich, Ill. I am now on my way toward the central and southern part of the state.

Those wishing to extend a helping hand toward carrying on the Liberal League movement in Illinois may continue to address me at Rockford, Illinois, and my correspondence will be forwarded to me.

I find a great lack of knowledge amongst the professed Freethinkers wherever I go in regard to what the National Liberal League movement means. There is but a very small proportion of the professed Liberals of this section of country who take any Liberal papers, and it is next to an impossibility to persuade them to subscribe for a Liberal paper, yet nearly every one takes a daily or two or three weekly papers which represent their peculiar political hobby. I hope this state of things will change after the November election is over, and Liberals and Freethinkers will hav time to reflect and learn where their most important interests lie, and where our most bitter and unrelenting enemy as Freethinkers is to be found.

I want to say to the Liberals and Freethinkers of this country that our liberties are not so much in danger from the success or failure of either of the existing political parties as they are from the Young Men's Christian Association, the Comstock Suppression (or, perhaps, more properly, the Greene-Street Assignation) Society, and other kindred societies, backed by the whole Christian church, which stands ready the very moment any particular party comes into power to urge them on to do its bidding in its efforts to suppress free thought, free speech, free press, and unreligiously-restricted mail facilities.

My Liberal friends in Illinois, please let me hear from you. I am extremely anxious to effect a thorough organization of the National League movement in this state, and to that end I wish to organize a state executiv sub-committee, in accordance with article eleven of the Constitution of the National Liberal League. Please send me the names of persons suitable for this committee, and also for local agents in every county and town. Address me, until otherwise advised,

Infidelity and Vice.

We copy the following from the Baptist Weekly, a representativ of a large denomination of Christians, published at New York:

The Liberal League, in a meeting at Chicago Saturday night, passed resolutions favoring the abrogation of the laws against the transmission of obscene literature through the mails. Colonel Ingersoll, having vainly opposed the movement, resigned his membership in the body. After all, it seems there are depths to which some Infidels are not prepared to make a descent.

This is exceedingly unfair. It is unfair in stating, without the qualification necessary to express the truth, that the Liberal League passed resolutions favoring the abrogation of the laws against the transmission of obscene literature through the mails; and it is unfair in making the implication that Infidels hav a propensity for diving into the depths of immorality.

We can understand that the falsity of the first statement is due to the maliciously garbled reports which came over the wires from Chicago; but the slur at Infidelity is due to the religious sentiment which assumes that a man must sink into wickedness, obscenity, and vice unless he believes, or pretends to believe, that on an exceptional occasion a man was born of a virgin, and that that man was God himself.

The League passed no such resolutions. They did, however, pass resolutions favoring the abrogation of the laws of Congress forbidding the transmission of obscene literature through the mails, and also those forbidding the use of the mails to circulate publications in aid of fraudulent enterprises. It does not follow, though, that they intended to giv countenance to either obscenity or fraud. They expressly condemned obscenity and the loathesome creatures who publish it, but they see in these Congressional laws an entering wedge to circumscribe the usefulness of the mails and trammel a free press. It is notorious that these very laws hav been appealed to, though thus far unsuccessfully, to suppress a lower order of Freethought literature, on the pretense that it is indecent; and it is not improbable, if the right of Congress to place a censorship over the mails is once acknowledged, that laws will be put into operation to exclude Infidel literature of all grades. It is a dangerous power, and neither the League nor Truth are the first to so denounce it. Henry Clay pronounced it a dangerous power from his place in the Senate when John C. Calhoun attempted to induce Congress to exercise it in reference to the circulation of anti-slavery documents. The effect then was to call it into action for the benefit of the slave power; and its exercise now is not so much in the interest of morality as in that of the church power.

It is the insidious beginning of the movement to unite church and state, and as such the Liberal League denounced it. They are as much in favor of purifying public morals by laws, or if laws won't reach the disease, by a rising of the people, as the church is. And they are much more disinterested than the church. But there are laws, state laws, which reach the evil and which it is the duty of public prosecutors to enforce. These laws make it a crime to mail an obscene publication as well as to circulate it in any other way, and in their enforcement legitimate mail matter is not subjected to a dangerous and unlawful espionage as it is now under the Congressional laws and the system of decoy and detection to which they hav given rise.

The circulation of obscene literature, like fraud and other social offenses, is a matter for police regulation, and its suppression belongs solely to the state. Unless we intend to make an empire of the United States, any invasion of the powers reserved to the states, no matter how commendable from a moral point of view, is dangerous to the republic.

This is the position of the Liberal League, and an attempt to identify its members, many of whom are among the purest men and women in the community, with the vile beings who liv by pandering to a morbid and most degrading taste is a libel which our weekly contemporary owes it to its own reputation for fairness to withdraw.

Explaining Elmina's Error.

Her startling statement respecting the mortality of mothers in a recent issue of The Truth Seeker—in which she refers to mortuary reports cited in the September number of the Physiologist—betrays very reckless reading of the referred-to excellent article by the "associate editor."

Sir James Simpson states in his address to the Social Science Congress at Belfast—on the strength of statistics published by Dr. Barnes—that out of 4,000 confined in the chief maternity hospitals of London 142 died, or 1 in every 28. Reference was also made to the registers of a St. Petersburg hospital, which gave even worse death-rates than any in London. But as we may reasonably suspect that puerperal fever had something to do with these hospital statistics, their value is accordingly lessened as authority in fixing a general average.

From data by Dr. Farr, it appears that in England the average mortality is 1 in 188. Dr. Stark estimates the risk of motherhood as expressed by one in 150. That seems to be a fair average applied to married women under the age of thirty. The birth of first children explains the risk run by women under that age. Under the age of twenty, ten married women die for every seven unmarried.

Dr. Foote cannot imagin where I got my figures for such an astonishing statement as Elmina attributes to me. Of course not, as they only hold true of the London hospitals. But Dr. Leon Le Fort found upon official investigation that out of 888,512 parturient women in maternity hospitals, where every kind of comfort and professional care was bestowed upon them, 30,394 died, or 1 to every 29. As a guide in giving my data upon this subject, I hav relied upon the carefully-compiled statistics of Dr. Matthews Duncan, who is universally accepted as an author of uncommon acuteness and accuracy.

Elmina should hav said 1 in every 150 instead of 1 in every 28.

Queer, Very.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It is astounding how men can write and talk about the Republican and Democratic parties. One would suppose they are thinking that 'tis the name alone makes the party. The least reflection ought to convince us that these two parties to-day hav not one thing in common with the parties that went by these names in 1861–5. Then the sole principle of the Republican was "Non-extension of slavery and ultra state rights." See its platform then. And the sole doctrins of the Democratic parties—there were two—were, of the one, "Territories open to slavery," and of the other, "Squatter sovereignty." Any additions to the platforms were mere excuses to fill space. Fully one-half the voters of all the parties then hav gone to the "narrow house and long home," their places taken by those who were then infants. And the very leaders of the Republican and Democratic parties hav changed sides. Butler, Logan, and fifty others I could name, who then were ultra-Democrats are or hav since been Republicans. Greeley, Sumner, Juliau, Brown, Blair, Trumbull, and fifty more leaders, Republicans, hav become Democrats. There is not one single dogma, doctrin, or plank advanced by any party to-day that had existence then. How, then, with leaders transposed, followers dead or mixed indiscriminately, and principles lost or forgotten, can men talk such nonsense about parties. The writer of this was an Abolitionist, open and avowed, though a citizen of a slave state, yet he has for four years voted to hav a change, and prefers Hancock to Garfield.

Ex-Abolitionist.

All skill ought to be exerted for universal good; every man has owed much to others and ought to repay the kindness that he has received.

Another Liberal Sneezes when Ingersoll takes Snuff.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It was with profound regret that I learned of the action of the Liberal League in passing a resolution that forced Mr. Ingersoll, H. L. Green, and others to resign. Since then I hav carefully tried to understand both sides of the dispute. In reading the newspaper report I said, Both are right. I was deeply impressed with the genuin sincerity of the two leaders. Mr. Ingersoll's speech was grand and wise, Mr. Wakeman's noble and logical. Some of the sentences in both hav in them moral courage and purpose enough to start a crusade. If these speeches had been made in the interest of any other subject, the nation would hav rung with their praise. There are sentences in both that deserve to be printed in letters of gold, and hung as mottoes in every Liberal home. Still there are two sides to this question. Human life is a very complicated problem. It is a sphinx, who destroys many before the wise Edipus solves the enigma.

Conduct, instead of being a choice between a right and a wrong, is sometimes a choice between two wrongs; and sometimes one right antagonizes another right. It is just here where the trouble begins in this case. Mr. Wakeman had one right and Mr. Ingersoll another. Mr. Wakeman, in seeing wrong on one side, seems to hav concluded that right must of necessity be on the other. Mr. Wakeman is a master logician, but Mr. Ingersoll is something more, for his instincts lead him better than logic. Mr. Wakeman is the student, and can solve the whole universe in his closet, but Mr. Ingersoll is the man of the world, who is so filled with the genius of the people that his very impulses are worth more than Mr. Wakeman's carefully-thought out convictions.

This question is not one of who is right and who is wrong. Mr. Wakeman was doubtless as true to himself as Mr. Ingersoll, but Mr. Ingersoll's self is a more serviceable commodity in the great work both and all hav so much at heart. The majority voted with Mr. Wakeman because they are truth seekers par excellence. They are going to reform the world with logic; but the world, like a stubborn child to the whip, won't be reformed that way. Heads before hearts, but the heart must not be forgotten in the reckoning. Mr. Wakeman was right logically, but Mr. Ingersoll was right practically, which is better. He may deserve no more praise than Mr. Wakeman, but in casting up the account I hav to decide with him.

I don't profess to understand the political phase of this question. I hav been too busy solving other problems to think much of this one. It is perhaps the most profound question this country has to settle. It was the question on which the war was fought. It is the question that underlies the present great political struggle. It is a terrible ugly rock in the shining river of progress, on which this republic may yet be split all to pieces. It was too great a question to settle in a three-days' convention. It may be to the honor of Mr. Wakeman and those that voted with him that they were so stanch and trouble-defying in their convictions, but this very strength and nobility forced upon others the alternativ of withdrawing.

I hav just learned that it is the purpose to organize a new League. Now I believe that Mr. Ingersoll is the greatest man of this age. I look to him as a leader. So long as I can be true to myself and do so I mean to follow and labor with him. I would not antagonize for one moment the present League. So far as I can I wish to labor with it. But I hav given my name to the call for the new League, and so, to be consistent, I herewith resign my vice-presidency in the present one. I do this after due and honest deliberation.

I hav been so generously welcomed by all the Liberals and hav found them so good and true that I would endure any sacrifice before casting a single reproach upon them. But Liberalism is not bondage. Happily it does not force us to unity, like orthodoxy, through fear of hell or malicious slander. It permits everyone to be true to himself without condemnation, or breach of trust or friendship. In mutual honor let us work together along the different paths that we hav chosen to accomplish the same end—the salvation and secularization of this government for the people and by the people. Let us all remember that true Liberalism is a grace and beauty of life; a breadth of affection that cannot be defined; a spirit of justice that is larger than all laws; a transparency of sincerity that glorifies its possessor in its pure and perfect naturalness, and that it is part of our work in the spirit and conduct of our lives to make the world see this in spite of fear and prejudice. Yours always,

George Chainey.

The Order of his Going.

The communication from Mr. Chainey, published in this column, was sent by messenger to The Truth Seeker office early Monday morning, Oct. 11th, with an urgent request that it be published that week. He gave no name to his essay, but it seems to be meant as both an acceptance and a resignation. In its latter quality it was not sent to the secretary of the League, nor to any official member of it; and to this day they do not know officially of his resignation. But for the courtesy of the editor of The Truth Seeker they would not hav known it till it was at his convenience to publish the document. If "true Liberalism is a grace and beauty of life," a true Liberal would hav observed the "grace and beauty" and propriety of sending to the officers of the League a form of resignation upon which they could act.

Still further, Mr. Chainey's resignation, such as it is, cannot be accepted without stating some related facts. His statement would not perhaps hav been objectionable in form if it had been made twenty or even ten days sooner, but the events and affiliations of those ten days make all the difference in the world. Since the great debate at Chicago Mr. Chainey had been meeting and conferring frequently with Mr. Wakeman and other Liberals in New York, also lecturing before the Leagues at Paterson, Port Jervis, and I think other places in this vicinity. It was understood that he accepted the decision of the Congress at Chicago on the great questions debated there. A movement had been set on foot—a preliminary meeting held and a committee appointed—by the combined Liberal societies of this city to gather a permanent congregation and employ Mr. Chainey to speak every Sunday. It was believed that he might to some degree take the place of Mr. Frothingham, and the old trustees of his church were being interviewed for that purpose. Mr. Wakeman specially interested himself in this project and used his influence with the "Liberal Club" and the "Society of Humanity" to promote it.

All this was going on for two days after Mr. Chainey had abandoned the field and departed for Washington; and the committee, composed of busy men, spent valuable time for two days without any notice from him of change of intention, and before hearing of it incidentally by one of the members dropping in at The Truth Seeker office. Mr. Wakeman, to whom of all men, in view of their relations, some notice should hav been sent, did not hear of it till late Wednesday afternoon. It occurs to him and the other promoters of this movement, that "a transparency of sincerity that glorifies its possessor" should hav prompted better treatment of a committee at work for a project in which he was such a vital center and they so deeply interested.

When men hav been pursuing a given, straightforward, consistent course of action, and all the omens foretoken that they will continue on in the same course; and then suddenly they deflect or altogether turn back on their tracks; their compeers and colleagues will inevitably look for the cause of disturbance and reversal of movement. Is it in any way singular, or merely coincidental, that these two men, Green and Chainey, each contriving that a conspicuous scene and tableau shall be wrought up and then resigning in the halo of it, are the very ones who are the beneficiaries in the great lecturer's bounty—$122 for each of them at Hornellsville and encouraging outlooks for more in the future. Mr. Chainey says, "Conduct, instead of being a choice between a right and a wrong, is sometimes a choice between two wrongs." But here is another truism. Conduct is sometimes a choice between a right and a wrong, plus the almighty dollar. What, then, becomes of the right, unless the temptation is sternly resisted and the right deliberately chosen?

The honest, independent judgment of liberal thinking men we honor and respect, and giv due heed to it in shaping a course of action; but the moment a judgment is tinged with the expectation of place, or profit, or self-advancement of any kind, it becomes a delusion and a snare. The dice are then loaded, the play becomes unfair, and must soon end from its own greed. People who study attitudes and pose in theatrical situations for the purpose of throwing odium upon acknowledged "truth seekers par excellence" shall be made to know that they only "split the ears of the groundlings;" while the judicious critic, "whose judgment outweighs a whole theater of others," takes them for what they are and is not deceived.

The salaried squire has no other function but to support and swear by his knight. He is, of course, to his hired henchman "the greatest man of this age."

Mr. Chainey says, "Mr. Wakeman is the student, and can solve the whole universe in his closet; but Mr. Ingersoll is the man of the world," etc. Never was there ever a greater misestimate of two men. Wakeman is a lawyer as Col. Ingersoll is. Wakeman is a student in his closet indeed, but he goes out daily with his "solutions of the universe" and applies them in practical life. He is in the constant practice of his profession, appearing in the courts of this great capital—capital not alone of this Republic but of the western hemisphere—meeting men, contending with them and judging of them everywhere. How then is he any the worse for being a student, and how is he any the less "a man of the world" than Col. Ingersoll—if that is the dominant virtue that makes a man great? The fact is Wakeman is every whit as much at home on the platform, and in the forum of debate, as ever Col. Ingersoll was; as "the greatest man af this age" found out to his cost at Chicago. This will do for one specimen of Mr. Chainey's judgment of men.

The Vice-Presidency of Mr. Chainey in the League was the work of Mr. Green. As Chairman of the Committee on Nominations at Chicago Green placed him there. In resigning he only returns to his own. Mr. Chainey has too recently escaped from a Christian pulpit to be altogether off his sea legs, and these staggers and vacillations may be set down to the inevitable obliquities there contracted. Poor Abbot suffered long from the same trouble which seems inseparable from pulpit ministrations.

When the adherents of the platform adopted at Chicago, or any of them, are found abandoning their colleagues without notice, or issuing a "confidential circular" instead of appealing openly to free and independent Liberals, or crooking the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning, or hiring adherents with money instead of attracting them by the merits of their cause, or going into a convention to obstruct its proceedings in order to force a policy which the delegates would not adopt on their judgment, then you may lecture us and ask us to "remember that true Liberalism is a grace and beauty of life; a breadth of affection that cannot be defined; a spirit of justice that is larger than all laws; a transparency of sincerity that glorifies its possessor in its pure and perfect naturalness, and that it is part of our work in the spirit and conduct of our lives to make the world see this in spite of fear and prejudice." As the years roll on we will submit to a candid world the arbitrament as to who best livs up to this standard of Liberalism. And look you to it, "good my brother, do not as some ungracious pastors do, show me the steep and thorny way to heaven, whilst himself the primrose path of dalliance treads and recks not his own rede."

Liberalism does not require its devotees to submit to contumely, confidential slander, purchased judgments, nor pretended alliances to get opportunity to resign and strike a more deadly blow; and we will not submit without returning blow for blow. When these proceedings stop we will stop. Enemies in war, in peace we will be friends. These are hard sayings, but it is due to the Liberals of this country who are pouring out their sympathies and their money to defend one after another of their imprisoned editors, that they, the Liberals, should know the motivs where one side takes the part of Comstock and publishes poetic, eloquent, innocent-looking resignations that don't after all resign.

Our cause has not the luxuries of the Grand Pacific nor the richness of the Comstock lode, nor the splendors of illustrious fame to offer for the enlistment of recruits. No; our standard is rather that of Garibaldi, who lured his devoted followers by the seductiv proclamation of black bread and hard tack for rations, the damp earth and blue sky for bed and covering, and fatigue, wounds, and death for final reward; and the volunteers from young Italy flocked to him by thousands on these terms. Of such is the kingdom of a patriot's heaven.

When I rolled out of Chicago after the Congress was over I left E. C. Walker and his brave little wife standing in the depot waiting to take the caboose of a cheap freight train to some near-by station, uncertain where, in order to commence selling Liberal books from town to town to pay their expenses home. It was a cheerless situation, which made me shrink, and I felt ashamed of my own comfortable express train, sleeping-car appointments, and ticket through to the door of my own little ones.

And there is another devoted worker, F. F. Follet, of Rockford, Illinois, who writes me that he, too, received Mr. Green's seductiv "confidential circular." He also travels from town to town selling books, making the most precarious living, but perfectly satisfied if he can, once in a while, induce a few citizens to organize a League.

Now here they are—a quartette of them—Chainey and Green, Walker and Follet. Down in the heart of hearts of all noble men and women, and in the estimation of all true heroes, which of them twain do the will of the Fathers of this republic? By devotions of the sacrificing kind hav good causes, all the way from the oldest time, been built up; and by these signs we, too, shall conquer.

In principle, the "lines at parting," written by Hosea Bigelow, thirty-five years ago, apply to the situation to-day:

"Wal, go 'long to help 'em stealin'
Bigger pens to cram with slaves;
Help the men that's ollers dealin'
Insults on your fathers' graves;
Help the strong to grind the feeble,
Help the many agin the few,
Help the men that call your people
Whitewashed slaves an' peddlin' crew!"

Now, if there are any more "sermons in stones" ready to fling at us, sling 'em along. The new Secretary is tired of this quiet life.

T. C. Leland.

Cowardice and Calumny?

AN OPEN LETTER TO COL. INGERSOLL.

Dear Sir: You hav charged Junius with being "a coward, a calumniator, and a sneak." It is not always easy to determin what calumny is. For instance, you hav telegraphed to James A. Garfield thus, "Your vindication has been as ample and glorious as the slanders were mean and malicious." Now I am not aware that any leading Democratic newspaper has published anything against Garfield half so damaging as what the leading Republican editors said about him seven years ago, but which the same newspapers refuse to reinsert to-day, even when offered to be paid for at advertising rates. If those charges, made by organs of his own party, and based upon the report of a congressional committee composed mostly of his own partisan friends, are false, then I agree that it is a calumny to repeat them. But I am not aware that they hav been shown to be false, and if not, how can they be called mean and malicious slanders?

But waving the question of calumny altogether, both as to Junius and the adversaries of Garfield, I humbly and earnestly entreat you to make good your accusation against Junius, that he was a coward and a sneak. And I hope you will find time to attend to this matter as soon as the exigencies of the presidential campaign will allow.

Respectfully yours, Wm. Henry Burr.

Washington, D. C., Oct. 15, 1880.

How odd that wise men will suspect Tanner, the faster, of cheating, spite of all the tests and spies around him, and will say, "He has not yet equaled the man of eighteen hundred years ago!" That part they swallow; never ask who watched, what tests were applied. O man, man, what a piece of work thou art! See Prof. Greenleaf, a law writer, on "Evidence." He has published a book on the Acts of the Apostles, to show the said Acts are genuin and true. Ha, ha, ha! Hearsay evidence could not be received to prove a citizen ate his breakfast, though ten thousand witnesses were proposed; but it will prove beyond doubt that the hand of God lifted Philip up and popped him down hundreds of miles off in a second of time—and hundreds of like miracles.

Letters from Friends.

SOUTH DARTMOUTH, MASS., Oct. 10, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: At a time like the present, when such men as Ingersoll, men on whom we thought we might count as being permanent, abiding friends in behalf of you and such as you who hav suffered for the cause, are leaving it, it is the duty of all who wish to uphold the efforts which are being made to counteract the proceedings of Comstock to work together. I, therefore, sympathizing fully and freely with you, and all who, like yourself, are endeavoring to secure freedom of thought as also of the mails, inclose $2.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for such period as it will pay the price of subscription. Will you, my dear sir, please inclose in the first number of the paper which you forward me a receipt acknowledging the payment of the sum inclosed in this communication, that I may know for how long a period my subscription extends.

Most truly yours, EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I hope you hav read and will lay before your readers an editorial on the Liberal League by J. M. Roberts in Mind and Matter of October 2d. How any journalist who has the love of humanity at heart can pen such an article as that is one of the profound mysteries of life. I trust you will lay the whole editorial before your readers and let them see fully the animus of this editor Roberts, who professes to be a Liberalist "of the first water," and a Spiritualist too. The editorial is sufficient of itself without note or comment. Think of a journalist who dares the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER to publish that Comstock law, which it (THE TRUTH SEEKER) has already done at least once, if not more, to my certain knowledge. Where did this immaculate brother J. M. Roberts come from but the same "obscene" fountain of nature that the rest of us sprang from, a mother's womb? Nature is obscene, is she? Did he spring from the loins of the Cæsars, the divinity of kings, or was he saved by the "Holy Ghost," and now "upon what meats does this our brother feed that he has grown so large," apparently towering above all other human beings in personal virtue, wisdom, holiness, and gift of prophecy? What fallacy now for the Liberal League to think of holding a substantial footing on this planet any longer after Bro. Roberts, editor of a Spiritualistic journal, whose lofty brow towers in the sunshine of heaven, and whose spiritually-guided feet tread daily and hourly the confines of the spirit world, has prophesied of its inevitable dissolution and ruin! It would seem to be the hight of madness and folly indsed to think that the Liberal League will not now die and be no more, when an oracle from the skies, an inspired penman in daily converse with the spirits of the blest in the beautiful summer land, has told us so.

A brother who daily drinks of the divine afflatus of Republicanism, Spiritualism, and celestial wisdom it would seem ought to know. Will the Liberal League, a band of heroic men and women contending for one of the grandest principles that ever animated the human heart, listen to the administrations of this "new-born prophet" and dissolve the League, and let Anthony Comstock and the immaculate Republican party run henceforth and forever this republic of ours, established by the heroes of '76? As much as Bro. Roberts and the great and loved Ingersoll, Green, and others desire such a consummation, I hardly think it will occur just to accommodate them.

To show what manner of man brother Roberts is (for with all his faults, and they are many, he is still a brother to us all, and I hav no ill-will to gratify), I will present the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER his reply to an article I sent him for publication, in which I criticised Republicanism and the money power, a brief but very similar article to one bearing my name in a former number of your paper. I was honest and earnest in trying to prove to him and his readers that the money power was the greatest tyranny we had on earth. I spoke of my own case and that of others in which the Republican and Democratic parties or Republico-Democratic party and the money power had dealt myself and others a deadly blow, we who had been soldiers, fighting to uphold the flag of our country. I requested him if he did not see proper to publish to return the article, which he did with the following strictures:

MR. R. E. LA FETRA, Dear Sir: As requested, I return the within article. I cannot see how it can in any way advance the truth as it concerns the public, and that is the aim and object of my paper. You are manifestly governed in your views of political duty as too many others are by your immediate disappointments and personal grievances. I would not hav you act on any other plane of duty so long as you are incapable of seeing matters from a less selfish standpoint. What the Republican party has done to place you in the position you are, your letter does not explain. You make many sweeping assertions but cite no fact to show that any of them hav any just foundation. If you can show that the Republican party is justly chargeable with any of the wrongs you charge against it, I will appease it too, but you are like Mr. Bennett, unpatriotic enough to put your private interests before those of the public, and with such persons I hav no political sympathy.

I am respectfully, J. M. ROBERTS,
Editor of Mind and Matter.

My response, which of course he would not publish:

MR. J. M. ROBERTS, Dear Sir: Had health permitted I should hav responded ere this to giv your strictures upon the article I sent you for publication, and which you hav returned, not deeming it worthy a place in your columns. I care nothing for the article itself, only for the truths it contains; but you say you cannot see that the article "had any relation to the public good, the object and aim of your paper." You say further that I made many "sweeping assertions, but cited no fact to show that they had any just foundation." You say also that "you are manifestly governed in your political views by your personal grievances," and then say, "I would not hav you act on a less selfish plane of duty while you are incapable of seeing matters from a less selfish standpoint, and that like Mr. Bennett you are unpatriotic enough to put your own private interests before those of the public, and that with such persons I hav no political sympathy."

Now I suppose that these are not sweeping assertions of yours without one solitary fact to prove them. What journalist who professes to be truthful and liberal ever made more sweeping assertions than those without a particle of evidence to prove them? What journalist can descend lower than to impeach the private character of an individual of whom he knows nothing? What do you know about my private character? How do you know I am the "selfish man" you charge me with being? I treated you as a gentleman, but I did not agree with you politically; and I suppose because I did not that I am a Catholic, a Jesuit, and am a low, base, selfish man simply because I do not accept you as a political oracle, and hence am nursing my private grievances like Mr. Bennett against the divine sovereignty and popish infallibility of your great Republican party, that is too immaculate, no doubt, in your opinion, to ever commit an error against any person.

You say I made statements against the party, but cited no proof. Had I cited all the proof (as I am abundantly able to do), it would hav made the article too long, and then you would hav rejected it on account of its length. The truth it, beyond doubt, as fairly shown by your editorials and ungentlemanly replies to my article, that you do not want the other side presented, and no doubt you want the patrons of your paper to believe that you are a polical oracle, the fount of political wisdom itself, and that it is not worth while for them to look for truth beyond your statements. All persons who disagree with you you seem to denounce at once as base and selfish; and as soon as you see their heads sticking up anywhere you are ready with your tomahawk to scalp.

It is just possible, Mr. Roberts, that you do not know it all yet upon all subjects, or any one subject that the human mind can grasp. I thought we were all brothers in this great world, as indeed we ought to be, one toward another, and that we severally occupied the position of both teachers and pupils. But it seems I am mistaken. You are the teacher, and infallible, too, and we are the scholars.

When Mr. Bundy refused you (as you hav stated he did) the columns of his paper to make a true statement of the seances given by the Blisses and Mr. James, and also your conviction therewith, and for which reason you say you started Mind and Matter (not finding a paper through which you could defend those mediums and yourself), was it because of your personal grievances you started your paper, or was it for a principle? If it was established on the basis of a personal grievance, I do not think it is worthy of much patronage; and if it was established on the basis of principle, then might it not be barely possible, Mr. Roberts, that some others in this world are actuated by principle as well as yourself, even including the Infidel Bennett and myself? I hav been the editor of a paper myself, and I never yet descended to that low plane, journalistically or individually, and I hope to God I never will, as to presume that I alone am infallible, and that all others who do not agree with me in my opinions are actuated by private grievances and selfish motivs. You seem to me more like a "Southern fire-eater" than any other journalist I know of in this country.

If the spirit that you manifest sometimes in your paper is the true spirit of Spiritualism, then the less the world knows of Spiritualism the better. In these communications that you claim come from the spirit world (and, for aught I know, do come from there), the spirit that they breathe is continually in favor of love, mercy, kindness, and goodness. What a contrast in the spirit they breathe and you breathe at times!

I hav no objection to your fighting the enemies of Spiritualism with flaming sword if you wish, and I like some of your articles very much, and some other features of your paper very much, but why count every one who disagrees with you an enemy to truth and to Spiritualism, which is not in any sense the case? Why fly off in a tangent and claim that everybody is dogmatizing and opposed to the truth, and then scalp them on every hand without mercy because they do not see things as you do?

Is this the hight of Spiritualistic journalism? In the name of truth and goodness, I hope not. I want to be a friend, a brother, a co-worker, a helper, to every man and woman on the face of the whole earth who is also working for truth, goodness, and liberty in all directions of human progress and well being, and I do not want to be denounced as selfish and low-lived because I do not see everything just as others do.

Yours for truth in all things,
R. E. LA FETRA.

CHARLES CITY, IOWA, Oct. 8, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: We hav had a Methodist Conference at Osage, a town twenty miles north of us. There were 166 ministers in attendance. They took a vote among them for President. The result was 3 for Hancock, 2 for Weaver, and 1 for Dow, so you can see how many of them are in favor of temperance by their votes.

I was in hopes that Mr. Ingersoll would see the errors of his party. But he is so wedded to it he cannot see them. I can sympathize with him, for I used to be just as big a yellow dog as he when I belonged to the Democratic party, and run under the wagon as faithfully as ever one of those collared dogs ever followed a nigger.

I am glad the Congress stood firm on the repeal of the Comstock laws. They hav the hearty support of all the Liberals here in this part of Iowa. Mr. Ingersoll, in the stand he took, has the condemnation of all the Liberals here.

Mrs. Mahara and I were at the Marshalltown Convention. It was the grandest feast of Freethought that we ever had the pleasure to attend.

Mr. Leland, the grand writer and reader, and Mr. Jamieson, one of the grandest debaters now living, and as fine a speaker as exists, gave us their opinions on Freethought in a way that could be understood by every one.

Mrs. Lake is a very pleasant and forcible speaker, and so is Mr. Phelps, of Kansas. But the grandest lady speaker is Mrs. Parry of Wisconsin.

Friend Walker is the greatest worker that we hav in Iowa.

The Convention will not be forgotten, but will be remembered for a long time by its friends and opponents.

I see by your letters you hav had a very pleasant trip, and I hope you hav enjoyed it and that it was a benefit to your health.

I think the Republicans will try to count Garfield in whether he is elected or not. They hav got it all fixed to do it. They hav over one hundred thousand men armed, and are drilling them for that purpose. We had about five hundred of them on drill here last week. They want a strong government here with a big N to it, and an established church. I think we will hav to hav another revolution to get free again. My best respects to Mr. Leland and yourself. Thine for the right, JOHN MAHARA.

PORTSMOUTH, O., Oct. 10, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As many Republicans would hav us believe that Mr. Garfield entertains Liberal views equally with Mr. Hancock, I would like to ask why Mr. Garfield's support comes mostly from preachers and their dupes, as was proved a few days ago in this district, when three hundred Methodist preachers were in conference, during which a vote was taken and Mr. Hancock received just two votes. How does that strike you, my brother Infidel? While we believe that their preaching has a tendency to keep the people in ignorance we are not so foolish as to think that they themselvs are so ignorant as to vote against their own interests; then why should we?

Speaking of Methodist preachers reminds me of a good story that I listened to the past week, got off at their expense, which was new to me and may be to many of your readers.

In a Western town where a conference was held, the deadhead accommodations being quite scarce, so that a number of the preachers were compelled to put up at the village tavern, it so happened that one evening about a dozen of these saintly beings and as many of the ungodly were assembled in the little barroom, and among the latter was old Uncle Jerry, the worst old Infidel in the town. For years they had been trying to convert this old fellow, and finally, becoming tired of them, he on this occasion propounded the following question:

Did any of you gentlemen ever see a Methodist minister's tomb? Now, this was a singular question, and yet there are few men that can answer it in the affirmativ; and so it was on this occasion, not one could say yes. Well, now, can you tell me why this is so? Well, said he, they all become gamblers or horse-thieves before they die. After that time old Uncle Jerry was never asked to come up to the mourner's bench. W. A. FAZE.

BROOKSTON, TEX., Oct. 9, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: About seventy years ago I read in a school-book this sentence: "Socrates died like a philosopher, but Jesus Christ like a God." I then regarded the sentence as a very noble, truthful declaration; I now look on it as mere bombast, destitute of truth. First, I remark, how could the writer compare the dying of Jesus with the dying of a god, when no god had ever died? It would certainly hav been more correct to say that Jesus died like a coward, than like a god, for his last utterance was a loud, unmeaning, senseless yell. If he spoke the truth in death he died in a godforsaken condition. Thousands of Infidels hav out-died Jesus. But I am bound to say that Jesus was a good man; but no god. Jesus was possessed of moral courage to a fault. His zeal more than equaled his knowledge.

I hold that, as a general rule, the intelligent Infidel outdies the intelligent orthodox Christian. The intelligent Infidel has no brimstone hell to fear. The Bible says, "Fear hath torment." The Christian knows or thinks he knows, that he that believeth not shall be damned in an eternal fiery, brimstone hell, and further knows that he has many friends and kinsfolks who are unbelievers. He knows then that they are in danger of the brimstone and fire every moment of their lives. Now he can't help fearing, unless he be a brute, and fear hath torment. Indeed, the Christian can't know but that he may be an unbeliever himself before he dies. So I conclude that the intelligent Infidel livs a happier life and dies a more peaceful death than the intelligent orthodox Christian does, so far as their religion is concerned. J. A. RUTHERFORD.

BURR OAK, MICH., Oct. 8, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav this day received a confidential circular from H. L. Green, once the efficient and worthy chairman of the Executiv Committee of the National Liberal League, stating that on account of certain objectionable proceedings at the National Liberal League Congress, lately held in Chicago, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, R. C. Spencer, and himself withdrew and decided to call an informal meeting at the Grand Pacific Hotel in Chicago, on the 15th day of November next, to take steps to organize a new Liberal Association, in which circular he asks the following questions:

1. Do you approve of the proposed informal meeting?
2. Will you attend the proposed conference?
3. If it is thought best will you allow your name to be attached to a public call for this meeting? To all of which I hav sent him a vigorous, No.

I had fondly hoped that the National Liberal League had received its first and last split when poor Abbot and his seceders left it, but it seems another branch has been torn asunder, another wayward son has left the parental roof, to organize anew, but like his predecessor, I think he will pine away and die. I was grieved to see Mr. Green and R. G. Ingersoll leave us at Chicago. I am of the opinion that if the Liberals of this country ever accomplish anything politically they hav got to stand together; we need them all, every one, to pull together and use their forces on the common enemy, instead of quarreling among themselvs. I cannot exactly understand Mr. Green's position. A year or so ago he was congratulating Mr. Wakeman on his masterly statement in regard to the Comstock laws; said he never understood them before, and was then in favor of their repeal. Now he comes out in the Fourth Annual Congress and because it passes a resolution in favor of repeal he withdraws, resigns, backs out, and is going to start a new party. It won't do, Bro. Green; it won't liv.

I myself understand the intent and workings of those laws better since listening to Mr. Wakeman at the late Chicago Congress, and as a delegate there I voted for the repeal of them, first, last, and all the time. I stand upon that platform to-day with Thaddeus B. Wakeman as my standard bearer of liberty and human rights whose superior in my judgment does not exist, and to whose guidance and instructions the Liberals of the United States may safely trust their cause. All hail the power of Wakeman's brain. Ingersoll says what we want is to see to it that Christians do not smother our Liberal literature. That is exactly what we are going to do; so we say, "Away with Comstock laws." There are laws for the suppression of obscene literature when Comstock laws are gone, and when we deposit our mail in the care of the United States we want to say to Anthony Comstock and his cohorts, "Keep your vile hands off!" This Robert C. Spencer, I helped to expel from the Chicago Congress with my vote, and he deserves the eternal contempt of every liberty-loving soul in the land, and I for one am not going to desert the old ship now with our noble old President Elizur Wright at the head (whom Mr. Green worked so hard to re elect), and such other veteran reformers as Parker Pillsbury, Josiah P. Mendum, Horace Seaver, D. M. Bennett, Amy Post, Lucy Colman, and hosts of others, to join hands in a new departure with this Robert C. Spencer as one of its figure-heads. Fellow-Liberals of America, stand by your colors and keep them flying! Let not the mailed hosts of superstition nor the weak-kneek saints of Liberalism swerve you from the right, and remember that there is a principle at stake here which is deeper and broader and grander than the eloquence of Mr. Ingersoll or the impudence of Mr. Spencer. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and if we would ever attain that liberty we must be up and doing. Yours for the right, A. H. THURSTON.

THE Albatross has no hind toe nor claw.

A Query.

Where seek ye for the truths you need
On which the hungry mind would feed?
Where does the tree of knowledge grow?

Say, can you show the way to me,
For its fair fruit I fain would see?
Must we perform a journey far
Before the way we can unbar?

And when it's found, is it not dear?
Will it not cost you many a tear?
Would not a falsehood smoother glide,
Than stemming such a stubborn tide?

Where will you find your recompense
For weary toil in truth's defense?
Does it stoop down to whisper peace,
And tell you all these wrongs shall cease?

They'll cease when tyrants lose their power,
When threat'ning c'ouds no longer lower;
They'll cease when light the clouds break through,
And many see as now a few.

Wraith of Thomas Paine.

BY ALHAZA.

That wraith flew over sea and land.
And like the sun it lent its flame,
When the great Congress was convened,
To publish noble Wakeman's name.

He met the tempest; words like his
Could rescue justice on the brink
Of error's dark and foul abyss,
Left by some traitor hand to sink.

If I were sleeping 'neath the ground,
"No briar-rose my soul could wake,"
But it would leave the daisied tomb
To hear the voice of Mrs. Lake.

Her heart yearns o'er the starving poor;
She would not liv on costly fare,
And see the child of want go by,
Nor offer him a generous share.

Some cannot hear the battle's shock;
They tremble at the cannon's roar.
They murder Freedom for a crown,
And soothe her bleeding heart no more.

Then let them leave the struggling League,
But noble hearts are beating there.
They keep the life-boat taut and trim,
To meet the waves of dark despair.

Some beings move with glittering wings;
Of solid virtue they are scant;
Put them severely to the test,
You'll find them naught but gilt and rant.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1880.

I wish to notify the public that a Mr. Baldwin, of Chicago, also Rhodes & McClure, of the same place, are publishing pamphlet editions of my lectures. All the lectures published by them are grossly inaccurate—filled with mistakes, horribly printed, and outrageously unjust to me. These men are simple literary thieves and pirates, and are obtaining money from the public under false pretenses. I take this course to warn the public that these publications are fraudulent. The only correct copies of my lectures are published by C P. Farrell. All others are published by people who are willing to steal from me and defraud the public vender. These wretches hav published one lecture under four titles, and several others under two or three.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To Miss Anna Knoop, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Conclusions Drawn from Apostolic Writings.

BY F. MENSIGA.

CONTENTS.—Questionable Dogmas, Superstition and Religion, the Appearance of Christ, the Life of Christ, Comments and Explanations of Jude, James, John, Peter, Paul (all his epistles), Acts, the Four Gospels, Revelations, a Summary, Erroneous Theories of Deity, Heaven, Devil, Hell, the Author's Intuitions, Evolution of Life. A work of strength and merit.

An octavo volume of 253 pages. Price, $1.50. Sold at this office.

THE MODERN THINKER.

Second number, 8vo, 160 pp. . . $1.00.

The Rights of Man. By THOMAS PAINE. Written in defense of his fellowman. A work almost without a peer in the world. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

Life of Thomas Paine. By CALVIN BLANCHARD. 12mo. Large type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 4 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

[From the Western Reformer.]

"DR. R. P. FELLOWS is a highly educated and scientific physician. He has an original system of practice, and is perfectly reliable and trustworthy. We hav heard many flattering reports of his successful cures of diseases incident to humanity."

JUST OUT!

Another Extraordinary Book!

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind.

Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Gems of Thought.

THE worst education that teaches self-denial is better than the best that teaches everything else and not that.—John Sterling.

NOBODY likes plain truths, when they are unpleasant truths, to be told them by competent authority, and almost all people try to avenge themselvs by declaring the teller a most impertinent person. Strict, plain truths hav to be told sometimes.—London Spectator.

A VERMONT shoemaker being asked if he had any religion, made answer, "Just enough to make good shoes, glory to God!" and with an extra pull he drew the waxed thread finely to its place. Let us endow his bench as a new chair in the divinity school.—Christian Register.

READER, attend! whether thy soul
Soars fancy's flights beyond the pole,
Or darkling grubs this earthly hole,
In law pursuit;
Know, prudent, cautious self-control
Is wisdom's root. —Burns.

THE whole value of a belief in God depends on the estimate we form of his nature and character. It would be better to believe in no God at all than to believe in a God whose nature and character would render the belief degrading to our own nature and conduct.—John Querry, D.D.

ATHEISM leaves a man to sense, to philosophy, to natural piety, to laws, to reputation, all which may be guides to an outward moral virtue, though religion were not; but superstition dismounts all these and erecteth an absolute monarchy in the minds of men.—Bacon's Essays.

WE are all of us (though not all equally) mistaken; and the cherished dogmas of each of us are not, as we had fondly supposed, the pure truth of God, but simply our own special form of error—the fragmentary and refracted ray of light which has fallen on our own minds.—Greg.

WE will leave it to the Jews to stamp their infant sons as something special by a permanent physical mark; we would not hav even a transient one, for we would not hav our children something special, we would only hav them men, and to be men we will bring them up.—Strauss.

THE name of Infidel is applied to the best of men; the wisest, the most spiritual and heavenly of our brothers. The bad and the foolish naturally ask, If the name be deserved, what is the use of religion, as good men and wise men can be good and wise, heavenly and spiritual without it? The answer is plain—but not to the blind.—Theodore Parker.

WHERE there is a great deal of smoke and no clear flame it argueth much moisture in the matter, and yet it witnesseth certainly that there is fire there, and therefore dubious questioning is a much better evidence than that senseless deadness which most men take for believing. Men that know nothing in science hav no doubts.—Archbishop Leighton.

THOU know'st that thou hast formed me,
With passions wild and strong;
And listening to thy witching voice
Has often led me wrong.

Where human weakness has come short,
Or frailty stept aside,
Do thou, All-good, for such thou art,
In shades of darkness hide. —Burns.

EVERYONE wishes to hav truth on his side; but it is not everyone that sincerely wishes to be on the side of truth. Men miss truth more often from their indifference about it than from intellectual incapacity. He who propagates a delusion, and he who connives at it, when already existing, both alike tamper with truth. We must neither lead nor leave men to mistake a falsehood for truth. Not to undeceive is to deceive.—Archbishop Whately.

WHAT did Jesus teach? Manly, self-reliant resistance of wrong, and practice of right? No, the keystone of his whole teaching may be found in the text, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. v, 3). Is poverty of spirit the chief among virtues, that Jesus givs it the prime place in his teachings? Is poverty a virtue at all? Surely not. Manliness of spirit, honesty of spirit, fullness of rightful purpose; these are virtues, but poverty of spirit is a crime.—Charles Bradlaugh.

ALL the religions and all the sects are in a state of flux. Even the Roman Catholic church, anchored though it be by the solid continent of institutions nearly two thousand years old, is yet partially afloat and dissolving. It, too, has its two parties, the fixed and the movable. All the leading religions, the Hebrew, the Christian, the Mohammedan, the Hindu, the Confucian, hav been breeding in the last fifty years a race of souls to large or too free to stay within them. They all hav the ex-members or those just ready to step out. And all the denominations are in commotion, a part of the membership going backward, a part forward, and a part trying in vain to stand still between the two parties.—Wm. J. Potter.

ONE penitent poet implores Varuna (the god of night) to tell him for what offense he seeks to kill his worshiper and friend, as all the sages tell him that it is Varuna that is angry with him. The poet pleadingly contends that he is not an intentional culprit; that he has been seduced by wine, anger, dice, or thoughtlessness. Another begs the god that, in whatever way mortals may hav broken his laws, he will be gracious. A third admits that he who was Varuna's friend has offended against him, but asks that they who are guilty may not reap the fruits of their sin; concluding with this amicable hint, "Do thou, wise god, grant protection to him who praises thee."—Amberley.

Odds and Ends.

WHEN a young lady tripped into a music store the other day and asked the bashful clerk in attendance for "Two Kisses," he jammed on his hat and rushed out of the back door. The clerk, never having heard of the piece of music, thought he was the victim of a leap-year proposal and his salary was not large enough to support two.

"TAKE the elevator," is the kindly-looking sign on the fence of a meadow only two miles out of Burlington. And a curious reader climbed over that fence to look for the elevator. He found it, took it on the return trip, and got over the fence in less than half the time it took him going in. The elevator was a dark brindle in color, had a curl in the middle of his forehead, and when he pawed the ground and talked bass, you couldn't see nor hear anything but dust and thunder.

AN anxious father was consulting one of the Wall street magnates as to what business he should put his son to. "My boy, sir," said he, "has had a first-rate education and is remarkably truthful." "I don't see much good in that," said the Wall street man, jingling the double-eagles in his breeches-pocket. "None of the successful men I know are truthful. Better make your boy an apothecary; that's the only business I know of where deceit does not pay in the long run."

"GENTLEMAN!" I interrupted, "did you ever hear how I went to prayer-meeting at New London, Conn., in a rain storm?"

They said they had not.

"Well, gentlemen," I continued, "one day I started for the New London prayer-meeting on horseback. When I got about half way there there came up a fearful storm. The wind blew a hurricane, the rain fell in torrents, the lightning gleamed through the sky, and I went and crouched down behind a large barn. But pretty soon the lightning struck that barn, knocked it into a thousand pieces, and sent my horse whirling over into a neighboring cornfield."

"Did it kill you, Mr. Perkins?" asked Mr. Twain, the tears rolling down his cheeks.

"No, it didn't kill me," I said, "but I was a good deal discouraged."

"Well, what did you do then, Mr. Perkins?"

"What did I do? Well, gentlemen, I hardly knew what to do, but to tell you the honest Connecticut truth, I went right straight out into that pasture, took off my coat, humped up my bare back, and took eleven clips of lightning right on my bare backbone, and drew the electricity all out of the sky, and then got on my horse and rode to New London in time to lead at the evening prayer-meeting."

Arise and sing!—Eli Perkins.

AT the last meeting of the Lime Kiln Club the Committee of Internal Improvements announced their readiness to make a special report. Some days since Brother Samuel Shin, one of the charter members of the club, was charged with drunkenness, and the committee were instructed to investigate and bring their findings before the lodge. The report was as follows:

"De charge was dat on a certain day an' date Brudder Shin was noticed to fall down five times while gwine from a certain butcher shop to his house, a distance of two blocks. Fo' white men an' a boy testified to dis fack befo' de committees wid de statement dat when de wind am in de east, an' de air full o' 'lectricity he am subject to blindness, as was de case dat day His case am s'ported by his wife and dorter, who hev even known him to fall down on de doah-step at midnight. Dis committee, takin' all fings inter considerashun, hev arrove at de conclushun dat Brudder Shin hez cl'ared hissel, of the charge of drunkenness, and do so report."

There was deep silence for half a minute, and then Brother Gardner quietly observed:

"Brother Shin, you hev been investigated an' cl'ared of de charge, but in de fucher I want you to keep your eye on de wedder-vanes aroun' town, an' when you see de wind shiftin' do you make tracks fur hum. We will now dissolve."

A MAN with a grip-sack in his hand halted before a Jefferson avenue fruit stand yesterday and priced a choice variety of peaches. When told that they were twenty cents a dozen he whistled to himself, walked softly around, and finally asked:

"Are you a Baptist?"

"Hardly."

"Neither am I. I didn't know but that if we both belonged to the same denomination you'd throw off a little. Do you lean to the Methodist?"

"Can't say that I do."

"That's my case. I never did take much stock in Methodists. Twenty cents a dozen is an awful price on those peaches, considering how tight money is. I expect you are a Universalist, eh?"

"No,"

"Neither am I. Can't you say fifteen cents for a dozen of these?"

"Hardly."

"Aren't you an Episcopalian?"

"No, sir."

"Neither am I, but I was afraid you were. I've been sort o' looking you over, and I shouldn't wonder if you trained with the United Brethren. Come, now, own up."

"I never attend that church," was the steady reply.

"Nor I, either. Say, what are you, any how?'

"I'm a hard-baked old sinner."

"No! Whoop! That's my case to a dot! I'm called the wickedest man in Washtenaw county! I knew there was a bond of sympathy between us if we could only find it out! Now, do you say fifteen cents for a dozen?"

The fruit-dealer counted them out without further objection.

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 7. No. 44. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, October 30, 1880. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

A CONVICT in the Belleville, Ont., jail recently eloped with the jailer's wife.

WE never yet knew of a church so honest that its members dare leave umbrellas in the hall.

How can there be harmony in heaven if the different religious denominations quarreled with each other there as in earth life?

INVESTIGATION frequently leads to doubt where there was none before. So much the better. If the thing is not true, inquiry can do no possible harm.

THE Puritan is a man who worships God according to the dictates of his own conscience, then knocks the lives out of his neighbors who won't be guided by the same conscience.

WE never hav met an orthodox Christian who could giv the least idea of what he should do or be called to do in heaven, except to drink milk, eat honey, and sing—between spasms of colic.

THE Independent makes fun of the New York Observer for saying that Bishop Whittingham of Maryland is in attendance at the Episcopal General Convention, and calls attention to the fact that the bishop has been dead for more than a year.

A TRIAL of the Rev. Dr. J. W. Carhart, presiding elder of the Northern Wisconsin Methodist Conference, has resulted in his conviction of dishonesty, lying, perjury, and general immorality. The court was composed of fifteen Methodist Episcopal clergymen, and their verdict was unanimous.

ONE Sunday morning recently the Wesleyans of Bridgend, Wales, on opening their chapel for the usual service, discovered that some persons had during the preceding night entered the building and tarred the whole of the sittings. The pulpit, the communion rails, and the organ seat had been treated in the same manner, and even the Bible in the pulpit.

SOME of the priests in Rome are so touchy—so full of Beecherism, so afraid they will slop over, that they issue edicts forbidding good looking women attending church, unless wearing a shawl or something of loose drapery to conceal the fairness of their forms. The old roosters had better go out and saw cord-wood or work out their poll-tax shoveling dirt on the highway. Too much religious devotion seems to—no it don't, either!—Great West.

THE Colored Sons and Daughters of Rebecca were dancing merrily in a St. Louis hall, and the members of the German Baptist Conference were eating supper in a room underneath. A janitor entered an apartment adjoining the hall where the gas had been turned on unlighted and struck a match. A tremendous explosion was the result, and an entire set of dancers dropped through the shattered floor right on the clergymen's table. Ball and supper were both ruined.

WE honor Judas Iscariot the Fusionist. He was very sweet on Jesus till tired of poor fare, then fused with the Jews, who, for political and other reasons, wanted Christ out of the way, went in with the hard-money party for harmony and thirty pieces of silver. Then finding it was not easy to sleep with his head in the bosom of Christ and his feet in a silver vault, had the good sense to go out and find a rope. We honor Judas for the last and most patriotic act of his life—the tail end of it.—Brick Pomeroy.

SOME of the "Christian" journals are charging the Liberal League with favoring the transmission through the mails of obscene literature because it demands free mails. The charge is characteristic of the church, which has been a liar, slanderer, and murderer since its foundation. Show us a Liberal who asks to hav sent through the mails anything as smutty as any one of a thousand verses we can select from the Bible and we will concede all those religious bigots claim. Liberals hav no use for smut. We leave the monopoly of it to that "Christian church," the story of whose birth is too vile for relation in the presence of grown men and women. Think of the story of the Holy ——. Well, under the impulse of "Christian" education we came near relating the foul story. Had we done so, our paper would hav been suppressed and ourself indictable under the Comstock law.—Cloud Co. Blade.

DR. BEHM and Prof. Wagner, German geographers of standing, who hav devoted much attention to the statistics of population, hav just issued a new edition of their calculations. They arrive, after great labor, at results which we quote, because they modify materially the estimate popularly current in Great Britain: Europe, 315,929,000; Asia, 838,704,000; Africa, 205,679,000; America, 95,495,500; Australia and Polynesia, 4,031,000; polar regions, 32,000; the world, 1,455 923,500. The calculation for Europe, which must be substantially accurate, is much larger than the usual one; but even then the immense bulk of humanity, five in seven of mankind, dwells in Asia and Africa, a fact which the philosophers will do well to remember. The Londoner or Parisian is not exactly "man."—The Spectator.

PERE HYACINTHE'S movement in Paris is not an entire success. Indeed, he is already reduced to the last extremity. He has three curates to assist him in his work, and they are in such poverty that appeals hav been made to the charitable for their support. The French hav very little confidence either in the Pere or his mission, and are somewhat chary about giving centimes. Unless the church of England comes to his assistance, and that right speedily, the Pere will soon hav neither church building nor congregation nor salary. The statements of two years ago, which had all the appearance of a pyrotechnic display, and which led one to believe that the whole of France was to be revolutionized in the course of a few months, look now a good deal like boasting and bravado.

DR. S. GIBBON, medical officer of health for the Holborn district, in his report for the past year, states that, whatever may be the cause, there is no doubt that a Jew's life in London is, on the average, worth twice as many years as a Christian's. The Hebrews of the metropolis are notoriously exempt from tubercular and scrofulous taint. It is very rare that one meets with pulmonary consumption among them. The medical officer of one of their large schools has remarked that their children do not die in anything like the same ratio as Gentile children; and in the district of Whitechapel the medical officer of health has reported that on the north side of the High street, occupied by the Jews, the average death rate is 20 per 1,000, while on the south side, occupied by English and Irish, it is 43 per 1,000.

THE Rev. J. O. Peck, D.——D., of Brooklyn, has been pitching into theaters. "All the eulogiums you may heap upon the classic creations of Shakspere are granted," says the reverend, "yet no lady could read his plays in her own parlor to a promiscuous company of ladies or gentlemen." Probably not. And the distinguished D.——D. might hav added that she could not read the Bible to such a promiscuous company either. Indeed it would require considerable self-control for a modest lady to read many and many a passage in the Bible even in the privacy of her own chamber, without a blush. Not that this necessarily coun's against the worth of the book. It was translated at a time when language and manners were not so refined as now. But Shakspere was written in such a time too, even earlier, and if its indelicate passages are arrayed against it, the assailant must expect to hear similar arguments used against the literature he holds sacred.—Truth.

THE Presbyterian Banner, a staunch old orthodox sheet, is in morning. It evolves briny tears over the sins and wickedness of this age, it loudly laments over the lack of converts to the Christian religion, and thinks there is need of an outpouring of the holy spirit over the entire church. Whether the editor of the Banner means the outpouring of the holy spirit of Calvin we know not; but if he does we wish to hav no such outpouring this side of the Rockies. A good square outpouring from the vaults of the bank of Nevada, or the Bonanzas of the Comstocks, would do this community a great deal more good than a mythical outpouring of the holy spirit of the distinguished gentleman so vaguely alluded to by the Presbyterian organ. As between a spiritual shower and a metallic shower from the coffers of Mr. Flood, living, the average San Franciscan—if he is virtuous and honest as he ought to be—would say, "Giv us Flood's shower every time." This is religion in San Francisco "and don't you forget it."—Jewish Times.

DISCUSSING the claim of Christian theologians that Christianity is the religion of gentleness, the Jewish Messenger spiritedly says: Let us grant that Christianity is a creed of gentleness. Is the average Christian meek and mild? Has the Christian church proved itself gentleness personified during the past fifteen centuries? Is the Christianity of the Inquisition a revelation of terror or of gentleness? Is the Christianity of Calvin a revelation of tenderness and mercy? Is Christian charity compassionate? Look at the Jewish race, hounded down through the ages for the greater glory of God? Is the Christian creed so gentle? What made so many Christian clergymen the apologists of slavery? Is the Christian dispensation so gracious? What made Christian England debase a nation by traffic in opium, and blow the Sepoys from the cannon's mouth? Do the lives and character of the great mass of Christians, Wall street brokers, church choristers, statesmen, bank officers, and even clergymen, show the impress of that ethical "sweetness" which is so preposterously claimed for them in theory?

THE Express, in an article on Colonel Ingersoll, exposed one of the worst characteristics of the Republican party—its tendency to centralization. Ingersoll is a Freethinker, and believes in free speech and a free press; but his Republican sympathies are so strong that when the Liberal League adopted resolutions denouncing the Comstock legislation as subversiv of the rights of the people to govern themselvs because they relegate to the United States courts the right to try common-law offens s and assume the authority of Congress to enact police regulations for the states, he seceded from the organization. His plea was that the League ought not to identify itself with obscenity. But that was a frivolous plea, for the resolutions condemned obscenity unqualifiedly, placing their objection to Comstock's Congressional laws solely on the ground that they make the federal government censors of public morality, a right which is reserved to the states. Colonel Ingersoll's real motiv was his unwillingness to abandon the centralization theory of government which pervades the political party to which he is attached.—Truth.

THE Christian brotherhood in Miles City, Montana, seem to be in a somewhat similar condition to that of the white and colored Masons in Galveston; they "don't filyate wuff a cuss." There appears to be the liveliest kind of a scrimmage among the rival Sunday-school leaders down there, and Parson Alderson, who recently cut an additional notch in his sacerdotal coup-stick by getting himself heralded abroad as the first resident minister to the nuptial knot in the new burg, is out in a card urging young aspirants for heavenly corners to come to his school, where "common sense is brought to bear in the investigation of Bible truths." As an additional incentiv to tho good little boys and girls to desert his rival, the Rev. W. L. Austin, he promises, in one of his Sunday evening sermons, to "endeavor to show that the Lord did not send but simply permitted Mr. Austin to come to Miles City; or, if he comes properly accredited from the court of heaven, that he has acted contrary to his instructions and should immediately resign," and adds that "a lively time may be expected." Of course the Rev. Austin will hav to hav his say, and we shall doubtless hear next week from his side of the house, probably informing us that the Lord didn't know anything about the Rev. Anderson, and that the devil who sent him had better yank him back and sizzle him on the coals, or words to that effect. And as, in Miles City nomenclature, "a lively time" means a grand display of pistols, tomahawks, and bowie-knives, with broken noses, blackened eyes, and bloody physiognomies, and a corpse or two thrown in to complete the tableau, the dear little Sunday scholars of that moral burg will doubtless be hugely edified and blessed. If any truly good, pious, shoulder-striker of a Sabbath-school teacher is looking for a real nice place to run a Bible class on high pressure principles, we advise him to make a straight break for Miles City.—Virginia City (Mon.) Madisonian.

Letter from Europe.—No. 10.—Continued.

Darmstadt is a town of 44,000 inhabitants, is situated on a plain, and is very well built. The principal street, the Rheim strasse, leads from the station across the town to the Louisen Platz, and then on to the Schloss. In this building is a library of 400,000 volumes, and many valuable manuscripts and curiosities. The collection of minerals, fossils, coins, antiquities, paintings, etc., are very good. In the picture gallery are some 700 paintings, and some of them considered of great value. In the public square stands a Doric column 140 feet high, with a large statue of Ludwig I., Grand Duke of Hesse, on the top. This is the home of Dr. Ludwig Büchner, the well-known Materialistic writer and Freethinker, who was at the Brussels Congress, but I had not time to call and pay my respects to him.

From Darmstadt the scenery is very fascinating all the way to Heidelberg. The Odenwald, or Forest of Odin, is not far away the entire distance. "The hills," says Howitt, "continually broken into by openings into romantic valleys, slope rapidly down to the plain, covered with picturesque vineyards; and at their feet lie antique villages and the richly-cultivated plains of the Rhine, here thirty or forty miles wide. On almost every steep, projecting hill or precipitous cliff stands a ruined castle, each, as throughout Germany, with its wild history, its wilder traditions, and associations of a hundred kinds."

It is indeed a marvelously lovely country. "Here," observes the authoress of "Peasant Life in Germany," "feudalism had her strongest fortresses, and here her institutions took firmest root. Here are scattered more thickly ruins that tell of the days of old, and every valley and hill-side teems with traditions which mark the footsteps of centuries. Every conqueror, from Cæsar to Bonaparte, has marched through its valleys, and the walls of these proud castles have echoed to the revelry and execrations of a hundred armies, as success or misfortune induced them to flee to them for refuge and shelter."

Heidelberg is two hours' ride from Darmstadt, and many flourishing towns and villages are passed on the way. The farmers were busily gathering their crops of hay, oats, and tobacco. The oats, however, are mainly harvested. Much hay yet remains to be cut—some on the low, flat meadows, and much of the second growth of clover. Of tobacco, much is grown, and the harvest has just commenced. For my own part, I would be glad could men learn that tobacco is of no real use to them; that it is in the aggregate productive of great injury; that it does vastly more harm than good; that its use is filthy and offensive, and discontinue to raise it. But my wishes in this respect will never be gratified. Men will continue to grow it, smoke it, chew it, and snuff it a long time yet, perhaps as long as man exists. The infatuation for the weed is so great that no matter how filthy the use of it is, it will nevertheless be continued.

I am often amused to see the kind of teams used by the peasant farmers in this country. I have seen an ox and a horse harnessed together, an ox working singly in a wagon, either in shafts, or with a tongue on one side and a rope on the other, or at the plow. I have seen cows working, sometimes in pairs, and once saw a cow working alone. The drivers of these single bovine teams are usually women, and all look out of place. I often see women at work in the hayfield, at digging potatoes, etc. But this kind of life, with the low grades of food used, makes these country women coarse, dark, scrawny, and unlovely; it unsexes them to such an extent that I cannot approve of the custom.

Heidelberg is another old town, and has a population of 22,000 inhabitants. It is noted for its university, where thousands of young men have taken their degrees in law and medicine, theology being relegated to colleges in other localities. Some eight hundred students are in attendance at the Heidelberg University the most of the time.

The town lies along the left bank of the Neckar, just where the charming valley is bounded by the wooded ridges of Koningsstuhl and the Heligenburg. It seems to be close up to and almost between these two spurs of the Black Forest hills, and the narrow valley that extends up above the town and between the hills is most picturesque. The beauty of its environs can hardly be overstated. Its drives and promenades are lovely in the exreme.

It has a large church of the Holy Ghost, from the fourteenth century, but as much as I think of the Holy Ghost, I did not find time to visit it or him. I was too busy looking at the ruins of the old castle, and spying out its grandeur and its wonders. This old castle is, after all, the principal attraction of this solid, quaint old town. This extraordinary pile, reared by many hands in the course of many centuries, is a wonderful mingling of palace and fortress. Its foundation dates from the thirteenth century, and various electors made additions from time to time. In the Thirty Years War it suffered much, but was restored. In 1689 it was blown up, and in 1693 it was so entirely dismantled that Louis XIV. issued vaunting medals proclaiming that Heidelberg was blotted out. At the commencement of the 18th century the castle to a large extent was restored to efficiency and splendor, but its destruction was again effected by lightning in 1764. Since then it has remained a ruin. It is a ruin of such magnificence, extent, and grandeur that I think you will approve of my giving you the following description by Longfellow:

"High and hoar on the forehead of the Jettenbuhl stands the castle of Heidelberg. Behind it rises the oak-crested hills of the Geisoberg and the Kaiserstuhl; and in front, from the broad terrace of masonry, you can almost throw a stone upon the roofs of the town, so close do they lie beneath. Above this terrace rises the broad front of the chapel of St. Udalrich. On the left stands the slender octagonal tower of the horologue, and on the right a huge round tower, battered and shattered by the mace of war, shores up with its broad shoulders the beautiful palace and garden terrace of Elizabeth, wife of the Pfalzgraf Frederick. In the rear are older palaces and towers, forming a vast irregular quadrangle; Rudolph's ancient castle, with its Gothic gloriette and fantastic gables; the Giant's Tower, guarding the drawbridge over the moat; the Rent Tower, with the linden trees growing on its summit; and the magnificent Rittersaal of Otho Henry, count palatine of the Rhine, and grand senechal of the Holy Roman Empire. From the gardens behind the castle you pass under the archway of the Giant's Tower into the great courtyard. The diverse architecture of different ages strikes the eye, and curious sculptures. In the niches on the wall of St. Udalrich's chapel stand rows of knights in armor, all broken and dismembered; and on the front of Otho's Rittensaal, the heroines of Jewish history and classic fable. You enter the open and desolate chambers of the ruin, and on every side are medallions and family arms, the globe of the empire and the Golden Fleece, or the eagle of the Cæsars, resting on the escutcheons of Bavaria and the palatinate. Over the windows and doorways and chimney-pieces are sculptures and moldings of exquisite workmanship; and the eye is bewildered by the profusion of caryatids and arabesques and rosettes; and the fan-like flutings, and garlands of fruit and flowers and acorns; and bullocks' heads, with draperies of foliage; and muzzles of lions holding rings in their mouths. The cunning hand of art was busy for six centuries in raising and adorning these walls; the mailed hands of time and war have defaced and overthrown them in less than two. Next to the Alhambra of Granada, the castle of Heidelberg is the most magnificent ruin of the middle ages.

"In the valley below flows the rushing stream of the Neckar. Close from its margin on the opposite side rises the mountains of All Saints, crowned with the ruins of a convent, and up the valley stretches the mountain current of the Odenwald. So close and many are the hills which eastward shut the valley in that the river seems a lake. But on the westward it opens on the broad plain of the Rhine like the mouth of a trumpet, and like the blast of a trumpet is at times the wintry wind through this narrow mountain pass. The blue Alsacian hills rise beyond, and on a platform or strip of level land between the Neckar and the mountains, right under the castles, stands the town of Heidelberg, as the old song says,

"'A pleasant town when it has done raining.'"

I have scarcely seen anything in Europe that I have enjoyed more fully than this immense, grand old ruin of Heidelberg castle. The roof and dome are mostly gone, and little but the heavy walls remain, but as I followed the guide from court to room, from banqueting hall to saloon and chapels and bed rooms and larder and store-rooms and servants' rooms and cellars and the forts where the warriors and artillery were stationed—when I saw it all and comprehended it my mind was filled with wonder and amazement at the magnitude of what man had achieved on that memorable spot, and how easily and ruthlessly the grand pile was destroyed. When in Paris and Versailles I could scarcely help feeling indignant toward the German army for the injury which in some cases they did to their magnificent palaces and to the works of art, but when I visited the castle of Heidelberg and saw where the French had undermined the walls, twenty-three feet in thickness, and let hundreds of tons of the wall fall a part of the way down that precipitous declivity—when I saw the vast ruin they had caused to the sculptured walls, façades, and statues which they destroyed, as well as the ruin of many other castles and towns, I felt to forgive the Germans for what they had done at Paris, and to think they only served the French about right, and I praised them for their magnanimity in not utterly destroying the beautiful city of Paris. They owed a heavy debt to the French, and it cannot be denied that they paid it in full. Oh, the havoc that has been made by war between neighboring Christian nations, both having the same religion, the same grand cathedrals, both worshiping the same God and the same images! There must be some serious defect in the whole institution. It certainly is not the system of religion that it is pretended to be. Its followers have been devils rather than angels, it has dispensed misery and death rather than life and happiness.

Friday was lovely, and when I stood upon the broad balcony of the castle and looked down upon the city at my feet, and upon the beautiful panorama of the country spread out before me, I felt all the rapture and admiration which Longfellow awakens in his faithful description. Dull must be the mind not to be thrilled and enthused at such a survey of the loveliness and grandeur of nature and the marvels and achievements of industry and art.

The palace is reached by different roads and paths. I took the direct road from the station, under rows of shade trees and through the beautiful palace grounds. Carriages by the excellent roadway easily make the distance, but I preferred to walk. The distance is something over a mile from the station. The Jettenbuhl, the high hill on which the castle stands, according to the legend, was named after an enchantress and prophetess, Jetta, who was killed near there by a wolf, near where she uttered her weird prophecies, and related her strange stories in the days of myths and fable.

The castle, including the courtyard with its fine old fountain, must cover several acres, and contains curious points enough for me to write about for a week, but I must not weary you too much. I must, however, tell you about the large wine casks I saw in the cellar under the Friedrichs-Bau. When the guide showed me the tun that contains 10,000 gallons I thought it the largest cask I had ever seen, but when he led me to another which holds 50,000 gallons my marvelousness was excited. The vast cask is 33 feet in length and 25 feet in hight, the staves were four inches thick and the hoops six by seven inches and not more than eight inches apart. That vast reservoir was filled with wine three times from the grapes grown on the opposite hills. They must have drank some wine in those days.

In the same room or cellar the guide showed me a curious old clock, as he called it, made by the jester of one of the old electors who once dwelt in this castle, and the statue of the jester stands beside the curious clock which he made, the description of which will perhaps startle you less than it did myself. The case and dial of the clock are plain and the works are the curious part. The guide assured me the clock was running still, and if I would pull the string below the dial it would strike. Anxious to see all the curiosities I pulled the string when as quick as a flash the door of the clock flew open with a spring and a large fox's tail was whisked into my face, whereupon the guide laughed heartily. I instantly saw the jester's point, and the guide's as well. I was startled for a moment, but was able to join in the laugh and take another look at the comical jester's face, as he stood there about to take a glass of wine. Thousands have probably pulled that string to make the clock strike and received the whisk of the fox's tail in their faces.

In the chapel are some ancient paintings on the walls and a statue or two. In the courtyard I saw ivy upon the walls over two hundred years old, the stems of which are six to eight inches in diameter.

But probably I have said enough about Heidelberg castle. In the courtyard I saw an American lady and gentleman making sketches of the old ruins. They are artists, and have been in Europe a year or two, and intend remaining two or three years more. The lady is from Maine, the gentleman from Washington. She intends to teach painting when she returns. She remarked, smilingly, that a person had to stay in Europe a few years before Americans could think them competent artists. I had a pleasant chat of half an hour with them. Heidelberg has not, as a city, many peculiarities worthy your attention. Its 800 students wear a uniform and a red cap. They drink a great deal of beer, and sometimes when in their cups have their quarrels, and have many times fought duels. They have grounds expressly for fighting duels upon, but it is not open to the public. But good-bye Heidelberg. Let us take cars for Carlsruhe, which also lies nestled on the plain, close up to the Black Forest hills.

Carlsruhe (Charles' rest) has a population of 45,000. It is an old town, and has a good deal of history which I will not now repeat. It has a pyramid of red sandstone to perpetuate its founder. It has also several other statues and monuments, one of which is an obelisk to the Grand Duke Charles. It has, too, a library, a museum of natural history, a winter garden, a botanical garden, and a hall of art adjoining. The town is built in the form of a semicircle, all the streets radiating from the palace where formerly dwelt the Margrave, Charles of Baden, and the palace is seen from nearly every street in the city, save Lange strasse, the finest street in the city.

But soon the cars bore us on to Oos, where we diverged by a branch road a very few miles to the noted watering place, Baden-Baden, which also lies on the plain but closely nestles up to the Black Forest hill on the Oos river, and something like Heidelberg, nearly in the little valley where the stream descends from the mountains. It has but some 1,100 inhabitants, but is a beautiful, romantic town, and is visited for its warm healing springs, much as is Wiesbaden. Some 50,000 persons visit Baden-Baden annually, and leave not a little money in the town. The place is called Baden-Baden to distinguish it from a Baden in Switzerland, and another in Austria. The buildings are fine, the promenades beautiful, and the town contains very much that is lovely.

In the bus from the station to the hotel I met Mr. E. P. Durant and daughter. We stopped at the same hotel and got somewhat acquainted. Of course my unpleasant sojourn at the Albany prison had to be talked over some. We attended the concert at Conversation Hall, which is on a similar plan to the Kursaal at Wiesbaden, though not so extensive. The concert was out of doors; the pavilion or canopy under which the band played is beautiful and showy. The hall for concerts, balls, etc., in bad weather is very rich indeed, and in that respect surpasses the Kursaal. It is also supplied with a reading room, where I spent an hour or more in looking over American papers.

Before breakfast yesterday morning I visited one of the finest springs in the town. The water is pouring from a fine little fountain in an elegant building, with a portico in front two or three hundred feet long, with stately columns, and the walls covered with beautiful frescoes and statuary, and the grounds in front beautifully laid out with fountains, walks, and flowers, as the Germans so well know how to do. The water is as hot as a person would wish a cup of tea—150 degrees—and has a slight saline taste. Many cures are performed at Baden-Baden, and it is a delightful place to stay if a person is only fortunate enough to have plenty of money. Many excursions are made from this point into the Black Forest country by carriage, on foot, etc. The environs of the town are very interesting, time and money being the requisites to fully enjoy them.

I took the next train for Appenheim, where I diverged again to Strasburg, the old French city in Alsace, which ten years ago was taken by the Germans, when Louis Napoleon made his unfortunate attempt to win military glory. The town contains 95,000 inhabitants, partly French and partly German. It is strongly fortified, but the German siege-guns were too powerful for it, and after a bombardment of nine days it surrendered to the Germans, September 28, 1870. But there is a deep dissatisfaction on the part of the French residents at the presence of Prussian soldiers and German rule, and some day that war will be fought over again, and with more bloody results. Both nations are preparing for that great contest, and it will be no child's play when it comes.

I stopped long enough in the old town to visit the celebrated cathedral, the monument to Guttenberg, who was born there, the monument of Kleber and Marshal Saxe. I also took the tramway (horse-cars) and rode over the city, even to the fortifications outside the town.

The cathedral is the great point of attraction in Strasburg. It is a most noble specimen of Gothic architecture, with its world-famous spire, 468 feet high. It was commenced in 1015 and not finished till 1439. The original design was to erect two towers equally imposing in hight. Only one was erected, and not till many years after the body of the church was completed. The upper part of the spire is open-work, and looks almost fragile, but as it is of stone, it is far from being weak or temporary. The ascent into the spire is made by 725 steps, and I felt hardly enthusiastic enough to attempt it. The cathedral is some four hundred feet in length and over a hundred feet in hight. One is struck upon entering it by its vast size and gloominess. A circular window, 150 feet in diameter, produces a striking effect. The stone columns are massive, and, as in many of the cathedrals, are cut to represent a large number of columns grouped in one. On the columns are life-size statues of saints, etc., and on some of them are several stone angels with expanded wings, and in several tiers, one above another. The chapels are richly ornamented with statues, paintings, and all the paraphernalia of these costly edifices. It is hardly worth while to speak of the carving in stone, which prevails in almost all of them; but the carved stone pulpit—the work of the fifteenth century—is really a marvel, having on it a great number of statuettes representing great numbers of incidents pertaining to the old, old story.

The great attraction of this cathedral is the great Strasburg clock, which has astronomical and automatical work which has made it famous indeed. It strikes every quarter hour, when a figure of a small man moves up and strikes a bell, once, twice, thrice, or four times, as the case may be. When the hour is struck it is done by another figure, and on another bell. At 12 at noon, a cock flaps its wings and the twelve disciples come out and make a bow to their savior, who acknowledges their attentions by a return bow. But I was two hours to late to see this bowing performance, and as I had seen the still more highly finished and elaborate astronomical clock by Meyer, of Detroit, upon the plan of this, I deemed it not worth while to wait twenty-two hours to see the apostles, I have seen them so many times and in so many shapes and styles, that I think I could comfortably live the balance of my life if I even never see another saint or apostle.

In the cars to Strasburg I met a young gentleman from Cincinnati, Mr. Loring Andrews, who is also on a tour of inspection. We held pleasant converse together, comparing notes and giving views. We visited the cathedral together. He remained over night to see the apostles, while I took the cars at 5.07 to return to Appenweir and then change for this place, Freiburg, where I arrived at about 9 P.M., feeling that I had passed a pretty busy week, and seen almost any amount of grand sights and curiosities.

Now I must briefly tell you something about this pleasant town and then seal up my letter and send it off to the land I love more than all other lands. Freiburg (freetown) has 37,000 inhabitants (6,000 of whom are Protestants), is beautifully situated in the plain of the Rhine and at an altitude of 918 feet above the sea level. It nestles up closely to and almost in an opening of the Black Forest Hills. It is also an old town and was once the capital of the mountainous and woody district of the Breisgau, and is the chief town on the upper Rhine. It is becoming very popular as a winter residence, the climate being dry and healthy. The living is said to be cheap here, and on market days a fine opportunity is afforded for studying the peculiar customs and costumes of the Black Forest peasantry.

It rained for about six hours in the fore part of to-day and I remained in my room writing this letter. In the afternoon when it had cleared off, I started out to see the town, its sights, and its magnificent cathedral. You must know by this time that I am very partial to cathedrals, for I do not let one pass me at the towns I visit, when there is one, without taking a view of it. This is because of the grandeur of them, the stores of the works of art they contain, and perhaps on account of the foolish superstitions wrapped up in the whole system which built them and still sustains them.

I found the fountains playing, stores open, people going hither and thither in quest of pleasure, making this as it ought to be everywhere a gala day—a day of recreation and amusement. On this score I like the Christians of Europe, notwithstanding all their stupid worship of saints and images, far better than their puritanical copyists of America, who make one day in seven—which is just as good as either of the other six—the most gloomy and doleful of all the days known. Yes, in respect to the adoration for Sunday and the Bible, I like the Catholics far better than the Protestants. The first care very little for either the Sunday or the Bible. If there is one thing particularly odious to human reason, human tastes, and human happiness, it is straight-laced, long-faced, hypocritical puritanism. I really wish America would learn to get along without it.

The cathedral here is of red sandstone, and decorated without and within with almost endless statues and carvings, dating from the thirteenth century. Facing the principal portal, which is a most magnificent one, are the columns with statues of the Virgin, St. Lambert, and St. Alexander, the latter being the patron saint of the church. The portal itself is elaborately decorated with sculptures, there being no fewer than thirty-seven statues representing the wise and foolish virgins, the sciences, saints, etc. On the walls between the columns were once brilliant paintings, but time has nearly effaced the colors as well as the statues themselves. The portal is forty or fifty feet in length, two-thirds as wide, and about the same in hight. The rich Gothic arch of the inner door is set full of statuettes in stone which are very elaborate. The length of the interior is 342 feet, the breadth 100 feet, the hight 100 feet. The stained glass windows are very rich and expensive. The chapels are also more than usually rich and attractive, but I will not dwell. In one is a representation in stone statuary of the Last Last Supper. It is life size. Jesus is among his twelve disciples, and they all wear a rather sad expression, save Judas with the money bag, and he looks malicious. All have beards save John, who leans his head on his master's bosom and looks like a very young man. I saw the Virgin again, dressed most gaily like a huge doll. I saw the same yesterday in Strasburg. And again holding the dead Jesus, beard and all, after he was crucified. That idea was not taken from the evangelists. I will not stop to tell all I saw. It is getting late and I must retire. I have written quite enough. I did however climb the spire as far as the stairs of 333 steps go and viewed with wonder the great amount of skilled labor it cost. The spire or octagonal tower is 400 feet high, and I went up about two-thirds of that distance, but stopping to puff occasionally and gave thanks that there were no more of the stone steps to climb. But, oh, what a lovely view I had of the town more than two hundred feet below me, and also of the beautiful country round, the plain to the west and the vine-clad hills to the east! These old cities are not the prettiest on the top. The steep tile roofs look ancient and are mossy with age. I like our flat-roofed buildings better. I saw also the big clock that tells the people of the town how rapidly time is flying away, and went in among the bells where the striking is done every quarter hour and where the chimes are played—thirteen bells in all. The belfry must be thirty or forty feet across. I stood there alone in that solemn place and saw the hammer strike the bells, and the ringing and reverberations were almost deafening there away up 150 feet from the ground. Two of the bells are very heavy, and weigh several tons each. The yokes and timbers which sustain them are strong and massive. The upper part of the tower is curious open scroll-work of the red stone, and the statues reach one hundred feet from the earth.

I saw in the cathedral, as in almost every case, people on their knees saying their prayers, counting their beads, and worshiping the virgin. There is scarcely an hour in the day but what at least a few in the churches and cathedrals are attending to these, of course, very important devotions.

The streets are clean and many of the sidewalks are curiously paved with small oval pebbles of uniform size, ground down so as to make a smooth surface, and every ten or fifteen feet an ingenious device made by the stones of different colors—very neat and curious. I saw several fountains, monuments, and statues, but I will not linger longer. The town is very pretty, and is calculated to last thousands of years.

This is the last German town I expect to visit, and to-morrow I go to Switzerland. There are many other points in Germany I would like to visit, were not time and money limited. But I shall depart from the country very well satisfied. It is indeed a great country, and the country of great men, and old ruins and relics.

The hotels are pretty good, though I do not admire all their styles of cooking. I manage, however, to get a plenty to eat. The beds and pillows are good and more of them than I have any use for. They furnish two large, broad pillows, and then a large half bed of eider down, half as large as the bed, and for which I cannot imagine any use, unless it is to lie on, which is wholly redundant, as there is a good bed without it. As a pillow it is wholly unnecessary, as well as a covering at this time of the year.

The hotels here, like all the hotels on the continent, have no gas in the sleeping rooms, and depend wholly on candles, for which they are always sure to charge extra in the bill, sometimes half a mark, sometimes a mark. As it does not take me more than two minutes to undress and get into bed, an eighth of an inch of the candle is all that is burned, and ten or twenty cents is too much to charge for so little. As I am opposed to paying for what I do not use, I have sometimes let the candle burn all night or till three in the morning, so as to feel that I had used the candle. I find I can sleep as well by candle light as in the dark. That, after all, however, is rather poor satisfaction, and when the room is small I let it pass and pay for the candle without burning it. There will not, by the bye, be much of the candle left which I use to-night; it is nearly burnt out, so good-night. I shall in a few hours be off for Switzerland, and you very likely may hear from me again. Adieu till then. D. M. B.

THEY were just closing up the Sunday-school at West Pawlet by repeating the Lord's Prayer. All stood except one, behind him stood a young man having Baptist parents, and who had been reared under the divine influence of the Sunday-school, taught to say his prayers, and go to church. He began, "Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be"—and then whispered to the boy just ahead, "Get up and pray, you lazy devil!"

THERE is trouble in the Baptist church at Rutland, Vt. Some wealthy members had a party and they danced. Dancing being very wicked, the people who dance will, without doubt, go to hell. A church meeting was called, and they were going to overhaul them a little. But the dancers left the church and went to another.

The "Public Call" for this movement, signed by Ingersoll, Green, and some fifty others, is not a formidable document. Many of the signers are Abbot Liberals, others are semi-Spirito-Bundy Liberals, others are personal followers of Col. Ingersoll, and the rest are wholly unknown. We miss the name of F. E Abbot from the list, and the paper is altogether incomplete without it. The name of his next friend, B. F. Underwood, falls far short of making good the omission. Underwood does not believe in organization, but is on hand every time to foment a bolt from one.

We are surprised also not to find among the first on the list the name of Gen. Roberts, the fighting editor of Mind and Matter, till we look half way down the column and see the name of Col. Bundy, another fighting editor of another Spiritual journal—then we are no longer surprised. These swordsmen of the spirit, slashing each other just like any fleshly heathen gladiators a long way this side of the skies, would not sign the same declaration of independence together, if they knew it would transform their common country into a blessed summer land.

The officers of existing unbolted auxiliary Leagues who giv their names to the call are very few—just a dozen Leagues in all out of 202, so that Ingersoll and Green are five times worse beaten by an appeal to the Leagues through their confidential circular than they were by the delegates at Chicago, where the Colonel was so shocked because a vote of 62 against 28 would impose a platform upon an absent voting constituency of one thousand. But it does not follow because a president or secretary permitted his name to this call that even these dozen Leagues will "sever their connection," as they are required to do by the "confidential circular," to qualify themselvs for admission to this new fellowship. The severence of connection of only one auxiliary has been sent to me, and that one is Col. Ingersoll's own at Washington. The split, then, assumes much less formidable proportions than the bolt at Syracuse, and amounts to no split at all. Two men bolted at Chicago, one was expelled, and one auxiliary has withdrawn—that is all.

Mr. Potter, of the Index, tendered the whole "League of America" left on his hands by Mr. Abbot, but only two of these allow themselvs to be delivered by this call; and on behalf of the National Liberal League, in THE TRUTH SEEKER two weeks ago, I offered a score or two of ours to set 'em up handsomely. But they seem attached to the old homestead of total and absolute separation of church and state, and refuse to rally under a flag that lowers the standard and separates church and state only in good easy spots and respectable places.

However, we sincerely hope they will succeed for whatever good they may do. We hope they will prove enough of a competitor to the National Liberal League to keep our own troops on the alert and our own armor bright and burnished. There are two main Liberal bodies in England—why not here? Between them both the church, I am sure, will get small aid and comfort. Two blades of Liberal grass growing where only one grew before will be no glad tidings for their rejoicing. Jack Sprat who could eat no fat will be a perennial character as long as this is a world of unaccountable tastes. Green and Ingersoll are entirely welcome to all the lean that don't come to us—for we are so "broad" and yet so "narrow" that we like and find no difficulty in digesting both. We naturally hope to retain with us all the able-bodied omnivores who let "good digestion wait on appetite."

The one thing to be deprecated about the "shop over the way" is its exclusivness. It seems to be more concerned about whom and what it shall keep out than whom it will take in. It has started out on a career of tucking up its skirts. If anything will make it die young, that will. "Confidential circulars" are sent to the very elect. Tickets of admission hav to be sent for in advance, as if these fifty odd gentlemen would know one another without a pass into a hotel parlor; connection must be severed with the National Liberal League, and a flaming sword points up and down and all around the doors and halls of the Grand Pacific. What a time the reporters will hav getting admission, even if they are let in at all!

One thing more should be noted—not a woman graces this "Public Call" with her signature, another sure sign of an early grave. Green, in his determination that there shall be no free trade in love, puts a tariff absolutely prohibitory upon it, to the great profit and joy of smugglers; and Ingersoll, in his lectures ridiculing "long-haired men and short-haired women," and needing to draw the line somewhere, draws it on hair—so between them both the platter gets licked again. We issue no papal syllabus on heads or hearts or hair. Col. Bundy, with his short crop, will be as welcome as Mrs. Colman, with her profusion, if he behaves himself as well.

Any how, success to the new concern; but it should know there are perils in store in the future, perils as well from the poverty of exclusion as from the exuberance and embarras de richesse of inclusion. T. C. LELAND

Friends, Come Out.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please say in your paper that the Northern Wisconsin Spiritual Conference has secured the talented and gentlemanly speaker, J. K. Appleby, of Chicago, as its principal speaker for the next quarterly meeting, Dec 10, 11, and 12, 1880. The Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railway has kindly offered reduced fare for this meeting. So, friends, turn out.

Mr. Chainey Replies to Mr. Leland.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you permit me a brief reply to Mr. Leland's strictures on the "order of my going" from the National Liberal League?

I think all liberal-minded people will think it rather a sorry business to denounce one as a traitor for leaving what he never joined. I shall not repeat here the ample reasons given for the tardiness of my action. I wish to say, however, most emphatically, that I never indicated to any one that I was in full accord with the action of the Chicago Congress. As expressed in my letter, I found so much right on both sides that I did not for a time know exactly how to shape my action so as to be just to all.

The decision to start a new movement under wiser and more liberal methods was the final key to the problem.

As to my not sending my letter to the secretary, I was not aware that any official red tape had to be gone through with. If such be the case, I knew it not, and so do not hold myself in any way responsible to it.

In regard to my contemplated settlement in New York, the surrender seems to me to be all on the other side. Mr. Wakeman, after hearing me lecture in Hornellsville, expressed a desire that I should receive a call to New York. I informed him that I had some expectation of assisting on a newspaper to be started by Mr Ingersoll, but that if the two could be made to go together I would accept such a call. We had several interviews in regard to this, and the final understanding was that it would be better to simply arrange for a temporary course of lectures, so that we could see how we liked each other. I had no idea that any opinion I might entertain toward the League or Col. Ingersoll had anything to do with this matter. All who know anything about me know that I entertain very great admiration and affection for Mr. Ingersoll. I supposed this call was to come from Liberals, not from orthodox. I never dreamed that the Chicago resolutions were to be presented to me as the sacred canons of New York Liberalism, which, after kissing, I was to solemnly swear to ever believe, obey, and defend. I hav broken from my neck the yoke of two ecclesiastical tyrannies, and hav no intention whatever of submitting it to a third. I cannot think that so orthodox an interpretation can extend further than Mr. Leland, and so I wish to say in this connection that if there are any Liberals in New York, it matters not to me whether they belong to Mr. Frothingham's society, the Society of Humanity, or the Liberal Club, and they want to employ me to giv them in a course of lectures my best thought and life, I am ready to accept the offer on the most liberal terms. In regard to my action being influenced by Mr. Ingersoll's personal generosity, I hav the most unmixed contempt and scorn for the spirit that prompted such a judgment. It is orthodox to the backbone. It belongs to the prayer-meeting and conventicle. If the author of it was ever afflicted with superstition his prayers must hav been companions to that of Holy Willie. It's of the same cloth as the outcry of the church against a man who dares to change his opinions after they gave him fifty dollars to go to school with or to help him in a poor parish. This spirit runs all through Mr. Leland's letter. Because some one was working for me in New York I ought not to hav any opinion but theirs. When did I advertise my conscience or judgment to let by the week or month? If this letter is a fair revelation of Mr. Leland's moral sense no wonder he thinks that Mr. Ingersoll hires adherents with money. But the truth of it is, Mr. Ingersoll is a man of a different sort. He never dreamed of buying any one's intellectual service. He understands too well the value of independence. He hates with all his being the very shadow of slavery. His action at Chicago was in part the result of his recoil from such a construction of Liberalism. In speaking with him on this subject at Hornellsville, in connection with my recent experience in leaving the church, he said: "There is nothing I detest more than this spirit of ownership in man. Why, I would think just as much of you if you should go back to the Methodist church to-morrow." But Mr. Leland would evidently call me "a villain—a twice-damned villain." There is another side to this financial matter. Mr. Ingersoll gave Mr. Green and myself a benefit lecture at Hornellsville. Out of that we each paid seventy-five dollars towards the expenses of the Convention. Modesty forbids me to speak of myself, but I do know that what Mr. Green received was not so large in proportion to the service as what was paid to others.

I am sorry that Mr. Leland is so orthodox. The redeeming feature of his letter is that he quotes so much from Shakspere. But if there be dreams in that sleep of death, surely the great poet must be sadly saying,

"To what base uses we may return!"

Adieu. GEORGE CHAINEY.

A Last Word on Politics.

Mr. Walker is late in replying to a last summer's article of mine on politics. Anything the other side of the Congress at Chicago he might let rest. I do. I wrote to influence the action there. That being over and no political action taken, I hav no more to say.

But Mr. Walker challenges my fairness, and I must clear that up. He had said he would bolt if the Congress resolved for Hancock. I said sportsmen had appropriate names for players who come into a game to rake in the bets if they win, but repudiate if they lose, but I would "name no names," or words to that effect. Now he says: "This is unfair of him. There is no dishonesty where fair notice is given of the player's intention." That is to say, it is at the option of any player to giv notice of intention to violate rules of the game. By this ingenious, not to say ingenuous device, he relieves himself of dishonesty. But sportsmen hav other names for players not according to Hoyle. Again I leave them to "name the names."

Dear Bro. Walker, when you "go West, young man," be sure you steer clear of "Poker Flat." You will get dead broke in more senses than one. T. C. L.

The New Split in the Liberal League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I observe another schism has taken place in the National Liberal League, and that a call has been made for a convention to consider the propriety of starting another organization. Well, I hav no objection to a convention for discussing the matter, but I had hoped that as the long-continued controversy between the Index and THE TRUTH SEEKER has ended steps would be taken toward effecting a general fraternity of all the disaffected sects and factions looking to a consolidated unity instead of further division. If we could find a common ground on which all Freethinkers can meet and fraternize it would certainly be a glorious thing, and I should prefer to lend a helping hand to this movement.

There might doubtless be some improvements made in the platform and principles of association as we learn by experience and grow wiser each day. I hav been too much embarrassed and harrassed with financial troubles and tribulations which hav threatened to ruin me pecuniarily and turn me out of house and home to pay much attention to the grounds of controversy which caused the division at Chicago, and should want further time to investigate the matter before I giv an opinion on the propriety of starting a new organization. I shall not, therefore, resign my office as a member of the National Executiv Committee till I can hav time to examine the question more thoroughly.

A word on politics. My rule is, if I vote at all, to vote the most reformatory ticket. This would compel me to vote for Weaver; and if Conkling's speech may be relied upon, made recently in New York city, the Democrats are far in advance of the Republicans in reform and almost equal to the Greenbackers, hence Hancock will be my second choice. As for Garfield, his own Republican constituents hav charged him with several acts of wholesale swindle and legal robbery as disgraceful and infamous as ever sent any man to the state prison. He seems to hav the worst political record of any office seeker in the nation.

Organization of a National Secular Association.

[Mr. Green has sent this call with a request that we publish it, which we cheerfully do.]

An informal meeting will be held at the parlors of the Grand Pacific hotel, in the city of Chicago, on the 15th day of November next, at 2 o'clock P. M., for the purpose of organizing a national Association for the specific object of secularizing the state. The Association to be formed on a basis broad enough to admit members regardless of their religious or non-religious opinions, and narrow enough to exclude all "hobbies" not germane to the question of state secularization.

To this Conference is invited one delegate from each auxiliary Liberal League that approves of this movement; one delegate from any other society in sympathy with the proposed meeting, and one delegate from any neighborhood or town, where ten or more persons reside, who favor this call, but where no secular organization exists.

Robert G Ingersoll, Rev M J Savage, Prof J E Oliver, Rev Charles Grames, Robert C Spencer, Robert Peet, Carl Joniiz, F A Wichelman, Clayton F Woods, W E Parker, G H Walser, Geo Chainey, S B McCracken, Wm Estus, W S Bush, J M Shelling, S Black, Wm Chester, Sr, F A Kerns, Hon A Krekel, B F Underwood, E Campfield, Hon James M Pratt, John W Truesdell, A G Humphrey, MD, Thomas Dugan, C J Herbold, Rev Samuel P Putnam, Dr J M Monroe, A B Brown, Alonzo Lucky, E D Stark, C P Farrell, Col John C Bundy, C Dunning, W H Wakefield, David Eccles, Chas A Wardan, Rev J H Burnham, Edwin M Seaing, Esq, Peter Tanner, Wm R Lazenby, M Newton, E E Taylor, Joseph Singer, Frank Hart, Edgar M Sellon, D L Boutell, G B Fleming, C C Richardson, A L Brainard, P Himrod, Esq., Dr C H Michner, Allen Johnson, H L Green, C W Steele, John Stone, Wm McIlwarth.

P. S.—Tickets of admission to this Conference will be furnished the delegates, on application, by H L Green, Temporary Secretary, Salamanca, N. Y. The Grand Pacific Hotel will entertain delegates at the rate of $2.50 per day; the Parker House, at 187 West Madison street, Chicago, for $1 25 per day.

They Don't Lower Their Flag.

The members of the Barber's Creek Liberal League, Rapids City, Ill.; and LeClaire, Iowa, are unanimous in heir emphatic approval of the action of the Fourth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, in demanding the total repeal of the Comstock postal laws.

We regard it as the merest and most trifling legal quibbling to say that because the Congress made this righteous demand it thereby denies the right of the general government to arraign and try the violators of its laws, in its own courts.

No such sophistry can justify any auxiliary League in trailing its flag in the mire of ignominious surrender.

We regret the retreat of Col. Ingersoll and H. L. Green, but believing as they do, that if we demand the repeal of this unconstitutional law we should lose caste in the eyes of the world, they cannot perhaps be blamed for retiring from the field on the eve of battle and in the face of the foe.

We hav full faith that for every tired soldier who steps from the ranks and marches to the rear, to the music of the enemy's retreating cannon, one hundred stanch recruits will spring to the front to compete for the vacant place.

Rapid City Liberal League stands firm by T. B. Wakeman and the action of the Fourth Annual Congress.

An American Free Press Hero.

At the International Congress of Freethinkers, recently held in Brussels, I had the great pleasure of meeting Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER (New York). In America, Mr. Bennett is well known as a fearless and determined upholder of the rights of publication; and the case with which his name is generally associated bears a curious resemblance to the famous Knowlton pamphlet, defended by Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, although they were not the original publishers. Mr. Bennett was charged with "mailing" (that is, selling through the post) a pamphlet by a Mr. Heywood on the marriage question. Comstock (the American equivalent to our Collette), of the Vice Society, appears to hav instituted the proceedings, but it was Mr. Bennett's outspoken heterodoxy that had aroused against him the enmity of the churches, and Comstock was but the tool of the religious bigots. The man with whom they had to deal, however, was not one likely to fall an easy prey. Just after his arrest, Mr. Bennett used these determined words: "My only object in selling this pamphlet is to vindicate the liberty of thought, of the press, and of the mails. I hav always announced that I did not approve of it, but as long as Mr. Heywood does, I declare that he has a right to mail it as a part of his right to publish it and as a necessary part of the freedom of the press." And then he added: "If this means that I am to go to prison, to prison let it be."

The case was brought to trial, and, on the part of the prosecution, every nerve was strained, not only to secure a conviction, but to bring the heaviest punishment on the defendant. The district attorney held up THE TRUTH SEEKER, and said to the jury: "This is the paper that he publishes, and it is read weekly by fifty thousand people." The jury consisted of average Christian men, and this appeal to their religious prejudice was not without its effect. A little pamphlet, entitled, "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," was also read to bias the minds of the jury against the defendant. The judge appears to hav been unfair in the extreme, for, says Mr. Bennett, "Judge Benedict said if they saw anything that had any tendency of any kind to produce any unpleasant effects upon *any*body—if, IF—I should be convicted. It was all "cut and dried" before I was brought into that court that I should be convicted, but what could I expect? I am an Infidel. I don't believe as much as they say I ought to, but I believe all I can."

The trials and hardships to which he was subjected during his imprisonment would have broken the fortitude of any man not sustained by a consciousness of right. But, through privation and labor, to which he was unfitted, brought on an illness that threatened to end his career, D. M. Bennett did not flinch one step from the course he had marked out for himself.

He was not idle during the long and weary term of his imprisonment. His spare time he devoted to the preparation of an elaborate work of a Freethought nature, and, at Brussels, Mr. Bennett took me into his apartment and showed me two thick octavo volumes, each containing, I should judge, nearly one thousand pages, which were the result of his prison labors. Each volume was adorned with a frontispiece; one represented the author in his natural condition as a free citizen, the other was his portrait as he appeared in prison, with criminal garb, cropped head, and closely shaven face.

On his liberation, a vast and enthusiastic meeting was convened in Chickering Hall, New York, to welcome him. Speaking on this occasion, Mr. Bennett said: "I was tried, ostensibly, upon the charge of mailing obscene literature. The book is not obscene! Attorney-General Devens, Secretaries Sherman, Schurz, Pardon Clerk Judge Gray, and many others connected with the government, hav read it with care, and none of them thought it was obscene. They perhaps did not approve of the argument or the theory of the pamphlet, but it was not an obscene work. President Hayes said I had committed no crime, and that I did not deserve imprisonment. But still President Hayes, in spite of this, disregarded the voice of justice and mercy and listened to the commands of the church and kept me in prison, though at the time my health was seriously failing, and grave apprehensions were entertained as to my life."

Mr. Bennett's bravery and determination were heartily recognized throughout the United States. At the meeting above referred to were present friends from Boston, Springfield, Newark, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Harrisburg, Reading, Rochester, and even from states so distant as Illinois. From all parts of the states came delegates of the National Liberal League, the great Freethought organization of America. The chair was taken by the Hon. Elizur Wright of Boston, and the sympathy of the best men and women in America was manifested either by presence at the meeting or, where that was impracticable, by letters full of hearty greeting and friendship. Thus was Bennett welcomed on his return from captivity.

Mr. Bennett is now in Europe, and in a very short time will revisit this country. He spent a day or two in London before proceeding to Brussels. From that city he told me he should go to Switzerland, Germany, and Italy, where he desired to see "old Vesuvius." He then intends to pass a short time in this country before returning to America. Surely we shall not allow so distinguished a visitor to come among us and to go away without some public recognition of his services and testimony of admiration for his steadfastness under suffering for conscience' sake. In honoring him we should honor ourselvs; for we should testify that we admire heroism and devotion to the right.

Glorious Yahoos.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Eighteen hundred years ago it is supposed one Pliny wrote some letters to various friends. Eighteen hundred years ago one Plato published some letters or lessons. No doubt such men lived, for we hav the universal testimony of all writers of their age to the fact. We know they lived just for the same reasons we know Milton, Pope, or Chaucer lived, or that any one lived who died over a hundred years ago. Yet although some hav questioned whether these men ever wrote the letters mentioned, no one ever has doubted that the men lived and wrote and taught eighteen hundred years ago. But the letters hav been analyzed searchingly. On the slightest fact being shown to discredit one of them under the rules of logic the letter is cast aside. Yet it is of no great importance to any one whether they are true or false. Still, the slightest contradiction or suspicious circumstance mentioned on impossible date or false geography causes all scholardom to turn up its nose and howl coyotishly. Who ventures to regard it as genuin him the world regards as non compos.

Eighteen hundred years ago, it is asserted, one Jesus Christ lived, taught, and died; spake as never man spake, created great civil uproar in a great city, died amid tremendous civic commotion and such elemental strife and awful phenomena as in men's minds must hav eclipsed ten thousand Pompeian earthquakes and the memory of all the wonders that ever befel the earth. He left to hundreds of his followers such magic power as men never before pretended to hav, and they went forth teaching and doing wonders, surpassing those of Hercules. So says a book purporting to hav been written by half a dozen of his followers. Outside of this book there is not the slightest pretense that ever any mention was made of these wonders. We hav books now extant by men who delighted to record all wonders and who lived near to these doers of miracles. Yet not one word of corroboration! When we examin these books for internal evidence, what then?

The grand miracle, foundation of all, the divine, miraculous, virginal birth of the grand wonder worker rests solely upon an old man's dream, related at hearsay by one who never met the wonder-worker till that worker was over thirty years of age. And the relators differ fatally among themselvs as to time, circumstances, and other facts.

But all stands on the birth. If it be not strictly as claimed, all the miracles of life and death are naught. Yet one fixes it in the days of Herod, the king, making certain Egyptian experience necessary; another puts it after Cyrenius had ruled, which was, we know, after the death of Herod the king and the reign of his son Archelaus.

The books profess to be the testimony of four witnesses, yet relate events, sometimes giving verses verbatim, the same, whereas, the unimpeachable canons of criticism declare that were two witnesses to the same act to relate the story of it, word for word, alike, even to the extent of a few lines, without collusion, 'twere a miracle equal to the removal of a mountain by the prayer of one whose faith is equal to a grain of mustard. They declare as much as that such a coincidence is utterly impossible. Impossible! Hail, age of Yahoos!

And yet some of our grave, venerable, owlish humbugs will, in conclave, seriously weigh the evidences of Christianity and announce their driveling platitudes with all the solemnity of little Jack Horner, who "put in his thumb, and pulled out a plumb, crying, What a shrewd boy am I." No wonder men hav lost all respect for courts of law when they see grave law writers and judges prostitute their brains, as shown in the Dred Scott, 7 to 8, and D. M. Bennett cases.

God and Man.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Before the Liberal League of this city a lecture was delivered yesterday on "The Existence of God." For this reason I beg leave to offer you the following lines on the subject for publication in your valuable newspaper.

God is the sum total of the laws filling, ruling, and maintaining the universe. The universe is infinit as to time and space. God, or the laws of the universe, is infinit as to existence and operation. The universe consists of an infinit number of globes revolving in infinit space. Said space is called heaven and to said globes the name of heavenly bodies is given. One of these heavenly bodies is our earth. Man, therefore, as an inhabitant of the earth livs in heaven from his birth to his death.

Man is a product of the earth. Because the earth is a result of God, or of the eternal laws of the universe, man is also a product of God or of said laws. The eternal laws of the universe that specially fill, rule, and maintain our globe or planet are called laws of nature. Man, therefore, more properly speaking, is a product of the laws of nature. If man strictly obeys the laws of nature he will feel happy; otherwise he will not. His whole nature, according to his three principal organs, heart, brain, and stomach, is divided into three parts, his mental, his moral, and his bodily nature. Man, because he is filled, ruled, and maintained by the laws of nature, has a certain amount of innate knowledge of these laws; other knowledge of them he acquires by his own observation, and the rest of his knowledge of them is the product of civilization, that is, of the observation of all men of all ages. Man not existing mentally, morally, or bodily before his birth, his life seems to constitute his whole existence, and death to put an end to his mental, moral, and bodily existence. For physical reasons there seems to be no immortality of the soul, life and soul meaning the same thing. Man may become immortal by his deeds that benefit mankind. Schiller, the German poet, says, "He who has satisfied the best men of his age has lived for all ages."

Man is sometimes called person. Person implies a body and means a mundane being. Only a man or a woman can be a person. Nothing else is or can be a person. God, the sum total of the laws of the universe, is, nor can be, no person or mundane being. God, the eternal laws of the universe, can neither be seen nor spoken to in the form or shape of a person, that is, of a man or a woman. All laws, eternal laws included, are without blood and nerves, and hav of course no bodily existence. There is, therefore, no personal man-like God. Man, as a bodily and perishable product of the laws of nature and of the universe, is of course mentally, morally, and bodily formed according to these laws. He is subject to them with or without his will and consent. God exclusivly means eternal laws and no person at all, either a man or a woman, with a bodily, perishable nature. Very respectfully yours,

St. Louis, Mo., Oct. 18th. JOHN GEORGE HERTWIG.

What the Deacon Thought.

The new preacher took his seat in the conference room. It was the first conference meeting held after his arrival in the parish. One of the deacons sat at his right. He was a stranger to almost everybody. The meeting proceeded. The deacon acted as prompter to the new pastor, and the two carried on a broken conversation in silent whispers. It served to introduce the minister to his new members. The dialog ran something after this fashion: "Who is that?" said the preacher. A man was speaking with quivering lips, sobbing tones, and streaming eyes (he always spoke so). "That," said the deacon, is "Gag Phidler—whose neighbors horse jumped into the cornfield and he gagged the animal. The poor critter almost starved to death before he was found. It made a muss in the parish, and he has gone by the name of 'Gag Phidler' ever since." A sister rose and related her experience in snuffling tones. "Smokes opium like a Turk," whispered the deacon. Another rose and berated the fashions and follies of modern church goers. "Vinegar?" sibillated the deacon; "she talked her husband to death, and none of her children can liv with her." A man in the corner let fly a fiery phillippic. "More ardent spirit than holy spirit," murmured the deacon. A leading merchant discoursed long on honesty in trade. "Prays with his customers and then skins 'em," said the deacon. Several spoke modestly here and there about whom the preacher's prompter made no remark. His face clouded as a sister rose and whined forth some commonplaces about "charity." "Needs it herself," scowled the deacon; "sent her poor old mother to the lunatic asylum and took her property to build a house with." A magniloquent brother followed with pungent exhortation on the duty of the church to the distant heathen. "And yet," said the deacon, "he turned his own sister out of his house in a way no heathen would ever hav been guilty of." "All packed up and ready for heaven, ticket bought and paid for," said another confident disciple. "First thing he has paid for in twenty years," added the deacon; "would not a dispensation of silence be a blessed thing for these frail disciples?" "Oh, wouldn't it?" groaned the minister. "Let's move the session to abolish speaking meetings," said the deacon. "I'll go for it with all my heart," said the minister.

Letter from Europe.—No. 11.

SWITZERLAND AND THE ALPS.

GENEVA, Sept. 15, 1880.

FRIENDS OF TRUTH: I have at last reached this beautiful city, lying at the lower and western end of the beautiful lake bearing the same name and at the southwestern extremity of Switzerland. Immediately in view of the city toward the south is Savoy, which, after centuries of political and military turmoil, now belongs to France. Further to the left, and in plain view from my window as I write, is Mont Blanc, with its eternal snow, looking as though not more than ten miles away, though in reality forty.

This city was for many years the home of John Calvin. Here he held almost supreme theological power and reigned with an iron hand. Here, on the Hill Le Champel, he burnt to death the amiable and good Michael Servetus; here Calvin preached many years in what is called the cathedral; here he died and was buried in 1564. Thus this was one of the birthplaces of the Reformation. Here it may be said that the gloomy religion, Calvinism, including Presbyterianism, Congregationalism, and a large share of Methodism, was incubated and brought forth. From here it went to Scotland and England, and by the Puritans was taken to our own American shores. It is unquestionably the gloomiest phase of Christianity, and is far better calculated to make men and women mournful and wretched than cheerful and happy. But its harsh and repulsive features have become rubbed and smoothed away in the centuries that have passed. Predestination, total depravity, the flames of a sulphurous hell for the millions, predestined from all eternity to burn in them, including innocent children and babes, are not nearly so much believed in as even a few decades ago. Even the followers of John Calvin have to a great extent ceased to believe God to be such a monster as to create a villainous devil to burn and torture his dear offspring for ever and ever, and simply for doing what they could not help. Thanks to the inevitable laws of evolution, the religions of the world have considerably improved since the day when Calvin burnt Servetus in this beautiful town, and when the devil and fires of hell were the principal stock in trade with the "elect" of heaven.

It was with some regret that I left Germany, the land of Goethe, Schiller, Feuerbach, Haeckel, and Buchner, without seeing more of it, but circumstances led me to be content with the parts I felt able to visit.

Germany is not so rich in fertility of soil as Belgium, France, and England, but it nevertheless has a large amount of land of fair productive power, though I judge it is not quite as skilfully managed as in the countries named, as the crops are not so good, so far as I was able to judge. We passed considerable low, flat land in Germany which is illy adapted to anything but grass, and even that seemed light, the yield not being half so good as I saw in Belgium, France, and England. Again, we passed many miles of fine farming country. The plains of the Rhine are of the first quality, and produce good crops. I saw growing there pretty largely a kind of bean new to me. They are sown broadcast, and grow nearly three feet high. I saw the same somewhat largely in England. In Germany I noticed two crops considerably raised that I could not make out what they were. Both were low, not more than a foot in hight, one looking something like mint, and the other with a yellow blossom like the mustard, which, however, it was not. I did not meet with any one who could talk English well enough to enlighten me; perhaps the first was Lucerne clover. Carrots, beets, turnips, and cabbages are much grown. I occasionally saw a patch of Indian corn, but generally not of a vigorous growth. The German butter is quite different from the American article, being soft and oily, and not salted, which leaves it of a flat taste.

The style of architecture in Germany varies greatly. In the towns are many very fine buildings of light-gray sandstone, quite in the modern style, while in the old villages, the older parts of the cities, and in the country, many of the buildings are decidedly ancient in style. Many were built with timber and brick, the brick being laid even with the wood, so that the latter comes to the weather the same as the brick. In this style a single course of brick only is required, as the studding, braces, etc., are a great support to the brick; but as a general thing such buildings do not look well. In many cases, however, when the timbers are skilfully arranged, and the outer surfaces dressed and painted a dark color, while the brick work is of a light color, they look very well. In Germany the larger share of the buildings are roofed with the earthen tile, while in many cases slate is used. There are fine slate quarries on the Rhine. The slate-roof looks far better than the clumsy tile; and in this country, the roofs are so steep, they are much seen.

There is a point or two in reference to Brussels which I intended to mention before, and perhaps it is not too late now. On the day we went to Antwerp we heard of a body of monks of the Trappist order, at LaTrappe, living near Antwerp. They pass their days in silence, making it a religious observance not to speak a word. Many of them go for years without speaking a syllable. Probably they think God does not like talking people, and that chatting belongs to the devil. Though they follow agriculture for a livelihood, they manage to get along without talk. If a person speaks to one of them he places his hands over his ears and walks away as though pained. How extremely senseless many of the religious notions which men have adopted! I did not visit the Trappists. Others of their customs are equally rigid. Existence has but few pleasures for them, and it is extremely doubtful if God even thanks them for the unnatural self-denial which they practice.

I think I did not mention the arcades or galleries of Brussels, a feature worthy of notice. I visited two of these, three hundred feet in length, some sixty feet high, with a glass roof and stores on each side, and two or three stories above them. They have a very cheerful appearance. Two of these arcades stood end to end, and were connected by a passage-way. I judge there are fully one thousand stores in the two, besides the offices, etc., above them. The distance between the rows of stores on either side is some forty or fifty feet.

I said nothing of the system of prostitution in Brussels. I saw nothing of it myself, but conversed with those who are familiar with it. Prostitution is an evil which exists in all large cities and in some which are not very large, and probably will continue to exist so long as the passions of man are what they are, however some may affect to ignore it. Many regard it as a necessary evil, and think it is not practical to attempt to exterminate it. The authorities of Brussels, and I think also Paris, have undertaken to avert some of the evils entailed by the system by subjecting the inmates of houses of prostitution to a daily examination by competent medical men to obviate the direful diseases engendered by that life. I was a little curious to learn what success attends this official recognition of the social evil, and am inclined to think that while good results spring from it in checking the spread of syphilitic diseases evils are also connected with it. From what I learned the unfortunate women of Brussels are in a woeful state of bondage to the persons who keep the disreputable houses of the city. They are not allowed to go upon the street unless accompanied by their keepers, and are compelled like the most abject slaves to continue the miserable life they have chosen whether they wish to or not. I learned of an English girl who had unfortunately been driven to adopt that life in Brussels, but to whom the slavery had become so irksome that she wished to return to England and to a decent mode of life. This, however, under the rule that prevails, she found utterly impossible—she could not leave the house even for a moment without the closest surveillance being held over her. Even when her friends became informed of the situation she was in, and when they wished to aid her in returning to England, the greatest difficulty was experienced in effecting it. I had regarded the legal recognition and regulation of the evil as productive of good, but possibly the effect is not an unmixed good. The whole thing is probably bad, the best thing that can be done with it. Perhaps, however, the evils I speak of have no necessary connection with the recognition and examinations by the authorities.

On leaving Freiburg, in Germany, I had a pleasant ride to Basal, Basle, or Bale, in Switzerland. On the right the beautiful plains of the Rhine extended far away, bounded by the Alsacian hills in the far distance. On the left the Black Forest hills were near all the way, and on the highest points the ruins of old castles still remain, with many of which are connected strange old legends. St. Georgen, the Schonberg, is 2,432 feet high, Schalstadt, the castle of Staufenberg, frowning over the town of Staufen, at the entrance of the Musthenthal and Kortziger, are successively passed. Heitersheim, on the Sultzbach, was formerly the residence of the grand prior of the Knights of Malta. Buggingen is the next, and then Mulheim. This is a little town, long drawn out, occupying about a mile of sloping ground, and noted for the Markgrafen wine, made in the neighborhood. On the Rhine, one and a half miles from the station, is Nouenberg, where Duke Bernhard died in 1639—in all probability a victim to the machinations of Richelieu. Schliengen, Belingen, Rheinweiler, Kleinkems, Ehigen, Eimeldingen, Halligen, and Leopoldshohe are successively passed, and each has its little history and legends. The day was pleasant and the ride was delightful.

In the compartment with me rode also two Englishmen. One had resided several years on the Continent, and the other belongs to the civil service corps, and has passed several years in China. The latter especially is a very intelligent man and very sociable. He had many inquiries to make about the politics and prospects in America, and many comparisons were made between England and America, both in regard to the form of government and the characteristics of the people. He was evidently very well pleased with his country, as I was with mine, and hence some slight differences of opinion arose, by which no unpleasantness was produced. To my remark that the tendency of advancing civilization was to the effect that people should choose their own rulers instead of inheriting them, he defended the system of hereditary monarchy by saying it is more permanent, less annoyed with repeated disturbance as with our elections and changes every four years, with all the excitement and unsettledness which grows out of the system; besides, he said, a people who have to look after their government have more cares and anxieties, and consequently less light-heartedness and happiness, than those not troubled with such responsibilities. I readily admitted the truth of the first part of his statement, but was not prepared to admit that it necessarily makes a people unhappy to choose their own rulers. To my objection to the enormous sum which it costs England to sustain their royal family, he said that was the smallest objection, and one least considered by the English people. They even did not feel it. The annual allowance to the Queen is only £450,000 ($2,250,000), and to the Prince of Wales £50,000 ($250,000)—the numerous other princesses with which England has been favored not being mentioned—and these sums are paid, or especially the Queen's is paid, from the property belonging to the crown, chiefly mines, the income from which is £800,000 yearly, leaving a net gain of £300 000 pounds per year. He did not explain away the fact that the two and a half million dollars annually paid the Queen and the Prince of Wales for doing really nothing whatever might be used in liquidating their enormous public debt, or otherwise lessening the taxes so oppressive upon the people. To my argument against the system of land tenure in England—a few owning all the land, and the masses, especially the tillers, owning none—he thought it a matter of very little consequence, and that the English system gave the most permanence and was just as well for the working classes. If America is allowed to send into England breadstuffs, beef, pork, etc., free of duty, the land-holders of England, whether few or many, could not make money at producing them in competition with America, and after all, land is only valuable in proportion to what profits can be made from it. The land-holders of England were now receiving much less rent for their lands than formerly, the tillers consequently paying less. Again, he could not see that the land-owner system of England is any more objectionable than that of America, where the farmer owns his own land, but where nearly every farm is mortgaged for half or two-thirds its value. He deemed it no more onerous to rent farming land in England than to pay excessive interest to capitalists in American. I acknowledged the force of his argument, but contended that as a rule it was not necessary for the American farmers to keep their farms covered with mortgages; and when they removed them and owned their own farms and had to pay no landlord and no capitalist it would be infinitely better than to always be a slave and till somebody else's land. I insisted that it is a great evil in any country for a few to own all the land, and that in my own country, when a man owned more land than he needs for his own use, or is able to work himself, while millions are able to own none it is no less an evil. I insisted that it is decidedly better for every man to own his own home than for one man to own the homes of hundreds of his fellow-men.

When he criticised the honesty of American politicians and asserted that office-holders in America are more dishonest than in England, from the very fact that in America office-holding is a very temporary affair and lasts only while an administration is in power, during which time the incumbent of an office feels that he must make all he can out of it, for the little time he holds it, whether honestly or dishonestly, whereas in England the incumbents of offices belong to the regular service corps, and if they are found to be guilty of embezzlement or thievery they are disgraced and cashiered for life, I admitted the truth of his remarks, but objected to the system of the recognition of a civil service corps, from which only office-holders can be taken. I preferred a free field and a fair competition in office-holding as well as in everything else. He contended that that very free competition makes most dishonest politicians, and held that the proverbial dishonesty of American politics proved it. He quoted the remarks of John A. Dix in strong opposition to his son's entering the arena of politics from the very reason of its corruption and dishonesty, of which his long life experience had abundantly taught him. I was compelled to admit the force of his argument; in fact, I have not very much to say in defense of American politics and politicians. Whether the English system is materially better I am not prepared to decide. That ours is bad I frankly confess.

After running over the habits of Americans in comparison with those of Europeans, and other topics, we naturally glided to the subject of religion,

He is a well-read man, and is familiar with the writings of Huxley, Spencer, Darwin, Stuart Mill, Buckle, Draper, etc., and while he is Liberal enough to admit there is much reason and truth in what they say, he is conservative, and inclines to hold on, to some extent, to the old theological system, holding that the errors of past ages are gradually being discarded, and that men will settle down to what is really true, and will come to acknowledge the great monotheistic fact which lies at the basis of true religion. I of course took issue with him, and insisted that the monotheistic idea as well as the polytheistic absurdities had for long centuries involved man in endless superstitions and errors, and had blinded him to the truths of science and reason. He and his friend with him scouted the idea that the universe is not the result of an all-wise and all-powerful intelligence which directs and controls all things by his will. I admitted at once that that was the theological idea, but contended that many are now becoming convinced that the teachings of theology are false in many things. For instance, I said, theology teaches that this globe and all the suns and stars of the universe were brought into existence a little less than six thousand years ago, and of course that man had existed no longer than that, but investigation, science, and demonstration have conclusivly proved that this earth has existed for hundreds or thousands of years, and probably millions; while in your own country, England, and in many other countries are unmistakable proofs that man has existed on this earth not less than fifty or a hundred thousand years. Theology teaches that the earth is the principal part of the universe, that it is stationary, has foundations, pillars, and corners; the sun coursing every twenty-four hours around it; while science has demonstrated—as every schoolboy now understands—that the earth is a sphere or globe, that it is not stationary, but turns every twenty-four hours on its axis, and every year makes a journey around the sun. Theology teaches that the earth is older than the sun, and brought forth and perfected vegetation of all kinds, including trees, grasses, vegetables, flowers, seeds and fruits, before any sun had been brought into existence, but science and reason have asserted that this is utterly impossible. Theology teaches that everything in the universe is governed by divine law, by a supernatural power, a positive supernaturalism, a special controling providence, but science teaches, and reason sustains it, that everything in this world, and in all other worlds, is governed by fixed, unchangeable natural laws. Things are as they are, and events occur just as they do occur, because there are natural causes that compel them to so occur; and no event has ever taken place that did not have a full, sufficient, and natural cause to produce it or make it so. If then the teachings of science are true, theology and its teachings are false and should be set aside. There is no longer any reason in keeping up and hanging on to that which is demonstrated to be positively false. In this age of intelligence we ought to be free enough to throw falsehood aside and embrace the truth, no matter what havoc it makes of old superstitions and fables. One of the two systems must be true—supernaturalism or natural law; if one is true the other is certainly false, and must be discarded. Supernaturalism has long held sway, and men have yielded a tacit consent that it is the power which has ruled the world, but science is now telling us in thunder tones that there is no supernaturalism, that everything is natural, hence old theology must be set aside, and the truths of unerring science must be taken in its place.

The gentlemen both wished to know how I could account for the existence of all matter, this world and all worlds, save by a creator of all, a mind and power behind it all capable of planning all and of bringing all into existence, and then of conducting and controling all. I replied that while I would not attempt to say what the original source or state of matter and the worlds was, I felt sure something was never made from nothing, and that the something—the matter—that exists to-day always existed in some form, which may have changed a million times. For me it is easier to conceive that matter is eternal and always has had an existence than to think that there ever was a time when matter had no existence and was made from nothing. I wished them to state whether they did not find the same difficulty in accounting for the eternal existence of their designer and creator, who necessarily must be superior to what he designed and created, as they have in accounting for the eternal existence of the universe. I considered the eternal existence of the other, but as we could see, feel, and know that the universe is, and has a bona fide existence, and as this designer is wholly imaginary, no person having ever seen him, or known the first thing of him, the argument is altogether in favor of the universe being an independent eternal existence. "Ah, but," said they, "witness the harmony and perfection displayed in all that you call nature, and see what wisdom and design of an intelligent creative mind is shown, and what proof is given that nature is only the handiwork of God!"

To this I replied that if nature must necessarily have had a maker because she is so perfect and works so harmoniously, and because such adaptation is found in all her parts, the same reason would necessitate that this creator of theirs, who must necessarily have design, adaptation, and harmony still superior to what is evinced is what he made, should have also have had a designer and creator. If it is set down for a rule that that which shows harmony and design must have a creator, then that designer and creator must also have had a designer and creator, and so on interminably. In that line of argument we would never be done conceiving of designers and creators of other designers and creators. We cannot get by it; if because the universe has harmony, apparent design and power—must have had a maker, that which has superior harmony, design, and power must still more have required a maker. Rather than pursue this idle and futile mode of argument it is far better to take realities, what we know to have an existence, with the laws and forces inseparably connected with them, and let that which is wholly imaginary and of which we have not the first particle of proof be allowed to rest and to subside where it belongs.

The water seems to know enough to run down hill without being directed, the sun seems to know how to shine without superintendence, the winds are able to blow, the waves of the ocean to roll, the grass and the corn don't fail to grow in the spring without an instructor or mover, and so it is with everything in the universe; the earth revolves with unerring precision, the planets move in obedience to the unalterable laws of the universe, the worlds and stars follow the same laws, and nothing needs an additional pushing power, nothing requires a director; there is absolutely nothing for divine providence to attend to, there is no conceivable use for any God more than there is for a million of them. The universe is superior to all imaginary gods and has not the slightest use for them.

The more intelligent of the two acknowledged the force of my remarks, but evinced a wish to change the subject. Of course, I was obliging.

We soon reached Basil. The two gentlemen continued on to Zurich, while I stopped over to take a look at the first Switzerland town and to begin to be more familiar with the country of the Alps. Switzerland cannot by any means be mistaken for a prairie country or one of dead levels and plains. The greater portion of it is of a decidedly elevated character. It is a small country, containing sixteen thousand square miles, more than half of which is taken up by the Alps, whose tops are covered with eternal snows, and down whose sides huge avalanches of snow and ice plunge with immense velocity, taking with them trees and rocks, and sometimes submerging cottages and hamlets. The altitude of the country varies from 678 feet above the sea level to 15,226 feet, the top of the highest mountain. The population is 2,776,000; and a more frugal, hardy, industrious, honest, happy people are hardly to be found on the earth. They are justly noted for their valor and love of liberty. For many centuries they have been ready at all times to struggle against heavy odds that their liberties might be preserved. For a long time the despotic power of Austria tried to subdue them, but in vain. They have been steadfastly determined to be a free people, and they have desired no king or crowned head to rule over them. While all the other nations of Europe on every side of them have bowed in submission to emperors, kings, and dukes, the steadfast, liberty-loving Swiss have maintained a republic, and perhaps the best republic that has ever been known in the world.

Though so large a portion of Switzerland is taken up by snow-capped mountains, it is far from being a poor country. Its productions are large and varied. Up to fourteen hundred feet above the sea level the vine flourishes admirably; above that to three thousand feet, oats, wheat, grass, and other farm products. Above four thousand feet but little grows save the Alpine firs. The soil is productive and well repays the honest tiller for the labor bestowed upon it. The hills and fields now look as fresh and green as in June, pasturing, excellent for the flocks and herds, and plenty and prosperity seem to pervade the land.

Bale, Basle, or Basel (it is spelled each way), is an old town and is claimed to be of Roman origin. It is situated on the Rhine, which divides it into two unequal parts, the lesser being called Klein Basel and the other Gros Basil. The custom house is here, but no ado was made in examining baggage. I saw no trunk or satchel opened or examined. There was formerly considerable antagonism and hatred between the two towns. This was shown by a town clock which the people of Gros Basel erected. At every hour when the clock struck, a head protruded its tongue at the people of Klein Basel, but the people of the smaller division survived these bad faces and tongue protrudings, and have flourished finely. The population of the entire town is forty-six thousand. It is a solid, old-fashioned town, some of the streets being very narrow, crooked, and irregular—some of the passages are not more than six or eight feet wide, and so crooked that but a short distance could be seen a given point. I noticed a style here that I have noticed in several other European cities—the streets, which perhaps you would take to be main thoroughfares, grow smaller and narrower and perhaps run entirely out in some court or up to somebody's stable, where they come to a dead stop and you have to turn and get into another street the best way you can.

I visited the principal noted places of the town, but saw nothing very remarkable. It has a small museum of art, antiquities, etc., and several churches possessing nothing specially worthy of notice. The minster, or cathedral, is said to be one of the finest Protestant churches in Europe. It has two towers 220 feet high, and dates back from early in the eleventh century. It has a few paintings and statues, but is very plain compared with the usual Catholic cathedrals. The town is very well supplied with public fountains, where the people go for water to wash their clothes, etc. Some of the fountains are embellished with appropriate statues.

The Rhine, here 850 feet in width, has a very rapid current, and is spanned by three bridges. Besides, there are two small ferry-boats run wholly by the force of the current. A wire cable is stretched across the river, and a wire is connected from this cable to the ferry-boat. By turning the rudder or keel with a lever, the boat makes good headway across, a pulley moving on the cable and keeping even with the boat. It is a simple affair, but is, nevertheless, curious to see the boat making trips every few minutes back and forth without anything to propel it save the river. The direction of the steering apparatus is changed every time the boat crosses, Although the bridges are free, these boats make enough by carrying passengers at one sou per head to keep up the running. I crossed in each of the two boats.

The water of the river is made very available for running machinery in the town. It is taken through in races, and used here, there, and in many places, and then discharged in the river, similar as with the Genesee river at Rochester. I saw several printing presses thus running by water power.

Near this town is the celebrated battlefield of St. Jacob, where in 1444, 1,300 Swiss withstood an army of 40,000 French under the command of the Dauphin of France, at that time a confederate of Austria. The French army perished, only ten escaping alive, and the battle of St. Jacob is still referred to as the Thermopylæ of Swiss history.

I will remark here that the Swiss may be called a cross between the German and the French; both languages are spoken, the German in the northern and the French in the southern part. Probably the French predominates. In several of the towns both languages are spoken. Here it is nearly all French, and the matter printed is in French.

On taking the cars again at the southern depot I was glad to see that the cars were upon the American plan, or nearly so—the first I have seen in Europe, and the only ones like the American save on the Russian railways. It is decidedly more pleasant to have the car all in one saloon than to have it divided up into five or six small compartments, with no chance to pass from car to car, or from one compartment to another.

As soon as we had well entered Switzerland its characteristic scenery presented itself. Ranges of hills with lovely valleys between were the rule, with here and there an undulating plain of moderate size, which reminded me much of many landscapes I have seen in America. As we penetrated into the country we passed through many tunnels, which proved conclusively, if proof were needed, that we were passing through a hilly country. I noticed even long after the sun had gone down, and the moon afforded us her light, that many of the higher hills were in independent peaks, and not in even ranges as they were in Germany. Some of these peaks were quite sharp or pointed, somewhat like a sugar loaf. These were, of course, simply rocks which some time in the long ago were forced up from the level of the earth, or the surrounding country had shrunk away from them, leaving those high points, which for some reason could not settle with th rest, away up as they are. We entered into the region of the Jura Alps, and fine mountain views were obtained. Often the scenery was most picturesque, romantic, and beautiful. We passed through several small towns, the largest of which is Olten, containing 23,000 inhabitants. We made no stop till we arrived at Berne, at 10 P.M., where we stopped for the night.

Berne (pronounced Bairn) is the seat of government of the Swiss confederation, and is a solid and very pretty town I was up in good season in the morning and out before breakfast viewing the city and seeing the men and buxom young Swiss girls opening the stores. Also the peasants from the rural districts with their supplies of all kinds of produce. It was Tuesday, the best market day of the week. The streets and little squares were occupied next the sidewalks to the extent of nearly a mile with these rustic people. The men had little droves of sheep or a few hogs shut up in little pens, made temporarily by tying with cords lengths of light fence for the purpose. The cattle for the butchers were in another place, but all looked fat and fit for use. The hogs were remarkably clean and free from bristles; perhaps they had been washed, but the bristles had hardly been pulled out. The dames had live chickens in large baskets with network tied over the top; also butter, cheese, eggs, and a full assortment of vegetables and fruits. The apples looked better than any I had seen, and the plums, pears, and peaches were also fine. The grapes are probably brought from the south, as it is too early for them to be ripe here. Later in the morning stalls were in full operation with nearly all sorts of merchandise, largely attended by women, giving the town the appearance of a fair. Tuesdays and Saturdays this selling of all sorts of goods on the streets is permitted. The purchasers were out in full force, the housekeepers laying in their supplies of eatables, and others buying what they most needed.

The costumes of the peasants looked decidedly antique. The men wear blue cotton blouses, the women gypsy hats, very short-waisted old-fashioned dresses, and some of them with what looked somewhat like a man's shirt with shoulder-straps, and a sort of open jacket, partly covering the white shirt, leaving the arms and part of the chest, showing the white undergarment. Some of the women had a singular head-dress, made of dark goods, like very wide heavy ribbon tied into a kind of knot, with wings ten inches long, made stiff with pasteboard or something of the kind, these wings being expanded like the wings of a huge bat or of a windmill. I could see neither beauty nor use in them, as they but slightly covered the head.

Berne is on the river Aar, a rapid stream, which makes a sudden turn or elbow at the lower point of the city, which makes the town a fan-shape, the lower part being the apex, and the other much broader. After breakfast, chartering a carriage, I rode round the city, crossing the river, and going unto Prospect Hill, where I had a fine view of the city of Berne below me, of the beautiful scenery of the surrounding country, and particularly of the Bernese Alps, whose eternal snows were plainly visible and looked to be not more than six or eight miles away, but were probably not less than twenty. By the aid of a glass they were brought much nearer, showing hovels or cheap buildings that had been constructed in that region of snow and ice. The whole view was truly a delightful one and worth a long journey to enjoy.

Berne contains nearly forty thousand inhabitants, of whom less than three thousand are Catholics. The church of Rome seems to have less foothold in Switzerland than in any of the neighboring countries. The Reformation became thoroughly established in this mountainous country, and its doctrines have been well maintained. I think there are no Catholic cathedrals in this country that will compare with others on the continent. The religion of the country is free—every person left to follow his own bent.

Berne is well built of light-gray stone, and has a neat appearance; even in the suburbs I saw nothing slatternly or offensive. Heavy and high walls have been built along the river, and in other places high terraces, fine promenades, and shady drives abound. Some of the public grounds and gardens are tastefully arranged. A large stream of water from the river is taken through the principal street, and in some places is left open for cleansing purposes, but it would seem the disadvantages would overbalance the benefits. The streets are of fair width, and the buildings are largely built over the sidewalks, with heavy columns and arches. The columns, or piers, are from two to four feet through, and sometimes somewhat ornamental. This mode gives pedestrians a degree of immunity from rain and snow, but makes the stores dark and gloomy, and induces the custom of displaying the goods largely out in the light next to the street. This style of building will hardly be adopted by other cities.

Berne has a noted town clock. At every hour a cock crows as a warning, also a figure of a man strikes the quarters on two bells, other figures nodding and taking part in the performance. When the hour is struck a figure of a man, life-size, in the belfry strikes the large bell, and several smaller figures, lower down, of a lion, elephant, and horse and rider, etc., come out and take a share in what is going on, and when all is over the cock again crows. I was a spectator, with many others, when the hour of ten was struck, and had my share of the amusement.

Berne is 1,683 feet above the Mediterranean and 522 feet higher than Lake Geneva. The river Aar empties into the Rhine and flows northward through Germany and Holland. The waters here flow southward and empty into the Mediterranean. Berne has a rather even climate, ranging from 87 degrees above to 24 below the freezing point.

Fountains surmounted with historical and allegorical devices are frequent, and to these the families seem to go for their supplies of water. I judge the water is not taken into the residences. Women are often seen washing clothes at these public fountains. There are but few cross streets, but passways under arches from one street to another are quite frequent. I have noticed the same here in the older parts of the city. These passways are dark and gloomy.

The bear is the crest of Berne, and is frequently seen cut in stone on columns, gateways, and in public places. Among the curiosities of the town are four black bears in two pits with high walls at the end of the town by the side of one of the main streets. Many persons were in attendance, throwing nuts and cakes to these savage pets. An Englishman once accidentally fell into one of these pits and the bears immediately killed him. I had not the slightest desire to try the experiment. Among other curiosities I saw a herd of milch goats, a dozen or two in number, being driven from one locality to another. As is well known, the milk of goats is much used in this country. In the higher altitudes they will live where cattle cannot, and their milk is richer than that of cows.

Berne has a museum, but not a large collection. Its public buildings are of a very respectable character. In rear of the Federal Hall is a fine terrace from which grand and lovely views are obtained of the surrounding magnificent scenery.

The following lines are from a poem by W. H. Pollok:

"I sat at Berne, and watched the chain
Of icy peaks and passes,
That towered like gods above the plain,
In stern majestic masses;
I waited till the evening light
Upon their heads descended;
They caught it on their glittering hight,
And held it there suspended;
I saw the red spread o'er the white,
Just like a maiden's blushing,
Till all were bathed in rosy light,
That seemed from heaven rushing."

On the way from Berne to the southwest much open country is passed through, abounding in pleasant prospects and charming landscapes. The Alpine peaks, or the high prominences, are hardly lost sight of at any point, though a fine opening of hundreds of acres of undulating ground is spread open before us. The whole is fringed in with high hills and sharp peaks of rocks. Many small Swiss villages are passed, where industry, thrift, and contentment seem to have a home. But little evidence of idleness is seen.

Fribourg is on this line of road—a town of 11,000 inhabitants, largely Catholic. It is a curious town, outwardly and inwardly. It is said to be the divisional line between the German and the French. At the upper part of the town everybody and everything is German; at the lower part everybody and everything is French. It is built on very uneven ground; the streets are steep and built one above another, so that in one part the upper street is carried on arches of stone over the roofs of the houses in the street below.

The people of this town have three things of which they proudly boast. The first is an old lime tree, fourteen feet in circumference, its branches being supported on stone pillars. It is in front of the Town Hall and Council Hall, and this legend is told in reference to it:

"When the memorable battle of Morat was being fought, the townspeople of Fribourg stood in the public square, anxiously waiting for tidings of how the day sped. There was one young fellow in the battle who remembered that the hearts of many of his friends and fellow-citizens were beating painfully in that time of suspense, and as soon as the contest was over, he ran from the field of blood, jaded and fatigued though he was, to bear to them the joyful news that the Swiss had been victorious. Away he sped over hill and dale, and sliding down a rocky slope he grasped a twig which would not bear his weight, but came out by the roots. Rising from the fall, on and on he sped till he reached the square of Fribourg, where the old men and maidens, invalids and women, were standing with pale faces and clasped hands, waiting his approach. Breathless and exhausted, the blood pouring from the wounds he had received on the field of battle, he could only raise his voice to shout out the word 'Victory!' and fell dead in their midst. The twig which he still clutched in his hand was planted on the spot where he fell, and now that fine old lime tree stands there as a beautiful memento of the love and courage of that gallant young soldier and the victory of Morat."

The second is the cathedral, a gothic building, dating from 1285. It has a tower 376 feet high. The church has not very many attractions, but its organ is said to be one of the finest in the world. It has sixty-seven stops, 7,800 pipes, one of them being no less than thirty-two feet in hight.

The third is the suspension bridge over the Sarine, a small river below the city, the principal streets being two hundred or three hundred feet above it. It has a span of 905 feet, and as one stands in the center of it and surveys the rocky ravine before him a very fine view is obtained. Higher up is another bridge, about two-thirds the length, 305 feet above the water. It is secured to the solid rock, but nevertheless seems slight for such a hight from the bottom of the abyss.

In passing on from Fribourg toward Lake Geneva the same picturesque country and scenery abounds on every side. Thrifty farms and villages are passed all along which bespeak industry and thrift. The mountain scenery is of course of the grandest description, but it is not till suddenly emerging from a tunnel, when approaching Lausanne, on the shores of Lake Geneva, that the acme of beauty and delight is reached. At once the most beautiful lake of clear, blue, placid water is spread out before you. The thrifty vineyards are above you and below, for the railroad runs for a long way on the side of a vine-clad hill. On the opposite side of the lake bold mountains arise, and away in the distance is plainly visible old Mount Blanc himself, with his hoary head reaching far heavenward. The day was lovely, the air clear, and the views almost entrancing. I think I never saw anything at once so grand and lovely. I will not attempt a description, but will only say it was exquisite.

Lausanne is a town of 26,500 inhabitants. It is also built on uneven ground—hills and hollows. Its cathedral, a plain structure, is noted as the arena of the great disputation between Calvin, Farel, Viret, and others, the result of which was the transference of the episcopal seat to Fribourg, the separation of the Canton of Vaud from the Romish church, and the supremacy of Savoy. The building is 330 feet long and 143 wide. From its terrace a magnificent view is obtained of the mountain and lake scenery around. The schools of Lausanne are somewhat noted, and the children of many English people are sent here to obtain an education.

The country between Lausanne and this city continues very beautiful, though perhaps not equal to that which bursts upon the view when first coming in sight of the lake. The crops cultivated are more diversified, not being the vine exclusively as about Lausanne. Several towns are passed, among which Nyon is the largest. The lake is in view much of the way and is extremely clear and blue in appearance—truly a lovely sheet of water, the largest in Switzerland. It is of a crescent shape, nearly fifty miles in length and eight miles wide at Lausanne, the widest place. It is hardly probable that any sheet of water of its size in the world is surrounded by more grand and picturesque scenery.

Geneva is the largest city in Switzerland, containing 68,000 inhabitants, though belonging to one of the smallest cantons in the Swiss confederation. The river Rhone, which is the outlet of Lake Geneva, divides the city into two parts, like London and Paris, though unlike those cities the southern side is the largest. A portion of each half stands upon a hill, but not so steep as to be difficult to climb. It is really a fine town, and is often called "a little Paris." The buildings are of the same light gray sandstone of which Berne, Fribourg, Weisbaden, etc., are built, and they range from four to seven stories in hight. The older parts of the city present somewhat of an antique appearance, but the more modern portions are built with much taste.

Geneva dates its origin back to Roman times. It has seen many trying periods, and passed through many struggles. It had contests with the house of Savoy for a long time, until it allied itself first with Fribourg, and then with Berne. In 1798 it was annexed to France; in 1815 it was allied with the Swiss confederation, but in 1846 a democratic government succeeded the aristocratic rule, and since then the course of events have run smoothly with the city.

Among the places I have visited here are the English Gardens, where is erected a bronze statue of much beauty of two large female figures, representing the Swiss confederation supporting Geneva. It is on the south side of the Rhone, with the faces of the figures looking toward Switzerland.

The botanic gardens are an agreeable promenade, but not equal to what I have seen in other cities in the way of plants.

The Rath Museum contains an assortment of statuary and paintings, but very limited compared with Paris and other cities.

The Conservatory of Music is a fine edifice and has beautiful statuary in niches in the exterior walls as well as on the interior in the halls. It is a school for music with a fine concert room.

The University building, as well as the institution for which it was erected, is a great credit to the city. I visited the large wing, used as a museum of natural history, and saw in its three stories a fine collection of specimens in all departments of natural history, including the skeletons of a large share of the birds, fishes, and animals, from the elephant down to the smallest mouse, all skilfully stuffed and arranged in upright cases in their natural positions, as though alive. One is filled with wonder at the great number of classes, orders, genera, and varieties of the animal creation. The collection of minerals in the same institution is very creditable.

The Brunswick monument is also a very imposing and artistic ornament. It was erected according to plans expressed in the will of the Duke of Brunswick, who was for political reasons compelled to leave Germany and locate here. He presented the city with some 600,000 francs, if I remember cor rectly, 200,000 of which were used in constructing this monument. It stands on the "Place des Alpes," facing the lake, upon a stone platform approached by a flight of steps, flanked on either side by a pedestal, each surmounted by a gigantic, heraldic lion, skilfully carved in stone. The monument is in the center of the platform between two large marble reservoirs; at the end of each nearest the monument crouches a large griffin holding a ducal crown and shield, with the armorial bearings of Brunswick. The monument is some fifty feet in hight. It stands on a hexagonal basement, and at each angle rises a marble column supporting a kind of Gothic temple, in each of which stands a white marble statue of an ancestor of the Duke. These columns support a platform on which is a marble sarcophagus containing the remains of the Duke. The whole is surmounted by sculptured ornamental work on which stands a bronze equestrian statue of the Duke in military uniform.

On a key near one of the six bridges which span the Rhone is a bronze statue of Jean Jacques Rousseau in a sitting posture. He is holding a pen in his hand; he appears in deep study, and is supposed to be writing his immortal "Confessions." I believe Rousseau was born in Geneva. The statue is the work of the sculptor Prader, and the small island or key upon which it stands is called "Ile Rousseau" or Island of Rousseau."

The point about this city having, perhaps, greater interest for me than any other, is the residence of Voltaire at Ferney, an old time village some three miles from the city. I took a conveyance out to see where the great and brilliant writer passed many years of his life, but found no admission to visitors in the Chateau Voltaire was allowed till 2 o'clock P. M. I had over two hours and a half to wait, and thinking it would take no longer to remain in the vicinity than to return to the city and go out again, and wishing to see the home of Voltaire more than anything else in the vicinity of Geneva, I sauntered around among the farmers and vine-dressers in the vicinity, went into several vineyards, and picked up what information I could without being able to converse with the peasants. I could have had a plenty of grapes to eat, but it is a week or two too early for grapes to be ripe here. I noticed more closely than before the mode of culture. The rows of vines are about three feet apart, and the vines about two feet in the rows. The vines have, on an average, only about six to ten clusters each, the purple having more than the white, and presenting a more vigorous appearance. I think the vines are cut back every year within some six inches of the ground, the new growth reaching three or four feet, and each vine tied to a stake. The old portion of the vine next to the ground gets large and stumpy, and occasionally dies, and has to be replaced by young vines.

The farm houses looked very old and not exceedingly comfortable. The house and barn are generally joined together, and often the compost heap, with its not very pleasant odors, is directly before the door. These country homes do not present a very inviting appearance.

I returned to the Voltaire mansion fully half an hour before the time for admission, and had leisure to inspect the exterior of the premises, while a number of other persons arrived in carriages and on foot impressed with the same desire as myself, to see where the great thinker and writer once lived. The mansion is about a quarter of a mile from the village of Ferney, and stands back from the road about a thousand feet, with the avenue to it lying between two rows of stately old shade trees. The house is a fine country mansion of wood, painted white, two stories in hight, besides the attic or mansard story. It is some sixty feet or more in length, and forty in width, with a wing probably added since Voltaire's time. The whole is well preserved, and has not an old appearance. The grounds in front comprise about an acre, and are finely laid out with flower beds, gravel walks, and roads. The whole is inclosed by a high iron fence in front, with large and small gates for carriages and pedestrians, and a solid wall of stone on the northern side. On the south side toward Geneva is a tower or observatory nearly a hundred feet high, from which a splendid view of the city and lake of Geneva, the surrounding country, and particularly grand old Mont Blanc, is obtained. There are probably few places even in Switzerland where a finer view is to be had. The mansion stands on elevated ground, probably three hundred feet above the level of the lake, and the view is very fine from any portion of the grounds. Mont Blanc towers up grandly, and a range of many miles of the eternal snows is very clearly seen. The near ranges of hills south of the lake, as well as north, not snow-capped, present a fine contrast with the hoary summits of Mont Blanc. The view extends for miles, especially east and west, and thousands of acres of vineyards and farms are spread out like a map before the observer.

At the hour of two the doors were opened, and twelve of us in number, both ladies and gentlemen, were ready to avail ourselves of the privilege of entering into the rooms where the remarkable man, Voltaire, passed many years. We were shown into his private rooms where he used to write, perhaps, his "Philosophical Dictionary," his "Commentaries on the Bible," "Pocket Theology," and others of the nearly one hundred volumes he wrote—historical, dramatic, theological, and philosophical. We saw his arm-chair, his bed, and the mausoleum intended by the Marchioness de Villette to contain his heart, but it lies with his body in the Pantheon at Paris. Around the rooms are nearly two dozen paintings, some of his near friends, and others being fancy, poetical, and classical pieces, but no crucified gods or sour-looking saints. Among the portraits, Frederick the Great, of Prussia, was pointed out, who for many years was a near friend of the great writer; also a full-size painting of one of his lady friends, a marchioness, whose name I did not understand. (No one present spoke English but myself, and thus I labored under considerable disadvantage.) Several old copper-plate engravings of various distinguished persons hung upon the walls, probably those admired by Voltaire. Among them I remember the names of Diderot, D'Alembert, Isaac Newton, etc. Benjamin Franklin and George Washington were also there, but I think they must have been placed there after Voltaire's death, for he died in 1778. Two or three busts of the great writer were in the rooms, one life-size and one smaller.

I felt a degree of solemnity and reverence as I stood in the rooms by the chair and bed of the distinguished man who occupied them a hundred and ten years ago, and I esteemed it a privilege to step into his old home and to place my hand upon articles once held by him. I entertain a profound respect for Voltaire. He was great in many directions, and, considering the age in which he lived, the power of the church which encompassed him on every side, he exhibited remarkable moral courage and wrote that which few authors dared to write. He gave the church and old theological errors many severe blows, which they were never able to avert. While standing by his chair, his table, and his bedside, I felt a desire to render myself useful in making many of his theological writings known to English readers, which have never yet been published in our language. If I possess the necessary financial ability, I shall publish them.

I did not learn who is the owner of the Voltaire mansion and home, but am glad it has fallen into hands who entertain such high esteem for the talented man, and who are willing others should visit the place and show their respect for the great departed and what he did to give mental liberty to his fellow-men. We were permitted to walk through the grounds in rear of the mansion and on the south side, which are most beautifully laid out and ornamented with flowers, shrubbery, bowers, statuary, reservoirs of water, fountains, etc. One continuous bower, composed of a species of dwarf beach, probably the blue beach, and the branches skilfully twined together, reach at least six hundred feet, and beyond is a beautiful park, with walks and drives, amid fine old shade trees. The entire grounds thus devoted to ornamentation and enjoyment must amount to thirty acres, and perhaps more. On the south of these grounds, as the land gradually slopes toward the sun, is a fine vineyard of ten or fifteen acres belonging to the same estate. On the other side are fine barns and outbuildings, with vegetable gardens, fruit-trees, farming land, etc. The proprietor of the old home is evidently a man of wealth and taste. It is indeed a lovely place.

The little chapel which Voltaire erected is of stone and stands somewhat in front of the grounds and of the mansion on the side of the roadway. It is some fifty feet in length by twenty-five or thirty in width, and has a modest tower with a town-clock in it which is still running. Over the door of the chapel is cut in stone these Latin words, "Deo erexit Voltaire." The chapel was not open to visiters, nor did I learn whether any use is now made of it. The door looks old and rusty, and as though a good coat of paint would improve its appearance.

The village of Ferney undoubtedly entertains a kindly remembrance of Voltaire. In 1878, the centennial year of his decease, a fountain monument of stone was set up in the public square, surmounted by a bust of the great man, the whole dedicated to his memory. The inscription being in French, I did not copy it. One of the hotels of the place is the Hotel de Voltaire. The country around Ferney is very pleasant, and between it and Geneva are many fine country seats neatly ornamented. In the village are several potteries, where plain and fancy ware is made. The road leading out, like nearly all the roads in Switzerland, is macadamized, or composed largely of stone, very smooth and solid.

On the same day I visited the home of Voltaire I sought out the spot where Calvin caused Michael Servetus to be burnt alive with a slow, excruciating fire in the year 1553. I had tried to find this spot on the day before but had failed. I was surprised at the ignorance of the people here of the damning fact that within the limits of this city a good man was once burnt to death at the behest of a religious tribunal of which John Calvin was the head, because it was thought his views were not what they should be. I inquired of many, and they seemed wholly oblivious that such an event ever occurred here. Even the proprietor of the hotel where I stop, and who speaks English tolerably well, knew nothing of it, and misdirected me to the Hill Le Champel, where the murderous deed was done, sending me nearly a mile below the town, where the confluence of the Rhone and the Aar takes place, to the left of which is quite a high hill used for a park and summer resort. That was not the place. I met a Swiss who has lived several years in America and can speak English very fairly. I spoke with him about the burning of Servetus, and said I wished to visit the place. He very good-naturedly remarked, "Ah, you American people know a great deal more about what has taken place in our own city than we know ourselves. I never heard anything about the burning of that man."

It is perhaps not at all singular that the followers of John Calvin are utterly ashamed of cruel, heartless deed of his, and would be glad to have the remembrance of it entirely die away, but it will not be done; it is indelibly recorded on the pages of history and cannot be erased. He not only caused the death of that intelligent Spanish physician, but also of the unfortunate poet, James Gruet, against whom he had a spite, besides pursuing with vindictive hate many others against whom his ire had been kindled. Probably a greater tyrant never lived in proportion to the extent of his power. Calvin's theocracy only extended over the small Canton of Geneva. Had he but occupied the papal chair or the throne of some kingdom it is highly probable the world would have had more severely felt the heavy hand of his power.

At length I found the spot where poor Servetus was slowly reduced to ashes, and it is within half a mile of the Cathedral of St. Peter, where Calvin year after year preached the gospel of hate and vengeance. Notwithstanding the rain was falling at the time, I stopped long enough to meditate upon the cursed deed that had been enacted there, the motives which led to it, and the religion which prompted it. For what was the inoffensive Servetus thus cruelly put to death? Simply because he had written and published his belief that Jesus Christ was not the eternal creator of heaven and earth—for occupying the almost identical ground upon which Unitarians stand to-day. Because this honest man had presumed to express his sentiments the extra-religious Calvin had pursued him for years, caused his arrest at Vienne, France, and pounced upon him when the pursued man fled to the city of Geneva, as it were, for safety. He flew from the claws of a hawk to find himself in the talons of a vulture, from the pursuit of a wolf to find himself beset by a hyena.

For a moment it occurred to me that there was a slight resemblance in the fate of Servetus and myself. He had merely written and published his honest convictions; I had done the same. He for this had been hunted down, thrown into prison, and finally most cruelly deprived of his life; so had I, with the exception that owing to the advance of civilization and righteous rule in the world, an attempt was not made directly upon my life, though there is little doubt that the hope was indulged in that my life at my age might yield to the more cruel punishment than death. Many followers of Calvin said I ought to be burnt at the stake. Had their wishes been answered I doubtless would have suffered the same fate as did Servetus. It must not be forgotten that the men who pursued me and threw me into prison are disciples of the same man who pursued Servetus. The infamous sneak who first set upon my track, and by false pretenses and false charges caused my arrest, is a Calvinist, and a member of a Calvinistic church in Brooklyn. The president of his persecuting society, who furnished money and influence to destroy me, is a Calvinist, and a principal pillar in the Calvinistic church to which he belongs. The bigoted judge who tried me, and in every way in his power showed the determination to convict me and throw me into prison, is a Calvinist and belongs to the same church, and is a pal of the base informer and perjurer who caused my arrest. The loud-mouthed Crosby, who perhaps is the biggest gun of Calvinism in America, who preaches in the first Calvinistic church in New York city, the man who approves of falsehood and deceit, who threw up his hands with joy at a meeting in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association because I had been arrested, convicted, and imprisoned, and declared it was worth one hundred thousand times as much as all that had been paid in to the society which pursued me, or the sum of $5,000,000,000, is a fine Calvinist. Can it be strange, then, as I stood near the spot where Servetus yielded up his life in extreme agony, at the instance of that cruel, heartless man, that I was not much in love with Calvinism? Is it singular that I do not love it at any time? No, it is not; and I feel that I will only be doing my duty to oppose to the extent of my ability, and so long as I have life, the spirit of intolerance and persecution for opinion's sake which Calvin and his disciples have shown.

The Postal Laws Again.

Mr. Wakeman's personal side issues hav nothing to do with the legal questions involved in the construction of the postal laws. If he believes that Mr. Ingersoll struck him below the belt at Chicago he should hav asked a correction then and there; and no one is more ready to do justice than Col. Ingersoll.

The side issues on lotteries and means for preventing conception hav nothing to do with the enforcement or repeal of the postal laws against obscene publications. The repealers demand the repeal of the postal laws on the ground that they invade the freedom of the press. Those laws must be construed strictly, and no postal officer can exercise any power not granted. Whatever he does, he must show a legal warrant for doing. The law does not authorize special agents, or postal officers of any kind, to open letters, except the employees of the dead-letter office. Post-office clerks and postmasters hav the same opportunity as special agents to detain, open, and destroy letters suspected of being obscene. No officer is authorized to commit a wrong or to violate the law. Section 1,234, Postal Laws and Regulations of 1869, prohibits and punishes intercepting or securing letters with intent to pry into the business or secrets of another, or embezzling or destroying the same. Section 282 of the Postal Regulations declares: "A letter once placed in the post-office is in the custody of the department for transmission and delivery to the party addressed. Neither postmasters nor officers of the law hav any authority to open it under the pretext that there might be something improper or even criminal in it, or that would aid in the detection or furnish evidence for the conviction of offenders against the law."

This section does apply to letters declared to be unmailable. It makes no distinction as to the obscenity or criminality of the letter. It prohibits all "officers of the law," which includes postal agents, from opening or detaining letters. The penalty is provided in section 1,234 (Section 3,892, R. S.).

In the case of the United States vs. Pond (2 Curtis R 268) it is held that the "intent to obstruct the correspondence and pry into the business or secrets of another . . renders the opening of such a letter unlawful."

The examination of second-class matter is of two kinds:

1. To determin whether it is a newspaper or periodical entitled to pass at second-class rates;

2. To see whether third-class matter is being sent at second-class rates. If the postmaster finds the matter is not second-class he can refuse to register it as such, or to forward it at second-class rates. If he finds it to be obscene, he can refuse to forward to the person to whom it is directed.

It is claimed that the examination of other matter opens the door to espionage of the mails, and that this violates the freedom of the mails. If so, the reform demanded should be the abolition of all examination of packages. The repealers, say let this espionage go on, but declare obscene matter and all matter mailable.

If it is lawful and constitutional to examin second, third, and fourth class matter to determin whether it is paid at the proper rate, lawful to require the parcels to be open to examination, lawful for the postmaster to determin the question of fraud without referring it to a jury, and to impose a higher rate of postage, it is no greater violation of constitutional rights to decide whether a publication is obscene, or to refer it to the postmaster-general to decide. To be consistent the repealers should demand the abolition of all examinations of mail matter, the abolition of postal agents, and the guaranty of freedom of the mails to obscene publications and articles designed for self-abuse, or procurement of abortion, and to lotteries.

They should also make the use of decoy letters unlawful; prohibit the officials of the post-office from being witnesses in prosecutions under state laws, make the jury judge of the law in all cases of criminal prosecutions, prohibit the creation of societies for the suppression of vice, statutory or volunteer, on the ground that they are part of the spy system, and "courts of inquisition, falsehood, and outrage."

This is demanded in the name of the freedom of the press, which is guaranteed by the United States Constitution. In all states whose constitutions contain the same guarantee, the same limitations of power apply to the state governments as to the national government. Error must be left free to be combated by truth, and obscenity hav free course to be put down by the moral sense of mankind. The present state laws against obscene publications should be repealed, as well as the national laws.

Mr. Wakeman has at last defined what he means by Comstock laws. He has published the Massachusetts Comstock law, and says that Mr. Wright, who sends him the copy of the act, givs information of value to all parties. I admit that he does. He shows that the law of 1879 was a revision of the law of 1860, that the first section alone was amended by interpolating the words, "Any instrument or article whatever for the prevention of conception."

It will be noticed by the careful reader that this law of 1879 does not refer to obscene publications, and does not amend the law of 1860, which I quoted, in the least.

Mr. Wright and Mr. Wakeman do not consider the laws of 1860 as Comstock laws, but only that provision of the law of 1879 which restrains the prevention of conception. Laws against obscene publications are not Comstock laws.

Mr. Wright's letter hoists Mr. Wakeman with his own petard.

Prof. Beckmann, who has thoroughly investigated the subject, says there is no trace of a chimney in the literature of all Europe before the year 1347.

Mr. Moore on the Situation.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav read friend Green's article in your issue of the 9th inst. over and over again, and I must say that I hav been made rather sad by the course he has taken, and I do hope that on a review of the subject he may see his way clear, as the Friends used to say, to return. I hav been a close reader of the discussion on the Comstock law from the time the Index took the grounds it did against repeal in the winter of 1877, when seventy thousand good and loyal citizens sent their names to our servants at Washington, asking them to repeal or modify those obnoxious laws, so that they cannot be used to interfere with the mails, on which depends the freedom of the press and of speech. About this time T. B. Wakeman gave us his great Faneuil Hall speech on this Comstock law, showing most plainly that it was a law void of any authority from the Constitution of our country, and that it was well calculated by its framers—minions of the church—for a gag on the freedom of the press and of speech, as well as the mails. Mr. Abbot arrayed himself squarely against this speech and against the seventy thousand who had petitioned for repeal or modification, and proceeded to charge them with encouraging the circulation of obscene literature, and here began this battle among Liberals. The Truth Seeker took sides with the seventy thousand petitioners, and its subscription list increased in size, while that of the Index diminished and its editor became excited over the state of affairs. The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League was drawing nigh, and Mr. Abbot, remembering that he was to be the presiding officer of that body, and that many of those signing the petition were members of the League, felt the importance of putting on his priestly robes. So he set at work through his paper to cut and dry, in part at least, what the League should do, otherwise he would not be willing to work with it. And—it is with feelings of regret that I say it—R. G. Ingersoll's course at the Fourth Congress savors much of Abbot's at the Second. Yet as he was but a new-comer in the League, and as he is fairly fastened to the tail of the Republican party—a party that embraces within its folds the great body of the members of the Protestant Evangelical Christian church, with a member of that church as a leader—I say, in view of all these facts, Mr. Ingersoll's course did affect them very much. But so faithful a worker as H. L. Green, one whom I supposed had kept himself posted on this Comstock law discussion, I am unable to see how he can afford to at once dissolve his connection with the League.

He thinks that the circumstance of the League's being fully committed to the side of repeal will be a barrier to any one applying for membership who does not believe in repeal. Is that a good reason, friend Green, why we as a League should hold back from speaking out the truth plainly, because somebody won't like us so well, or even for fear some of our own number should be offended and walk not with us? This reminds me of the arguments that some of our timid ones put forth in our antislavery conventions long years ago, when they were about to pass a plain and telling resolution. One case in particular I well remember. It was in 1844. At old Kennet, Chester county, Pa., when the Abolitionists had met as a state convention, in the old meetinghouse, to settle the question of voting or not voting under the United States Constitution, the old house was full to running over, so that we had to adjourn to the grove in front. This subject, like the repeal question before the League, had been before the society for discussion for some years. It was now expected that the society would take a vote upon it. But there were many good members, like friend Green, who did not want a vote on the question for fear it would cause a rupture in the society. Then, again, it might be a barrier with some honest politicians against joining our ranks. About this stage of the proceedings W. L. Garrison, of Boston, took the stand, and in his quiet and genteel, though firm, tone said: "There is a time to talk and a time to act. You hav now had this subject before you for some years; there has been much talking done on both sides of the question, and now it seems to me that the time has fully come for action;" and for one hour or more he laid open to view the character of the American government, with the Christian church as its backer, as he alone was able to do. When he took his seat Thomas Earl, of Philadelphia, took the stand and defended the political platform of the Liberty party as worthy of the votes of the Abolitionists. As he was a lawyer, and a kind of Ingersoll one at that, he went for policy. As he took his seat Lucretia Mott, of Philadelphia, came forward and said in her mild and quiet way: "Friends, let us not pass lightly over present duties. I believe the time has now come for this society to speak out on this subject, so the people at large may know where we stand. Remember, duty is ours; the consequences are God's. I know not what the vote of this convention may be, but as for me and my house, we will giv our vote in this convention on a line with our Abolition principles." The vote was then taken by the affirmativ committee passing through the house. Charles C. Berly and Thomas Earl, being appointed tellers, passed through the house also, and the "nays" were found to be in the majority by a few votes. But there were no cross words, nor even looks, on either side. The members of the Liberty party joined in at the ballot-box with Garret Smith and company, but they still helped to carry forward the Abolition movement proper.

When I look back to the struggles which the antislavery movement came up through, with the government on the one side and the church on the other as opposers, and with the rabble at their heels, this little flurry at Chicago doesn't frighten me in the least. It is impossible, in great movements like the Liberal League, that offenses should not come, but "woe be to those through whom they come."

Friend Green seems to be wonderfully out with something that he calls "Freelove." Exactly what he means by this I must acknowledge I am at a loss to know. If by free love between the sexes he means other than pure love based on intelligence, though it may hav the indorsement of the Christian church and popular sentiments, then I am with him.

School, Church, and the Constitution of the United States of America.

By John George Hertwig.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: History teaches us that civilization is the best preserver of mankind—its greatest benefactor. That such portions of the human race as persistently abstain from civilization are doomed to perdition is easily to be seen from the fate of the Indians or Red Men in this country.

Civilization comprises all the achievements of man for his mental, moral, and bodily welfare, and true civilization means true happiness of an individual or a nation. The state of the civilization of a nation is shown by its laws and public institutions; its art and science; its press and literature; its commerce and mechanical industry; its means of communication and transportation; its tools and machinery for mechanical and manufacturing purposes; its use and enjoyment of the resources of the soil upon which it livs, and its manners and mode of living generally. Civilization does not come by itself, but is the result of hard, incessant, and energetic labor, which latter itself is the best, noblest, and truest use and enjoyment of life. The faithful performance of useful work is inseparably linked with true happiness for man.

The chances of a free nation to reach the highest degree of civilization and to become really and thoroughly enlightened are, of course, best, because in a free country the laws permit every man to become master of and to forge his own fortune. For this reason the desire for civil liberty, or, in other words, for equal rights with all other men in all matters of public concern, dwells in every man's heart.

The children or young people of a nation, in order to comprehend its civilization, and, as grown-up persons, to foster and promote it, receive an elementary or rudimentary education in schools ordained by law. For this reason we hav public schools in the United States.

The public schools of this "land of the free and home of the brave" are based upon the principle that civil liberty and education always are, and of right ought to be, true and inseparable companions. These schools are not only state, but national institutions, both because they "promote the general welfare"—one of the aims for which the American people have ordained and established the Constitution of the United States—and on account of the land grants made by Congress for their support. They, therefore, ought to be kept, taught, or managed in every particular strictly according to said fundamental law of this free country of ours.

But the Constitution of the United States—the supreme law of the land—says, "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States;" and a constitutional amendment further says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." These constitutional clauses cannot be construed otherwise than that the Bible has no public authority whatsoever in this country, but must be considered as a private book legally binding no one.

The Bible is the basis or fundamental code of morals and religion of the Christian churches, which churches, in foreign countries, as public or state institutions, instead of promoting peace, order, and morality, at different times hav caused the greatest bloodshed, as is proved by history.

What kind of a book is the Bible? It has not been written by only one author. It is a collection and compilation of books. It consists of quite a number of different scriptures, which were written, not at the same time, but in different ages by men or authors whose names are given and well known, and who, because "all men are created equal," were born under no other "laws of nature and of nature's God"—to use the language of the Declaration of Independence of the United States—than men are born nowadays. The Bible is a compilation of very old books, originally written partly in the Hebrew language and partly in the ancient Greek language. However holy and sacred it may be, yet nobody in this country can be constitutionally compelled to use it; that is, to read the scriptures either in the original languages or in the translations for religious purposes. In other words, a public recognition of the Bible as a religious book in the United States is unconstitutional.

If these views are correct, it necessarily follows from them that reading from the Bible in our American public schools for religious purposes—as prayer—is unconstitutional and for this reason an error. By law the exercise of religion in this country is most wisely and most happily a strictly private affair, with which our American free schools, as public institutions, hav nothing at all to do.

Our American public schools, supported by state taxes and national land grants, ought to be according to and in harmony with our American Constitution, fully non-sectarian and devoted exclusivly to intellectual instruction, that is to science, which always is moral. The Bible, as a religious, irrespectiv of its moral precepts and value, ought to be strictly excluded from them throughout the land. We liv in an age of rapid progress, especially ever since our American Declaration of Independence was promulgated, and the American Constitution rules our national union. The knowledge the children of this free country acquire in our American public schools, by intellectual training, is indispensable to them for the race of life, in order that they may be enabled to earn their daily bread honestly, after they hav left school. Not a particle of their school time ought to be used for other and illegitimate purposes; but the whole of it for their acquisition of practical knowledge, enabling them to become good, useful, and happy men and citizens. Let them, if they want to, seek religious instruction in Sunday-schools and in their families, by reading the scriptures or other religious books, or by attending divine service in the churches. Religious instruction is, of course, best understood by adult persons.

The constitutional provisions quoted above admit no other interpretation than that no church, that is, institution for religious service and instruction, shall ever become a national or state institution in this country. According to them, all religious sects and societies of all denominations hav in the United States only a strictly private character. According to them, the station of American priests, pastors, rabbis, and other religious teachers is a strictly private one, not entitling them to privileges, immunities, or monopolies. According to them, all church property of any sort, in this country, is strictly private property. According to the Constitution of the United States clergymen as such, hav no more right to control our American public schools than other private citizens hav who are no school directors.

Nevertheless, one class of them demands that the Bible for religious purposes be read and retained in the public schools, which demand has been disposed of above; while another class of them is opposed to our American public school system altogether, and in favor of sectarian schools.

This latter class of the American clergy can get and hold their positions only by submitting to compulsory celibacy, demanded of them by the canon of their church. But this demand must be considered as a wrong, immoral, and unnatural thing. Family is and always has been the moral basis of human society. No other men in the world, as a class, are compelled to lead a celibate life on account of their calling. If a man voluntarily leads a celibate life, this is, of course, his own business. But no man of self-respect, for the sake of his livelihood, ought to submit to the demand and to take the vow of compulsory celibacy. Compulsory celibacy is an unamerican institution. It is in full contradiction to our American principle of equal rights to all, in all matters of public concern, laid down in the Declaration of Independence, according to which principle every man is entitled to matrimony, that is to the blessing of founding a home and family. This noble principle, the basis of our American civil liberty, is contained in the following passage of said original fundamental law of our American nation, to wit:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Matrimony, because it is regulated by law, is a matter of public concern.

Said clergymen, as celibates, are the subordinates and representativs of a foreign spiritual potentate or tyrant, (every potentate, because he exercises a power, that denies the principle of equal rights to all, is a tyrant), whose superannuated power is strictly opposed to religious liberty, enlightened civilization, and true morality. Every American citizen is a free man and as sovereign as that potentate. Said foreign spiritual potentate, therefore, has to dictate nothing whatsoever to any American citizen as to his moral or religious welfare. Our national Union is a free country and does not recognize any right or privilege of any kind or shape whatever of a foreign potentate on its territory. Said foreign spiritual potentate, therefore has no right whatever to interfere with the public schools of the United States, nor hav his subordinates in our midst, that is, in our whole country, any such right. They are not entitled to claim any privileges for religious purposes from any state of our American Union, because, according to our American Constitution, state and church hav and can hav nothing whatever to do with each other in this country. And such privileges granted them would involve a public recognition of their church, which is constitutionally impossible, and be an encroachment upon religious liberty and liberty of conscience, which hav been secured to our American nation, for all time to come, by the provisions of the Constitution, quoted before. But full religious liberty and unconditional liberty of conscience are the noblest prerogativs of every American citizen.

The clergymen named as celibates by compulsion are no true Americans, and as representativs and subordinates of a foreign spiritual potentate, they cannot be true citizens of the United States.

The demand of said clergy that their sectarian schools, by a division of the school funds derived from state taxes, be maintained at public expense, is in direct contradiction to and contravention against the provisions of our national fundamental law named, according to which a religious institution, either church or school, can never become a public, but must always be and remain a private institution. Sectarian schools are of course religious institutions, because religious instruction is given in them. Public sectarian schools, therefore, are constitutionally impossible in the United States. Because according to the American Constitution, all church property of all denominations is strictly private property, it ought to be taxed everywhere throughout the Union, exactly like all other private property. By such a course the opposition of that clergy against our American public schools would be effectually and permanently checked and removed. If that clergy deny at any time its clerical or spiritual aid to children because they attend or hav attended non-sectarian public schools instead of sectarian private schools, said aid is not worth having at all, because our American public schools are in full harmony with our national Constitution, and because, according to this fundamental law every inhabitant of the United States is entitled to take care of his or her salvation himself or herself, without the aid of the clergy and thus without expense. Every clergyman, as man, also takes care of his own salvation himself. Our national Constitution grants all the liberties dear to the American heart, and our American public schools are the best, surest, and only safeguard for the permanence and eternal operation of the Constitution. The aims of the latter are laid down in the following preamble to it, viz:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselvs and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

How can these aims be made true, except by men who in most cases in school hav learned to read and are able to read and understand the Constitution?

Our American free schools are public institutions, maintained at public expense, while all our American churches are private institutions, exclusivly maintained at private expense. They, therefore, hav nothing whatevor to do with each other. The whole American clergy always ought to be mindful of this fact, and to let our public schools alone. The indispensable necessity for these schools is admitted, and the great benefit derived from them is recognized by every sensible, well-meaning, and patriotic citizen of the United States. When they are censured or opposed, this is regularly done by clergymen of this country—doubtless for selfish reasons. Do our American public schools censure or oppose the churches of this country? Never!

It may be said that, as a matter of course, home education must go hand in hand with the instruction given in our public schools, in order to enable the growing-up American generation to become as good, useful, and happy citizens as possible.

Even the two great political parties of this country hav recognized the importance of our American public schools. In its platform, adopted by the late national convention held at Chicago, the Republican party wisely favors the promotion of popular education throughout the land as a national duty, and justly opposes both the influence of sectarianism upon the public schools and the appropriation of public funds to the support of sectarian schools. In its platform, adopted by the late national convention held at Cincinnati, the Democratic party also favors public schools. In addition, it demands separation of church and state for the good of each. But this demand is superfluous, because church and state hav been completely severed in this country by the clauses of our national Constitution above.

The foregoing views will be gladly indorsed by the majority of the German naturalized citizens of the United States. Germany, their nativ land, experienced the horrors of a destructiv war of thirty years' duration (from 1618 to 1648), which was waged because the Christian churches in that country opposed each other and wrangled for power as public or state institutions.

A Feeling Discourse.

Dear Brudders an' Sisters: Dis day am de saddest I hab 'sperienced since comin' among you. Though the sun shines bright, de birds a singin', an' nature has put on her many colored autumn dress, yet our feelings am said, an' our hearts am draped with black and heavy with grief.

I see dat de floodgate of your eyes am stretched wide open. Don't shet it, but jess 'low de tears to run down unchecked, for you cannot pay a nobler tribute to de one who has left, but am with us. Yes, ole Aunty Beebe am no more. Dar she lays in her narrow bed ob voiceless oak, soon to be taken an' given into de army ob our great mudder Nature. Bless her dear black face, an' bless dose lubbin hearts whose gentle han's placed aroun' de lifeless clay dose sweet ferns, an' flowers, an' many colored autumn leaves. Poor, dear, black face, a smilin' even in death's embrace.

Yes, Aunty, your face am still black, but your heart would excel the snow from heaven in purity an' whiteness. Why shouldn't she smile in death, the good kind heart who nebber did a wrong while libin', who nebber spoke a word to hurt de feelings ob de lowliest, but who on de udder han' would walk away from her presence gladdened by her words ob comfort and cheer, walk away from her with heads tossed in de air, square to de front, wid firm step, an stiff resolve dat life was worth libin' for, arter all. De same 'dentical folks who fust came to her wid dar swellin' hearts nigh a bustin' with grief, with head bowed down, an' a flickerin' resolve in de corner ob deir hearts to end all dis turmoil an' sufferin' an' play de coward's part by backin' out ob de ranks ob life an' let others b'ar de brunt ob de fight without deir 'sistance—yes, ob dese waverin' folks she made men an' women. She put in dem de stiff backbone ob common sense, showed dem dat though de road ob life hab its rough places dey should keep right on de track, an' not fly it, but keep a good clear eye ahead, an' step high. But was it all words with Aunty? You know it wan't. De words ob comfort an' cheer were san'wiched between good solid chunks ob 'sistance.

When poor Melissey Crane came a stranger to dis place an' stopped at Aunty Beebe's an' axed fur a crust ob bread for her little chile, did she refuse her? She did. What did she say? She done say, "A crust ob bread, you poor little fool? Come right in here. It's a nice broth you both want, an' careful nussin, chile, for you've got a monstrous dreffal fever aboard." For two months she nussed mudder an' chile, an'— Dar she stan's, poor Mellissey, a bendin' ober her dearest friend on earth, or elsewhar. Cry on, cry on, poor chile. You's not sturbin' de services for de tribute you am now payin' to departed goodness am far above de poor words your parson am utterin'.

I will not make you, dear brudders an' sisters, feel wuss by tellin' ob udder individuals. She stretched out de white helpin' han' too, fur dar am not one ob you but what hab reseabed 'sistance ob some kind from her who now lies dar. Many will miss her; but dar am some who knew her not, an' consequently will not mourn her loss.

De Lady's Sewin' S'iety, inaugurated for de ostensible purpose ob makin' up winter clothin' for de headen ob de South Sea Islands, but really for de dissemination ob scandal, will not weep for her. No; for while dey was a'gibin' birth to scandal an' a'conductin' dar backbitin' convention, ole Aunty Beebe was a'sittin' in her humble chimney corner knittin' socks an' a'makin' all sorts ob nice warm tings for de poor aroun' her.

De females ob de Lady's Prayer Meetin's will not miss her, for while dey was on dar marrow-bones plyin' a hypocrit's tongue to a false God, beseechin' de myth dat folks wid whiter hearts dan dar own speckled ones would be sabed from a brimstone hereafter, Aunty Beebe was out in de cold an' storm, fair weather an' rough, not tryin' to sabe something called souls, but a'totin' chicken an' muffins an' soup an' lots ob nice fixin's so as to keep on dis earth ob ours as long as possible de poor bodies ob her famishin' brudders an' sisters.

De ladies who make dressin' gowns an' slippers for dar good-lookin' young pastors will not miss her, for she was one who could not afford to make presents to de rich an' high-toned when dar was so many poor folks aroun' her who required her attention.

De ladies ob de different church fairs will not miss her, for de simple reason dat she nebber believed in a'gainin' money under false pretenses or in gamblin' or a'spreadin' temptations for de guileless, eben in de name or under de auspices ob de great Jehobah.

All de s'cieties ob dis breed will not miss her, an' well was it for our sister dat she was not contaminated with dar acquaintance.

Aunty Beebe was a whole missionary s'ciety in herself; an' if de so-called ones would do one-half as much in proportion as she did dar would not now be on de face ob de universe an empty stomach or a bare back. Peace an' contentment would drive out crime an' sufferin', an' degraded humanity would leap from ignorance an' superstition's mire on to de white an' glistenin' platform ob manhood.

Oh, dat dar were more Aunty Beebe's in de world! Probably dar am, but I has not de honor ob dar 'quaintance. But I tole you what we can do. Standin' here by her side, let us solemnly swear each to demselvs dat de good example she set we will try hard to follow. Let us take up her work where she left off an' continue in it until we are forced to lie down by her. Den we can pass away without a fear, knowin' dat others will take up our work, an' so on, until dar will be nuffin on de face ob de earth known as starvin' or degraded mortals.

I doesn't feel like speakin' more at present, for my eyes are blinded an' my throat is awful lumpy, besides, others wish to speak ef de dear departed. But I will say dis personally, before de body is lowered, de flowers strewn, an' de cruel dirt falls upon de coffin-lid, Good-by, dear, lubbin', ole Aunty. I wish from de bottom ob my heart dat—dat you could read it. If you could you would then know how it bleeds to see you go—go before.

Again, good-by. If dar am angels in de great beyond, an' I reach the place whar you am, I know I can soon find you by flyin' straight for de front ranks.

Yes, you'll be dar, if dar am such a thing; an' if others wear crowns ob gold, you will hab a big one ob diamonds. Good-by. An' though de damp an' moldy clods will shut thee out from mortal's gaze, memory will keep enshrined, while life endures, the features of Aunty Beebe in one poor ole darkey's buzzum. Amen.

The Institute of Heredity.

We hav received from Loring Moody, of 35 Pemberton Square, Boston, a circular in regard to the establishment of an institute having for its object the influencing and improving of human life before birth—that is, to see that children are born right. Mr. Moody contends that the diseases with which humanity is burdened spring from inherited impurities, and that criminals are made so by their ancestors.

"And the great problem," he says, "now confronting us, and demanding solution, is how to set and continue in motion such pre-natal influences as shall make the hereditary tendencies of future generations wholly good. So that little will be required from the environment or surrounding conditions to keep posterity entirely in the line of spiritual and physical health and right moral action, and so take off a large share of the burdens with which civilized society is laden.

"Century after century hav church and state, with all their vast, complicated, and cumbrous machinery, enforced their empirical methods with terrible penalties and at tremendous cost, for the purpose of putting an end to these evils, and with the most wretched results. And above all this, what vast amounts are expended in voluntary contributions of money and labor in the various forms of charitable relief, with the same hopeless and unsatisfactory results. And for the reason that we hav battled against effects, while leaving causes in unchecked operation.

"The causes are congenital. People who are born with theft and murder in the blood will steal and kill. The jailer and hangman neither cure them nor check their tendencies, nor thin their ranks, for as fast as we imprison and hang criminals others are born to take their places. And so with all the forms of disease with which our race is afflicted; hence all our conflicts with evil result in a long-drawn battle."

To correct this the Institute of Heredity has been inaugurated. The scheme has the warm indorsement of many eminent men. For further particulars those who are interested may address Mr. Moody as above.

On the day before, when I was searching for the spot on which Calvin's cruelty and intolerance were displayed I met two Scotchmen, one of whom I took to be a clergyman, and of course they were Calvinists. I made known to them that I was looking for the place where Calvin burnt Servetus to death for his opinions. "Oh," said the one I took to be a clergyman, "I don't think I should have any desire to go to the place if I even knew where it was. There is no use in keeping those things in memory. Calvin simply acted in consonance with the spirit of the age in which he lived, and was perhaps somewhat carried away with the sentiments which prevailed at the time when he lived, and it should not be remembered against him. He had one of the clearest and most logical minds of any man who ever lived, and showed argumentative and reasoning powers superior to almost all other men. This should be remembered of him and not any mistake he may have made." I replied that I could not agree with him, Calvin professed himself, and his numerous followers believed him, to be a follower and apostle of Jesus who taught the gospel of love and compassion, and that he manifested the spirit of Jesus in a remarkable degree. Now, when Calvin had that merciless, heartless, and execrable deed performed of burning an honest man to death for his opinions, this "gospel of love" had been in existence in the world more than fifteen hundred years; and if Calvin set himself up as a teacher, guide, and model for others to look to and follow, it was perfectly legitimate to examine his conduct and see what sort of works he had brought forth—what sort of fruit his tree had yielded. He was a public man who held himself up as a light to the world, and there is no reason why we should shut our eyes to any black deeds he may have committed. If he had proved himself to be an unscrupulous, heartless tyrant who took human life without reason, especially when he is held up as a pattern of righteousness for others to follow, the world cannot be too well apprised of it. There is no reason why the facts should not be brought out. If he was in truth a "reformer," if he did profess to teach a better religion than the church was in possession of, there is no excuse for his inhuman conduct in the fact that those whom he left and opposed had also been guilty of the same enormities. The fact has proved him to be essentially one of the most cruel, heartless tyrants that ever lived. He hesitated not to take the life of his fellow-men to gratify his spirit of hate and revenge in proportion to the extent of his power. His power was limited, and extended only a little way; had he been a pope, or a monarch, we have the best of reasons—by the use he made of the power he did have, to believe he would have been one of the most bloody and merciless monsters the world has known. It is hardly worth while to claim as justification for him that other men had done wrong; he was a man of intelligence and claimed to be a guide for his fellowmen, and he is entitled to no excuse from the conduct of others. As for his clearness of mind and logical powers we have only this to judge him by; he evolved and brought forth a set of theological points or dogmas, more repulsive to human nature, more derogatory to the highest and most adorable qualities we ascribe to deity, than any other man has ever been the author of. If he had clearness and logic he made an extremely bad use of them, and has been a damage and curse to his race instead of a blessing. The doctrines which his clearness and logic brought out have produced more gloom, despondency, and unhappiness in the human mind than any other set of doctrines which have been accepted by the same number of people.

The clergymen of course thought I was wrong. Calvin was a great man, and Christianity had given the world all the civilization that had amounted to anything. It was, in fact, the parent and source of civilization. I would not admit this, and called attention to the high degree of civilization that had attained in India, Persia, Chaldea, Egypt, Greece, and Rome long before Christianity came into existence, and to the superior degree of morals in some directions which exist in Burmah, China, and Japan to-day, where thieving is almost unknown, and in many parts of which countries it is the custom to use no locks or keys, and for merchants to mark the prices upon their goods and to go away and leave their stores open for any one to go into who chooses to examine the goods, take such as they wish, and leave the proper price therefor. This custom would hardly answer to follow in Christian New York, Christian London, or Christian Glasgow. I said further in regard to Calvin that he had shown himself just as capable of persecution and of taking life for heresy or for not believing according to his dictation as any of his Catholic predecessors, and that his followers had shown the same intolerant persecuting spirit. I called attention to the thousands of lives Protestants had taken in the name of religion in England, Scotland, and Ireland. I added that taking these opportunities and the age of the world into consideration, the Protestants had shown themselves equally as bloody, as intolerant, and murderous as the Catholics. As for that matter, they have both within the last three centuries abundantly shown themselves ready and glad to kill and send each other to hell whenever they had the power to do so. But I was looking for the death-place of Michael Servetus, they had some other object in view, and we parted.

I visited the cathedral of St. Peter, in which Calvin preached for many years, and which since the Reformation has been devoted to Protestantism, but it is a somewhat gloomy looking affair, more fitted for a prison than a place of worship. It was built in the tenth century, and has been several times destroyed by fire, but restored. Some of the older parts still remain. It is possibly a little like the boy's pocket-knife which had had seven new blades and five new handles, but was the veritable jackknife still. There are stained windows and sculptured stalls in the cathedral, but little of the pomp and show of the Catholic institutions of the same kind. The old church has another cathedral here for its own use, but makes no pretensions to show or richness, and I did not visit it; neither did I take the trouble to visit Calvin's grave, though he lies in the cemetery with plain J. C. upon his still more plain slab. The house which he formerly occupied is now used for clinic purposes in connection with the medical school.

I spoke of the meeting of the waters of the Rhone and the Aar about a mile below the city. It is well worth the walk to see. Both rivers flow with much rapidity and come together with force. The Rhone is perfectly clear and transparent, while the Aar is as turbid as the Mississippi or Missouri. It is curious to watch how, though they come together with such impetuosity, they flow on side by side without blending with each other. The distinction between the clear water and the turbid is kept up for many miles. The Rhone is the water of Lake Geneva, and the Aar comes in from south of the high mountains of Savoy, where it doubtless pours vigorously down hundreds of steep declivities. Both rivers flow with such force that advantage is taken of their power for running various machinery. I think I saw some two dozen water-wheels some twenty-five feet in diameter placed out in the rivers, the current of the water turning them slowly, and the power by shafting carried to various factories, foundries, etc. This utilizing of the abundant power is most practiced in the Rhone, though the rivers appear nearly of the same size. As I walked along by the river bank I think I must have seen a hundred women at different points washing clothes in the water of the river. Sheds were erected for the purpose, and some conveniences fitted up. The market and market-house is near the river, and of course I visited the same. The market women have their vegetables, fruits, etc., in large flat baskets of willow, and set them down on the ground or pavement. I must have seen several hundred of these baskets. The vegetables and fruit looked well. The finest cauliflowers I ever saw were here. In one department was nothing but mushrooms, including what are usually called toad-stools. They were out in great variety of kinds and size, but did not seem to be selling very rapidly. The Swiss cheese, sweitzer-kase, is a peculiar product, and some of it finds its way to America. I saw much of it in the market-house. It smells very "loud," and one would seemingly need to have a very bad cold in the head or to hold the nose while eating it. It looks rich, but oh dear! the smell is prodigious. The Swiss, however, do not dislike strong smells, and unless some things do not smell loudly to heaven, they consider them not worth having. I prefer American butter and cheese to the Swiss, German, or French.

When I had descended from the first hill, which proved not to be the Hill de Champel, in walking around the base, looking at the gardens, etc., in the suburbs of the town, my attention was called to tunneling that was being done into the hill, and I naturally drew near to see what it was for. I found several tunnels had been made in quite a distance and some had been inclosed by large doors, and over the entrances of some buildings had been erected. I could not exactly devise the reason why so much gravel had been removed. A native was at hand, and pointing to the large door of one of these tunnels spoke words to me in an unknown tongue; but as there was a pleasant expression on his face, and a question was implied by his mysterious remarks, I ventured to say "Oui," whereupon he opened the big door and beckoned me to follow. Being a good follower I followed, and when he carefully closed the door we were in the vestibule of darkness itself. He lighted two candles, and giving one to me I was enabled by the light of them to see how dark it was. He led on and I followed, and soon we came to another big door, which admitted us into the sactum sanctorum of profound darkness and silence. Here were huge casks or tuns on either side, two or three stories high, and I perceived we were in a beer cellar, and it was very cool in there. He led me on between the rows of monster casks for fully three hundred feet, and when we came to the end I found a solid wall of ice. I could hardly believe it, and putting my hand upon it inquired, Glace? and he said "Oui." Sure enough it was ice reaching up ten or fifteen feet from the floor, and solid without seams like a rock. How it got there I am in ignorance to this day. He pointed to a thermometer, and I saw that it indicated the freezing point. It was the object of course to keep the temperature at as near the freezing point as possible. He took me into another corridor of a similar kind, where were rows on each side of huge open tubs full of beer, undergoing slow fermentation. He had me go up a ladder and see the beer and the fermentation. I wondered how the beer got in there, but subsequently learned that the brewery was on the hill over the cellars, that the decoction of malt and hops was prepared in the brewery, and then transmitted by pipes to the large tubs, and then by other pipes and a force pump to the large casks. I very nearly learned the secrets of lager beer making right there in the dark. The cellars were excellent. The excavations were made in a solid hill of gravel and dirt one hundred feet high. The excavation was in the form of a Gothic arch, sharp at the top, and does not cave in. The gravel taken out is used with lime and sand in making excellent concrete for walls and buildings. So utility and profit resulted all around.

When the good-natured Swiss led me back toward the entrance he stopped before a cask and drew a glassful of an amber-colored fluid, from which he blew the froth and handed it to me. I knew in a moment he meant me to drink it. In consideration of his kindness in showing me the hidden wonders and wealth of that hill I had not language to reject his offer and poured it down like a man. It was not bad. I am not perhaps a good judge of beer, but I counted that as very good. He drew a glass and quaffed it himself in excellent style. Then he proceded to fill the glass the third time, and I immediately began to wonder what he intended to do with that third glass. I was not long left in doubt, for with a most benignant smile all over his face he handed it to me, expecting me to drink it. In vain I held up my hands and said, "No, no; not any more if you please." In vain I told him of my temperance proclivities and my great piety. He would hear nothing of it. He still extended it more determinedly toward me, saying the only word in English he knew, "Good, good!" I did not wish to dispute the goodness of the beer, but what could I do? I shook my head, stamped my feet, and looked up piteously for mercy, but it was no use; he still poked the glass at me, saying, "Good, good!" Resistance was in vain, and there was only one thing I could do. I must drink it. I was there in the bowels of the earth, and not even my worst enemies could witness the deed, and I drank in a spirit of self-sacrifice, and the Swiss was appeased, especially when I slipped a half franc into his hand. I would not have minded those two glasses of beer had I not within the half hour before taken a small bottle of white wine on the hill. This I had done by way of atonement at my disappointment at learning from the gentlemanly proprietor of a place of refreshment up there, who speaks very good French exclusively, that that was not the Hill de Champel. When a bottle of wine costs but a franc, and a man wants to do something magnanimous, perhaps on extra occasions like that he cannot do better than spend the franc in that way. Think not, dear friends, that that bottle of wine and two glasses of beer had any injurious effect upon your humble servant; far from it. A somewhat uncomfortable sense of fullness was all; no intoxication or improper exhilaration of spirits I assure you. It is one of the peculiarities of Swiss beer and wine that to what extent they may be indulged in they seldom intoxicate to any considerable degree. I have not seen a drunken man in Switzerland yet, though I have seen a man take his two bottles of wine with his dinner. The percentage of alcohol cannot be very heavy.

I did not climb to the top of Mt. Salève, immediately south of the city, which is 4,527 feet high. A fine view is doubtless obtained from it, but the weather has been somewhat rainy here and I did not make the effort. It obtained its name from a priest by the name of Salève, who was driven from the city by the Protestants, and who went up on that high mount and there stopped in view of his church and people, saying he would go no further, and there he stayed. What ultimately became of the old man I have not learned, but I presume he was far more worthy of being canonized as a saint than many to whom that honor has been extended.

I visited one of the principal musical box establishments for which Geneva is famous, and was shown by the polite proprietor, B. A. Bremond, many new devices in his art. I saw musical boxes from eight feet in length, with ten cylinders, and which would play over one hundred airs, down to music boxes the size of a small box, playing two airs; music boxes in water pitchers that commence to play as soon as lifted from the table; the same with fruit-baskets, etc.; music-boxes that have the harp attachment; music-boxes that imitate the church-organ very closely, having large bellows operated by heavy springs; music-boxes like an orchestra, or entire band, including drums, bells, and all the variations. This particular one rendered

"The Star-Spangled Banner," "The Marsellaise," and "Pinafore" most charmingly. The one that pleased me most was the one in the form of a nightingale sitting on a perch in a cage. He sang as though he would burst his throat, and charming music, indeed, he uttered. The little thing had just the appearance of a bird doing its best at singing, and the notes were beautiful in the extreme. I have never heard a nightingale, but I think it could hardly excel this wonderful little counterfeit. The price of it is five hundred francs. I would like to have bought it, but the francs are not plentiful enough. Some of the instruments cost five thousand francs. I saw several I would be glad to possess if there were no ifs in the way. The manufacturing is not all done in one place. Certain parts are done in one place, and other parts in other places. Some parts the workmen do at their homes. Large numbers of watches are manufactured in Geneva, but I learn that large numbers of the workmen have emigrated to America, and that American watch manufacturers have come to be heavy competitors of the Geneva houses.

I would be glad to visit old Mont Blanc, Mont Rosa, the Jungfrau, near Interlachen, and to climb to the very summit of their highest peaks, but there are some difficulties in the way. It would require several days and quite an outlay of money for conveyance, guides, mules, etc. When Albert Smith made the ascension of Mont Blanc with four others it cost him 2,338 francs. Of course it can be done much cheaper now, but I have not the necessary funds. I am hardly of the age to make the needful physical exertions, and am not at all partial to mule or donkey-riding. So I shall omit climbing to and reveling in the eternal snows, as well as breaking my neck in slipping and falling from some icy crag into the vast abyss a long ways below. I will content myself with having seen the Bernese Alps and Mont Blanc at a distance, the photographs of those and many others, with the real views I have had of lofty mountains and will still have in crossing the Alps over into Italy.

There are many places of great interest in Switzerland which I will not be able to visit, and among them are Zurich, Lake Lucerne, Interlachen, Neuchatel, etc. They all have their peculiar charms and attractions; but I cannot take the time to see all. I have seen and will see much of this peculiar country, and will go home quite well satisfied if I do not go to the time and expense of visiting all the points which richer tourists are in the habit of visiting.

I would like to go to Altdorf, near St. Gothard, in the eastern part of Switzerland and visit the place where William Tell, at the command of the tyrant Gessler, shot an apple from his young son's head, the beautiful story of which has charmed and animated thousands of patriotic Swiss, as well as thousands of other nations; but as charming as the story is, and as much as it has inspired men to noble deeds of daring, it is now generally admitted that William Tell, his son, and the apple are all myths, and that no such event ever took place. It seems a little cruel that the happy dreams and fancies of our childhood should be thus ruthlessly destroyed. But truth is inexorable and does just such things.

There have been a great number of myths in the world that have been implicitly believed in and which have yielded great consolation to those who accepted them as facts. The story with respect to the amiable but misused carpenter of Nazareth, in my humble opinion, is one of these myths, and I thnik his existence had no more reality than William Tell, Jack the Giant Killer, Santa Claus, Blue Beard, John Bull, Brother Jonathan, Uncle Sam, Miss Columbia, and lots more. The world has been full of myths, and I will let William Tell go with the rest of them and not try to hunt up the place where he is said to have performed his valorous deeds.

Geneva and its environs have many historical events interwoven in their history, but I have not the time nor facilities to engage in their recital. Pregny, a short distance from the town, is where the Empress Josephine resided after her cruel divorce from Bonaparte, and there Baron Rothschild has a magnificent villa. There are several beautiful and interesting villages near the city and many fine country seats. It is a good place here to live for those who have a plenty of money and leisure.

The Swiss people have their peculiarities, but they are pretty well known, and it is hardly necessary for me to attempt to enter into a detail of them. I will only say they are as a class industrious, frugal, temperate, ingenious, patriotic, liberty-loving, virtuous, and happy. They love their country and will freely shed their blood in defense of it. They are decidedly a religious people, all Christians of course, and perhaps about equally divided between Catholics and Protestants, but with all their religion Sunday is lightly observed here, and in this it is much like all the continental countries of Europe. The railroad trains, steamboats, diligences, etc., run precisely on Sundays as other days, and many carry on their work the same as on other days. The Swiss I spoke of who spent several years in America, and is now superintendent for his brother who is an extensive builder, told me that many of the mechanics work Sundays the same as on other days, and that he had been trying to get his brother to let his men rest one day in seven. Not that he thought Sunday is any better than the other days, but because everybody ought to have one day of rest in seven. I presume the Europeans regard one revolution of the earth as being just as holy and as sacred as the others, and think that where the revolution takes place which constitutes what we call Sunday, nothing takes place a particle different from what occurs on all other days. Their plan is perhaps better than forcing everybody to keep Sunday whether they wish to or not. Here those who wish to go to church and say prayers, sing praises, hear mass, and listen to a preacher, can freely do so, while those who wish to take excursions on the lake or to the mountains, or those who prefer to work and make a few francs and help support their families, are just as free to do so. I take it that this is about right, and I wish the same spirit could more generally prevail in America. The puritanical idea which prevails too much that Sunday is materially different from all other days, and that it is wicked to take pleasure on that day, or to do anything save wear a long face, drawl out prayers, listen to horribly dull sermons, and play the hypocrite generally, all for Jesus' sake, is the most absurd one in the world, and well will it be if it can go entirely out of fashion. In Catholic countries religion is not made exclusively a Sunday business as it is with the Protestants of England and America. Here the old women, principally of the female sex, who wish to attend to pious duties and go to early mass at daylight in the morning on every day of the week, or to the later masses, or who wish at any time through the day to go and kneel before the image of the Virgin and count their beads, say their Ave Marias and pater nosters, etc., have the utmost freedom to do so; and a few who have the inclination and time keep it up at nearly all hours of the day and on nearly every day of the week, while the great bulk of the population do nothing of the kind, and treat Sunday almost precisely as they do the other six days. With pious Americans it is not so. They have a long, pious, hypocritical face exclusively for Sunday; this they draw on with great sanctimoniousness on Sunday morning and would not be seen to smile audibly for any consideration, but on the week days their religion is very conveniently laid aside and their time is spent in striving to cheat their fellow-beings out of a few dollars of their hard-earned money, and how they can in someway obtain the advantage of their more unsuspecting neighbors and strangers. Religion, according to their views, should be attended to only on one day in the week, and then with the utmost severity. That is Puritanism. I prefer my Sundays, like my hotels, on the European plan—have what you choose, and pay only for what you get.

One peculiarity of the Swiss I will mention, and that is the custom of both men and women carrying heavy loads on their backs by means of a large flattish trumpet-shaped basket or vessel with straps through which they pass their arms, thus carrying very heavy loads. Flat vessels of wood for milk are thus transported about, and I have seen many women with tin vessels of this shape carrying water from fountains to their homes. The style is convenient for those who have heavy loads to carry. I think the women do not carry heavy loads on their heads so much as in Germany, but they do march off with tremendous back loads.

Death by Prayer.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Recently I followed a benevolent order to the last home of a deceased brother, and while there a very orthodox pastor of the Baptist persuasion, a Rev. Parker, in his discourse said that the deceased had been a sufferer from that dreadful disease, cancer, for the last eight years, and that he visited him frequantly, and prayed and sang with him; that recently just as the sun was going down he was standing by his bedside witnessing his suffering, and that he fervently prayed God to relieve the sufferer by death, and that in less than ten minutes his prayer was answered, and that the sufferer was relieved by death.

Now the question is, if his assertion is true that God killed this man in answer to the prayer of a bigot, and if he could hav his petitions answered and death brought in ten minutes, why did he not pray to an all-wise, powerful, and merciful God and hav the poor sufferer restored to perfect health and to the bosom of his friends, as he was but a young man? Would the pious divine and his God rather grieve, separate, and kill poor mortals here than to restore, console, and cure suffering humanity? If it is right far a divine to pray for the death of a sufferer, why not end his life with a pistol or a dose of morphine. These eminent divines' prayers hav about as much efficacy as the old negro's had who did not hav an over-supply of food, and prayed the Lord to send him one of Bro. Jones' fat turkeys. He kept up his devotion for several nights, but no turkey came, and finally the old darkey prayed the good Lord to send him after the turkey, and then he fetched him the first night.

The Philosopher's Stone.

In the years 1260 to 1280 Marco Polo, a Venetian, went to China and stayed there, traveling all over it. He described the splendid civilization there, and it is evident from his accounts that the whole land—a space as large as all Europe—was cultivated like a garden and crowded with several hundred million people. He found innumerable cities finely built and carefully governed. In fact, there is no country of Europe to day except Belgium where the people liv so happily and in such high civilization as then did the people of China. It is well known that China has declined very much from her condition even one hundred and fifty years ago. She was in her prime when Polo was there.

Speaking about the money used in China, he says (chapter xviii), "In this city of Kanbalu is the mint of the grand khan, who may truly be said to possess the secrets of the alchemists, as he has the art of producing money by the following process." He then tells how paper is taken, prepared carefully, cut into pieces of different sizes, longer than they are wide. The size indicates the value represented.

"The coinage of this paper money," he says, "is authenticated with as much form and solemnity as if it were of pure gold, for to each note a number of officers specially appointed not only subscribe their names, but affix their signets also; and when this has been done by all of them, the principal officer deputed by the emperor, having dipped into vermilion the royal seal committed to his care, stamps with it the piece of paper, by which it receives full authenticity as current money, to counterfeit which is a capital crime.

"This money circulates through all the grand khan's dominions, nor does any person refuse to accept it in payment. All his subjects receive it without hesitation, because they can dispose of it again in the purchase of merchandise, gold, silver, pearls—in short, every article. Several times a year large caravans of merchants arrive and dispose of their goods for this money, because even though they should be inhabitants of countries where this money is not current, they invest it in other articles suited to their own markets. When any person has old or damaged paper money he can exchange it at the khan's mint for new notes. Should any want gold or silver for purposes of manufacture, such as drinking-cups, girdles, or other articles, they in like manner apply at the mint, and for their paper get all the bullion they want. All his majesty's armies are paid in this paper money, which is to them of the same value as gold or silver. Upon these grounds, it may certainly be said that the grand khan has a more extensiv command of treasure than any other sovereign in the universe."

This to the then barbarians of Europe seemed incredible, yet some states of Italy were wise enough to see through and adopt it. Here was a money used by a nation the most populous and most civilized and most commercial the world has ever seen; and this money was based upon the revenues of the government, which revenues are themselvs founded on the whole power, wealth, honor, and dignity of the people, whose government is constantly receiving and disbursing them. The words "legal tender," stamped by law, suffice for its people, and there never was a money of the world.

"NATURE'S REVELATIONS OF CHARACTER," an original and interesting work on physiognomy, by Dr. J. Simms, author of "Scientific Lectures," "A New Physiognomical Chart," "Health and Character," etc, is all and more than its name implies. The book contains some six hundred pages, is neatly printed and illustrated, and apart from its scientific and literary character, is a valuable historical record of the lives of celebrated men and events. It tells how to interpret the signs stamped by Nature upon the faces and forms of her children, and thus possess herself of all their mental and moral traits of person. Also the physiognomical signification of the walk, the laugh, etc. So pleasingly and lucidly are the cardinal principles of the science of nature illustrated and explained, that the student is very soon able to judge who of his friends hav the musical ear, the eye for love, the eloquent lips, the peaceful eyebrows, the intellectual chin, and to determin who is to be trusted and who is to be suspected. The knowledge of a science such as physiognomy, which deals directly with nature and human nature, is sure to prove of incalculable benefit to him who has mastered it in any or all the walks of life. It bears also as equally an important relation to the body as it does to the mind and prescribes the best known natural rules for the preservation of the mental powers and physical health. The best evidence, perhaps, of the intrinsic worth of "Nature's Revelations of Character" is the large sale it has met with and the unqualified indorsement given it by the critics and scientists of Europe and America. The deserved high reputation of its auther, Dr. J. Simms, who is well and favorably known all the world over as a scientific lecturer and writer, has also added to the popularity of the book. Everyone should secure a copy, for "knowledge is power," and ours is an age of progression.—Salt Lake Tribune,

Creation.

BY B. C. H. MOON.

Creation is a myth. No dreamy God
  Ee'er slept in the night of chaos on a bed
  Made of vacuity, and 'neath his head
The darkness for a pillow, and awoke
  Half frightened by the whir of angel wings,
  And struck a light to see what horrid things
Had roused him from his sleep; began to nod;
  Then lit his eye with glory as he thought
  That he 'tween sleeps would make the world from nought.
With pity for nihility he spoke,
  And borne upon his breath were space and time.
  Then blew the dust from heaven's floor sublime—
A myriad orbs which through the ages sweep—
And, satisfied, retired again to sleep.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1880.

I wish to notify the public that a Mr. Baldwin, of Chicago, also Rhodes & McClure, of the same place, are publishing pamphlet editions of my lectures. All the lectures published by them are grossly inaccurate—filled with mistakes, horribly printed, and outrageously unjust to me. These men are simple literary thieves and pirates, and are obtaining money from the public under false pretenses. I take this course to warn the public that these publications are fraudulent. The only correct copies of my lectures are published by C. P. Farrell. All others are published by people who are willing to steal from me and defraud the public vender. These wretches hav published one lecture under four titles, and several others under two or three.

A New and Important Work, entitled

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY.

BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,

Graduate of the Hygeio-Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.

The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth: price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers by permission to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Association.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To Miss Anna Knoop, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

THE MODERN THINKER.

Second number, 8vo, 160 pp. . . $1.00

Life of Thomas Paine. By CALVIN BLANCHARD. 12mo. Large type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.). $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 4 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

[From the Western Reformer.]

"DR. R. P. FELLOWS is a highly educated and scientific physician. He has an original system of practice, and is perfectly reliable and trustworthy. We hav heard many flattering reports of his successful cures of diseases incident to humanity."

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

BY L. FEUERBACH,

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc

Translated from the German.

JUST OUT!

Another Extraordinary Book!

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Of Chicago, Ill., and Minnesota, and the

REV. JACOB DITZLER, D.D.,

Of Kentucky.

Held in Kirksville, Mo., during nine evenings—May 20-29, 1879. Synopsis report—official. This book of 220 pages gives an interesting presentation of the theological questions which divide Christians and Liberals. The Rev. Ditzler is regarded as an able defender of his favorit Christian doctrins, but it will undoubtedly be admitted by the reader that Prof. W. F. Jamieson fully met all he had to offer. Christian readers will take more kindly to a work of this kind, giving both sides an equally fair chance, than to books on our side only.

WORKINGMEN, READ!

ALLEGORY.

UNCLE SAM AND AMERICUS,

A DIALOG ON

LAND, LABOR, AND REFORM.

By F. E. BOYD.

Outlines of a plan for a new American national land and labor co-operativ system, by which land and comfortable homes may be secured to the poorest classes of every race, without money or price, with the educational and social advantages of modern civilization. Designed to ameliorate the condition of the struggling masses; to equalize population; to prevent vice, crime, and pauperism; to prevent the recurrence of industrial crises and feuds, labor riots, and popular insurrections; to terminate Indian wars; to avoid or do away with an oligarchy of landlords and capitalists; and to preserve or restore the liberties of the people and the rights of self-government by bringing immediately together the two great elements of universal progress, land and labor.

"The land shall not be sold forever; for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. xxv., 23).

Gems of Thought.

It is doubtful whether Aristotle believed in the immortality of the soul, no decisiv passage to that effect occurring in such of his works as are extant.—Draper's Intellectual D velopment of Europe.

If you will be the bringer of new doctrins, do not look for a welcome. Walter Bagehot concludes that to the ordinary mind no effort is so painful as the reception of a new idea, and Leslie Stephen says, "Mankind resent nothing so much as the intrusion upon them of a new and disturbing truth."—Christian Register.

Many a man, if he had been sheltered from childhood from the bleak winds of adversity and mild and enlivening gales had played on his brow, would hav afforded an example of truth and generosity and honor, who now, from the stress of temptation, has sunk into meanness and lying and robbery and outrage. —W. Godwin's Essays.

If a man is profligate enough to take advantage of the light-headedness which sometimes afflicts a starving and forsaken woman, both his profligacy and her misfortune need to be reconciled with the purity of God. The social evil is a double-headed clamor against heaven. And we put another tongue into its accusation when we make an outcast of the woman and a tolerated nuisance of the man.—John Weiss.

Man differs from a lifeless body or a brute in this: That it is not with the present moment alone that he has to deal, for the brute, the past, when gone, is clean gone forever, and the future, before it approaches, is as if it were never to be. Man, by his recollection, makes the past a part of the present, and his preknowledge adds the future thereto, thereby uniting the three in one.—Draper's Intellectual Development of Europe.

Exempting church property from taxation is only robbing the people in general to gratify and enrich a few traders in religion. The churches and Sunday-schools produce as many criminals, and yet of a higher class—remember the Bank of Glasgow—than the taverns. Why are these taxed while those escape scot-free? There is no reason in the arrangement, and it stands on mere consent and custom. It is time to let the foolish custom die.—Hylax.

Solomon, who gets the credit of being the wisest man the world ever saw, is more outspoken than the Stagerite, for he has said: "To him that is joined to all the living there is hope; for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything, neither hav they any more a reward, for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love and their hatred and their envy is now perished; neither hav they any more a portion for ever in anything that is done under the sun" (Eccl. ix, 4 6).

One of the soundest principles of human law on the subject of crimes and punishments is that law should in as rare instances as possible interfere with the discretion of individuals. Laws should be as few as they possibly can be made, forbidding nothing the indulgence of which would not beyond question be injurious to the common weal. The right of private judgment in everything beyond this should be sacred. The independence of every man in all things except where prohibition is required for the general safety is indispensably necessary for the improvement of a rational nature.—Godwin's Essays.

All can reason, can inquire, and attain that knowledge which is most beneficial to every individual. We are set at large from those fetters which for ages bound the inferior and more numerous portion of mankind to the law of an implicit subjection, and are turned loose into the great common of such inferences and solutions as are the natural results of fearless inquiry. It is in vain now to endeavor to reerect the wall that separated one set of men from another. We might as well endeavor, by planting a hedge, to confine birds, the nativ inhabitants of the skies, as to prevent men making that use of their reason which reading and reflection naturally supply.—Godwin's Essays.

All human bodies hav kept dead so uniformly and for so long a time that we hav a right to say that what has occurred nine hundred and ninety-nine times will happen on the thousandeth. We are as sure of it as that the sun will rise to-morrow. To say that it is not impossible that the sun may not rise to-morrow is to put the safety of a phrase against the salutary dependence which we derive from experience. While science and experience proclaim what is actual, it is childish to waste breath in saying that nothing is impossible. The law by which a dead body cannot be revived is an unalterable fate. If any bodies, presumptivly dead, revive, the presumption stands corrected.—Weiss's American Religion.

If I could think that discourses and arguments to the understanding were like the several sorts of cater to different palates and stomachs, some nauseous and destructiv to one, which are pleasant and restorativ to another, I should no more think of books and study, and should think my time better employed at push-pin than in reading or writing. But I am convinced of the contrary. I know there is truth opposit to falsehood, that it may be found if people will, and is worth the seeking, and is not only the most valuable, but the pleasantest thing in the world. And therefore I am no mere troubled or disturbed with all the dust that is raised against it than I would be to see from the top of a high steeple, where I had clear air and sunshine, a company of great boys or little boys (for it is all the same) throw up dust in the air, which reached not me, but fell down in their own eyes.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

Odds and Ends.

The bumble-bee and garter snake hav taken down their sign since the picnic season ended.

"It may be wrong, but still its fare," as the conductor said when he tossed up for the odd five cents.

"Yours in faith, hope, and charity," is the way a young man closed a letter to his girl, and now when he wants to visit her he does it through the telephone. She wore brick hair.

AN ENIGMA.

Why is a garden's wildered maze like a young widow fresh and fair?
Because it wants some hand to raise the "weeds" which hav no business there.

The icemen must and shall be exterminated, So must the plumbers. During the coming winter, when your water-pipes freeze up, instead of sending for the plumber, unscrew the pipes and save them for the next summer's use. The scarcity of ice last season was due to the fact that most of it turned sour before it was caught.

A president of a college, in a horse-car, noticed one of the freshmen curled up in front of him, and exhibiting obvious signs of vinous exhilaration. For a few moments the president surveyed the undergraduate, and finally he exclaimed: "Been on a drunk?" The half-conscious student rallied, and with a gleam of good fellowship in his eye, ejaculated, "So—hic—hav—I."

"Adolphus, my dear," said she, "its nearly a year since you first began to call,"

"Yes, I believe so," nervously.

"And we've talked about books and music every night."

"Y-y-e-s, I think so," more nervously than before.

"Well, I-I— Don't you think a change would be agreeable?"

There was "a change" in a few weeks time. The pastor made it.—New Haven Register.

They had not been married long, so they sat down to play checkers. In the middle of the game she said:

"Then do I jump these two men and get a king? Of course I do. Crown me. I've got the first king," and she chuckled hysterically.

"No, you aint, either; I didn't mean that move," said he. "If you can't play checkers without cackling like a hen you'd better giv it up. I'll take that back and move here; now so. Now you can move"

"Over here?" asked the wife.

"Certainly. That's very good," and her husband gobbled two men.

"I didn't see that; I'd rather put it here," she remonstrated.

"Too late now," said he, pegging away for the king row. "You should study your moves first."

The witness who went to the Tombs police court to testify to the good character of his countryman, Patrick Magrath, charged with assault and battery, was a trifle effuse in his remarks and delved too deeply in the genealogy of the Magraths to suit the complainant's counsel. Twice he tried to arrest the torrent of encomiums, and failing in it lost temper and said:

"Did you ever talk a man to death?"

"No; did you iver do it yerself?" asked the witness quite tartly.

"Yes," said the counsel, with an absent air, but watching his opportunity for a thrust. "Yes, a couple of hundred of them, I suppose."

"Is that all?" quoth the witness, sharply. "Then ye havn't beat the raycord yet."

"Havn't beat the record! Whose record?"

"Samson's," returned the witness, calmly. "He slew three hundred Philistines wid the same instrument yer use yerself!"

The subsequent queries put to that witness were remarkable for their brevity.

In an alley off Hastings street, just back of a tumble-down rookery, a member of the sanitary police squad found a man under a wagon and inquired if he was ill. The man pointed to the old house, cautioned the officer to speak low, and replied;

"I'm the husband of the woman you see hanging out clothes over there."

"I've been off on a spree for a whole week."

"Ah! I see. It is the return of the prodigal."

"Wuss than that, sir. The prodigal had no wife, and did not steal the rent money to get drunk on. Oh! I'll catch it, sir, if you don't intercede for me."

"But what can I do?"

"You slip around to the front of the house and say you hav news for her. Watch her face and see how she takes it."

"Then tell her its about me. Watch and see if she gets white around the mouth. Tell her that you hav news that I was drowned at the ferry dock. Watch her tears at this point. Tell her I called her dear name as I went down for the last time. Watch and see if that melts her. If I can get her all broke down and overcome, I'll burst in on her and get her forgivness before she gets over wiping her eyes and pulling her nose. Go, now, and I'll owe you a debt of gratitude all my life. I think Mary will melt under your soft words."

The officer slipped around and told the wife that her husband was hiding in the alley, and then took a position where he could watch what followed. He had hardly secured it before the man came down the alley on a gallop, followed at a short distance by the wife, armed with a hoe-handle. There were no words spoken, but the man simply threw up clouds of dust with his heels as he put on steam, and as he passed the officer he somewhat curtly observed:

"Ah! but ye ain't worth shucks at the melting business!"

Notes and Clippings.

THE English Church Missionary Society labored for twenty years before it could report one convert.

THE Liberal League of St. Louis has proved its progressiv tendency by electing Mrs. Lizzie Jackson as its secretary.

THE Religious Herald, published at Richmond, Virginia, says that four-fifths of the 1,455 923,500 persons in the world are "without God and without hope."

EVANGELIST HAMMOND has gone to Winnipeg, where he will hold revival services among the little Winnipeggers. Winnipeg is the principal city of Manitoba, and is 1,800 miles from here.

CONSTABLE SCHOONOVER, of Elgin, Ill., arrested on the 25th ult. a Methodist preacher, the Rev. I. T. Severance, for forgery on money received on a school order on the directors of the Burlington school, which they pronounced a forgery. Hence the arrest.

THE Covenant, which is the organ of the Reformed Episcopal church, says that several of the principal Protestant Episcopal churches in Baltimore are on the high road to Rome, and that in some of these churches the rectors regularly hear confession. It mentions as chief among these St. Paul's, Mount Calvary, and St. Luke's.

THE First Baptist church in San Francisco is burdened with a debt so heavy as to be greater than the value of its property. The probability is that the church will, before very long, hav to go into bankruptcy or in some other way be wiped out of existence. Churches hav a hard time in California, for the people generally hav little reverence for religion and no particular respect for Sunday above other days.

SOME Galveston boys were impressed by reading of the martyrdom of saints by death at the stake, and they decided to burn a pet dog in the same manner. The leader in the movement had a theory that the poor brute's sufferings would result in immortal joys, and so be a good thing for it. A post was driven into the ground, the dog chained fast, and a roaring fire built. The boys sang hymns while their victim was roasting to death.

AT a meeting of the Liberal League in this city on Saturday evening Mr. David Eccles introduced a resolution in favor of the League in Kansas City withdrawing from the National League. It was voted down, whereupon David, a la Ingersoll, withdrew from the League. Mr. Eccles has been a sort of dictator to the League, but by the failure of his resolution he saw that the scepter was departing from the house of David, hence he departed.—Kansas City Pioneer.

DR. THOMAS, of Chicago, recently preached a sermon in which he spoke thus of hell. The general impression in Chicago seems to be that he will be found guilty of heresy and expelled from the ministry; "John Wesley believed in a hell of literal fire or material fire. He says there is no such thing as immaterial fire; and in answer to the objection that such a material fire would destroy any body on which it might act, he says that God has mercifully given us an example that such is not the case—in the asbestos, a kind of flax that no heat could consume. And then he says that if it is not material fire it is something worse. Such a thought makes the idea of God impossible. We cannot, with such a picture before us as millions of his children—those whom he called into being—suffering forever the agonies of such a hell, think of him as good, and hence cannot think of him as God; for to think of any being less than absolute perfection, or that might be better, is not to think of God at all. If I believed such a doctrin of future punishment; if I believed that millions who once lived here were in such torments and must stay there forever; if I believed that I should never smile again; if I believed it, I could wish I had never been born; I could wish the world had never been made; that mankind had never been created. If I believed that, I could wish that the race would perish from the earth; that star after star might fade out till the heavens were only blackness. If I believed that, I could wish that the universe might sink into nothingness, and that God himself might be annihilated. I don't believe it, and I don't see how any sensible man who believes in God can believe it."

SAN FRANCISCO can boast of a reverend who has "killed a man," and Portland (Or.) is only a little way behind, having a clergyman who attempted to kill a fellow-creature; and he states himself that it wasn't his fault that his game wasn't brought down. Friday morning, at 9:30 o'clock, in front of Hexter & May's on Front street, near Washington, the Rev. Rabbi May got slapped in the face by Mr. Waldman, one of his congregation, whereupon the reverend gent pulled his little pistol and blazed away, and came near making a corpse of his antagonist at the first fire, and wounded another gent who was passing at the second. Some officious gent knocked the reverend down, and then Mr. Waldman waded into him and gave him a good beating. The difficulty grew out of some Sunday-school business, of which school Mr. Waldman is a director and Rev. May a teacher. It may be the correct thing for a thief, pickpocket, or burglar to carry six-shooters in their hip-pockets for "protection" against the public, but we can't for the life of us see what use a minister has going around in a city like Portland with an "iron" concealed on his person. If it is a crime for an ordinary mortal to carry concealed weapons, punishable with fine or imprisonment, it should be hanging for a minister to do the same. Reverend May's mission is peace and good will toward all men; but his method of healing up dissensions between his congregation and himself seems to indicate that he has adopted General Jackson's style, who said he'd "be d——d if he wouldn't hav peace if he had to fight for it." The reverend gentleman was brought before Judge Bybee, charged with an assault with a dangerous weapon, and held in the sum of $500 to answer.

DR. TAIT, Archbishop of Canterbury, England, has been instructing the clergy of his diocese in the most approved methods of dealing with the enemies of the church. In a discourse at Turnbridge he showed them how to combat Infidelity; at Dover he told them what arguments to use against deists and theists; at Ashford he attacked the "meagre, sublimated Christianity" of those who hav reasoned all the sweetness and light out of the faith and left it a barren philosophy. He spoke at Turnbridge of "the conflict for which the church universal must brace itself in this nineteenth century," and told his hearers that Christian society was troubled, and that the church of Christ and the faith of Christ were "passing through a great trial in all regions of the civilized world, and not least among ourselvs." The picture he drew of what doubt and unbelief are doing and threaten to do was disquieting in the highest degree. The adversary was there, armed at all points, resolute, and dreadful to behold. The Archbishop engaged him, like a skilled and fearless master of fence, just to show his clergy and church wardens how easy the thing was. A few passes, a feint, a parry or two, a lightning thrust, and modern Infidelity was stretched dead at the Archiepiscopal feet. "You see, gentlemen," said Dr. Tait, wiping his blade, or, at any rate, we may imagine that he said it, "how very simple this matter is when you know how." The Archbishop's short and easy method of dealing with Agnostics was to tell them that in the cemeteries of Paris the civil or non-religious funerals reach a scarcely appreciable percentage of the total number, showing that however numerous the scoffers might be, and however indifferent to religious truths in life, the solemn fact of death freed the promptings of nature from the fetters of rationalism and brought the most hardened skeptic to acknowledge God. "I think we may take some encouragement from the report thus made," said the Archbishop, "that this atheistical skepticism is neither so widely spread nor so powerful as some fear." That disposed of Agnostics. "And, secondly," continued the primate, flushed with the victory he had just attained, "if the world is not about to become Agnostic, certainly there is little fear of its falling under the dominion of a dogmatic atheism." He felt sure that the "boasted enlightenment" of this century was a sufficient protection against such a danger. Having thus carried the church unscathed through the "conflict" for which he had a few moments before declared that it must "brace itself," Dr. Tait cleared the field of the prostrate figures of his foes of straw and treated the clergy to a dress parade. "But if we do not fear either of these antagonists," said he, "this is no reason why we should not call to mind the evidences, many of them very old and very commonplace, but not, therefore, the less forcible, whereby we may withstand their baleful influence, and thus hope to avert the ruin which they may bring on the unwary." This he did in a long discourse, full of the familiar arguments. Can this learned primate of the church of England content himself with "very old and very commonplace" evidences? Does his experience justify the conclusion that arguments drawn from Bishop Butler and from Paley will be as effectiv against the Agnostics, the evolutionists, and the Materialists of the nineteenth century as they were against the deists of the eighteenth? Can he point to any other field of human thought and enterprise in which men are satisfied to work with instruments that are confessedly "very old and very commonplace?" When eminent theologians make such confession of their incapacity to keep up with the thought and knowledge of the day, we can no longer wonder that Christianity is losing ground. The rapid spread of skeptical ideas is largely attributed to the intellectual unreadiness of the defenders of the faith. The Bible story of the creation, the authenticity and inspiration of the scriptures, the truth of the narrativ of the gospels, the divine nature of Christ, the account of the resurrection, and a hundred other essential facts of Christianity hav had, within the last quarter of a century, to withstand assaults from new sources. The elements of the faith hav been subjected to the action of powerful historical and scientific solvents only recently brought into use. Infinit keenness of intellect and great learning hav been enlisted on the side of unbelief. Against these new powers the pulpit orators and actual workers of Christianity hav struggled as best they might with their old weapons, for it is beyond dispute that the theologians who hav met the hostil critics on their own ground hav been mostly scholars, not preachers. The men for whom the people receive their Sabbath lessons in holiness hav either dodged the question or fallen back on Butler or Paley. There has been unwisdom, too, in the very councils of the church. Theological thunderbolts that were immensely serviceable when the preacher had to deal with the callous consciences of robber barons and the dullness of ignorant peasants hav been kept in use, and, until lately, any daring innovator who proposed to lay them aside for something better adapted to an age when men are governed by their reason, instead of their fears, has been punished with stripes for heresy. A still greater mistake has been made in clinging to acknowledged error. The cause of truth and the religion of Christ suffered from the blind tenacity with which hundreds of theologians defended the King James version of the Scriptures and opposed the revision. They said, in effect, we will use this Bible and continue to preach its doctrins, with all its errors, rather than acknowledge that some of the texts we hav discoursed upon so many times are false and spurious. The abandonment of old, harsh theories by a portion of the church and their retention by others in the same faith help the cause of unbelief. But this is inevitable. The whole body of theologians cannot move forward with even step and in line. Their ranks present a most unfortunate spectacle, however, when the main body is in doubt whether to push on with the advance guard or tarry with the loiterer and sluggard. The Archbishop of Canterbury is not mistaken as to the dangers which beset the church. At the time of the Bradlaugh contest it was said that a very large proportion—possibly a majority—of the House of Commons were, if not pronounced Atheists, at least not Christians; and when it was proposed to include a question as to religious belief in the schedule for the next census of the United Kingdom, the friends of the proposition, who had brought it forward in "the interest of religion," were speedily persuaded to abandon it, after some well-informed persons had told them that a census table showing the relativ proportions of Christians and unbelievers in England would not hav the beneficial effect they anticipated. The wonder is that, with a knowledge of these facts, the Archbishop is still content to rely on "very old and very commonplace evidence."—N. Y. Times.

Events of the Week.

THE widow of Abraham Lincoln, who has just returned from a sojourn in Europe, is in this city.

SEVENTEEN valuable horses were burnt to death in a livery stable at New Haven, Conn., on the 31st ult.

BRIGHAM YOUNG, Jr., committed suicide at Salt Lake City on the 27th ult. He had been on a protracted spree.

THE tide of immigration continues undiminished, as many as four thousand arriving in this port some days.

THERE was a good deal more Garfield than God preached in many of our metropolitan pulpits on Sunday last.

THE Nova Scotian fishermen are reported to be in a starving condition owing to the failure of both fisheries and harvest.

THE largest grain elevator in the country has just been completed in Brooklyn. It will hold nearly a quarter of a million bushels of wheat.

THE custom house authorities hav lately seized several thousand dollars' worth of priests' vestments which were being smuggled

A METHODIST minister in this city made an attempt to commit suicide a few days ago, but failed. This is his eighth unsuccessful attempt.

THE Italian laborers who were swindled out of their wages by the Cape Cod Canal Company hav been brought to this city, and are now supported by their friends.

A REMNANT of Victorio's band of savages, who escaped when the others were killed by the Mexican troops, hav crossed to this side of the line and recommenced their depredations.

FIFTY vessels were lost on the English coast during a terrible storm on the 30th. Many lives were lost. During the same storm thousands of acres of land in Leicestershire were flooded

THE alleged Garfield letter on the Chinese question, which was published by Truth, has caused intense excitement throughout the country, and has brought the Chinese question into prominence.

AN international pedestrian match for the championship of the world was begun in London, England, on the 1st. There are six entries of first-class walkers, and they are to go as far as possible in six days.

THE land agitation in Ireland continues to spread, though the government makes fierce threats, and has arrested many of the leading agitators. The constabulary force has been increased by two thousand men.

THE Episcopal Convention recently in session in this city voted to alter the prayers in their prayer-book. This will be refreshing news to the proprietors and inhabitants of heaven, who are supposed to listen to those stereotyped supplications.

THE Ansonia Clock Company's works in Brooklyn were destroyed by fire on the 27th ult. Several dwelling-houses near by were also destroyed. The loss will reach nearly a million. Several hundred workmen were thrown out of employment.

INGERSOLL and Bro. Beecher fraternized and preached politically from the same platform in Brooklyn on Saturday night last. They formed a mutual admiration society and gave each other unlimited "taffy," each calling the other the greatest orator of the age—which he undoubtedly is.

MORE than twenty-five persons were injured, several of them seriously and two or three fatally, by an accident to a street car on Staten Island a few days ago. Going down a steep grade, the brakes refused to act, and the car ran to the bottom at a fearful speed, jumping the track, and being broken to fragments.

ALL efforts to extinguish the fire in the Keeley Run coal mine, near Pottsville, Pa., hav proved unavailing, and the coal will probably continue to burn indefinitely. There are now many burning mines in Pennsylvania; one near Coal Castle has been burning since 1835, and another near Maunch Chunk has been on fire twenty-five years.

Here I am in sunny Italy with the balmy air and the blue skies. I am on the shores of the beautiful Lake Maggiore, and its placid, unruffled surface is hardly a stone's throw from my window. Across the lake, at a distance of three miles, on the lovely, rising ground, are beautiful villages of white buildings and tall spires surrounded by vines and still verdant vegetation. Pleasure steamers are occasionally plying up and down the lake laden with pleasure-seekers from England, France, Germany, and a due proportion, probably, from America. A peculiar stillness pervades the atmosphere, and not even a leaf stirs to show that such a thing as wind exists. It is evidently a land of summer—a land of luxuriance. Poets have for ages sung of the sunny clime of Italy and of the blueness of her skies. I find it all true. Though it rained last night when we arrived here, and through the night, it cleared off this morning and is now as warm and balmy as heart could desire. Yes, the sun shines brightly here, and the sky is blue—just about as brightly as the sun shines in America and the sky just as blue, and no more so. Had a bright sun and blue sky been my only object, I need not have left my native land to find them. It is probable no country on the earth excels America in this respect. Italy, indeed, is lovely, but no more lovely than America. Switzerland is grand, and has beautiful lakes and high mountains, but America excels her even in these respects. Germany has a lovely river, picturesque scenery, beautiful plains, and very interesting mountain scenery, but America's are far more extensive, and equal in every respect. France, Belgium, and England have a fertile soil, pleasant scenery, with beautiful rivers and lovely landscapes, but beautiful, loved America nevertheless surpasses them all in these particulars, and is the greatest country of all of them. Here are older towns, more dilapidated and ruined castles, more weird legends and stories, more works of art, grander cities, and that is about all. In the real beauties and loveliness of nature, America is not behind any European country.

But I must tell you about my very interesting tour from Geneva to this point. Of course I cannot interest you in it to the extent I was interested myself, but I can at least give you the main points. I left Geneva on Saturday morning, the 18th, per steamer Mont Blanc, with a fine party of pleasure-seekers. It had rained much of the time for two or three days, but finally cleared off, and that morning was pleasant, and we were favored with a good chance to appreciate the beautiful and picturesque scenery which surrounds Lake Geneva, or Lac Leman, as the Romans called it, and which name it still somewhat retains. I think I said that the Lake of Geneva is the largest in Switzerland, being about fifty miles in length and of a crescent shape, its concave shore being toward the south. It is eight miles wide at the widest part (in the center), at Lausanne, and two or three miles wide toward each end. It is 1,230 feet above the level of the sea, and is in many places over 1,000 feet deep. Its waters are the melted snows and rains from the mountains, and are remarkably clear and pure. It has a peculiar bluish color, and is in every way a beautiful sheet of water—perhaps as beautiful as the lovely waters of the smaller Otsego Lake in New York, on the shores of which I first saw the light of the sun.

We left Geneva at 9 A. M., and were all occupied in beholding the fine country seats, the lovely vineyards, the beautiful villages that line its shores, with the lofty mountains dimly visible in the distance on either side. The majority of the passengers were Swiss, French, and German, with several English people, and perhaps two Americans, with whom I did not become acquainted. The western end of the lake is lovely, but its beauty increased as we moved toward the east. We landed at several points and put off passengers and took on others. Lausanne is the largest town on the lake except Geneva, and lies beautifully on the hill slope surrounded by its hundreds of vineyards in the highest state of culture and now nearly ready to pour hundreds of thousands of gallons of grape juice into the casks for fermentation. The part of the town lying next to the lake and partially separated from Lausanne is called Ouchy, with many beautiful hotels and stately mansions. Here many English and Americans remain for months, and some the year round. Here it was that Gibbon resided for a long time and wrote the last volume of his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." He was a great writer. He produced a work that will live for ages, and it is gratifying to know that he was one wholly an unbeliever in the superstitions of the church and entirely free from its shackles and bondage. One of the fine hotels of the place is named Hotel de Gibbon.

From this point to the eastern end of the lake the scenery is most picturesque and lovely; perhaps entrancing is not too extravagant an adjective to apply to such concentrated loveliness. Byron was an admirer of the beautiful lake of Geneva, and Voltaire often pronounced it the most lovely sheet of water in the world, and this perhaps is the reason why so many of the years of his long life were passed near its shores. Byron wrote of it:

"Clear, placid Leman, thy contrasted lake
With the wild world I dwell in, is a thing
Which warns me with its stillness to forsake
Earth's troubled waters for a purer spring.
This quiet soil is as a noiseless wing,
To waft me from distraction."

Again he sang:

"Lake Leman woos me with its crystal face,
The mirror where the stars and mountains view
The stillness of the aspect, in each trace
Its clear depth yields of their far hight and view."

After Ouchy we touched at Chillon, Clarens, Vevay, Montreux, Villeneuve, and other points, and each seemed to surpass the other in loveliness. It is indeed a land of poetry, of sentiment, of beauty. This locality has been enthusiastically described by many writers, written of in every note-book, delineated in nearly every sketch-book of the fascinated tourist for hundreds of years. Before Byron sang of its sweet beauty, others had been equally entranced by the picturesqueness of these localities. At Chillon Rousseau is said to have placed his Julie and St. Preux, and Clarens, and Meillerie, and all that is real or unreal in the Heloise, are here or hereabouts.

Mr. Laing, in writing of this part of Switzerland, says: "The snowy peak, the waterfall, the glacier, are but the wonders of Switzerland; her beauty is in her lakes, the blue eyes of this Alpine land. The most beautiful passage of scenery in Switzerland is, to my mind, the upper end of the lake of Geneva, from Vevay or from Lausanne to Villeneuve. The margin of the lake is carved out and built up into terrace above terrace of vineyards and Indian corn plots; behind this narrow belt, grain crops, orchards, grass fields, and chestnut trees have their zone; higher still up the hillside, pasture grass and forest trees occupy the ground; above rises a dense mass of pine forests, broken by peaks of bare rocks shooting up, weather-worn and white, through this dark green mantle; and last of all, the eternal snow piled up high against the deep, blue sky; and all this glory of nature, this varied majesty of mountain land, within one glance. It is not surprising that this water of Geneva has seen upon its banks the most powerful minds of each succeeding generation. Calvin, Knox, Voltaire, Gibbon, Rousseau, Madame de Stael, Byron, John Kemble, have, with all their essential diversities and degrees of intellectual powers, been united here in one common feeling of the magnificence of the scenery around it. This land of Alp and lake is indeed a mountain temple, reared for the human mind on the dried, unvaried plains of Europe."

If one end of the lake of Lucerne may be called the land of Tell, with as much propriety may the east end of the lake of Geneva be termed the land of Byron. He seemed to take in the loveliness of every part. But ten minutes' walk from Villeneuve is the "Hotel Byron," and ten minutes from that is the Castle of Chillon. Apart from its historic interest the old castle is impressive, with its solid walls and towers, and its strangely isolated situation on a rock, connected with the bank by a wooden bridge. The story of the prisoner, immortalized by Byron, like many another similar work of imagination, has been a subject of controversy, but the beauty of the locality never can be. Of this castle and its inmates Byron wrote:

"Chillon! thy prison is a holy place,
And thy sad floor an altar—for 'twas trod,
Until his very steps have left a trace,
Worn as if the cold pavement were a sod,
By Bonnivard! May none these marks efface,
For they appeal from tyranny to God."

Upon these lines Baedeker makes these remarks: "The noble author of these exquisite lines has invested this spot with much of the peculiar interest which attaches to it, but it is an error to identify Bonnivard, the victim to the tyranny of the Duke of Savoy, and by him confined in these gloomy dungeons for a period of six years, with Byron's 'Prisoner of Chillon.' The author calls his poem a fable, and when he composed it he was not aware of the history of Bonnivard, or he would, as he himself states, have attempted to dignify the subject by an endeavor to celebrate his courage and virtue. The following brief particulars of a man with whose name these gloomy walls are so intimately associated may be acceptable to the traveler as he contemplates the spot. Francis Bonnivard was born in 1496. He was the son of Lord Bonnivard, lord of Lune, and at the age of sixteen inherited from his uncle the rich priory of St. Victor, close to the walls of Geneva. The duke of Savoy having attacked the republic of Geneva, Bonnivard warmly espoused its cause, and thereby incurred the relentless hostility of the duke, who caused him to be seized and imprisoned in the castle of Grolèe, where he remained two years. On being restored to his liberty he returned to his priory, but in 1528 he was again in arms against those who had seized his ecclesiastical revenues; the city of Geneva supplied him with the munitions of war, in return for which Bonnivard parted with his birthright, the revenues of which were applied by the Genevese to the support of the city hospital. Bonnivard was afterward employed in the service of the republic, and in 1530, when traveling between Moudan and Lausanne, fell into the power of his old enemy, the duke of Savoy, who caused him to be confined in the Castle of Chillon. In 1556 he was restored to liberty by the Genevese forces of Nögelin; he returned to the republic, and was made a citizen. Bonnivard's subsequent existence was a stormy one, and he died in 1571 at the age of seventy-five years." So much for that bit of Swiss history.

It has been said that Clarens is all poetry. Let Byron, who could probably do it better than anyone else, describe it:

"Clarens! sweet Clarens, birthplace of deep love!
Thine air is the young breath of passionate thought;
Thy trees take root in love; the snows above,
The very glaciers, hav his colors caught;
And sunset into rose-hues wrought
By rays which sleep there lovingly; the rocks,
The permanent crags, tell here of Love, who sought
In them a refuge from worldly shocks,
Which stir and sting the soul with hope that woos, then mocks.

"Clarens! by heavenly feet thy paths are trod—
Undying Love's, who here ascends a throne
To which the steps are mountains; where the god
Is a pervading life and light—so shown
Not on those summits solely, nor alone
In the still cave and forest; o'er the flower
His eye is sparkling, and his breath hath blown,
His soft and summer breath, whose tender power
Passes the strength of storms in their most desolate hour.

"All things are here of him; from the black pines
Which are his shade on high, and the loud roar
Of the torrents, where he listeneth to the vines,
Which slope his green path downward to the shore,
Where the bow'd waters meet him and adore,
Kissing his feet with murmurs; and the wood,
The covert of old trees, with trunks all hoar,
But light leaves, young as joy, stands where it stood,
Offering to him and his a populous solitude.

"A populous solitude of trees and birds,
And fairy-formed and many-colored things,
Who worship him with notes more sweet than words,
And innocently open their glad wings,
Fearless and full of life; the gush of springs,
And fall of lofty fountains, and the bend
Of stirring branches and the bud which brings
The swiftest thought of beauty, here extend,
Mingling and made by love unto one mighty end.

"'Twas not for fiction chose Rousseau this spot,
Peopling it with affections; but he found
It was the scene which passion must allot
To the mind's purified beings; 'twas the ground
Where early love his Psyche's zone unbound,
And hallowed it with loveliness; 'tis love,
And wonderful and deep, and hath a sound,
And sense, and sight of sweetness; here the Rhone
Hath spread himself a couch, the Alps have reared a throne."

I thought Vevay the most lovely of them all, if that were possible. On one hand the hills covered with vineyards and beautiful residences were mapped charmingly before the eye; and then just to the east the bold hill, bower like, arose, and on the summit a beautiful residence, but how to get to it seemed the mystery. The town itself is finely built, having the beautiful lake on one side and the most charming scenery on the other, all the lovliness a town can well possess. I have often heard of the charms of Vevay on lake Geneva, but did not realize them till I saw them, then these impressed themselves deeply upon my mind. It is a delighful place, where one would fondly linger. The views of the lake and mountain scenery are here exquisite, and the town seems admirably calulated for pleasure.

Perhaps I am wrong to give the preference to Vevay, when the other points are so beautiful, but I cannot stop to describe all. I trust it may be the lot of many of my readers to look upon these beauties for themselves. As we rounded the end of the lake we had a fine view of Mont Midi, whose hight is said to be 10,400 feet above the sea and whose tops were white with snow and hood, were somewhat white though not so high. The ice. Other mountains closely in the neighbor-hills near the end of the lake are many of them very abrupt, some of them with a small growth of green trees, and at other places the rocks are entirely bare, with here and there a sharp pinnacle of rock, which looked to me like nature's monuments and tombstones in this field of the universe. Some of the peaks look like pyramids, mounds, and domes, with some as sharp and defined as the tower of a church. The grandeur of those Alpine peaks is indeed great.

The value of these hillside lands, like all others upon which the vine is grown, depends upon the quality of the wine which the land produces. A little difference in location, a little difference in exposure, often makes one hundred per cent difference in the value of the wine, and as per consequence in that of the land. But all the hillsides on the north shore of the lake, where the exposure to the sun's rays is favorable, are very valuable for the vine culture. Some of it is owned by rich landlords who cultivate it themselves, and some is rented out to poor people, and some again is owned in small lots by the comparatively poor themselves who raise the vine for their own livelihood.

Our ride on the lake terminated at Bouveret, an insignificant little village on the south shore at the end of the lake, where the railroad takes passengers up the valley of the Rhone between the mountains to the Simplon pass on the way to Italy. You must understand that Lake Geneva has the Rhone at each end of it. The Rhone empties into the lake, and the Rhone is also the outlet. Thus the beautiful lake upon which we had been riding for several hours, and which is surrounded by such beautiful scenery and towns, being in the center eight miles wide and a thousand feet in depth, may be considered as an enlargement and reservoir of the river Rhone. Many other streams also empty in the lake, thus making the Rhone at the outlet much larger than at the inlet. But as we journeyed up the valley we saw plenty of evidence that sometimes this part of the Rhone is a monstrous stream. I noticed in the narrow valley through which we passed places where the water had reached to the second story of the stone houses, and where the flat land was covered two and three feet deep with gravel and boulders weighing two hundred pounds, thus ruining the land forever. When the immense body of snow upon these towering Alps begins to rapidly melt at the approach of warm weather the most fearful floods are the result.

This valley of the Rhone is extremely grand, the mountains rising most abruptly and towering into the azure blue with sharp pinnacles and rounded domes. Many of the mountains are bare rocks, they being too precipitous for any earth to remain upon them. In some places they are nearly perpendicular, and on the ledges I saw the remains of ancient castles; but how the material was ever taken there to build them, and how the owners reached them and left them, remains a mystery. Martigny, the second point of importance, is a noted locality for the ruins of ancient castles. Every eminence, almost, seems at one time or another to have had its own particular fortress. Here, all along the narrow valley, where the hills that sloped to the south had earth enough to allow the growth of a vine, there the vine is planted, and in many places it is so steep that it was a wonder to me how the earth could remain there or how the peasants could get up there for the grapes when grown. In many places it reminded me of the vine-clad hills on the Rhine, though on the Rhone the bare rocks predominate.

The Rhone, in this valley, has a pretty rapid descent, so of course we must have been constantly rising. How much Brigue, the point where the railroad terminates, is above the waters of the lake, I cannot say, but I should judge three hundred feet. As we ascended, the valley grew narrower, and it was a wonder how so many people could live here, and how so many villages could ever spring up in such a rocky, mountainous world with so little land susceptible of cultivation. If there is a people in the world who can live on a naked rock, that people is the Swiss. The valley became so narrow that I more than once thought we had come to the end of the houses and towns, when village after village was reached, and all having the appearance of comfort and prosperity.

I do not know the distance from Bouveret to Brigue, but it cannot be less than 50 or 75 miles, for it took us from 2 P. M. till 11 at night to make the trip, though we laid over three hours at Sion. I must say for the Swiss railroads that while they seem very solidly and securely built, they do not run at all rapidly, giving the tourist plenty of time to look at the eternal and endless hills to his heart's content. I thought, too, that the trains stopped unnecessarily long at the stations. It more than once occurred to me that possibly they were waiting for the peasant wives to bring in their hens' eggs to send to market, and if the hens had been derelict in their duty of laying to allow them to be driven in to attend to that little job. When the chef de gare (master of the station) gets quite through with everything he can think of and everything his neighbors can think of, he rings a dinner bell, and then the rather feeble engine blows its weak whistle and then we are off again at a slow rate for the next station a mile or two away, to repeat again the tedious delay. If I had to travel perpetually on the Switzerland railroads, I would wish that the hens would be prompter in their daily duties or that the trains need not wait for them. The Swiss, with all their good qualities, need a little more of American snap in the conduct of their railroad affairs. Possibly, however, their country being so very small, they are afraid visitors will get over it too soon if they let the iron horses go at their fastest rate of speed.

At Sion, as I said, we stopped over three hours for the next train, and I was surprised to see an old town of a thousand inhabitants able to live and flourish in such a narrow, rock-bound place, but then perhaps the valley widened a little and the rocks sloped a little more moderately so the vine could grow. From all appearances this has been a town for hundreds of years. The streets, the narrow lanes, the buildings, all proclaim of antiquity. On the spur of the rocks three or four hundred feet above the town stand two ancient castles, and I again wondered how they could have got there, and how the occupants could ever have reached them.

I visited the cathedral and saw several at prayers on their knees and doubted not they would feel the approval of conscience for the devotions thus rendered. I saw more stained windows, more statues of the dying God, and more images and paintings of the Virgin. So I concluded that Sion is quite a Catholic town, though a Protestant church stands almost side by side with the cathedral. It is to be hoped that between the two lasting happiness will be found by the honest people, though that so many priests are needed to secure the very desirable article of happiness was ever a mystery.

That I might not lose the time, I thought I would get a little lunch in Sion without going to a hotel for it, so I looked along the one dismal long street to see if I could find a restaurant, but was not successful. The stores are small and dingy, and very few had any signs to tell a stranger what kind of business was being conducted within. At length I saw a sign which read "Epicere." I fancied that word had some relation to eatables, and I ventured to enter and look around to see what was for sale. It was a small room and fully crammed with a variety of articles, more, perhaps, of "one thing and another than anything else." It seemed a rude and primitive grocery without much of anything in it fit to be eaten. The owner and his wife were in attendance and manifested a very laudable disposition to minister to my wants, could I only make them known. How to do this was the trouble. For a moment I could not think of a word in French or German that meant anything eatable. I had asked, "Anglais?" but when they shook their heads I knew that talking between us was out of the question; so I resorted to pantomime, at which by this time I consider myself an adept. At pointing and motioning I ought to be proficient if practice brings proficiency. So I put my hand to my mouth and made my jaws go as though I were eating. "Oh, oui," said the man, who joyfully thought he understood me, and brought me a box of cigars. I shook my head in a grieved manner that I had been so misunderstood and that even a Swiss had for a moment thought I would smoke tobacco. The man and his wife were pictures of anxiety and despair, and I was another picture of anxiety and despair; thus there were three living pictures in that little Swiss epicere on Mont Sion. But, fortunately, at that opportune moment I happened to think of the French word for bread, pain. I wanted some cakes, rusks, or buns, and pain was the only word for anything baked from flour that I was acquainted with in the French language, so I immediately said, "Pain." They at once were happy, and so was I too. The man said, "Oh, oui, oui, pain," and immediately took me by the arm and led me half way across the street, toward a very obscure, dingy-looking shop, and, pointing toward it, said in the pleasantest possible tones, "Pain, pain." I entered the pain shop and found a very matronly-looking old lady in charge. The shop was not neat nor particularly inviting, but feeling determined to carry out my resolution to get a cheap supper, I looked around upon her rather light stock of goods. She evidently was a baker. I saw a card of rolls or buns, and, picking it up, I handed her a half franc and motioned in my most intelligible manner that I wished that amount in that sort of merchandise. She understood me in a trice, and broke off so much of the goods for me that I was almost sorry that I had called for so much. She had nothing but bread and buns in sight, and as I felt as though my purchase would go better with something else to eat with it, I bethought myself that I had seen cheese at the epicere and that the couple were truly good-natured souls, and so recrossed the street to the first establishment. They seemed glad to see me with my pain in my hands and looked all anxiety to see what next they could do to serve me. I immediately spoke plainly, "Fromage," the French for cheese. The good couple were again overjoyed to know what I wanted and that they could serve me, and the husband immediately placed a knife in my hand and motioned to me to try the different cheeses that were cut to see which I preferred. I remembered the proverbial odor of Swiss cheese and though I would take a sample that would not prevent my eating the pain I had purchased. I selected the fromage that suited and handed out some small change, to the extent of which I was willing to invest with him. The good woman proceeded to cut off a piece so large that I was almost again filled with dismay. She put it upon the scales, and finding it did not weigh enough, was about to cut off more to add to it, when, by the most earnest gesticulations I was capable of, I besought her for mercy's sake not to give me any more. She wrapped the fromage and gave it to me, and I gave her the pfennigs, and all hands were happy once more. At that moment it occurred to me that I would need some fluid with my supper, and not supposing that the people of that country ever drink water, I boldly said, "beer." The man understood me in a moment, and seemed happier than ever. I was in hopes that beer was in his stock of trade, for I felt a desire to patronize him all I could under the circumstances. I understood him to say he had schnapps but no beer. I did not want schnapps, and then the good soul took me again by the arm and led me half a square and pointed to an old building up on the bank and said in dulcet tones, "beer, beer." I was still resolute and climbed the steps and found a rosy-cheeked, buxom-looking damsel in attendance, who, I suspected, was of the German persuasion; so resorting to my limited vocabulary of Dutch, I said, "Ein glass bier." She understood my excellent German as well as though she had been a professor of a Teutonic university, and with all reasonable dispatch she procured the beverage, for which I duly handed out twenty centimes, and she resumed her speaking with a neighboring swain, who had called in to pay her his Saturday night attentions. And there the editor of The Truth Seeker sat by the beer table in that little brewery on the hill in Mont Sion and munched his pain and his fromage and sipped his beer, feeling rejoiced that by the aid of three different establishments he had succeeded in getting quite a supper at a very moderate price, and thereby cheated some needy landlord out of two francs.

When the beer was finished I slowly retraced my steps to the station with pain and fromage enough left for another meal or two. These meditations came into my mind as I thus wended my way to the gare: "Well, I have heard a good deal about Sion, and now I have seen it. This must be the genuine old Sion which we read about, for here is the mount to all intents and purposes, and it is as old as there is any sense in any town's being."

Settling this matter to my entire satisfaction, and finding I had still more than an hour to wait, I sat down in the gare and took a nap, just as sweet as anybody's nap, and when I awoke I gave the man in charge twenty-five centimes, not for my lodging, but for taking care of my satchel and overcoat while I had been viewing the town. In due time the train came on, and at a little before nine we made a fresh start for Brigue, still gradually climbing the rocky, wild, mountainous country, and the little Rhone growing smaller and smaller as we neared its source. The moon shone sufficiently to enable me to still see the vast mountains of rock that on either side abruptly raised their summits to the very clouds. It seemed like a dispensation of Providence that that narrow valley had been so shaped that both the active little Rhone and the slow railroad train could find their way through it between those mammoth hills. I don't know but I should have been willing to accept the design argument had the valley thus continued all the way to Italy; but it does not, and that very fact knocks the design argument in the head, so far as I am concerned. I now think that valley and all those Alps are just as they are, because there was the best of reasons, the strongest kind of causes, for them to be just as they are, and that design had nothing at all to do with it.

Well, after passing numerous towns up that wild Alpine valley, eleven o'clock brought us to the end of the railroad and to the town of Brigue. I was again surprised to find so much of a town away up there among the naked rocks and it seemed comparatively new. The hotel where I put up is a very respectable building of stone, three stories high, with stone floors, nicely carpeted, and the lace window curtains in the very first style. After securing a seat in the diligence the next morning, upon being told that I would be called at four, in time to eat my breakfast, ready for the diligence at five, I went to bed but not to sleep. It seemed to me I lay awake all night. The high altitude may have so exhilarated my spirits that I could not sleep, or the beauties I had witnessed through the day had conspired to make me wakeful, or the fear that I would not be called in time for the diligence in the morning drove sleep from my eyes. Whichever it was I cannot say, nor is it of the slightest consequence now.

In the morning I was duly called; I partook of the coffee, bread, and butter and honey, and at five we were all ready to make the passage of the Simplon pass. Yes, I wish you to understand I have crossed the Alps precisely where Napoleon did after his well-known battle of Marengo; and yet I

Dr. Denslow as a Calumniator.—Was Paine ever Dismissed from the Excise Service for Smuggling?

BY WM. HENRY BURR.

The defenders of Thomas Paine are but a handful compared with his defamers. It is meet that lordly aristocrats and spiteful priests, whose power and craft are endangered by the prevalence of political and religious freedom, should invent and propagate calumnies against the great apostle of republicanism and Infidelity. But when a scholarly Agnostic joins in the outcry with the imperialists and ecclesiastics, and charges that Paine "was twice dismissed from the excise for smuggling," and not only says it once, but on two successiv pages of his "Modern Thinkers," unless he has evidence to prove the grave accusation, how can he hope to avoid being consigned to the category of calumniators of Thomas Paine? Ignorance is but a pitiful plea for such a writer and reviewer, who is presumed to hav had before him ample materials and authorities on the subject of his essay.

Now, although smuggling is generally regarded as a venial offense, yet it certainly becomes a crime when committed by a public servant, especially if he be an officer of the customs or excise. And although it cannot be doubted that many a high official before and since 1774 has been guilty of robbing his government of its customs—among others even "the heaven-born prime minister of England," William Pitt (see Rickman's Life of Paine)—yet if the humble exciseman of Lewes, while in the discharge of his duties under the government, was a smuggler, let it be set down as a most damning blot on his character.

But Dr. Denslow has adduced no proof of the charge, nor has he cited any authority. Already, in a former article (THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 8th), we hav shown that Paine's first dismissal in 1765 was for no dishonesty; and now we will show that there is no evidence that his second dismissal, in 1774, was for smuggling, but on the contrary that his moral character suffered no detriment thereby.

The earliest biographer of Paine was an anonymous enemy who styled himself "Francis Oldys, A. M., of the University of Philadelphia." His book was published in London, 1791, and reached a fifth edition in 1792. It was manifestly written to counteract the tremendous influence of Paine's writings in England. It is a libel from beginning to end. The author calls Paine "a nonsensical scribbler, entitled to no literary fame." Concerning the first dismissal, this is what Oldys says:

"Whether, while he thus walked at Grantham or rode as an exciseman at Alford, his practices had been misrepresented by malice, or his dishonesty had been detected by watchfulness, tradition has not told us; but it is certain that he was dismissed from his office, August, 1765."

This is only a malicious insinuation that he might hav been guilty of malpractice; but in Paine's petition for restoration, July 3, 1766, he says, "No complaint of the least dishonesty or intemperance ever appeared against me;" and he was very soon after restored.

And now in regard to his second dismissal Oldys says:

"Troubles seldom come alone. He had long been known at Lewes as an officer inattentiv if not unfaithful. He had sometimes condescended for the purpose of concealment to drink a bottle with the examiner. But the eagle eyes of the excise were not to be blinded by bottles. With the watchfulness, jealousy, and acuteness which make the excise the cleanest collector at the smallest rate, his superiors had for some time beheld him dealing as a grocer in excisable articles, as a grinder of snuff buying smuggled tobacco, at others conniving in order to conceal himself. He was therefore dismissed from the excise after a dozen years' service, in April 1774. He petitioned for restoration, but such was his notoriousness that his patron was unable to protect him."

To support this general accusation all the evidence that Oldys is able to produce is the following, which he says Paine wrote to a superior officer, dated Lewes, March 24, 177

"Dear Sir: I hav requested Mr. Scott to put ye 3d and 4th rd books for 74 under examination, for as I was in London most of last winter I hav no others which hav any business in them. Request the favor (if not inconvenient) to inquire and inform me when they are ordered—and if you can find out the examiner, desire you will drink a bottle or two of wine with him. I should like the character to go in as fair as it can."

Comment on such abortiv evidence is hardly necessary. Every subordinate officer knows that it is well to court the favor of his superior, especially when that superior has power to cause his removal, even on trivial or trumped-up charges.

But let us see who and what was the Mr. Scott above referred to, and first let him be judged by the testimony of Oldys himself, who says:

"Neither bankruptcy, nor dismissal from office, nor separation from his wife, weakened our author's interest with the late George Lewis Scott [died 1780] who had been appointed a commissioner of excise in 1758, and who having been attracted by the case of excise men [written by Paine in 1772] was afterwards captivated by the softness of his manner which concealed the harshness of his spirit. When his patrons whose literature is remembered, while his benevolence is forgotten, could not for the third time obtain our author's restoration as an officer of excise, he recommended him to that great man, Benjamin Franklin, as a person who could at that epoch be useful in America."

So, then, on Oldys' own confession, one of Paine's superior officers, a gentleman of culture and benevolence, against whom no suspicion is breathed, who had been in office seven years longer than Paine, who knew him well, and became his patron in spite of his "notoriousness" as a smuggler, went and recommended him to Dr. Franklin as a man who could be useful in America; and from that time until Franklin's death we all know that Thomas Paine was his trusted friend. Can any one believe after such an admission, from Oldys himself, that George Lewis Scott, the tutor of Prince George III., the co-editor of "Chamber's Cyclopedia," the adviser of the historian Gibbon, believed that his friend and fellow-officer Paine was guilty of smuggling? Nay, more, is there any evidence that he was even suspected of such a crime?

Even the malignant Cheetham, the British emissary and second biographer of Paine is candid enough to confess that Paine's restoration in 1766 disproves Oldys' assertion that he was dismissed for "scandalous misconduct." And as to the second dismissal this is what Cheetham says:

"In April, 1774, sinking under accumulated misfortunes, the effects of his shop were sold to pay his debts. In the same month, having dealt as a grocer in excisable articles, and being suspected—I know not how justly—of malpractices in the excise, he was a second time dismissed."

Note to the above by Cheetham: "Oldys says that availing himself of his place in the excise he smuggled tobacco for the use of his mill."

So even Cheetham, the convicted libeler, acquits Paine of the charge of "scandalous misconduct" in the first instance, and has not the hardihood to indorse Oldys' further groundless accusation of "malpractices in the excise" as the cause of Paine's second dismissal.

But it is reserved for the cultured Agnostic Van Buren Denslow, L.L.D, the literary editor of the Chicago Times, to sanction the calumny of the lying Oldys, A.M., and to publish abroad that Thomas Paine was twice dismissed from the excise for smuggling. "And thou, too, Brutus!"

League Notes.

I said last week that Gen. Roberts would not sign Green and Ingersoll's "Public Call" if Col. Bundy's name was on the list. I wrote wiser than I knew. Some spirit guided my pen—there isn't a doubt of it. As between Bundy and Roberts I believe in spirits. When I think of them I become a medium at once. Heaven opens and down come the inspiring sylphs, and Ariels, and Pucks. Then the next week my revelations are materialized, verified. and fulfilled. In Mind and Matter appears the "Public Call," all in due form, and the names thereto—that is, some of the names—all but one—appear. The great fighting general turns out his colonel, and puts in himself. The name Bundy is nowhere to be found, but J. M. Roberts closes up the list. I shall admire to see these spirito-militants meet in a Pacific parlor while they cannot on a platform. The name of that hotel will be changed from that hour by common consent. Besides somebody will resign a vice-presidency and heaven will break loose. Now, see if again next month this revelation is justified of his mediumship. If not, I will turn Infidel, and never believe in the immortals any more.

AS TO Mr. Chainey's reply, careful readers will note, under his gloss, confession of all I charged, with the usual palliation, "it is such a little one." As defendant, it is but fair that he shall hav the last say. I hav said my say, and, justified by the facts, I stand by it.

I HAV to announce that the report of the proceedings of the League Congress at Chicago was got ready about Oct. 20th, as promised, but by that time the air became so thick with the smoke of this political campaign we feared our report would be smothered and get very little attention. We are getting out a large edition, and we wish it to hav its full effect. It will be mailed to League officers and subscribers this week. Single copies, 5 cents; 13 for 50 cents; 30 for $1 00; 100 for $3.00, all prepaid. Every League ought to send for at least 100 copies, as some Leagues hav already done. It is an important document to circulate, and the election once over, Liberal activity will begin.

201 East 71st st., N. Y. T. C. LELAND.

At Chicago.

Will the young man who met and exchanged cards with Mr. Julius Reichhelm at Chicago at the late Liberal League Congress please send his name and address to Mr. Reichhelm, 112 Garden street, Hoboken, N. J, who very much regrets that he has lost the card given at that time?

Science of Life.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Reading your bold, aggressiv paper interests me to enter into the discussion of the "Science of Life" in its columns. To converse with your readers is no common privilege, for they hav cast off domination and are seeking truth.

Under the guardianship of freedom unlimited opportunity is offered for growth of character and broader comprehension, which is the ultimate fruit of all effort. Verily, "the world moves," as those who hav watched the progress of thought realize as they compare the present with the near past. To liv to-day is grand; to liv a little way on will be glorious.

The authority of the church and the divine right of kings to rule is being so seriously questioned that the fabric of tyranny is crumbling, and it becomes our privilege to rescue the good of the past from the rubbish, and incorporate it with the new into a more intellectual model. Evidence of fact, and not the label "sacred things" is what commands respect. Harmony with natural law, and respect for human nature are the standard proofs of right and wrong by which science, that great factor of civilization, estimates. That man is not a blunder, but that the production of a natural character through the inspiration of his intellectual being is an assured result if left free to the forces ever activ, and that he may become endowed with all the attributes claimed for deity, is the central idea which should mark the matter-of-fact religion. Also that a supernatural God is false and that a natural God is free.

This brings us to the question, Is there a principle in nature or mind and will that molds, sustains, and vitalizes—that our fathers called God—or is it a myth, and is man of that substance, and will his life continue?

The discussion of the question whether all is material, seems useless, as all the souls hav been deemed powerful, which necessitates substance. So all gods hav been material.

That there is a potent principle in the universe that designs is clear to my mind, although not so readily explained as the substances and forces that are more crude and less potent. The eye is the critic in our organism, and as it cannot see the essence of the principle we call God, it does not giv us the unhesitating testimony in regard to it that it does in things more dense.

We recognize order in all things. We comprehend the beauty and vastness of the universe, parts of which we can take in pieces, analyze, and put together again; but our credulity has been so imposed upon that we question the existence of the sublime force of design, whose material qualities we cannot comprehend.

It seems to me that a want of full comprehension is no reason why we should ignore a demonstrated force. Why should we not giv the same weight to the testimony of experience in this as other matters? One person has talent to detect fine qualities of color, another music, and still another delves into the unexplored realm of chemistry and enlightens us with discovery, and we listen and examin with candor the result of their research. The difference of perception is apparent, and why should we doubt that the application or distinctiv talents of one mind may discover more clearly than another the facts of spirituality?

There are those who know as positivly that their intellects are enlightened by the reception of ideas through the intellectual sense as the student of mathematics does that he reaches a result through calculation.

We all know that light is and that it always has been; but it is within a short time that its chemical qualities hav been in a measure comprehended. The inquirer in that branch of natural science has met at the outset the fact that much darkness existed in the mind in regard to this purely light subject. Finer tests hav been devised, more acute vision trained by constant exercise, until more knowledge has been gained upon this ocular science. So also with electricity. During all the ages past man has seen the flash, felt the shock, and heard the noise of the electric explosion that has produced equilibrium in the atmosphere; but it is within our own century that it has become partially comprehended. Our knowledge is still imperfect; but we can estimate its density and calculate its force in ohms as definitly as we can heat in degrees by the thermometer. Our knowledge of it makes it obedient to our touch and sensitiv to our wish. Little did our fathers know that the lightning that flashed in the clouds was within them, the messenger of mind and executor of will—the will of the real man whose home was the brain, and that every movement and feeling was transmitted by it. Little did they think it the sublimated essence of physical life, and that at its touch inert atoms moved, and that without it was decay. On account of its not being seen, except in its agitation, they could not comprehend its omnipresence, vitalizing force, enlightening qualities, and that it was the central force around which all the universe gathers and by which the whole and individual parts revolve and the pivot upon which they all depend. Once it was thought to be made for the occasion. Now we know that it is, and that it is the active agent in universal force. Mind, that king of the universe, controls it, however. Ignorance trembled in its presence. Knowledge shakes hands with it and seeks a more intimate acquaintance.

That the demonstration of this more refined force or principle of mind is more clear in what it does than those of light and electricity is a fact, and also, that in all that is is infinit design beyond dispute, and infinit control beyond resistance. Electricity acts under control and conditions, but that principle which controls it makes conditions not only in the vast arrangement of the solar system, but in the minute creations only revealed by the microscope. The tree taking root in the solid earth is lifted by its growth into more ethereal condition, its branches reach forth and develop bough and leaf, and through the leaf is gathered from the air, not the earth, that which through regular process consolidates into fruit with all exactness of quality and flavor. We say this is in obedience to law; so it is, but there is design in the law and condition outside the crude elements we comprehend as activ in the process, so may we trace the same principle in the floral kingdom. The plant lifts its head from its earth-womb, and while it retains its hold upon its mother elements it develops its pistil and gathers from the atmosphere the most refined saccharine matter known in chemistry, also fragrance and beauty from the absorption of light. So in every natural development is evidence of perfection, order, and design. No element known in chemistry, from the most crude to electricity has the qualities of design or power of action except by the first arrangement of conditions. They are acted upon and obedient to superior force. This force is not found except in intellects so far as we know, hence the logical conclusion that it inheres there. The intellect of men possesses all the qualities manifested in what we call God identical in quality, but limited in scope. The universal soul is centralized and embodied under conditions of design. The analogy of the plant seems to me the illustration of the organization of the human mind. The brain is the blossom of the human organism, and if man is in his highest nature of the essence of the infinit, will he continue his individual existence or be absorbed into the original element? Every circumstance indicates the probable fact that individuality will continue. The multitude of plants in the solar system of one common nature and origin emanating from one common source, vitalized by the same forces permeated with their generating elements, still showing no evidence of probable return, is an analogy worth consideration. That all things teach the same facts is undeniable and that the universal desire to continue life is a prophecy that it will be so, is sustained by the facts that no human desire, so far as we know, is beyond realization, and that it is revealed in the intellectual sense is proof most positiv with those of spiritual expression and perception that we shall liv hereafter. With me the knowledge that all that I can comprehend is designed for the best is assurance satisfactory that that which is best will be. PRINCIPIA.

The Field of Liberalism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Science is demonstrated and systematized. Its truths can only be reached by experiment, painstaking investigation, doubting, and fearless and unbiased exchange of views. Science embraces all human knowledge. The most eminent scientists see that the limits of astronomy, geology, biology, or any other special science are not clearly defined; but all branches of science are blended in one great science of nature, as a whole. The unity of all truth is established. The importance of each and every fact in nature in assisting to form a more truthful estimate of the universe and our own relativ standing, as a part of it cannot be doubted.

Men throw off ancient superstitions and accept newer and better opinions, and from time to time more rational and enlightened customs, only as they make progress in their knowledge of nature, and only as this increased knowledge develops the brain capacity in the individual to a broader conception of things. This gain, with its new starting point for further advance, is transmitted to posterity through the laws of inheritance. We cannot, then, overestimate the importance of each fact, each branch of knowledge, for it is a necessary part of a great whole, and without it that great universal whole would be incomplete, and of course less comprehensible.

What has all this to do with the demands of Liberalism? Very much. Any act that in the least curtails or limits knowledge tends to interfere with the spread of Liberal ideas, for the highest Liberalism can only be reached by minds disciplined to the broadest comprehension of everything knowable. This ideal enlightenment may never be reached. The earth itself may reach its highest development and pass into its decline too soon for such a consummation, for mortals hav their time of growth, maturity, decay, and death as well as nations and men. We do our whole duty when we strive conscientiously to reach the highest plane. We fail to do our whole duty when we set our heels on the smallest budding truth, the puniest fact, or when we activly or passivly retard that free interchange of ideas that is necessary to utilize each and every step in advance. If the least is hurt the greatest suffers.

If any Liberal organization expects to accomplish much good, its platform must be broad enough for every struggling truth. It must not decide in doubtful cases just what is right and what may be wrong, but support free and full discussion. Any newly discovered truth is unpopular, and generally its discoverer is in a minority of one. If the majority assume to determin what is true in every case and suppress unpopular and erroneous opinions then an end of all progress is reached. In a land of perfect liberty any one has a right to advocate erroneous views without proscription.

Free discussion implies free speech, a free press, and a free circulation of printed matter through the mails; that is, erroneous views should hav as free a chance to go unmolested through the mails as those deemed orthodox. There should be no espionage nor censorship. All mail matter should be sacred from official search. So dangerous a power should not be delegated to any man or body of men on any pretext. Censorship, especially when exercised by appointed officers, who, like United States postal officials, are remote from popular correction and influence, is unwise, unsafe, and unnecessary. The state authorities should be left to deal with questionable matter. A thorough education of every adult in anatomy and physiology would destroy the occupation of the venders of immoral literature for the morbid curiosity on which it thrives would die a natural death. In the meantime the regular state authorities ought to get along without church influence and supervision.

Instead of making the Liberal platform narrower, make it as broad as the sphere of intellectual activity. Make it cover the whole domain of the knowable. Make it something more than a string of generalities. Let Liberals in name become Liberals in fact, then they will not fly off in a tangent as soon as one practical reform is attempted.

Ask the first Christian you come to if he is in favor of the total separation of church and state, and he will answer, "Oh, yes, they are separated now." All the men and all the candidates, and all the parties are ready to say that. All that is necessary to do is to read party platforms to find that Protestants are willing that Catholics should hav no appropriations made for their parochial schools. Yet this bait catches some old Liberals. Ask for the repeal of a law that enables a Christian organization to retard the progress of free discussion, and then comes a deluge of abuse. Let the Liberal editor exercise the freedom of discussion we are presumed to enjoy, and a ruinous prosecution is liable to be followed by imprisonment. Liberals are socially and politically proscribed, are taxed to sustain sectarian institutions and churches; are compelled to observe Sabbath laws, yet all this, together with actual imprisonment, is not at all inconsistent with the Christian standard of perfect religious liberty.

With a general platform as broad as the globe, and a disposition on the part of Liberals to show a united and unbroken front, in meeting every special assault on any part of the line, our influence and power for good would be very great. Some of us, many of us, do not approve of some things that are written, but every true Liberal must see that the only safe way for us men who all hav hobbies, is to stand together in defense of the right of others to advocate opinions that may not meet our approval. If we expect to stop the threatened flood of persecution we must strengthen the first dam. And its foundations must be broad, not narrow. After abandoning all our hard ammunition in our retreat before a malicious, untruthful, and unrelenting foe, after using taffy and tufts of grass, we may find that we hav only succeeded in leaving ourselvs "naked to our enemies."

Let us not forsake the least struggling truth. Let us sustain the free discussion without which truth is not demonstrable. A big, broad Liberal has no business on a shaky, narrow platform. The narrow platform may, but I doubt that, gain the tacit support of a few moderate Christians. On the other hand, the broad platform will challenge the earnest approval of the pioneers, at every point along the long lines of the army of progress. It is better for the organization, and better for the great cause that is above and beyond all organizations. All seekers for the truth are interested, for the same Christian power that aims a blow at Bennett because of his Freethought publications, misrepresents and sneers at Ingersoll, scoffs at and ostracies the Darwins, Haeckels, Huxleys, and Tyndalls, whose views they dare not attempt to controvert in the arena of free discussion.

Our friends who think to silence the enemy, or win recruits from their ranks, by unloading a principle that gave rise to a false charge of filth, will themselvs, and any organization they may form, still be just as obnoxious as ever to the churches, the enemies of all progress. The dealer in the filthiest literature would be forgiven a thousand times when the true believer in the hypothesis of evolution, or the Ingersollian Agnostic would never be forgiven at all. There are myriads of ravenous wolves on the track of our friends, and they cannot hope to make their escape by going through the motions of throwing out a little stinking meat when the wolves scent a warm, living, healthy meal. The hue and cry cannot be escaped. We must make a stand and whip the whole pack.

Our united forces must stand in one immovable phalanx. The conflict is irrepressible. Superstition will inflict many wounds in its death throes, but is destined to eventually succumb to the inevitable. The struggle will go on with the varying fortunes of all human affairs until the final triumph of the right. GEORGE W. MOREHOUSE.

Confusion Worse Confounded.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: One word corrected in our former communication and we will try to relieve ourselvs from your pungent criticism: "We speak of the spirit of man; sometimes we say soul, yet no one has denied either." "Denied" is not ours, but defined. It should read, No one has defined either. Touching sheer speculation, it seems to hav captured your thinker.

You say that it is not sheer speculation to say that both the producer and the result produced are material, all that matter is or does is material; thus eyesight, hearing, smelling, taste, feeling, thinking are material. Far from it, my dear sir, in the sense we designed; we defined our meaning by the term concrete. The whole must hinge upon fact, not simply upon the definition certain linguists giv it.

To make the aroma of the rose, or the odor from the body of an African, material, if not sheer speculation, is at best Teedism. It may satisfy some minds to tell them the fragrance of the rose and odor from the African are particles broken off from the substance, hence material. Suppose we apply this theory in a fox chase. The hounds, twenty-four in number, giving chase to the fox, track by the particles broken off from the fox. Bosh! after a twenty-four hour's chase, giving each hound a smell, the fox, when taken, would not be a fox, but a shadow? Your theory cannot be proved any more than you can prove the shadow of a man to be the real man.

The light of the sun as material was a theory of Newton's. He held that the light and heat of the sun consisted of certain particles emanating from that body and darted out into space like arrows from a bow. This is called the emission theory; but philosophers since Newton think they see deeper into nature than he did.

Hence the wave theory. This theory presents the light of the sun and heat in a succession of waves or vibrations in an extremely attenuated luminiferous ether, analogous to those which convey sound to the ear, so that you are to understand that light and color are impressed upon the organs of sight by vibrations, just as different notes of music are impressed upon the organs of hearing. No improvement upon Newton's theory.

Again you say, Did Hines ever see a musical instrument not formed of matter? We never claimed to hav so seen.

Again you say, Mr. Hines evidently thinks matter cannot produce thought. If he will tell us what else does or can produce thought, we will be obliged to him. We never claimed that anything but an organized brain produces thought, and for Mr. Bennett to lug in his elephant to prove anything, is but speculation, if not buncombe.

Again you say, Mr. Hines admits that cosmos was never created by a God. Has he the slightest proof that it was ever created by any other sort of God? Will he please giv a description of his kind of God?

In answer, we say that we hav never seen or conversed with one of those aerial gentlemen, therefore are unable to describe. It may be he is material; if so, he is the shadow kind.

As to cosmos having been created is something I don't profess to know. To my mind, it would be sheer speculation to say that it was created. However, touching design in nature, it seems not to be sheer speculation. Mr. Bennett, though we hav never seen the man, shows design; the organized brain shows design. The sexes show design, as well as the law of propagation. The eye and ear show design, your opinion of sun-made eyes to the contrary notwithstanding. The whole universe shows design. The motion of the heavenly bodies shows design. Without design they must fall into one general confused mass at the bottom, could bottom be reached.

You say there is adaptation in nature. Adaptation is design; it could be nothing else. You seem desirous to hav us say that cosmos was created by a God from nothing. We shall not say it. Something cannot be a result from nothing.

To my inquiry, "Does cosmos possess a brain?" you answer, "Yes, millions of them." This, Mr. Bennett, is an evasiv answer. I again put the question, Is there no intelligence in nature? How, my dear sir, could come all those grand results without intelligence?

I said, "Spirit has never been defined." The wild Indian believed in a great spirit, and himself the lesser; and he (the Indian) is just as well informed upon this subject as Mr. Bennett or Mr. Hines, or theologians.

Until spirit-soul can be defined, I am one of the despised who believe that when man is dead he is just as dead as a horse, cow, or any other animal, that death is an eternal sweet rest. It was Benjamin Franklin, I believe, who said, "What hav I done to inherit eternal life?" I repeat the sentence, What hav I done to inherit eternal life?

In this I am not fighting Spiritualism. I love Spiritualists, for they are not craven; they are a great improvement upon old stale orthodoxy. Respectfully and fraternally,

Oak Ridge, Mo. M. J. HINES.

P. S.—I am not entirely ignorant of the theory of the materiality of the gases composed in the earth's crust. The body of man is claimed by theologians to be composed of earth. Chemistry informs us that but a small particle of the human body is earth.

What I am driving at is the "spirit of things." Man is claimed to be a spirit and dwells in the supposed tenement of clay (the body). The heart they claim to be the seat of moral goodness, religion, hence the theologian endeavors to reach the heart as though the spirit dwelt there. To my mind, the heart is a pump with two valves, force and suction; the one forces the blood through the system, the other brings it back, life being the motiv power, the heart being just as much the abode of the spirit, if any one knows what it is, as the great toe.

If we hav a soul or spirit it livs in the brain, and, to my mind, dies with the body. Now I desire you to define this spirit. Spiritualists claim that through certain forces or, means at hand, they are enabled to materialize the spirit, that is to say, giv it solidity, make it material, place it upon a scale and weigh it, then dissolve it back to nothing. When this is successfully done without gammon, then I will admit the fragrance of the rose to be material; not before.

M. J. H.

Dr. Clark.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Dr. A. J. Clark, the very able and popular lecturer, of Indianapolis, Ind., having been on a business tour through the northwest, the principal object of which was to advance the cause of mental liberty—and a noble worker he proves to be—paid our city a brief visit on Sunday last. His sudden appearance in our midst scarcely allowed us sufficient time to do him justice for honoring us with a call. As usual, the Doctor was ready to drop a shell among our orthodox friends, and to get at them he was announced to lecture in the evening, subject, "Church History, or Religious intolerance." The lecture was listened to with marked attention and repeatedly applauded by the fair-sized and intelligent audience who were so fortunate as to embrace the opportunity of hearing him. Yours respectfully,

Elgin, Ill., Oct. 25, 1880. JAS. METCALF.

Dr. J. R. Baker, of Keithsburg, Ill.

Reader, hav you never heard Dr. Baker? If you never had that privilege you will thank me for suggesting to you that you send for him to deliver a course of his Liberal lectures in your neighborhood. He ought to be constantly employed. I hav been with him on the electioneering stump. He is a rousing political orator, and I am satisfied that he will make the orthodox quake and the Freethought friends feel happy. He is a frank, outspoken gentleman, splendid company. Such workers should be in the field battling for mental freedom every hour. Address him at Keithsburg, Ill. We need a host of just such lecturers as Dr. Baker, full of common sense and love for our common humanity. W. F. JAMIESON.

Oct. 27, 1880.

Personal.

Mrs. H. S. Lake has removed from Clinton, Iowa, to Chicago, where she has been lecturing every Sunday since the National Liberal League Congress. Owing to her exertions there an auxiliary League has been formed, which is in a thriving condition. She desires to make engagements to lecture in Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, and Michigan. Address her at 36 Ogden avenue, Chicago, Illinois.

W. F. JAMIESON will receive calls for lectures for the month of December, having postponed his trip to Nebraska until later in the season. Address him Mazeppa, Minn.

A HINDOO will never say anything so vulgar as that a man killed himself by drowning or cutting his throat. He simply says he allowed his life to depart by water, or the knife, or poison.

do not consider myself half so great a man as he was. I found a good road already made and he had to make one for himself, or his men did for him. But I did not have half the reason for wishing to get over that he had, and that may make a little difference in drawing a comparison between us. And again, he caused thousands of persons to be killed after he crossed, while I intend nothing of the kind, which again may possibly be something in my favor. No, though Napoleon and myself crossed the Alps in the same place and only seventy-five or eighty years apart in time, I will make no pretensions of equal ability with him, for he was twice made a prisoner, while I have been a prisoner but once. Oh yes, he was far the greater man.

First of all, let me give you some description of a diligence. It is a good deal like our old stages which used to traverse New York and Pennsylvania fifty years ago, only more so. They are heavy and strong and are differently constructed from our old style coaches. There may be said to be five departments or grades to a diligence. The driver's seat is at the top; two persons can occupy the seat with him. Under the seat is a snug inclosure with doors and windows, roomy for two persons, but crowded for three; next in center between the fore and hind wheels in the main body of the coach is an apartment with two seats, one facing forward and one backward. This compartment will hold four rather comfortably and six decidedly uncomfortably. Then in rear of this division, and half a story higher and over the hind wheels, is another seat with a top that may be tightly closed or thrown back at pleasure. Between this seat and the driver's and over the body of the coach below, with a railing around it, is the main deck of the vehicle, where the baggage is stowed away, and where the luckless passengers who can find no other seat may also stow themselves away and let their legs hang over so long as there is room enough left for them to hang in. I was booked for an inside seat, but it is not the most favorable for seeing the exquisitely grand scenery all the way through the pass, so I arranged by pantomime with the conductor, for there is such a functionary who accompanies every diligence, for an outside seat. He was a very clever conductor, and as we had not a full load, and there was a seat in the rear by the side of himself, I mounted there with him. The extra price for an outside seat is nine francs, but as the outside seats were not taken he let me have one for what I pleased to give, and that was two francs and a half. But he was very kind to me and took off his heavy overcoat and wrapped it around me. It was chilly, quite chilly, and though I had my overcoat on I was still cold. A young German couple, whether married or not I cannot say, occupied the front compartment; an Italian man and wife, who are married, and a friend, with myself made up the quota for the larger compartment; two way passengers occupied the deck; one sat with the driver, and thus we were disposed, the conductor sitting alone in the rear. None spoke English except the young German, who could say a few words. Our team consisted of five good horses, three in lead and two at the wheel. Upon starting we immediately commenced the ascent of the Alps in good earnest. The whips seem to have a large share of the work to do in getting along here, and the way the drivers crack them is a caution to young Chinaman.

We steadily, that cold Sunday morning, climbed our weary way up the Alps, and as we rose and the light prevailed we could see the valley below us and the bleak rock-topped mountains around us, and the snow-capped summits at a greater distance. Steadily and constantly we climbed hour after hour. The grade of the road is easy, not as steep as I have seen up-hill roads in America, but up, up, constantly up, mile after mile. When we got cold and tired we got out and footed it a mile or two and viewed with perfect awe the grand scenery all around us. The road is very far from being in a straightforward course; it rather winds in a serpentine "circumbendibus" sort of way, much like a very extended letter S, only more so. We often went a good long way in one direction and then turned and went almost directly back in a contrary direction to gain a little way forward, so that sometimes we were not more than a stone's throw from the point where we had been half an hour before, and when we had been from Brigue fully three hours we were not probably more than two miles from it in an air-line, only a good deal higher.

In America our mountains are in one continuous chain, with occasional variations in the altitude of the ranges. In Switzerland it is not so. There seems in the Alpine country to be a great amount of individuality and disconnectedess among the numerous members of Alpine family, especially the upper portions, much as though the great hand of nature had been full of mountains, and had cast them pell-mell into Switzerland, and that they had all lighted little end up, and though their basis being in a plastic state had run together the apexes had persistently preserved their independence and separation. We sometimes crossed from one of these cones to the other when they came close together, and wound our way on up and up, slowly but steadily and continuously.

But oh, the grandeur of the scene. I fear I cannot adequately make you realize it. Those Alpine cones and domes shoot up so steeply and so high! Oh, they are grand beyond conception! I looked back upon the valley we had left, and saw the little villages seemingly struggling for existence in that narrow little world, and at the little farms and homes upon the mountain sides, with here and there a church spire showing that religion had its place in the minds of those rugged mountaineers. As we steadily climbed up I noticed the gradual change in the character of the vegetation. We left in the valley below the vineyard, the potato field, the beets, and very little patches of feeble-looking Indian corn, but as we got up into the higher region those gradually one after the other seemed to be left behind. The corn and the vine were left behind, but the potatoes and the turnips were yet seen; but by and by we saw the potatoes no more. Little but grass could be seen in those highland little farms. At first the usual forest trees seemed to flourish, but they gradually dropped behind, and we only saw pines, firs, with stunted mountain birches, and these at last become extremely scarce and small, the pines were passed, and nothing in the way of trees but the alpine firs were to be seen. They grew invariably where earth enough remained on the rocks to cover their roots, but we got so high that those hardy firs even could hardly exist. There is a limit even for the firs, and we reached it. We were where there was nought but grass and a sort of growth which I hardly know whether to call a shrub or a moss, about eight or ten inches high, and that was abundant.

It is almost astonishing how the hardy Swiss climb up those steep mountains and make homes where it seems almost impossible for a goat to keep from tumbling down the mountain side. Wherever half an acre can be found not steeper than the roof of a house, where a human being can keep from sliding off, there may be seen an humble Swiss cottage and a little green grass plot, where the sheep and the goats feed together. The goats can even live where grass will scarcely grow. The goat will live on a very little, and the Swiss mountaineers will live on the goat, and thus they seem to keep up a kind of community system among themselves—the mountaineers and the goats. The goat cannot climb a tree, but he will climb a rock where men who can climb a tree dare not go.

Yes, I saw little houses on these Alpine hights that I could not have believed could be habitable, and the people, for I met several of them, looked healthy and happy. It may be a romantic sort of life, but it must be monotonous and prosy. I am very sure it would not suit me. It is indeed a mystery how those mountain-side farmers manage to stay on their places. It many times looked as though they, and their children, and even their cattle, must inevitably fall off and dash themselves to pieces on the rocks away below, unless secured by ropes. I wondered how they could ever have erected their little huts in such inaccessible places, and how they even could get there. I think they cannot be much troubled with callers or tramps. It is decidedly an isolated mode of life that would not suit those of social tastes. How often I looked across on to the different peaks, and away up, up where the eagles seemingly would not dare to fly, there, living on little patches of almost perpendicular, sterile land were those hardy, brave, indefatigable Swiss mountaineers, with simply half an acre of grass pasture, and which probably no plow had ever touched. Verily, verily, some people in the world have no idea how other people manage to live.

When we had been out about two and a half hours we stopped at a stone refuge house and changed horses, and I assure you the five horses we started with were sweating freely and looking as though they were completely exhausted. We changed driver with the horses. Each driver remains with his team. We changed horses seven times during the sixteen hours' ride, and with every new relay of horses we had a new driver, and every one delighted to see how loudly he could make his mammoth whip resound among those Alpine peaks. They are, however, a good-natured, happy set of men, as indeed are all the mountaineers.

The refuge houses are every three or four miles apart over the mountain; and though they look cheerless and lonely now, I doubt not they look cheerful to the storm-surrounded traveler in the depth of winter, for which purpose they were erected and why they are called refuge houses. I think we passed nine of them, and all are numbered. Besides these there is a hotel now and then on the road; and the people we met with, even away up near the summit, looked as though they thought they had the happiest homes in the world.

Wine is to be had in the refuge houses, as well as at the hotels; and I noticed that the conductor and the driver were good patrons of those places. I even found myself not slow to conform to the rules of the country, and I tried a glass of wine with my fellow-sojourners and voyagers.

I have not fully described the steepness of those mountain sides. We passed many places where it was quite enough to make one's head swim to look down into the abyss beneath us for hundreds of feet, where, if the diligence, by any mishap, had gone over the brink, we must have been dashed to pieces at the bottom of the ravine away below. It was not unusual that we were on a level with the tops of tall fir-trees or spruces but a short distance from the road whose bodies were nearly a hundred feet in hight. The road, however, is quite safe. It is broad enough for two carriages to pass easily, and in all dangerous places stone posts are firmly set every eight or ten feet, so that it would be difficult for the diligence to get over the brink of the precipice. There are some places at which, if it did go over, it might fall one hundred feet before striking the earth.

I noticed that in those tall Alpine cones the strata of the rocks were vertical, while in some of the more obtuse mountains they were sometimes horizontal, or but partially dipped. This shows what huge changes some time or other in the long past must have taken place in those Alpine regions. If it was by upheavals, as many believe, how powerful and vast it must have been to have forced those Alpine cones thousands, yes, tens of thousands, of feet, so that the rocks, instead of being horizontal, as all rocks once were, to a perfectly vertical or perpendicular position! If, on the other hand, those mountains were caused by the surrounding portions of the globe contracting and settling away from them, as others again believe, while for some sufficient reason they could not settle, the change was not, perhaps, sudden, but no less wonderful and grand in its results. When looking upon those almost countless number of Alpine cones and domes my mind was filled with wonder at the grandeur and sublimity of old nature and the mighty works she has performed. Few sights and few meditations are better calculated to excite awe for the grand and the majestic in the universe.

I ought to speak of the many beautiful waterfalls we passed, where good-sized streams leaped thirty, forty, fifty, and nearly one hundred feet, and the more numerous beautiful cascades, where the vigorous streams danced from rock to rock and from declivity to declivity, laughing and sporting as they seemed to be on their journey to the deep valley away below. Sometimes the white threads of those streams could be seen trickling and spreading down the rocky steeps hundreds of feet together. In many places the mountains or piles of rocks rose almost perpendicularly to an altitude above the roadway, which I estimated at three and four and five hundred feet. In other cases, where the sides were less abrupt and loose earth had remained for the firs and pines to grow, I often looked up and saw where the hardy mountaineers had climbed up and cut the trees and let them slide down with velocity to the roadway below.

As we climbed on our weary way we nearly left the world of vegetation behind us and came to the region of perpetual snow. Some of the high elevations looked white from recent snow storms, and other banks and deep bodies of snow doubtless have been summered over for hundreds of times. At length we reached the summit of a pass marked by a cross with a little god upon it being crucified, much as the same thing was done in Asiatic countries three thousand years ago. It is singular how the religionists of the present day keep up the ideas and follow the customs of the pagan religionists of thousands of years ago. We were now six thousand feet above the level of the sea and within half a mile at the farthest of where, in sheltered localities, were snow banks which were there one hundred years ago. With this fact before me I could not help thinking of the more than improbable story of the landing of Noah's ark on the mountain of Ararat, which is seventeen thousand feet in highth. If perpetual snow is found on the Alps, seven thousand feet above the sea level, how could the menagerie of Noah, which had been month after month on the Dr. Tanner system of fasting, even if all the rest of the impossible story of the flood were true, possibly live or find food at an altitude of seventeen thousand feet, and when even the valleys had not had time to produce a new vegetation? Let those believe the flood story who can. I cannot believe it if I go to hell for it, and there is no use in my trying.

We passed through in course of the day several tunnels in the rock and several places where heavy stone arches had been built over the road, the outer wall being three to four feet thick and the arch over head very strong. This is to prevent the danger of avalanches or heavy bodies of snow in certain localities when they slide down the mountain sides, and thus shoot the snow over the roadway, protecting life and preventing the passage from being filled.

Soon after we began to descend we came to a hospice, which I interpret to mean a convent of religious ninnies who imagine they are doing God great service and pleasing him highly by passing their lives in that inhospitable place. The building is of stone, more than one hundred feet long and three stories in hight. How many the inmates number I could not learn, nor did I see any of them though the diligence stopped there some ten minutes to exchange mail, etc. It being Sunday, possibly the devotees were all at prayers, for none of them came to the windows. The conductor was very communicative in telling me all about them, but unfortunately I could not understand a word. Even at that hight there were some fields of grass, and cattle and sheep feeding in them, though the snow banks were easily within rifle shot. Near these we saw more crucifixes and more gods being crucified. In our descent of a mile or so we came to the rugged mountain valley of Simplon, where we stopped to change horses again and to take some dinner, for here in this upper world there is a little Alpine village where people live and furnish eatables to travelers who journey that way.

A mountain damsel presided in the dining-room of the stone hotel with stone stairs and stone floors, and as soon as we could by exercise get warm enough to handle knife and fork we were ready for business. I took a dish of hot soup and some poulet, pronounced pullay (chicken), some pommes de terre (potatoes), with bread and butter, which made a good meal, and for which the fair damsel only demanded the moderate price of two francs and a half. Thus fortified, I could descend the mountain with perfect contentment with myself and good will toward all mankind. We were soon on the road again, and as it is perfectly smooth the horses kept up a regular trot and we made far better headway than in the ascent on the other side. The descent was not unlike the ascent in the topography of the country save that the rocks were still more precipitous, and chances for little dwelling-places for the mountaineers more scarce. The last pile of rocks often seemed to stand almost perpendicular, and to tower up, up, up many hundreds of feet with barely a chance for a roadway between the gorges and glens. It is a grand, wild country indeed. The scenery became grander and wilder at every turn. The rocks seemed to have been rent asunder for the express purpose of giving a passage to the mountain stream, which leapt from rock to rock in its descent southward and to allow a roadway for the French army and ourselves to get through. I more than once marveled how Napoleon and his engineers were ever able to make a roadway through such a series of defiles, gulches, ravines, gorges, and glens. Wonderful are the winding tunnels which commence after passing the famous gorge of Gondo, said to be the wildest and grandest in the Alps. These gigantic tunnels are hewn out of the solid rock when to do so was less labor and expense than to cart all the rock away, and one of which required one hundred men eighteen months to excavate, working by turns day and night in gangs. As we emerged from the tunnels a scene of stupendous majesty met the eyes. Hissing and roaring, the boiling waters of the Frassinone dash over the rocks above into the fearful gorge below. On either side rise rocks more than two thousand feet in hight, the whole forming a picture of the grandest and most terrific sublimity. More cascades, more ravines, more lofty crags, and Gondo, the last Swiss village, was reached. Here were lads of Italian birth, with grapes and figs fresh from the trees, which gave us the assurance that however wild the scenery was around us, we were nevertheless nearing the land of summer and delicious fruits. I indulged in a dozen or more of the figs, they being the first I had ever eaten in their natural state, and also some grapes, but I made the mistake of eating the figs first, they being so sweet as to cause the grapes by contrast to be sour. We soon after came to a large round stone post by the roadside on which was cut in large letters the word Italia. When that was passed I knew that we had passed into Italy, though the crags and mountains of rock still surrounded us, and I again and again marveled how Napoleon and his army could have made the descent without the benefit of the tunnels and the splendid roadway which now exist. We soon passed crucifixes and shrines by the roadside far more frequently than among the Swiss. We soon came to Isella, the first Italian town, and here our baggage had to undergo official examination, and it was more thorough than any I had before witnessed, but nothing contraband was found, and all were permitted to pass.

The women who gathered around wore a different kind of head-dress, and the soldiers in attendance had a different uniform, which impressed upon my mind that I was now in the domain of King Humbert I. Though mountains and rocks still continued for miles, the air and the scenery gradually changed and softened; we felt that we had left the region of almost perpetual winter, and were approaching the land of perpetual summer, while still down the mountain we steadily rolled. The balmy air, the trellised vines, the patches of Indian corn, told us that we were coming to the summer land indeed.

Before we leave the mountains of Switzerland entirely behind us let me say a word of the buildings in the Alpine region, especially in the country. They are usually stone, and in the mountains often of spruce timbers, hewed or sawed four to six inches square, and these halved or locked together at the corners so as to allow them to come close together and thus make a tight, warm building. Stone, however, is the most common building material, in the better portions plastered over neatly and presenting a comely appearance. The roofs in the valleys are largely of slate. As we climbed the mountains I noticed that the slates were not trimmed regular, but laid on promiscuously as they came from the quarry, making not a pretty roof, though they may answer a very good purpose. In a few instances I noticed roofs of bark laid in shingle fashion; but the usual roofs of the mountain cottages, barns, and sheds are of flat stones over two inches in thickness and three or four courses in depth, thus making a very heavy roof and requiring strong rafter-poles and timbers. With the exception of these roof timbers and the door, the entire buildings, including the floors, are of stone, they usually being but a single story high. Such houses must make grim, cheerless homes, but they are far better than nothing. They are very durable, and not easily burned. When well laid, nothing seems to prevent their lasting hundreds of years. As we come into Italy these stone houses and stone roofs still continue, black and mossy with age, and the most cheerless homes I ever saw. The windows are small, and often with no glass, giving them the appearance of prisons more than cheerful homes. I must say the stone houses of the Italian peasants bespeak less taste and less thrift than do those of the Swiss. Take nearly all the houses of the poor as we descended the mountains and they are of the most uninviting and most uncomfortable character. I could often look through the stone roofs. The walls are not plastered, and everything is of a stony, comfortless appearance. We continued to descend, and evidently came down a greater number of thousands of feet than we climbed from Brigue on the other side; thus we are lower here than there.

A tunnel through the mountain has been begun at Brigue, designed for the railroad and to obviate the travel by diligence; but it will require a tunnel of considerably over ten miles in length, and when it will be completed, and the cars running through it, no man can tell. It will require mints of money and many, many years of constant, patient toil day and night. I do not remember how many miles the Mont Cenis tunnel is, but this Simplon tunnel will be much the larger if ever completed. Mont Cenis is now by far the longest tunnel, and will continue to be until those who are now young will come to be old, and those who are now past the prime of life are sleeping the sleep of death.

We passed in our descent the Val d'Ossola, where the valley still expands, though the domes and high piles of rocks still hovered around us.

We came to the large village of Domo d'Ossola, where we changed horses. We had passed several smaller villages still among the hills of rocks, where, in every case, was a church with a chime of bells in the spire. At more than one of these villages we heard the agreeable chimes on many bells, which could hardly be expected in such small villages with such scanty means or wealth. As we still descended the rocks and domes became of lower altitude and the valley grew broader. The Frassinone, which was only a little rivulet when we began to descend, by the constant accretions which take place all along the miles of its rocky descent, when we got down to the valley had become quite a river, which, from all appearances, must be a powerful stream in the spring seasons, when the snows melt on the mountains. It is, perhaps, some fifteen miles from where it begins to where it empties into the beautiful Lake Maggiore.

Let me repeat, the valley to which we descended shows fertility, but it seems to me it shows less signs of thrift and good agriculture than were so perceptible among the Swiss. Here the vines appear neglected and are choked with grass. The Indian corn is sown broadcast and often thick with grass. There is much good meadow land, but the foolish practice of filling it up with worthless trees like willows and poplars shades the land far too much and draws richness from the soil, besides being much in the way of plowing, mowing, etc. I marveled as we rode along at the absurdity of filling up good, productive land with willows. I fear the Italians lack thrift and energy. Many indications of it strike my observation already. I have already seen too many idlers, too much the appearance of the lazzaroni. I noticed last night as we come along, Sunday though it was, many loads of hay being taken to the barns from the meadows. Probably it is the second crop, for it was short and fine. The teams and drivers amused me. The teams were sometimes a single ox in shafts, sometimes a pair of heifers, sometimes a donkey, and sometimes a pair of donkeys, the size of the load being in proportion to the team, and in nearly all cases the drivers being women. I judge a good share of the farming is done by women, and that it is not of the highest quality. The result, however, showed good sense on their part to get the hay under shelter, for before we reached this town the rain was falling.

We must have ridden nearly fifteen miles on the shore of Lake Maggiore, and a beautiful drive it is. On the shore all along are fine hotels for persons who resort here to pass a few pleasant weeks or months. At one we halted and changed horses for the last time, and there were numerous guests out by the roadside enjoying the view by the lake shore by moonlight and chatting together. I heard two conversing whom I was certain were Americans, and as I had not heard a word of English all day I felt an impulse to speak to them; but Americans even are not all sociable, and I did not venture to speak. We passed on the lake shore extensive granite quarries, which turn out most beautiful stone. I noticed many caps for columns and other architectural work already cut for some stately edifice, and for a mile I saw slabs, posts, etc., laid in the water of the lake along the shore, perhaps to soak and soften so as to cut easier. Probably the water either softens it or at least prevents it from becoming hard. It was from these extensive quarries, as I learn, that the stone for the grand cathedral at Milan was obtained. The stone is shipped in sloops and schooners up and down the lake, and then I hardly know how. From here it can go by rail now, but not when the cathedral was built. I notice that stone is used for a variety of purposes—the posts for the trellises for vines are stone, the fences are flat stones like grave stones set up edge to edge, and the telegraph poles even for fifteen miles back are of stone, being six by ten inches square and fifteen to twenty feet tall. It is my opinion that the major part of them will outlast the oldest inhabitants.

The hotels along the margin of the lake were many of them brilliantly illuminated with Chinese lanterns and other curious lights as we came along; fire rockets and Roman candles were sent up, and wheel-rockets whirled merrily, and bands of music were playing in several places. I concluded all this was that they might have a good, happy time, and did not for a moment suppose that my arrival had anything to do with all the display. Hundreds of Italian couples were walking slowly along the lake shore and I doubted not talking sweet words of love to each other. I left my blessing with them, saying in spirit, "Mortals, be happy while you can, for the future is a sealed mystery of which we can know nothing," and I think they followed my instructions.

When we arrived here at Arona, though it had just begun to rain, music again greeted our ears, and several Sunday night concerts seemed to be in full blast. I was not long coming to the conclusion that the Italians, although the most devout Christians in the world, and the most thoroughly priest-ridden, are nevertheless very fond of music, and believe in having a good, happy time.

I was glad to find that one of the clerks here at the hotel could speak English, and I concluded to tarry over here to-day, to breathe in quietly the Italian air by degrees, to look about this town some, enjoy the beautiful prospect on the lake and across it, and withal catch up with my writing once more. I have passed the day very pleasantly. The steamboat landing is directly before my window. I have seen pleasure seekers depart up the lake and return several times. There are a number of lake steamers to attend to these pleasure excursions. It is all right; let those seek pleasure who can do so legitimately, and bad luck to the hand that is raised to prevent it. The day has been most lovely. The lake has been as still as a mirror, and almost as much a reflector. If we have many days of this kind I don't know but I shall have to conclude that Italy in this respect is a little ahead of America. I can judge better after I have passed ten days in this land of history, of art, of music, of poetry.

This evening several musicians, perhaps of the stolling character, played the harp and other instruments immediately before my window, and I enjoyed it nearly as much as though it had been gotten up expressly for my pleasure, and a small coin or two paid the bill. A while ago, to me, what seemed to be a political meeting appeared to be in full operation within earshot of my window. I could easily mark the intonations of the speaker's voice as he stirred up the enthusiasm and patriotism of his hearers, and their plaudits reminded me of home; but being so wholly unacquainted with their language I could not fully decide whether it was a Garfield meeting or a Hancock meeting, or whether for Weaver and greenbacks.

Some have said to me it is almost unsafe for me to visit Rome yet for a while lest, so unaccustomed as I am, I may take the malarious and deadly aria cattiva which prevails through September, and thus perhaps die. But it is on my programme to go to Rome. I never did take a fever and die, and I can not see why I should now, and as I am not afraid of death, I shall go to Rome. If I die, I will not have to die again, and I will probably rest as quietly on Italian soil as the millions who have gone to rest here. If you hear not from me further, think I am sleeping with the Romans and the dead popes, but I am quite sure you will hear from me again.

Adieu,

D. M. B.

Letter from Europe.—No. 12.

NORTHERN ITALY.

No. 81 Via Vittoria, Rome, Sept. 24, 1880.

Dear Friends in America: Here I am in the "Eternal City" at last. What special claim it has to that very venerable cognomen I cannot tell you, but perhaps it is because it has seen so large a number of years. True it has lived more than three thousand years, but there are cities in Asia older, still more eternal, than this. Possibly it is because this has been considered the residence, par excellence, of the gods, the "eternal ones," that this has been called the "Eternal City." Yes, nearly three thousand years ago it was believed that many gods resided here, when they removed from Olympus in Greece, the principal and greatest of whom was Jupiter, or Jove, "the Thunderer," "the Mighty One," "the Eternal," as the Romans of old fondly called him, Zeus, as the Greeks called him, and Giove, as the Romans of the present day denominate him. Jupiter and his sons, for he had many by his wives, mistresses, and loves—of which he had many—made quite a large family, and here they lived, and flourished, and reigned, and controled the affairs of this world and of heaven, or rather so it was fully believed. Here also long resided his father Saturn, and the citizens of this city nearly three thousand years ago used to build temples for Saturn and Jove to dwell in, and be worshiped in. Yes, here resided, too, Mars, the god of war, Hercules, the god of strength, Mercury, the god of knowledge and literature, Apollo, the god of light and beauty, Juno, the queen of heaven, Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, Venus, the goddess of love, Ceres, the goddess of the earth, Diana, the huntress, and many, many more whose names I need not mention, and which all of you are quite familiar with who have read my late work, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times."

Yes, it is here where they lived and luxuriated many hundred years, and would have continued to do so just as much till this time if the people had continued to believe in them; but it was the same with those old gods and goddesses as it is with all other gods, as soon as the people cease to believe in them they cease to exist. It seems that old Jove and all his companions, though he was fully believed to have created the earth, the sun, and all the worlds, to possess almighty power, and to rule all existent beings and worlds just as he pleased, have nevertheless lost their power, and are even no longer believed to exist. This was because other gods supplanted them. Gods, too, who had no more real existence than they had. It seems that no gods live and rule any longer than their worshipers remain powerful, and are able to subdue and oppress their foes. When the people of a country who worship any particular gods, from a bad course of conduct become weak or disunited so that a nation having other gods are able to overcome them and hold them in subjection, their gods are also overthrown, and no longer rule over the country which has been conquered, and the gods of the conquerers generally come into power, and are adopted by the conquered. Thus the old set pass away and even go entirely out of existence. They cannot be anywhere found, their temples are deserted by their worshipers, and they cease to exist altogether. So it was with Jove, Mars, Mercury, Saturn, Juno, Minerva, and Venus, and all the rest of them. They have entirely departed. When they left Rome they also left the world, and went to the regions of nowhere and nonentity, where they have since remained.

But, unfortunately, the people of this city and country did not learn that they could get along better without gods than with them, that the gods cost a great deal of money to support without returning anything tangible and good in return; so when they got rid of the gods which they had borrowed from their neighbors, the Greeks, they, foolish-like, thought they must have other gods in their place, and they in due time adopted the gods of those who proved more powerful than they, and who became masters of their country. Thus the gods of the victorious party ultimately were adopted, and Jove and company went to forgetfulness, save in the productions of a few poets who liked to keep their valor and their fancied existence in remembrance.

The gods who are believed in here now are a family of deities that emigrated from a very small broken country in the extreme western part of Asia, and were never heard of much in the world till about fifteen hundred years ago. They were the gods of so insignificant a people that they were very little known among the nations who were contemporaneous with them, so that even none of the historians and writers of those times ever mentioned them, or the gods they believed in and worshiped. But as it has often happened that a small nation have become the masters over stronger people, so the gods of even a weak and obscure nation have been adopted and worshiped by nations far stronger than the one which first devised them and brought them into existence.

I need hardly tell you that the weak and obscure nation I allude to was the Jews, who once had a precarious existence in Palestine, but from their restless, quarrelsome, and ill-advised conduct they utterly lost what little power they possessed, and their country also. This principal God of this small country and this contentious people was believed by the weak nation he ruled over to have been the creator of the earth and all the suns and stars of heaven precisely as other nations had believed about their gods and with precisely the same amount of truth. But as powerful as they believed him to be, he was unable to keep his chosen people together and in power over the small and almost miserable country he had given them, and sworn over and over again that they should possess forever.

Strange as it may appear, this weak God, who showed himself unable to do what he had undertaken to do, and sworn repeatedly he would do—make his people a great and prosperous nation and the perpetual possessors of their small and mountainous country, about one hundred and forty miles long and less than forty miles wide, on an average—has been adopted by other nations who seemed not ingenious enough to get up gods of their own, and were thus under the necessity of taking the God of the obscure, defeated, and scattered people I have alluded to. Verily this is so, and that God, called at different times Jah, Yah, Jahveh, Yahweh, or Jehovah, who could not hold possession of that little country at the other end of the Mediterranean, has transferred his throne to this European city, and he has got a vicegerent here who acts as general agent for him and attends to all his matters and affairs, which he finds it inconvenient or too troublesome to attend to himself.

When this God, Jah, or Jahveh, had got to be nearly a thousand years old, the affairs in his realm had become so entangled that he could not make them reel off to his mind, by which means he became exceedingly vexed and out of humor, and he laid all the fault to the people he had created, and especially those whom he had selected as his own chosen and peculiar people. So he decided to beget a son upon the person of some good-looking young woman of the nation he had chosen, and whom no man had ever aught to do with, and then when this son became grown up to the size and age of a man to cause him to be put to death, so that Jehovah would find himself able to forgive his people for doing just as he had made them do. It seems that his affairs had got so mixed up and confused that if he did not put this son to death he must destroy all his chosen people and all the rest of the nations of the earth besides. It was a very sad state of things, indeed, when a God had to put his only beloved son to death to straighten out the complication and entanglement which his affairs had gotten into, but, remember, precisely the entangled state which their nation—of which he was the author—was exactly calculated to bring about. But as sad as it was, it had to be done. The son had to die that the world might live, that is the very kink of it, and he was, according to the will of his own father, put to death in the most cruel and ignominious manner known, to wit, to be crucified; and, to make the ignominy greater, he was executed between two condemned felons who had committed crimes deemed worthy of death.

This is, take it altogether, a very singular story, and possesses many curious points and features that I will not take the time to call your attention to now. I am aware the story is not new to you, and perhaps I ought to apologize for introducing the subject in this letter, but it seemed to be a part of the thread of the story about the gods who formerly reigned in this city and those who reign now. For you must know that though that dear son was put to death on the cross it was only a sham after all; he did not die, or, if he did, he came to life again, and was as good as ever, and better too. It seems his sufferings, all told, did not last more than three or six hours, when he was taken down and carefully laid away in a nice new sepulcher. He had said he would remain there three days; but as the matter of a day or two is not of much consequence, only so far as truth and accuracy are concerned, when he had lain in that sepulcher one day and two nights he came to life again, as is believed, of his own accord, and was more a God than before he was executed; and after an uncertain number of days (there is, unfortunately, considerable disagreement on this point as well as several others, some making it forty days, while others represent it only as a day or two), in broad daylight, he ascended up to heaven to sit on the right hand of the Father, who had caused him to be put to death, and he became the general manager of his father's business, and in fact a God of just as great proportions as the Father himself. Unfortunately, too, this matter of the ascension is not told in the same way by any two of the authorities to whom the world has to look for information about this important subject. But that really makes not the slightest difference, only to those who are disposed to be critical, and insist that the story should at least preserve the semblance of truth and consistency; for if a person only believes what he is told, whether it is consistent or not, or whether it is true or not, it is all he has to do, and he will go to heaven and be happy forever, and his great credulity and gullibility will be counted to him for righteousness.

Yes, as I said, Jahveh has left the Holy Land altogether and has made this Holy City—Eternal City—or whatever it may be, his chief residence, and from here go forth his will and law to all his chosen people in all parts of the earth who bow down before the Virgin; for you must know that since the son has come into chief command in this little world which he has saved, or tried to, the mother who conceived him by another member of this god family and brought him forth into this troublous world, and furnished the only avenue by which it was possible he could get into it, has been called the "Mother of God," the "Queen of Heaven," the "Celestial Bride," and lots of other titles just as pretty; and though she was the mother of five or six children, she is still regarded as "the Virgin," and she is looked upon and worshiped as the most remarkable female that ever had an existence. She has been deified and exalted to the highest place among all the gods which this people worship, and if she is the mother of God, perhaps this is all right. I assure you she is held in great adoration in this country of Italia, and I have many times seen her dressed up in silken robes, richly decorated with jewelry and precious gems, and in her arms or upon her knee sits the little juvenile God which all this people think has done so much for them. Oh, you ought to see, as I have seen, the pious devotees gather round this figure of the Virgin and child and observe how they bow down before her, pay their adoration to her, and look up into her face so beseechingly and imploringly, as though they thought she possessed the power to bestow upon them perfect happiness and eternal life. Never could the old Egyptians have paid more devout admiration to their Virgin and child—Isis and Horus—than do these deluded people. Egypt is doubtless one of the sources whence this Virgin-adoring people obtained the idea of the Virgin-worship, and the Egyptian paintings of their madonna—Isis and Horus—were brought from Egypt to this very city of Rome more than fifteen hundred years ago and sold to the people here, by whom they were accepted and adopted as their own gods, and from those models thousands of copies have been painted and engraved. India was also a great source whence the idea of Virgin-worship, divine conceptions, etc., was obtained. Never was Saravasti more devoutly worshiped as the queen of heaven than this Christian Virgin; never was Ishtar more regarded as the queen of heaven in Chaldea three thousand years ago, where the representation of herself and child in terra cotta have been found within the last twenty years, where they have been buried more than two thousand years. Yes, to see the worship bestowed here upon the Virgin Mary reminds me very forcibly of the worship that was accorded to Isis, Saravasti, and Ishtar, and mentally I exclaim, "Oh, how like this is the defunct mythological worship of those old and, some of them, obsolete nations!" I mourn that no more advance has been made in the direction of truth and reason.

But once more I beg your pardon for this lengthy prelude before giving you some account of my travels and observations for the last few days. But arriving here in the "Eternal City," the memory of the many old gods which once resided here brought the conviction firmly upon me that Jahveh now makes this his principal home, or, in other words, the home of his principal agent or vicegerent, called Leo thirteen times, who resides here and receives directly from divine sources numerous dispatches and communications from Jahveh, the Son, and the Virgin, to say nothing of the thousand and one saints who have been exalted to the dignity of gods, and whose statues and paintings I have looked upon by the scores of thousands. I very naturally refer to the changes that have taken place in the god line before commencing my letter proper; and as I may refer to this god question again in some future letter, I will leave the gods and tell you about where I have been and what I have seen.

Arona, where I left you last, as I told you, is very prettily situated on the shores of Lake Maggiore, and contains between three and four thousand inhabitants, and some three churches, in which are about the usual number of paintings and statues of virgins, saints, dying gods, etc. The noticeable feature of this town is the mammoth figure in metal of a human being standing on a hill in fine view of the lake, which was erected in 1697 by the Borremo family, St. Carlo Borremo having been born in Arona in 1538. The statue is 66 feet high, and stands on a pedestal 40 feet high. By means of a ladder and some scrambling one is enabled to climb up into this monstrous figure of a man, and rest, if he chooses, in its ear or nose.

On Tuesday I took cars for Milan, or Milano (the i being sounded as e), as the Italians call it. The ride was a beautiful one of some forty or fifty miles, and gave me a fine opportunity for seeing an excellent portion of northern Italy. The country is level and fertile, and is cultivated with fair skill and economy. In the distance I saw the mountains of the Tyrol, and at a distance of a hundred miles or thereabouts we could plainly see the snow-capped mountains of Switzerland. The day was lovely and the ride also lovely. A considerable portion of the farming land is in meadow, and the system of irrigation is perfectly adopted, and every few rods I saw running through the meadows a small ditch or furrow, ten or twelve inches deep, filled with running water. In places I saw again too many of the useless willows and poplars. It seems to me the Italians unduly encumber their fine lands with these trees, which suck up the better portions of the soil, and shade too much the growing grass and crops. The lands seemed perfectly filled with trees all along so as to greatly obstruct the view of a large scope of the level country through which we passed. I saw apple trees, peach trees, pear trees, and a large number of mulberry trees, by which I presume much attention is here paid to the silk business. These trees I can tolerate and highly approve, but the willows and poplars appear to me so utterly worthless that I cannot understand why so many thousand of them are set out and grown upon such valuable land. The tall Lombardy poplar seems to be a great favorite here, as it was also in Switzerland and Germany; but I see very little beauty in them. The limbs often die, and the tree, when thirty years old or so, presents an ill-looking dilapidated appearance. The morus multicaulis (mulberry) is a pretty tree, generally about the size of an apple tree say twenty-five years old, throwing out vigorous, healthy branches. The vine is also seen in considerable abundance, and is trained on trellises more as in America then as is the custom on the Rhine and in Switzerland. I saw considerable Indian corn and potatoes, both of which are ripe. The potatoes do not grow as large here as they do in America, the major part being about the size of hens' eggs, with one occasionally the size of a goose's egg. Squashes are grown in abundance, and seem to be highly prized by the children of Italy.

The villages and towns are frequent, but perhaps not as much so as in Belgium, Germany, and Switzerland. They do not have as cheerful an appearance as I would like to see; buildings generally look antiquated, the roofs are set too close to the upper story windows and the everlasting tiles for roofs do not look agreeable to me. I see scarcely any more slate roofs; everything is tile, and the tile in Italy has a more clumsy aspect than that which I saw in Belgium and Switzerland. I notice there are several patterns and styles for the tile. In France and Belgium it was made of a kind of flat ogee shape, and they locked or lapped over each other, just how I cannot describe. It was much the same in Germany and Switzerland, but here they are made in half circles, like the section of a stove pipe cut in two, lengthwise, only thirty times as thick, and always that brick red color. There are two patterns of tile here. One kind is made in large flat plates, say twenty inches long and twelve inches wide with a ridge or lip turning up at the sides; these are laid side by side, the ends lapping on to each other, and the side joints covered with the half circle sections, lapping also on to each other. In that way the roof is probably tight and will last hundreds of years, but it does not look pretty to my eye, and a town with a brick top always presented to heaven does not look nearly so well as slate, tin, or shingles. If I was God and had to look perpetually down upon them, I know I should tire of the brick tops and pass a decree that some other roof should be used. The churches with square brick towers, with several bells in the belfry, are seen in nearly every village. They all believe in chimes. The depots or stationes in Italy are large and commodious, more so by half than seems necessary. They have a very large room where the travelers assemble, and where the ticket offices are, and then other large rooms severally for first, second, and third class passengers, where they are passed to after the tickets are purchased. They can not pass out into the open part of the depot, where the cars and track are until the proper time comes, when the doors are unlocked and directions given as to which cars are for which town. Thus the passengers for Milan have compartments separate from those for the way stations. Enough time is taken after the passengers take their places in the coaches to look them over, to see that they all have tickets and are in the right train and the right car. The waiting rooms in the depots are vaulted and capacious, and the walls are frequently decorated with fine frescoes, presenting battle scenes and historical paintings. It helps to while away the tedium of waiting for a train to have numerous fine large paintings to study.

We reached Milan at nearly 11 A.M., and I had several hours to look over a very pretty Italian city of near 250,000 inhabitants. It is built upon a broad plain; it consists mostly of good stone and brick buildings of a dull cream color, and the city is kept clean and tidy. The streets are paved with cobblestones mainly, with large flat stones at suitable distances apart for the wheels of carriages to run upon. I approve of this plan; it causes the carriages to run very smoothly and saves a great deal of the perpetual noise and clatter of the carriage wheels bumping over the cobblestones. I think it might with propriety be adopted on Broadway in New York. In streets wide enough, two sets of these flat stones are laid down to enable carriages to travel freely both ways. I am sorry to say, however, that the beauty of the city is much marred by many of its streets being so narrow and irregular, like nearly all the continental cities I have visited. Sometimes they are mere pass-ways, not more than six feet wide with tall buildings of three, four, five, and six stories high. They are so close together that where the streets run east and west the sun can never shine on the pavement. There are no sidewalks or gutters to such streets, but one level pavement, and men and women walk in the middle of the street. This is the rule in all the narrow streets in all the cities I have visited—the pedestrians take the middle of the streets, side by side with the donkeys and horses. Some of these streets, however, are so narrow that no cart or wagon can enter them. I have seen some not much more than four feet wide; and where they curve and run in all directions it is hard for a stranger to tell where he is or to keep the points of the compass in his mind. Milan, however, is not so bad for narrow streets as some other cities I have visited. It has very large squares, and the cross streets are fully five times as far apart as with us, and the interior is occupied with private courts, gardens, and beautiful grounds. The entrance to these is through ornamental gateways or arches through the buildings standing on the street. Flowers are largely cultivated in Milan, and nearly everything wears a beautiful appearance. Fruits are in abundance. Grapes, figs, peaches, apples, pears, pomegranates, melons, etc. Here I saw the first watermelons I have seen in Europe, and you may believe I ate all I wanted. Watermelon never hurts me, and I am not afraid to eat a whole one at one sitting. Grapes and watermelons would nearly serve me for a continuous diet. Many Italian chestnuts are sold in Milan; they are three times as large as they grow in our country, but are comparatively tasteless. They boil them and sell them freely on the streets. I tried a few soldies worth of them, but I thought them inferior to American roasted chestnuts. Filberts and walnuts are also abundant, the latter like what we call Madeira nuts, but they have a bitterish taste now when green, which perhaps they lose upon being dried.

Milan has some very pretty open squares, or piazzas, as the Italians call them. One has a fine large stone statue, mammoth size, of Cavour, on a large base or pedestal, on which is a large bronze female figure, without any clothing on, and whom I took to be Fame, or History, who had just finished inscribing in the block on which stood the statesman, the name "Cavour." The design is very pretty and the whole is neatly executed. The Italians are not excelled in sculpture and painting, and probably not equaled. I have proofs of their great skill in this line at almost every turn and corner. Many, many years have been spent in this country in cutting marble and other stone into human shapes, into the forms of animals, and in covering hundreds of acres of canvas with beautiful colors, representing men and women, gods, and especially virgins, crucified gods and wretched saints, who look as though they had not a friend in this world or any other. This is unquestionably a better way to spend the time than in fighting and killing each other.

The city appears to be well supplied with canals, some of which run through the city. I saw some rafts of logs or large poles fit for masts of vessels being let through one of the locks. They must have come from the Tyrol or from Switzerland. Milan was the capital of Lombardy before the Italian states were consolidated into one kingdom. The part of Italy I entered, and in which is Arona, is Piedmont, largely a broken, mountainous country, being the fringe or skirts of the Alps. Lombardy is very level and a fine farming country. The Tyrol, which lies in the northeastern corner of Italy, where it joins the Austrian Alps, is also a mountainous Alpine country, with deep and delightful valleys.

The principal object of attraction in Milan is its world-famed cathedral, which in many respects surpasses all the cathedrals I have yet visited; and as I think you cannot fail to be somewhat interested in hearing something about it, I will run the risk of becoming tiresome and give you a somewhat full description of this very expensive house of God. I draw my statements from the official records, a copy of which I bought in the cathedral and near the altar in the chapel of the Blessed Virgin, so you can rely upon the truthfulness of what I tell you.

This stately edifice is of white marble from the celebrated marble quarries near the shores of Lake Maggiore, from which point the material was brought to Milan by canal, whether cut for the purpose or not I have not learned, but as the country is so level and scarcely a lock required in the entire distance the digging of the canal was not attended with very great expense. The marble, besides many other gifts, was presented for the purpose by Giovanni Galleazzo Visconti, a duke of Milan. Its erection was commenced in the fourteenth century, and upon the very spot and in the center of the city once occupied by the metropolitan church of the town, built in 836, under the title of Santa Maria Maggiore. It is purely Gothic in style, except the front portion, which is Grecian. It has been very slow in growth, and was not completed till the present century—in fact is not completed yet. One spire, I believe, is still to be added before the designs of the architects will be fully carried out. But it has already cost as much as a thousand houses, which any decent, reasonable god ought to be satisfied with for his worshipers to assemble in to cross themselves with holy water, count their beads, repeat their Ave Marias, paternosters, and to chant their liturgies. The edifice is in the form of the Latin cross, and comprises five naves corresponding with the five entrance doors. The length of the main nave is 486 feet; the total breadth of the five naves, which form the lower part of the cross, is 288 feet; the total breadth of the cross, including the two side chapels, is 351 feet. The hight of the largest nave from the pavement to the arched roof is 104 feet; the whole hight from the pavement to the vault of the cupola is 224 feet; and to the top of the statue of the Blessed Virgin, 355 feet. The separation of the five naves is effected by fifty-two very large and fluted columns or pillars of marble of a shape almost octagonal, or looking, like others I have seen, like a cluster of small columns—all alike save the four which support the grand cupola, these being twenty per cent larger than the others. The hight of the columns, including the base and capital, is 160 feet, and their diameter eight feet. Besides these there are numerous half columns, corresponding to the full ones, and these project from the walls which form the circumference of the temple. The thickness of the walls is eight feet. The capitals of the columns are worthy of notice, being of different designs and each adorned with eight statues; and the pointed pediments are enriched with a prodigious quantity of arabesques. The interior of the cupola is also adorned with sixty statues and bas-reliefs, four of which represent the doctors of the church.

The exterior of this great edifice is sufficient for a week's study, containing, as it does, as decorations some three thousand statues, the larger portion standing in niches, life-size, or nearly so, while others occupy the pinnacles, which shoot up like spires all over the roof. The statues on the exterior alone are said to have cost 550,000,000 francs, or $110,000,000. In the front is a fine flight of steps of red granite, leading to the five doors, in Roman style, and opening into the five naves aforesaid. Over the doors are five large windows of rich stained glass, with all the holy figures upon them you can imagine, and in far more brilliant colors than those same saints arrayed themselves in when they were in the body. About 250 statues decorate this magnificent front, and the fifty-two bas-reliefs, representing events mentioned in the Bible, etc., are worthy of attention. The summit of the front is adorned with twelve spires, supporting as many colossal statues. Four bas-reliefs, divided into two rows, adorn the base of the great pillars. Commencing on one side, are Tobias and his angel on their journey to Rages; Moses rescued from the Nile by Pharaoh's daughter; the temptation of the godly Joseph by Potiphar's naughty wife; Jacob wrestling with Jahveh, or one of his angels; above is represented a lot of saints, which we do not care very much about. On the reverse side of the same pillars are four more, also bas-reliefs, representing the spies returning from the promised land with grapes, etc.; the angel driving our dear first parents out of the Garden of Eden, and just because they ate an apple; Daniel in the lion's den, where the brutes were so well fed on young, tender meat that they did not care for a poor, tough, dried-up old Jew, and Job in his dung-hole. To the right of the door is a bas-relief representing God as he appeared to Moses in the burning bush. The likenesses of both God and Moses are supposed to be very life-like and natural. Over the first entrance, on the right, is a representation of Queen Esther when she went before Ahasuerus. It is thought that Esther conducted herself rather improperly on that occasion. The glory of the angels—which, of course, is very glorious—is on the ceiling over the door. The sculpture on the pavement of the balcony represents the anointing of Saul as king of Israel. But notwithstanding the divine unction, Jahveh "went back" on poor Saul and supplanted him by a stripling only three feet across the shoulders, who proved himself not only pretty good at a sling, but a holy murderer and adulterer. The next pillar has on its base the vision of Jacob, presumably just as Jacob saw it, and Moses striking the rock, and the water spurts out magnificently. Moses was an excellent man on the strike; possibly it was he who struck Billy Patterson.

Above the second portal is represented Judith in the act of cutting off the head of Holofernes (brave woman was Judith), also more glory of the angels by another artist, and on the cornice is Deborah supplying Captain Barack with weapons. Deborah

Rational Morality.

There is no moral law. It is utterly impossible to formulate an ethical law, because as we hav before shown, morality, like man, is progressiv, and therefore constantly undergoing transformation. The dictionaries giv us no light on this subject. According to Webster, the word "moral" is derived from the Latin mos, moris, which means manner, custom, habit, way of life, conduct. This definition, though loose and broad, nevertheless corresponds with the actual morality of mankind. Conformity to public opinion is the practical test of morality as the world goes. In every land and in every age this imperious yoke of custom has galled the neck of men until they became trained slaves; until a race of slaves beget their kind and bequeath to humanity perpetual serfdom. Webster's definition does not help us in our effort to find the grounds of morality, for there must be some better test than public opinion. We hav only to look back upon the past to discover that public opinion has been on almost all great questions hostil to the right. In all reforms the current sentiments hav been in opposition to improvement. Scarcely any discovery or useful invention or moral reform has ever gained the attention and indorsement of society except after a battle against great odds. The common sentiments of society are, therefore, if anything, immoral rather than moral. Society has deemed it best to put to death those bent on discoveries, inventions, improvements, and reform.

It is true the civilized world is rising above those conditions, but progress in this direction is painfully slow. For while the trumpets of church and state proclaim the rights of free citizenship and free conscience, yet they are in a large measure empty blasts. Freedom of conscience means nothing if it does not guarantee one the right to think in opposition to public opinion, and the still further right to express his views publicly.

Some years ago, while the writer was yet in the meshes and gall of priestcraft, his common sense was deeply impressed by reading in Emerson lines like these:

"The virtue in most request is conformity. Self-reliance is its aversion. It loves not realities and creators, but names and customs. Whoso would be a man must be a nonconformist."

But the great evil is we are born slaves, and all social influences, apart from science and Liberalism, tend to keep us in the line of our inheritance. The dissemination of knowledge is the hope of the world, and the free press is the corner-stone of the temple of liberty. Society falls into manners and customs, and refuses to be disturbed. It is enough to know that our fathers did thus and so, and why should not we do the same?

> Zaccheus, he > Did climb a tree
> His Lord to see.
> And why shouldn't we?

When we look back and see that our forefathers believed in slavery, polygamy, witchcraft, and many other equally barbarous and unreasonable things, Zaccheus' course seems worthy of emulation.

It is a truth which obtains universal assent that the race has been upon the upward march from the past to the present. Everybody admits that progress has been the order of the day, the order of the centuries, but ninety-nine out of a hundred stop right there. If the present and future are contemplated it is not with any conception of or sympathy with progress. "It is best to let good enough alone." Even slaves thought their condition good enough if their master was kind, and women think their state of subjection to man is all right if he will only accord them certain privileges.

To improve the condition of the humble, the noblest work of man, it is necessary constantly to break out of the common usages of society, by presenting higher truths and better conditions or possible attainment. Conservatism is fossilizing, progress is vitalizing. Nothing is so important to morality as growth or development. But the common notions which are just the opposit of this assumes that morality is a well-defined and fixed thing, and hence the attempt to manufacture morality by precepts and prayers. Man must be free before he can be moral. It is only on the grounds of his intelligence and freedom that he can be made responsible for his conduct. The moment you attempt to manufacture a moral nature by forcing it with authority, that moment the moral nature is overthrown. Morality can liv only in the sunshine of individual freedom.

If society forms certain rules or customs for the government of man's actions, and he follows them, his conduct cannot be said to be moral. He must hav the liberty of choosing, he must hav the responsibility of deciding, he must feel the sense of duty, and act out his own convictions of right. Everywhere you enter a church, nothing so much impresses you as the formality of the service. It is but lip service; and the reason is because the individual has no opportunity to act according to his own nature. He is a mere puppet, acting as he is acted upon. To be true, man must act from motivs prompted by his own manhood.

It will be far better for him to do wrong by acting according to his own judgment than formally to do the right thing by blindly following the dictation and domination of another. Morality is at war with the Commandments. They are but little else than a mental lash to whip the mind into obedience without instructing it. He who givs a shilling in the name of charity, because he is commanded to be charitable, only givs sixpence. His deed loses half its virtue in our eyes when we learn that it was not spontaneous, but largely mechanical and formal. He probably would hav given nothing if he had not been commanded.

The person who goes through religious exercises not because he has any liking for them, but because he is oppressed with an uncomfortable feeling that he ought to do so, does not act from moral motivs. He may pray because he fancies God commands him to pray, and this may pass for religious worship, but it is destitute of moral motiv. It is mechanical action, and reminds one of the weathervane on the steeple, which points the way the wind blows, not because it knows anything about the wind or cares anything about it, but simply points as it is forced to point. And when religion has depended upon its positiv laws or commandments it has succeeded in evolving a very religious but very immoral people.

Formality is death to individuality, progress, and manhood. The Mohammedan prays morning, noon, and night, not because his noblest thought and purest love prompt him to such repetitions, but because of imperious customs and inherited tendencies, which constrain him to perform this religious duty. He is moved by his fears and superstition rather than from any enlightened convictions. If Christians do not as formally pray three times, it is because they practically look upon prayer as an abraded superstition. We don't believe half as much as our fathers did, because we know twice as much as they knew. Education is becoming of a broader type. Sectarianism is a contemptible and despicable spirit, which science and liberty are holding up to the scorn of the world.

We are entering upon a new era. It may fitly be termed the age of man, as the spirit of the nineteenth century is emphatically bent upon establishing the rights of man. Individual sovereignty is the nervous force which furnishes agitation on all social questions to-day. It may indeed be yet in a crude form and display itself to great disadvantage at times, but the people are no longer content and willing to submit to the powers that be.

Not many years ago the workmen upon railroad trains in Egypt got up steam by burning mummies. Shocking as this may seem, yet kings and priests hav used living men to further their own ends by having them slaughter each other by the thousands.

To-day the people are getting their eyes open to the giant wrongs heaped upon them in the past; and if all signs do not fail we are now on the threshold of a new epoch in the world's history. The moral tone of society advanced enough to create a desire for greater freedom among the lower classes. Manufactured morality no longer passes for the genuin metal; it is only a galvanized imitation. The people wish now to rise and explain. Society has said, "Keep your seats, gentlemen, and we will make it all right." But common sense is the trump, and the people before long will show the caitiff lords that they hav a full hand.

In the present political excitement we are humiliated at the sight and potency of political corruption. The patriot loses his enthusiasm in beholding such general and systematic bribery and buying of offices. Where will it end? Surely there are rocks ahead, unless manhood can be developed sufficiently to raise us above superstition and political decay. And this can be accomplished only by the cultivation of true morality. I hav spoken of manufactured morality, and referred to the Commandments as tending to produce formal obedience devoid of moral sentiments. And this notion is not yet extinct. Apropos to this, Mr. Spencer observes:

"Not a few modern thinkers hold that there is no other origin for good or bad in conduct than law. And this implies the belief that moral obligation originates with acts of parliament, and can be changed this way or that by majorities. They ridicule the idea that men hav any natural rights, and allege that rights are wholly the result of convention, the necessary implication being that duties are so too."

People generally hav but little apprehension of rights other than those conferred by the legislativ bodies of the land. Ages of servitude to the strong arm of the law breed in men tame submission.

The diffusion of knowledge is enabling the masses to see the foundations upon which the superstructure of thrones and temples are built. We are just beginning to demand that laws shall be just before we promis to obey them. "But who are to judge of the righteousness of the laws of the land?" Every man must in many cases decide that question for himself, and take the consequences. It is true man has always had this privilege, but has never, or hardly ever, had the courage to defy the law. The law-makers were head-breakers to all who called in question their wisdom or authority, and hence the martyrs were few.

It is futil to say that people generally are not prepared for freedom, because it is only through the uses of freedom that they can ever become qualified for its highest and happiest applications and results. He who would learn to swim must plunge into the water, and yet he is in danger of being drowned. It is as unreasonable to ask man to prepare himself for individual liberty while a slave to tradition and custom as to ask him to learn to swim and insist, "But don't go near the water." All great institutions owe their strength and authority to the submission of the people. All prominent institutions demand a tame constituency respecting the radical questions of human rights. Rulers rule because they hav the power to rule, and it is a delusion to think that law-makers make laws for the welfare of society. Those who make laws and those who administer them are not troubled about ethical principles, but foist their government upon the people and enact laws to suit themselvs because might makes right. We need fully to appreciate this before we can properly estimate the virtue and functions of law. Even our institutions of learning are not free from settled and systematic hostility to the higher morality. The study of pagan classics and Christian traditions does not tend spontaneously to awaken new thought and to inspire independence of life. The colleges and universities discount individuality.

We are apt to hav too great a respect for law, and to thoughtlessly accept as law enactments which are aimed at the very citadel of liberty. Law must be founded on justice, and when it is not, it is an outrage of human rights. If the people stupidly submit to fugitiv slave bills and Comstock laws, the rulers will execute them with a vengeance and enact more, and execute them in like manner, all for the good of the cause, and the welfare of the "dear people." But it should never be forgotten that rulers, like the leech, are crying for more. Mr. Mill notices this peculiarity of despotism in his little book on liberty. He says:

"Apart from the peculiar tenets of individual thinkers, there is also in the world at large an increasing inclination to stretch unduly the powers of society over the individual, both by force of opinion and even by that of legislation; and as the tendency of all the changes in the world is to strengthen society and diminish the power of the individual, this encroachment is not one of the evils which tend spontaneously to disappear, but, on the contrary, to grow more and more formidable. The disposition, whether as rulers or as fellow-citizens, to impose their own opinions and inclinations as a rule of conduct on others is so energetically supported by some of the best and by some of the worst feelings incident to human nature that it is hardly ever kept under restraint by anything but want of power, and as the power is not declining, but growing, unless a stronger barrier of moral conviction can be raised against the mischief, we must expect in the present circumstances of the world to see it increase."

This encroachment upon human rights is not of doubtful origin. Religion is avowedly opposed to human nature as being totally depraved, and to human reason as "carnal reason." M. Guizot, an eminent Christian writer, freely admits that the church has always been hostil to the liberties of the people in general and to the liberties of the individual in particular. Here is what he says:

"But when the question of political securities came into debate between power and liberty; when any step was taken to establish a system of permanent institutions, which might effectually protect liberty from the invasions of power in general, the church has always ranged herself on the side of despotism."

This then has been and is to-day the attitude of the church toward the vested rights of man. Now let us see from the same author how it treated man's personal freedom.

"All religion is a restraint, authority a government. It comes in the name of a divine law, to subdue, to mortify human nature. It is then to human liberty that it directly opposes itself. It is human nature that resists it, and that it wishes to overcome. . . . It is necessary that man should submit, but it must be willingly and freely, and that he still preserve his liberty in the midst of this submission."

What sort of liberty is that which may be preserved in submission? The liberty first, to pay tithes, that fat priests may consult oracles respecting the kingdom come; liberty to believe as truth and fact creeds and Bibles filled with fables, myths, dreams, visions, miracles, immaculate conceptions, and marvelous resurrections and airy ascensions; liberty to hav faith in all the priest may teach, but no liberty to listen to the teachings of ungodly science; liberty to work hard at starvation prices and never know of any greater freedom than to work, suffer, and die.

He has no liberty to become an investigator, unless he is willing to risk torture, exile, and death. If it is necessary that the masses be kept under tutelage, if they must hav opinions and beliefs ready-made, let it be so, the evil consists not in doling out milk to children but in withholding meat from men. Christianity by its dogmas recognizes but one rule of conduct, which is the same for all, namely, obedience to and faith in the church. It is the method of the Procrustean bed—a mechanical or machine morality, a mold in which all persons must be fashioned alike.

The church makes no effort to cause its members to think freely in the pursuit of truth. There is not the first incentiv in Christianity to lead mankind to think for themselvs, but a spirit the very opposit teaches them to find liberty in submission. And many do find all the liberty they want within the limits of their creed. So does the bird in the cage sing as sweetly as if upon the wing, especially if it has been kept in a cage all its life. But it is hardly so with the bird accustomed to a life of unrestrained freedom—it pines in confinement. One thing is certain in case of both birds and men, that once they hav escaped their creeds and cages, they never go back to them.

The whole tendency of religion and society is to superintend the details of individual life, as the parent controls the conduct of the child. This kind of meddlesomeness has kept the race in infancy. And because they are mere children in intellect, the masses are kept in poverty, ignorance, and slavery.

The pivotal question is, "How far may the individual act according to his own choice, and at what point may society or the 'consensus of the competent' restrict his actions?" Where is the limit? Where is the boundary line between the authority of society and the sovereignty of the individual?

Mr. Mill observes that "the principle of individual liberty is that the sole end for which mankind are warranted individually or collectivly in interfering with the liberty of action of any of their number is self-protection." And again he defines it as, "The only freedom which deserves the name is that of pursuing our own good in our own way, so long as we do not attempt to deprive others or impede their efforts to obtain it."

Mr. Spencer givs substantially the same definition: "Every man has freedom to do all that he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man."

Letters from Friends.

MODESTO, CAL., Sept. 20, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Your noble advocate of truth, justice, and equity comes to time every week full of adversity of opinions on the all-absorbing questions of politics and religion. Well, as I haven't had my say on the subject of politics, as the old lady Partington would say, I will offer a few thoughts touching the great questions at issue before the American people. What the people want as the main essential to prosperity is low taxation and good government.

Now the first question for solution is, then, which of the contending parties, in the estimation of the voter, will carry out the desires and interests of the people? Now the fact is, in my humble opinion, that the politicians on both sides care but very little how much the people suffer, if they (the politicians) succeed in filling their own coffers with ill and other gains pilfered from the pockets of their masters (so called), but in reality slaves. We are supposed to be a representativ government, but the very assertion is a lie in reality; even if you get the object of your choice for political position, you are liable to be ignored in full or part by the hypocrit that you helped to elevate to power and profit.

As to any difference in the swindling propensities of the two parties, Republican and Democrat, I think it one-half dozen of one and six of the other. But aside from these facts, there is a gigantic question to be considered. A large number of the so-called Democratic party were anti-Democrats previous to the conspiracy aimed at our nation's life, or a complete subjugation of the free states to the interests of the slave power, or for the establishment of a slave oligarchy. When the secession party undertook to dissolve the Union they ignored every principle of Jacksonian Democracy. Now behold this same element moving heaven and earth to obtain possession of the very government they tried a few years ago to destroy. Of course the pretended love for Hancock (according to their own declarations) is only skin deep. A people disposed to sanction the cold-blooded murder of John Wathers and hundreds of others, from time to time, are not worthy of taking possession of the government. Just so long as a man from any state in the Union cannot be allowed to express his honest opinion upon the subject of politics and religion, just so long such people should not be allowed any privileges of an American citizen. The bitter feelings engendered by the war of course hav been suppressed, but not destroyed and obliterated, and the people of the South are standing in their own light when they allow a contemptible mob to suppress freedom of speech and abuse American citizens coming from other states of the Union. Such conduct will be met by all lovers of their country as an evidence that the people are not worthy of any control of the government. Hancock, standing alone, without any influence of the bulldozers and ballot-box stuffers, might do very well. The reign of terror existing in the South precludes all hope of harmony and peace among the people of the two sections of our common country. State movements are already made to the effect that if Hancock is elected the Southern bulldozers will be allowed certain privileges that other people will not be allowed.

This question of politics being introduced in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am fearful, will hav a bad tendency among our Liberal friends. It is impossible to show up all the reasons why the so-called Democratic party should not be supported by all Liberals, as has been suggested by some writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is supposed that every man who is in possession of sound reasoning faculties ought to stand upon his own individuality and risk his own judgment as to which party will be the safest to administer the government for the next four years. I fully corroborate the statement of your San Jose correspondent in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 4th, page 572. Of course every man will vote according to the dictates of his own convictions. In a previous letter I advocated the nomination of our own candidates, but as I hav not heard from or seen any account of my proposition, I presume it was considered unworthy of recognition.

Our League held forth last Sunday at Roger's Hall. I am happy to say that one of our Christian friends had the moral courage to come before us and advocate the faith that was in him. Of course our friend was completely demolished by Col. John R. Kelso and others, but the League congratulated and thanked Bro. Henderson for courage displayed. Yours for success and justice, C. C. LUTHER.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Oct. 13, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Feeling that this is somewhat of a critical moment so far as the life and well-being of the National Liberal League is concerned, and a time when we should know our strength so that the weak-kneed may be strengthened and the wavering decided, I, as one, wish to make known through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER the stand I take with regard to the outcome of the Fourth Congress of the N. L. L., held at Chicago, and for this purpose send you a circular lately received from our old friend, H. L. Green, and my answer to the same, and would suggest that the League in general, and all who feel an interest in the future continuance and success in the old League, would manifest the same by forwarding to THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, or some other paper having general circulation an expression of their views and wishes upon the subject. I would like to state that I send the circular and answer out of no ill will to our late chairman of the Executiv Committee, but because I feel it a duty in the interest of the League so to do. Before closing I wish to say that the members of the Liberal League of Utah indorse the views I take in my answer to H. L. Green. Yours, WALTER WALKER,
Sec. L. L. of Utah.

[Copy of Letter sent to H. L. Green.]

H. L. GREEN, ESQ., Dear Friend: I am really sorry that any misunderstanding should hav occurred at the Chicago Convention to make it seem necessary to any one having the object of its organization at heart to separate or draw off from the main body, and more still while I fail to see it necessary myself, as judging from the report in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I must confess my mind to be that there was not such a cause. I am more particularly sorry when such valiant men, among whom I esteem yourself equal to any of them, should deem it necessary to be found among the seceders. I am no friend to Freelovism or obscenity, as all would be willing to attest, and yet I fail to see wherein the National Liberal League at the Chicago Convention committed itself to either party. I do sincerely wish to be respectable in fact, while I am not so tenacious as to what others may think of me from the fact that while we choose to be antichristian or unorthodox we cannot obtain the character of respectability, try for it however hard we may. For me it is enough that I feel I am in the right. "United we stand, divided we fall," is an old but true motto.

Of course from the foregoing you can infer my answers to your circular, but my mind is never so made up that I cannot change my course if good reasons can be obtained for me to do so. In the mean time I feel assured that whatever course you may take, it will be intended for the best good, and I can easily wish you good speed in your movements. I would be much pleased to receive more light from you if you are able to giv it, and in any event I would like to keep up a correspondence with you, feeling assured that though our convictions may be different our objects, aspirations, and ambitions will be the same.

Your friend and well-wisher, WALTER WALKER.

WILLAMETTE VALLEY, OR., May 10, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Again I take the liberty to pen you a fearless expression of my honest opinions from and partially about this gospel-suffering country. THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the few honest organs we dare to confide in; our Oregon press is either too cowardly or not independent enough to publish the most distant allusions to the depravity of the Christian church and her leading "white-necktied" and "black-gown wearers," written for their columns by those who are too independent to become the tools of the clergy, and honest and courageous enough to tell them so. Many excellent people even think that such subjects are better "let alone," but I cannot concur with their view. It is these delusions that keep the masses in the mud, that rivet the chains which enslave them, and induce them to remain prostrate at the foot of oppression and misrule. Priestcraft enslaves intellect, renders it weak, bending, and credulous, and while thus fettered, priests and a few more bask in the sunshine of splendor and power, while the industrious many remain neglected in misery, toil, and despair.

As long as such sentiments as the Bible produces on the mind of our Christian flock find currency and are esteemed as the ne plus ultra of moral worth, our morality will remain as hitherto a system of "organized hypocrisy," an unblushing caricature of all that is virtuous, noble, generous, and faithful. The Christians ought to blush when they look at the simple excellences of people who can afford to be moral without the spurs of heaven or hell.

It would be time for those bragging asses (the Christian clergy) to cease fulminating from the pulpits their atrocious calumnies against men like Ingersoll, Underwood, D. M. Bennett, and even Franklin and Jefferson, because the Infidel's position is substantiated by having shown the reductio ad absurdum to which the reasoning of the theologian infallibly tends:

Strike them to the root, and the glorious age will dawn upon us,
And from the lips of truth one mighty breath
Shall, like a whirlwind, scatter in its breeze
That whole dark pile of human mockeries.

The time has arrived to stop up the mouths of the lying priests and parsons. If God, when he dabbed up man, had clapped a bell or clicker within him which should hav given the alarm whenever he told a lie, he would hav avoided much crime and misery in the world; there would hav been but little want of law and gospel.

We hav, after all, good reason to congratulate ourselvs because the glorious age of liberty has commenced dawning upon us; even clergymen who obtained the highest culture cannot meet any more with success the investigations of the champions of Freethought. Too strong for them are such men as Strauss, Renan, Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, Lewes, Humboldt, and Tyndall.

There are, no doubt, thousands of sincere Christians who try to do good. I am acquainted with many people, especially ladies, of this vicinity, whose only aim is to liv a moral life and to do right; but as there is an exception to every rule, this can be said only of a very limited number of Christians. And how otherwise could it be if we consider the immorality of the book they call the word of God. Can, for instance, Ezek. xxiii be considered moral teaching to young ladies? Does or did an intellient Infidel ever take such words as we find in verse 20 of that chapter on his lips? Yet they are commanded to make the Bible their chief literature. Nay, they are even obliged to believe in it or be damned. The spouses of the Christian pastors seem to be strong believers, especially in such allowances as Jacob took with the female servants of his house, through the urging of his two wives, or they would not consent to the lusty orgies their husbands are so very apt in celebrating, or does what we read, Lev. xv, "I say unto you that joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth," etc., raise the morality of man? The cry of the priesthood is, "Whatever is is right," consequently there is nothing wrong, and when a convict swings off in fine style from the drop, and they are assured by the Rev. Mr. Deddledum that after they hav repented of their sins, and hav received absolution from his soiled hands, they will mount up to the region of bliss. I say, with Peter Pindar, therefore,

Repent, then, all ye rogues, you'll be forgiven,
And giv the saints a holiday in heaven.

Or, I ask, can Christians be expected to keep peace with their neighbors and enjoy the real happiness of life's true friendship? Don't Luke xii make Jesus say, "I am come to send fire on the earth [very much like a benevolent deity], suppose ye that I am come to giv peace? I tell ye nay, but rather division. The father shall be divided against the son, the mother against the daughter?" etc. Could Beelzebub hav ever said anything worse? Well, history shows priests made good use of that.

What are the chief mottoes of our Christian world? The bamboozled Christian's cry is, "Gin and Jesus." The upper class, the bamboozler's cry is, "Let the church alone." While I shall add, "Si populus vult deripi, deripiatur.

What is the true spirit of holy Christian religion? Bring all, you cannot bring too much. I shall let John Wesley, that great light of American Methodism, speak: "You who hav $200 a year, and spend but $100, do you giv God the other $100? If not, you rob him of just so much. Oh, leave nothing behind you. Send all you hav before you go into a better world; send it, lend it all unto the Lord, and it shall be paid you again. Haste, haste, my brethren," etc.

Protestants are very apt to blame the Catholics for pacifying their angry God through money donations. Well, I think our Methodists, according to Wesley's command, had better not say any more. Is not the mighty dollar "the real God" Christians worship? Who has ever seen a Christian who would part with his last dollar to benefit his neighbor? The real philanthropist can only be found among Infidels. Thomas Paine is a specimen. How can Christians be expected to deal fair even in business transactions; are they not taught an arithmetic which defies all honesty? "One is three," and "three but one." It is always "one is three" with them when they receive, and "three but one' when paying out. Money, if it is not the God they worship, it is at least their devil; and even when down on their knees praying, they cast only "one eye" to God, lamenting moral evil, the other eye winking down upon the devil; one voice to heaven, "To God my heart incline," and one in whispers, "Satan, I am thine." The majority of our modern apostolic race will sigh for heaven, while in mammon their real God they see.

Who has ever seen one of God's Christian pillars who would divide his last garment with the poor? One of my nearest neighbors, one of those praying, namby-pamby apostles, is a fine specimen of such Christian liberality. Not only too avaricious to use a piece of his stored-up mammon for clothing himself with decently; nay, his better half has to take advantage of her stern lord by playing him the lowest kind of tricks before he will buy her her yearly calico dress. We hav her own word for it. His children prove that an apple never falls far from the trunk.

The only exception some will make is to assist the army of missionaries in doing nothing. To Asia and Africa they will send their money, with the belief that their missionaries will tell those heathens something new. They are too ignorant to know that those heathens read the Christians' Bible years before any Christians ever put their eyes on it, and that in original.

Only a few weeks ago, a couple of spinsters of Philomath, Benton county, who hav no other show left than to become the brides of Jesus, were elected the chief magistrates of a female missionary-supporting society, themselvs deceived through their holy fathers, and announced before the assembled club, that 120,000,000 Buddhists had become converted to Christianity all in one day. 120,000,000 Buddhists converted to Christianity! These very Buddhists are apt to tell our missionaries at every meeting that they knew long before Christ's time what it meant to hav a God to cohabit with a woman, hav a son—God number two—born, and hav him nailed to a cross.

Mr. Editor, I am glad to see so many ladies among THE TRUTH SEEKER's correspondents; a good proof that they hav found out that there is nothing to expect from the believers in Paul; the Infidel is the only true friend they hav; the Infidel is the man who believs in providing, making home happy, and giving them their rights. Christians are not very gallant, or they would hav made a female god, and given the old Jehovah of the Jews a spouse; but that would hav given women too much right, the male alone had to stay the real image of God:

Formed like his maker! who could then suppose
To hide the workmanship, he'd want some clothes?

It would be better also for our Christians not to say any more about the sacrifice the believers in other religions hav brought, or are bringing yet, either for pacifying their angry God or to tickle his smeller. Didn't they, after they had made a God, sacrifice him? Nothing but a God would do the Christians, while others were satisfied to honor their Jehovah with the sacrifice of an animal or crops from the field. Yes; even worse! They slaughtered their God, not to honor their other, older God, alone, nay; they did it to honor their devil also. Hav they pacified their devil? I notice that Mr. Devil is the chief reaper yet; old Joe is far ahead, and leaves to his old companion, God the First, perhaps, nothing but a few innocent babes:

Æsop's heathen had a God and beat him,
Enlightened Christians make a God and eat him.

Can mankind think of anything more barbarous? To pass Jesus at least once the year through their bowels is considered absolutely necessary; without such cannibal food they would never enter heaven. Good Friday, especially, is the favorit day of the Protestants to feast on the carcass of their God. I suppose they prefer him warm and bleeding.

Before closing I must refer yet to a twaddle two holy Bible-grubbers held here lately. While one couldn't see how a Christian could concur with the first commaudment, the other thought it absolutely necessary for a Christian to believe in it. While one placed the kingdom in heaven, the other was bound to hav it on earth. Strange that such differences should be between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

May we not say also:

'Tis strange such hellish wrath should rise
'Twixt heavenly saints of kingdom come;
While one gang hocus-pocus cries,
The other bawls for fee faw fum.

That ignorance and error are found in all these sects is self-evident; the testimony of each against all the others is to this effect; the fact of their divisions and conflicts puts their errors beyond all doubt.

The Bible says: God has forseen and foreordained whatever comes to pass. Then God has ordained that I should not believe in that book; and I must say, I feel extremely happy by it. Vox Populi vox Dei. FITZNER.

HONOLULU, SANDWICH ISLANDS, Sept. 13, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I will write you a few lines relating to the inhabitants, religion, etc., of these islands. The nativs number about one-half, and are fast dying out. Wherever the white men settle in any considerable numbers the nativs disappear. It is so in India, Australia, and New Zealand. The reasons given for the disappearance of the nativs here are that the foreigners hav brought contagious diseases among them, and introduced certain customs which hav a tendency to prevent offspring. The inhabitants are indolent and inoffensiv generally. The Chinese are here in strong force, and will probably overrun the country in a few years more.

No part of the world is superior to these islands for the cultivation of sugar cane, and there is still room for those to engage in this business here who hav got some money to invest.

The inhabitants are engaged chiefly in raising live stock, cultivating sugar cane, and commerce. Silver is the only money I hav seen in circulation since I came here. No doubt the missionaries hav done considerable in civilizing the nativs, but some of their doings here are questionable.

Are the poor people in America who sent clothing here for free distribution aware that the missionaries set a price upon it? Are they aware that many of the missionaries hav become wealthy and left the ministry? One missionary in Hawaii has an income of two hundred dollars per day. They appreciate the almighty dollar as well as the saving of souls. Yours respectfully. LYMAN SMITH.

REJOINDER TO CHARLES E. TOWNSEND AND E. W. ALLEN

WACONDA, KAN., Oct. 6, 1880.

GENTLEMEN: There certainly is no greater difficulty than answering to a "no answer," and so I shall not attempt it. Mr. Allen says in trying to solve my question, "Can there be a first without a second, and can there be a second cause for the same thing. Let the immortal mind of man soar aloft above the sublunary things of time, brought forth by invisible power in the ethereal regions of endless space, as insects germinate in the element of water according to the ever-immutable, self-existent, mathematical, chemical laws of science, God inherent in the constitution of nature."

Now, friend Allen, did I say one word about the immortal mind of man either to soar aloft or delve into the earth or anywhere else or about insects germinating in water according to law, or no law, or God inherent in the constitution of nature? Suppose he is, what of it; does he answer the question? Or what of mathematical, chemical laws of science, does this jargon answer the question?

You say it must be considered that there is no such thing as nothing. Well, who said there was, and that as visible things come from invisible substance in endless space. Well, just prove that; and if you do, then it has nothing to do with the question. Then comes a lot of lingo about endless space, which is the original, great first, activ, effectiv cause. Well, just prove that. But then it don't touch the question any more than so much Choctaw or Bengalese. Here you say, to sum up the argument in as few words as possible, the first great cause of all causes is force or power, which is the cause of all action.

Here comes the expression "first cause" again without any effort to prove that there can be a first cause, simply because there can be no first where there is no second. Then this progress from nature up to nature's God, as written in the second Psalm. Well, what has nature, nature's God, or the second Psalm to do with it. I hav said ye are gods and all of you are children of the Most High. Well, what of it, if we are gods, that don't solve the problem; and the children of the Most High don't do it either, destined to hav dominion over all the creature of Father Science, God, and Mother Nature, the great contingent cause from whence contingent causes flow.

Now, in all candor, let me ask once more what all this hifallutieg, Methodistical, borrowed lingo has to do with the question Can there be a first without a second, and can there be a second cause for the same thing. Now, friends Allen and Townsend, allow me to tell you how not to do it. Hold up your hand with four fingers on it, look to the first, and why first? Just because there are three others. Remove the second, third, and fourth, and hav you a first finger? I think you hav a finger only or one finger. Consequently to say a first where there is no second is fallacious. So you see if you could prove a first cause you must prove a second, and since we cannot comprehend a second cause for the same thing we cannot comprehend a first either, and when speaking of causes there is no first, and your five verses of poetry in conclusion are just so many evidences that you know first rate how not to do it. But if you like it best to say first cause, and call that cause God, I cannot object, for you hav as much right to a plurality of gods as to any other thing or idea. But don't be surprised if others consider it so and treat you accordingly. For myself, I always say there is a cause, but sometimes fail to discover it.

WOODHULL, ILL., Oct. 28, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Though I am not a member of any Liberal League, yet I wish to be heard through THE TRUTH SEEKER.

From observation I supposed the National Liberal League was got up for a purpose. Not for a lifeless, inactiv organization, a name without substance, but that its purpose was to unite the anti element of church and state into action to prevent the church from encroaching upon the constitutional rights of those who are not in sympathy with its dogmas by enacting laws and executing them in a partial manner. If this is not the object of Liberal Leagues, what are they for? and the idea that all who are worthy to be members (not tag-rag and bobtail) must be of one certain hight and of one averdupois weight, holding the same judgment in matters of moral reform, is foolish. Each generation has the right to alter and change the morals and customs of the past, and establish for the present or time being. To flare up and demand the majority to yield to the wishes of the minority is rank tyranny. What would be more childish and silly than for a member of Congress in Washington, should a question be decided by two-thirds of its members, to arise in his self-styled dignity and resign, giving as his reason that he would not suffer his private character to be stained by such an unjust act? Membership of any organized body is not the proper place for such men. Wherever they are there is trouble.

As for the Comstock law, there is no other law on our statute books that calls for action on the part of the League more urgently than this law. First, a petition with 70,000 names, asking for a repeal or modification. What was more fair and reasonable than this? yet by some it was condemned because it was not confined to modification alone; and by this class of fine-haired gentry the question was forced upon the Liberal League. And it is the same class that is now finding fault for its being brought before the League, admitting at the same time that the law is so worded and used that an innocent person can and has been made to suffer. This admission is an acknowledgment on their part that the law is defectiv and in justice demands repealing or materially modifying; and a large portion of the Liberals are in favor of its repeal, yet they withheld action upon it in the League until another innocent editor is arrested and is now crying for help; thus giving the modifiers ample time to act in the case if they wished.

I am surprised so see so noble a man as Col. R. G. Ingersoll, who made such a splurge at Cincinnati, in one year after crawl upon his knees and beg the Liberal League not to condemn the Comstock law, perhaps wishing by the use of this law to force the church to abandon the Bible as an obscene book. If this was the Colonel's object he is excusable, yet would it not hav been more honorable to hav followed the example of Alexander Stevens, who after warning his Southern brethren of their rash act, said he would not desert them. We think the Colonel's object was of a political nature.

As for that which is called Freelove (practiced more or less in all churches, and was about to be exposed as a theory by Mrs. Woodhull in the days of the intimacy of Beecher and Tilton), it was said by prominent men in the city of Peoria that "it was bound, when properly understood, to become the prevailing sentiment of all civilized nations." A sense of a moral reform as to legal prostitution is among the necessities of this enlightened age, and should be discussed by mothers and wives, as they are the ones who suffer.

It appears General Roberts, editor of Mind and Matter, intends to run Spiritualism and Liberalism himself, claiming that his theory on Spiritualism and the Comstock law are the only two things that are right. Yet we feel disposed to giv him credit for defending mediums; but does he not stand by his own argument guilty of aiding and abetting imposters by denying the right of test conditions? He surely does. As for his arguments in the Bennett case and on the Comstock law, they are so inconsistent that they are not pleasant to read, and every Liberal should let him know it.

ISAAC PADEN.

CINCINNATI, O.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I know you are on the side of morality and utterly opposed to vice and obscenity, and now the true secularists and moralists are rid of that ugly bone of contention, Freelove. The real Simon pure Liberal League will rise and prosper. I trust our worthy TRUTH SEEKER will show its hand, and sound its voice to push onward to success the League of leagues, that it might be a power in the land, to neutralize the effects of superstition, and ultimately supercede the unmeaning dogmas so long promulgated by the cunning swarms of drones who sponge on the gullible and credulous multitudes. Go in strong for taxing all their Joss houses, also the hypocrits who preach that which they know to be false.

HARWINTON, CONN., Oct. 10, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: It is so seldom that one reared under the canopy of the royal Presbyterian gospel mill in this place dies without permission from the chief dispenser of wind who at the time bottoms the pulpit chair that I take advantage of the occasion and chronicle the affair. James L. W. Davis, who has suffered terribly from consumption for more than a year, was an unbeliever in ghosts, gods, devils, or confidence men. He never contributed to the missionary fund, never was guilty of subscribing to keep a soft-fingered gentleman supplied with a pulpit, and, sick or well, he held no communion with deception or hypocrisy. When it became known that his disease had the upper hand of him he was advertised as a subject for hell; and when those people who care more for a person's spiritual welfare than for their physical became aware of such fact long-winded prayers were offered singly at wholesale prices; but as prayers are wholly composed of wind, and as there is generally a sufficient supply of that material on the hills of Litchfield county the additional supply was wholly uncalled for; but Christian wind is cheaper and easier dispensed with than Christian dollars, so the young man was far better supplied with that which he least needed. Three days before his death the chief priest and his elder, taking advantage of the absence of the "head of the family," and groaning under a high pressure of wind colic, kindly consented to visit the "afflicted family" and attend to the wants of the dying (spiritually); but as the dying was fully competent to manage his own spirituality, he declined an audience, whereupon these two apostles of Jesus insisted upon the family giving ear to a fearful rush of air in the shape of a petition to an imaginary God who was never yet known to giv ear to supplications of this style. The people resident of that house are believers in the natural, not the supernatural, and thought it not worth while to waste time in listening to that which was unavailable.

Mr. Davis became reconciled to his fate two months ago, and admitted he had no hope of living. "I shall not winter," he said; "but what nature gave she will take. I take no stock in superstition. If the devil gets nine-tenths of the human family, suckling babes, idiots, fools, and imbeciles excepted, and such is the teaching of orthodoxy, I prefer an abode with intelligent men."

He was a man of more than ordinary intellect, well read, and had he possessed a body proportionate to his brain, would hav made his mark in the world. He bade his friends good-bye in a clear tone. "I am dying! I shall not liv five minutes!' A faint good-bye, and his trouble was ended. Talk about an infidel not dying easy, mentally! No man ever met death more bravely or nobly, and the church has lost the satisfaction of making him a subject of eleventh-hour bankrupt repentance, as they falsely say of Thomas Paine.

Peace and rest be to his remains! CONSTANCY.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find post-office order for seven dollars—five dollars for "The Gods and Religions," one dollar for your Brussels trip, and one dollar to my credit.

I am more than pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and its contributors. Let every question be agitated that will benefit mankind. I wish Liberals were less illiberal. Aunt Grundy is a terror to weak knees.

Sister Slenker is a terrible but glorious woman, if she does believe death ends all.

E. A. Chapman ought to giv proofs of immortality to Bro. Jamieson. I like to read all both sides hav to say.

Hoping you will continue to prosper and long be at the head of the paper which has diffused more light in less time than any journal of modern times, I am,

Yours fraternally, AUGUSTUS HASTINGS,

SOLON, O, Oct. 27, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I know not how fatal to the friends of repeal the defection at Chicago may become; but this I do know, that I would sooner affiliate and compromise with the Comstock society and the Y. M. C. A. than with this second brood of recessionists. I can make some allowance for Abbot in Boston. It was asking a good deal of him to like Bennett. It was asking too much of a Hub man to be a Liberal. They make pretty good Infidels, that's all. Their birthplace is bad for them.

Ingersoll is no Liberal. He is an Infidel, and a very vain one at that. Since he was told that he was eloquent in words, and left the Democratic party, he has not been heard to utter one generous or liberal sentiment toward his opposers; and even in his Infidelity he is illiberal. He is now only a very promising aristocrat, and would make a strong head of any established system had he judgment proportioned to his ability in the use of words.

But your patrons are an amusing set. I hav read your paper for nearly four years. When my time is out I expect to renew. I can't spare the fun, the bedlam, of your correspondence. Besides, I like the old chief. He is a fountain filled with the blood that creates life when the blasts of death hav withered everything free and ennobling. I can object to him sometimes, but I had rather miss a dozen other papers than his.

If Ingersoll, Abbot, or Green should write for THE TRUTH SEEKER and became regular correspondents it would only add to the already strange medley of disputation that Bennett's generosity has so far allowed; but let me advise him not to trust them to any considerable extent.

Old Socrates, the old questioner of Athens, could he read weekly the views of the various writers in your paper, would find something new and diverting and likely to drive away the care and tedium of his years. But his punishment for blasphemy probably would not allow of his sharing in any such enjoyment.

Among all your correspondents I do not remember of one who has said that he had any affection for the Southern states. In order to complete the whole round of differences, I wish to state that I hav great regard for Southern people, and hav had ever since I taught school in Kentucky in 1832.

Yours, N. EGGLESTON.

SANFORD, N. Y., Oct. 20, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: It seems hard work for people that hav been used to the applause of the multitude to stand true when the time comes when they may lose popular hand clapping. I think Ingersoll and Green are trying to float with the current; won't say where they may land. Green & Co. don't want to hurt the old League, but you must withdraw before you can come into their high-toned crowd. Hypocrisy! Now for politics. I don't relish working my lifetime and my children after me for the purpose of paying for five pounds of pork and hardtack for every one I consumed when in the army, protecting the property of the people. Exempt those that risked their lives as well as those who risked their dollars for this dear country from taxation. Gold for both or none, M. L. KUISKERN.

SOLEBURY, PA., Oct. 17, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

Thanks for an entrance gained
Amongst a noble band,
The friends of truth and justice,
The grandest of the grand.

For truth I hold to be the reality of facts as they exist in the various departments of nature, and not as some suppose, according to our limited capacity to understand them, wherefore the saying, "Let God be true, but every man a liar."

Hold science God as ever true,
Whatever men may think,
Examin well their thoughts,
At science fountain drink.

Now as there are no two things in nature exactly alike, the which displays the great wisdom of omnipotent science power, and the whole of all is a unit, where is the wisdom of man in persecuting his brother man for opinion's sake?

Oh, what folly is displayed,
To rot and molder down,
Like the power of kings, dismayed
When they hav lost their crown.

Come then and let us reason together as rational and intelligent beings, to endeavor to fathom the depths of knowledge as contained in the book of nature, and see

All things are working for one end—
Perfection of the whole,
From good to better and to best,
In time's eventful role.

Man being, or heading, the climax, from nature up to nature's God, to become ruler over all below his exalted position, where, purified in the light of knowledge, he should ever act with circumspection as his guide in all the ways of life, claiming only an equal privilege of justice to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in the economy of nature. Hence the greatest enemy of mankind is the tyrannical serpent of selfishness found squirming among the branches of the tree of knowledge of good and evil—the organic faculties of man,

Where all the mischief in the world
Begins its onward course,
And naught but science knowledge
Can stay its onward force.

For what is called the Christian plan of salvation has degraded the human race, and made a nation of pauper slaves, dependent on a vain chimera of priestly, nonsensical faith, impossible for all to embrace, and which has wrapped the world in gloom, set man against his brother man, and drenched the earth with human gore.

Then halt, ye doctors of the law,
And of the gospel too,
Your nostrums are a failure,
Administered by you.

Respectfully, E. W. ALLEN.

ALLEN'S PILL,

For the cure of a species of hydrophobia prevalent with many about the time of election. Free for all. May be taken at any time or in any manner, to suit the patient.

Come, listen, my friends, I'll giv you a rule
By which to determin a knave or a fool:
He who insists on your voting with him,
His wisdom and virtue are feeble and slim.
I care not how high, how lofty and great,
I count him but dross, a feather in weight,
In this land of freedom, of the free and the brave.
Now swallow this pill, thou fool of a knave,
And rally, my friends, to do as you please,
And spurn with contempt those insolent fleas.

Given forth the first day of the tenth month in the year of our Lord 1848, by one of his majesty's most humble subjects. Respectfully, E. W. A.

SAN JOSE, CAL, Oct. 15, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I notice that in your issue of October 2d Mr. Osborn refers to Stilson Hutchins as a slanderer of that estimable lady Mrs. Annie Besant. A man by the name of Stilson Hutchins edited a Copperhead newspaper in Dubuque, Ia., in 1862 and 1863, While the boys in blue were fighting for freedom, Stilson Hutchins was doing all in his power to aid the rebels through his Northern paper. He made violent speeches against the government in the summer of 1863 in different parts of Dubuque county. From Dubuque he went to St. Louis, Mo. His Copperhead Record is well known at Dubuque. Is it not possible that the slanderer of the United States government and of Mrs. Besant is Stilson Hutchins, the Dubuque Copperhead?

HASTINGS, MICH., Oct. 23, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am very much disappointed in the action of Bro. Green and Robert G Ingersoll at Chicago, but I think the National Liberal League will hold together and grow stronger every day so long as we hav a Wakeman and a Leland to pilot the way for us.

If the League has any important work to perform it is to destroy Comstockism. Hoping it will soon be accomplished, I am Sincerely yours, GEORGE WOOD.

has had few equals and no superiors. Next we have Jacob's well; the temple of Dagon, the bad god of the Philistines; Rebecca giving water to Abraham's servant when in search of a fit wife; of Isaac, and old father Abraham on the point of sticking a big, sharp butcher-knife into the body of his son Isaac, when Jehovah stopped him and supplied a good fat ram instead of the lad. The statues of this pilaster represent Matthew and Mark, and it does not make a bit of difference which is taken for which or which for the other. You call either of them, and there they are.

The bas-relief of the frontispiece of the middle and main door shows just how Jahveh created the world out of nothing. On the sides are two symbolical statues, one representing the Old Testament and the other the New. If two more had represented the "Arabian Nights" and "Gulliver's Travels," it would have been equally appropriate and true. In the superior window are two statues—Moses and John the Baptist. If Moses should be mistaken for John no harm would result from it. In fact, every visitor is permitted to take his choice as to which is which. Several other minor statues adorn this front, but it is hardly necessary to name them all. It is sufficient to say the whole thing is a forest of statues, and cost in the aggregate hundreds of years of toilsome work. I could give you the names of the artists who executed them, but what would be the use? They were Italians, Giovanni this, or Guiseppe that, and Antonio the other, whom you never heard of before and will never hear of again.

On the next pillar is represented Saul in his attempt to slay David, and if he had succeeded it would have served David right; also David's vision—which, I give you my word for it, was one of the wildest visions that ever were seen by any visionist that ever saw a vision—is represented by statues of St. Luke and St. John. One can hardly think, however, when beholding them, how differently they wrote their accounts of the same events they attempted to describe. On the same pillar is carved an ash tree, which bears considerable resemblance to something which has existed, which is considerable more than can be said of many of the others.

Of the representations around the fourth door is Jael driving a nail into the head of the sleeping Sisera; more glory of the angels; Eli as wakened by an angel; the Tower of Babel; David holding up the head of Goliath after he had cut it off; Esau yielding up his birthright to his false and treacherous brother; the sacrifice of Noah after the flood, when animals were by no means plenty. That sacrifice, under the circumstances, should have been appreciated. The cornice and opening of the fifth and last door are ornamented by the queen of Sheba listening to Solomon; Hagar in the desert; Abel immolating a lamb, which pleased Jahveh so much better than a vegetable offering; Gideon before the battle with the Midianites; Samson slaying the lion; the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah; Samson carrying off the gates of Gaza; Absalom hung by the hair of his head; Hagar's flight when Abraham cruelly drove her away, with statues of several saints. I think no one will doubt but what work enough was laid out upon the exterior of this house of worship.

As the visitor enters the interior he is struck with the view of a forest of columns and a forest of various works of grandeur and art. Some of the capitals of the fifty-two columns contain eight large statues, others sixteen, twenty-four, thirty-six, and forty-eight. The ceiling of the arches of the naves looks like sculptured marble, like lace work, open and very intricate. If this is so, it must have required an inconceivable amount of labor. The inside ornamentation of the five large doors is most elaborate, but there is so much of it all that I can hardly give all the details. The forty-two stained glass windows are a marvel in themselves, and the designs alone would require a long letter to describe. The floor or pavement of the entire cathedral is of rich stones in various colors and laid in mosaic work so that the whole floor looks much as though covered with a magnificently-figured carpet. This floor alone must have cost several fortunes and years and years of patient toil.

As the journey is made around the interior of this immense edifice the eye is constantly being struck with works of great cost, and executed with the highest skill. There are numerous chapels surrounding the immense room, and much larger than I have seen in some other cathedrals, and each one is most richly decorated with marble altars, images of the Virgin, her son, sometimes being just born, and the wise men from the East who strangely learned of the event, so as to nearly have arrived there to witness the absolute occurrence; sometimes being condemned by Pilate, sometimes bearing his cross to Mount Calvary, often being nailed to it, and often after he was taken from it, lying limp and dead, or his mother holding him in her lap, when he was only a corpse.

All these conceptions, besides many more, are represented both in statuary and painting, which I tire at the thought of writing out in full. At the entrance, and over it, are two balconies, the painted glass windows of which represent Michael fighting the dragon, and the four doctors of the church, and St. Charles, who is giving alms to the poor of Milan. As we turn to the right we find a large stone tomb, containing the ashes of Aribert, once an archbishop of Milan. Next is a sepulchral urn of red marble, supported by two equal columns, where lie the ashes of Ottoni, another archbishop and viscount. A little further on is a monument commemorative of Marco Carelli, who by devise gave 35,000 golden ducats toward the building of the cathedral, for which meritorious deed any priest will tell you that his soul is now inhabiting some one of the blissful mansions of paradise. Following on we come to a monument commemorative of Constantine's remarkable conversion, when after a bloody battle, or when he was marching to one, he, Paul-like, saw a vision in the heavens, of a cross, and heard the voice, "By this shalt thou conquer," meaning that if he would adopt the cross on which Jesus was crucified, he might fight and spill as much blood as he pleased and be victorious every time.

An Open Letter to H. L. Green.

FRIEND GREEN: Your circular letter relating to the disaffection among the members of the Fourth Congress of the National Liberal League regarding the repeal of the so-called Comstock postal law, with the proposition for calling an informal conference looking to the organization of a Liberal association, on a restrictiv basis, is at hand.

In reply I would say that I sincerely regret that the Congress could not consistently hav restricted its deliberations in the interest of harmony and good will, to measures that would hav enlisted the activ support of all its members, and especially of yourself and Col. Ingersoll.

I see no objection to the formation of a new organization for the exclusiv object of state secularization, as set forth in said circular, provided a large number of Liberals cannot conscientiously labor in the broader fields of the old League. Possibly some of the proceedings of the Liberal Congress may hav been unwise and impolitic, yet I fail to discover any important measure adopted that appears dishonorable or unjust, or that I could not consistently support.

In regard to the Comstock legislation, it is evident to me that the law was concocted by designing religionists, not so much in the interest of morality as for getting control of the judiciary, and establishing a kind of star-chamber ruling in order to punish obnoxious Infidels under the flimsy charge of constructiv obscenity, and for the purpose of crushing Freethought by adjudging irreligious truths immoral. And furthermore to establish a jesuitical espionage over the mails, in order to suppress the dissemination of "ungodly" facts.

Although it might hav been policy to hav waved the question of repeal, if, as stated, the measure was opposed by a large proportion of the assembly. Yet, in view of the elastic nature of the law, which evidently is well adapted to maladministration by modern Torquemadas of bigotry; in view of its dangerous intermeddling with the public mails, and the constitutional guarantee of a free press; and seeing the ruthless work of persecution of honorable men, for the dissemination of their honest convictions, by the unscrupulous hands to which the enforcement of this law has been committed, it seems to me passing strange that, among Liberals, there should be a question in relation to its disposal.

I regard the law as a usurpation by the general government of states rights in the prosecution and punishment of moral offenses, a device concocted and practically used by fanatical pietists as a menace to overawe anti-religious writers. Hence, had I been present as a delegate I should hav voted for unconditional repeal.

I am decidedly in favor of the statute relating to obscene literature being controled, as are other criminal laws, by state legislation, where the authority legitimately belongs, and where for centuries it has been exercised more consistently and impartially than by the general government since its officious interposition, and while, as at present, engineered in the interest of religious cliques.

I hav no confidence in the Pharisaical assumption of reverend hypocrits, who seek to pander to popular prejudice by besprinkling Infidels and Freethinkers with their favorit "obscenity" perfume, for I know too well the godliness of jesuitism, to mistake a tinseled mask of squeamishness for innate chastity, and hav too keenly felt the poisonous sting of their pious slander, while seeking the release from "durance vile" of an eminent victim of their insidious wiles, not to detest the exposition of such mock-virtue.

It matters not how conservativ or how radical may be the League on social questions, for therein lies not the offense. If we dare to expose pastoral pranks, and show up ministerial mummery, if we persist in doing our own theological thinking, and refuse to countenance ecclesiastical error, we must expect our reputation to be smirched by scandal and the scum of obscenity, which seem uppermost in their thoughts.

I know professed pietists who, with mock-propriety, affect to be shocked by the public discussion of sexual relations, yet who, in private, freely use language that a Freethinker might well blush to repeat.

I do not believe a single member of the Liberal Congress would countenance obscene literature, either Christian, pagan, or profane, as was publicly avowed by resolution to that effect. And yet the charge by votaries of superstition will be flaunted in their faces, regardless of facts. And even though the Congress had voted for modification of Comstockism instead of repeal, had sought to lop a few branches of the evil instead of plucking up by the roots, it would hav been all the same.

To be a Freethinker or Liberal reformer is regarded by fossilized bigots as equivalent to being guilty of all that is gross and mean. Thus has it been from time immemorial, as was illustrated by the "Rt. Revs." of Judea in the arrest and execution of that radical reformer, Jesus Christ. And as is also shown under the present priestly domination by the malicious persecution of D. M. Bennett, Dr. Foote, Heywood, Lant, Barter, and other noble champions of Freethought.

Evidently the only way for Radicals to escape the anathemas of squeamish pietists is to utterly renounce mental freedom, join the church, and play the hypocrit, where, as saintly subjects, they can prate purity while practicing promiscuity, and, by freely contributing to church coffers, may cheat and defame heretics "for Christ's sake," and thus be enabled to "lay up treasures" in the orthodox heaven, that exclusiv Christian penitentiary, where the moral thieves cannot break out and steal our reputation.

Then, even "though their sins be red as scarlet they shall be as wool," for it is well known that sin is the bell-wether of the flock that furnishes soft fleeces for the pastoral back.

Norwich, Conn., Oct., 1880. BYRON BOARDMAN.

P. S.—FRIEND GREEN: Whatever may be the outcome of the contemplated conference I hope you may be eminently successful in your anti-theological crusade.

I hav great confidence in your personal integrity, and know you to be a brave soldier in the grand campaign for the emancipation of truth from religious thraldom.

With your energy and capacity as a writer and speaker you will accomplish much good in the cause that may command your labors. And certainly there is still plenty of hard work to be accomplished in your chosen field—the secularization of the state. B. B.

The Reign of Bible Miracles is Doomed.

Let us see how this is so. Herodotus relates that when the Persian invaders came to Delphi, two local heroes, buried near the place, Phylacus and Antonous, arose and were seen of more than mental stature, fighting against the Persians. He relates that before the onset at Salamis the vision of a woman appeared over an Æginetan ship, and cried in a voice which all the Grecian fleet heard, "Good souls, how long will ye keep barking?" He relates that at Pedasus, in the neighborhood of Halicarnassus, the priestess of Athens had a miraculous sprouting of beard whenever any grievous calamity was about to befall the people around; he says in one place that twice this miraculous growth had happened, in another that it had happened thrice. Herodotus writes here of times when he was himself alive, not of a fabulous antiquity. He and his countrymen were not less acute, arguing, critical people than the Jews of Palestine, but much more. Herodotus himself finally is a man of a beautiful character, and of pure, good faith.

But we do not believe that Phylacus and Antonous arose out of their graves and were seen fighting with the Persians; we know by experience, we all say, how this sort of story grows up. And that, after the crucifixion then, many saints arose and came out of their graves and went into the holy city and appeared unto many. Is not this, too, a story of which we must say, the moment we fairly put it side by side with the other, that it is of the same kind with it, and that we know how the sort of story grows up? That the phantom woman called to the Æginetan crew at Salamis, "How long will ye keep backing?" we do not believe any the more because we are told that all the Grecian fleet heard it. We know, we all say, by experience, that this is just the sort of corroboration naturally added to such a story. But we are asked to believe that Jesus after his death actually cried to Paul on the way to Damascus, "It is hard for them to kick against the pricks," because the bystanders are said to hav heard it ( ), although, to be sure, in another place ( ), with the looseness natural to such a story, the bystanders are said to hav heard this voice. That the Salamis story and the Damascus story are of one kind, and of what kind, strikes us the moment that we put the two stories together.

The miraculous beard of the priestess of Pedasus is really just like the miraculous dumbness of Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist. The priestess, however, is said by Herodotus, in one place to hav twice had her marvelous beard, in another to hav had it thrice; and the discrepancy proves, we all say, how loose and unhistorical this kind of story is. But yet when Jesus is, in the second gospel, said to hav healed as he departed from Jericho one blind man who sat by the wayside, in the first gospel to hav healed, as he departed from Jericho, two blind men who sat by the wayside, there is here, we are asked to believe, no discrepancy really at all. Two different healings are meant which were performed at two different visits to Jericho, or perhaps they were performed at one and the same visit, but one was performed as Jesus entered the city, and the other as he left it. And the words of St. Mark, "And he came to Jericho, and as he went out of Jericho blind Bartimeus sat by the wayside," really mean that Bartimæus sat there as Jesus went into Jericho and two other blind men sat by the wayside as he went out. How arbitrary, unnatural, and vain such an explanation is, what a mean device of our own to make a solid history out of a legend, we never feel so irresistibly as when we put the Jericho story by the side of others like it.—Arnold's "God and the Bible."

W. S BELL, writes: "How about the respectables—don't show up formidably do they? Ingersoll reckoned without his host."

Yes, dear Bell, but the host reckoned with him and he couldn't pay the reckoning. T. C. L.

Priestcraft and Politics.

Impartial Freethinkers to gl
Above superstition to liberty's throne,
Free press and free mails you hav boldly defended,
And triumphed o'er all opposition alone,*
On the learn'd battlefields made persecutors yield
And won the fresh laurels that circle your brow;
Made contentions to cease and gave all mankind peace.
All loyal Americans honor you now.
But to papists and heretics still we are slaves,
And to-day we are victims of sanctified knaves.
We must pay their church taxes, "Believe or be damned,"
And with infernal dogmas our minds must be crammed.
Indeed, hell is the rule taught to children at school,
And if we are not Christians we all must be damned.

Freethinkers and truth-seekers freedom possessing,
This glorious trust they bestow and they crave.
This sacred inheritance, infinit blessing,
Is always the gift of the noble and brave.
As the great Thomas Paine did all tyrants disdain,
Myths, falsehoods, and bigots truth-seekers despise.
It is well understood that man's infinit good
In time and eternity Infidels prize.
In the grave they insist it is better to dwell
Than with God if he tortures all nations in hell.
Will mankind be forever dupes, victims, and slaves
Of a torturing God, hell, devils, and knaves?

Truth-seekers, the rights of mankind while defending,
To glory and honor and fame they arise;
And like the bold eagle still higher ascending
To that elevation which Liberals prize.
As our fathers were free, so till death we will be,
The false creeds of Christians with t th we'll assail.
We may fill loyal graves, but we scorn t be slaves
While the star-spangled banner floats on the gale.
Scientific Americans never are slaves
Of a torturing God and of sanctified knaves.

A voice came from Brussels across the wide ocean,
"Come over and help us break bigotry's chain!"
Americans answered with loyal devotion,
Invited all nations to join the grand train.
And in phalanx unite for perfection and right,
Expose cruel Christians on every shore
Till the Infidel cause, truth, and impartial laws,
Shall triumph forever till time is no more.
Break the chains of all nations, release all the slaves
From their Christian oppressors, priests, preachers, and knaves.

We hav won many battles. Once they would burn us.
'Tis true inquisitions and tortures are past,
But heretics now do imprison and spurn us—
Make us slaves here on earth, then hell us at last.
But pure science and truth, although yet in their youth,
Put a veto on priestcraft, tortures, and pain.
So that we may be free, on the land and the sea,
Equal rights like our fathers we may obtain.
And the sons of bold heroes be free as the waves
When all Christian oppressors hav gone to their graves.

As soon as the churches and states are united †Our freedom and happiness both will be lost.
For writing new thoughts we may now be indicted,
Imprisoned, and fined, and saints liv on the cost.
This is usurpation in this boasted nation—
Is more than American freemen will stand.
In this dark, trying hour the ballot has power
To repeal unjust laws in this happy land.
All true, good, loyal men to the ballot-box fly!
Save your country by votes or by bullets and die.

Free press and free mails to obtain and defend them,
All vote as one man and refuse to be slaves.
Republican frauds, to the devil we'll send them.
Time brings persecutors to infamous graves.
Loyal people, unite for the absolute right!
Vote Liberal tickets! Stand firm in the van!
If all votes are thus cast we'll get justice at last
For saints and for sinners, for woman and man.
And remember this plan is good, better, and best
For all nations by bigots and tyrants oppressed.
Vote alike, and to Christians no longer be slaves
While the earth bears a plant and the sea rolls its waves.

Poor victims, you need THE TRUTH SEEKER's protection.
"God's people" hav treated you very unjust,
But you will survive in man's fondest affection
When Christian oppressors hav moldered to dust.
May your spirits arise to ineffable skies,
Sweet flowers be planted to hallow your rest;
Persecution endured, and man's freedom secured,
In all coming time in the lands you hav blest.

*Wakeman versus Ingersoll in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 2, 1880. Pages 636, 637. Grand sentiments indeed.

† The usurper Hayes's administration has been distinguished in a peculiar manner for bigotry and cruelty. Persecutions resulting in death to many victims without any adequate cause on the part of the silent dead. Cruel Christian Republicans hav very unjustly imprisoned, fined, ruined, and sent to the grave many innocent persons for really pretended offenses. Comstock boasts of fifteen defunct victims.

WHAT WERE THEY PERSECUTED FOR?

Persecuted principally for being unbelievers in Christianity.
Persecuted for being Liberals, Freethinkers, truth seekers, Infidels, etc., whom Christians hav persecuted in all ages to the extent of their power.
Persecuted for being pagans, Jews, Turks, papists, heretics, skeptics, and lunatics.
Persecuted for writing and mailing a philosophical pamphlet which should be read and understood simply for self-preservation.
Persecuted for publishing and selling Infidel books which Comstock threatened to suppress.
Persecuted for publishing THE TRUTH SEEKER, the most just and Liberal paper in the world.
Persecuted for "if" such books and papers are not suppressed Christianity will soon become defunct, and all clergymen must go to work for a living. But this would be too great improvement and progression for this age of the world.
Persecuted for selling syringes—very indispensable articles indeed.

Query—Why was not Comstock punished for exposing nude females in the city of New York? Was this a less or smaller crime than selling syringes?

Last, but not least, the Christian president of this great, free nation absolutely refused to grant the petitions, prayers, and entreaties of two hundred thousand loyal subjects of this government to release an innocent victim from the cruel clutches of a most unjust and unconstitutional law. Both Hayes and Devens acknowledged that the prisoner, D. M. Bennett, had committed no crime, because the pamphlet (for mailing which he was indicted) was not obscene and therefore it was not amenable to the Comstock obscene law. O consistency, thou art a jewel. O Christianity, what hast thou done? Let the shades and spirits of thy murdered millions answer. Perhaps our pious persecuting, sanctified Christians like Comstock will kindly giv us the exact number of their victims.

And the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones.—Rev. xxi, 19.

For modes of faith let graceless bigots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right;
In faith and hope the world will disagree,
But all mankind's concern is charity;
All must be false that thwart this one great end;
And all of God that bless mankind, or mend.
—Pope.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1880.

I wish to notify the public that a Mr. Baldwin, of Chicago, also Rhodes & McClure, of the same place, are publishing pamphlet editions of my lectures. All the lectures published by them are grossly inaccurate—filled with mistakes, horribly printed, and outrageously unjust to me. These men are simple literary thieves and pirates, and are obtaining money from the public under false pretenses. I take this course to warn the public that these publications are fraudulent. The only correct copies of my lectures are published by C. P. Farrell. All others are published by people who are willing to steal from me and defraud the public vender. These wretches hav published one lecture under four titles, and several others under two or three.

All of C. P. Farrell's editions of Col. Ingersoll's works, and none others, are sold at this office. D. M. BENNETT.

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY.

BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,

Graduate of the Hygeio-Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.

The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

— ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

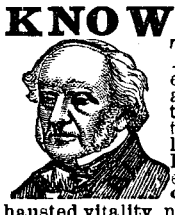
A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.



The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth: price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers by permission to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Association.

Address Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To Miss Anna Knoop, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

[From the Western Reformer.]

is a highly educated and scientific physician. He has an original system of practice, and is perfectly reliable and trustworthy. We hav heard many flattering reports of his successful cures of diseases incident to humanity."

JUST OUT!

Another Extraordinary Book!

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind.

Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Gems of Thought.

TRUTH is truth, if it fall from Satan's lips; and error ought to be rejected, though preached by an angel from heaven.—R. D. Owen.

IT often falls out that somewhat is produced of nothing, for lies are sufficient to breed opinion and opinion brings a substance.—Bacon's Essays.

To believe without examination, however it may accord with our natural indolence, is unworthy of the mind of man.—Account of Eacon in L. U. K.

WE see men frequently dextrous and sharp enough in making a bargain who, if you reason with them about matters of religion, appear perfectly stupid.—Locke.

TRUTH is a benefit, and a benefit of the first importance to those who receive it themselves, even though they should have to lament its rejection by many others.—Whately.

THE improvement of human life on earth is the first religious duty of man, and the worth of that life the one great truth to be taught in our pulpits and on our platforms.—L. K. Washburn.

SEIZE upon truth wherever it is found,
Whether on Christian or on heathen ground;
The flower's divine where'er it grows;
Neglect the thistle and assume the rose.
—Watts.

ALWAYS be cheerful and good-natured. Be more ready to praise and commend good deeds and work well done than to condemn, blame, and scold for errors, mistakes, and shortcomings.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THAT an opinion is the opinion of the multitude is to some a powerful recommendation; to others it appears an infallible criterion of error; to those who are truly rational it will be neither.—Dr. G. Campbell.

THE way to rise to sudden popularity is to be a plausible advocate of prevailing doctrins and to defend, with some appearance of originality, something which men like to believe but hav no good reason for believing.—Archbishop Whately.

JESUS took the same view of the Sabbath as he did of facts, and was equally bold in carrying out his views in either case. To observe the Sabbath was in itself of no consequence whatever. If it helped a man to reach his true destiny, let him abide by it; if not, he was at liberty to neglect it.—Bible for Learners.

NATURE, a mother kind alike to all,
Still grants her bliss a laborer's earnest call.
With food as well the peasant is supplied
On Idra's cliffs as Arno's shelvy side;
And though the rocky-crested summits frown,
These rocks, by custom, turn to beds of down.
—Goldsmith.

THE Augurs in Rome went about the streets on their solemn office, laughing in their sleeve at each other as they met, long after the religious belief which appointed their service had did out from all the intelligent classes of the population. This insincere tenacity of the forms of religion is indeed one of the saddest proofs of the decay of belief, and there is not a little of it in our own day.—W. I. Potter.

MY name is Fun, your cronie dear,
The nearest friend ye hae:
An' this is superstition here,
An' that's hypocrisy.

I'm gaun to Machlin Holy Fair
To spend an hour in daffin;
Gin ye'll go there, you wretched pair,
We will get famous laughin' at them this day.
—Burns.

IT was great blasphemy when the devil said, "I will ascend and be like the highest;" but it is greater blasphemy to personate God and bring him in saying, "I will descend and be like the prince of darkness;" and what is it better to make the cause of religion to descend to the cruel and execrable actions of murdering princes, butchery of people, and subverting of states and governments? Surely this is to bring down the Holy Ghost instead of the likeness of a dove, in the shape of a vulture or raven, and to set out of the bark of a Christian church a flag of a bark of pirates and assassins. —Bacon's Essays.

IT IS important to remember that, in strictness, there is no such thing as an uneducated man. Take an extreme case. Suppose that an adult man, in the full reign of his faculties, could be suddenly placed in the world, as Adam is said to hav been, and then left to do as he best might. How long would he be left uneducated? Not five minutes. Nature would begin to teach him, through the eye, the ear, the touch, the properties of objects. Pain and pleasure would be at his elbow telling him to do this and avoid that, and by slow degrees the man would receive an education which, if narrow, would be thoroughly real and adequate to his circumstances, though there would be no extras and very few accomplishments.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

WE all know that the disciples of Jesus do unto others as they would that others should do unto them, and that the disciples of Confucius do not unto others anything that they would not hav others do to them. Surely such people ought to liv together in perfect peace. Our religion can only be brought into contempt by the actions of those who profess to be governed by its teachings. If you wish to impress the Chinese with the value of your religion, show them that Christians are better than heathens. Prove to them that what you are pleased to call the "living God" teaches higher and holier things, a holier and purer code of morals, than can be found among pagans. Excel these wretches in industry, in honesty, in reverence for parents, in cleanliness, in frugality, and, above all, by advocating the absolute liberty of human thought.—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

THE REASON WHY.

Now doth the old maid busy be
T' improve each shinning hour,
And gather scandal all the day,
Because the grapes are sour.

THE meanest woman on record is the one who ran up to a lady friend on the street, and said: "Of course you've heard of the scandal in our church? Awful, isn't it? Oh, here's my car." She took her car and was gone. The other lady had not heard.

AN Englishman recently made the remark, "There is no American woman who can walk a mile without becoming tired to death." That's all right. Let him marry one and send her word that her husband has gone to the theater with another woman. She'll find that theater if its a million miles off, will carry an Indian club all the way, and although he may do his best pedestrianism act home, she'll be at the front door before he's under the bed.

THE time has arrived when the average citizen can be seen out in the back yard spanking the stovepipe, and after he has it nicely cleaned on the inside, and a silvery polish on the outside, he carries it up stairs only to find that he will either hav to purchase a new pipe to fit the stove, or a new stove to fit the pipe, and then he sits down and wonders whether he'll murder his family and commit suicide, or keep warm by buying parlor skates for all hands.

THE flue of Mr. Bunk's chimney having been stopped, he looked up and saw what he thought to be an old coat in the orifice. He loaded his gun and discharged it up the chimney. The old coat was Mrs. Bunks, and just as he fired she washed out the flue with a tub of hot water. Mrs. Bunks now wears railroad tracks up her arms and Bunk's back is only about half cooked. And the children now carry messages between their mother's mother's house and their mother's children's father's house.

THE hunter man now starts out in the morning with his gun and tells his wife not to get any meat for dinner, that he'll fix that all right. He arrives home about dark with two fingers and a work-house robbin in his pocket, and when he ascertains that there's nothing cooked he hooplas around and lies out of his bad luck by explaining that the law isn't up yet, and that he could hav shot a deer if he hadn't been afraid of being arrested. He finally compromises by painting a picture of a ham on a piece of paper, and superinduces nightmare by placing it under his pillow and going to sleep on it.

THE "JOURNAL" SUNDAY MAGIC.

"What is Sunday?" says the cynic.
It's a blank of woe;
Of inferno it's a mimic—
Nowhere can we go.
Nothing can one fill the time with,
"Blues" giv one despair;
Should the world be made of Sundays
Never came the noisy Mondays.
Truly, I declare,
I would rather never "quick" be,
I would of my living sick be,
Than such sorrow share.
Sure that Dante, when he wrote his
Awful vision down,
Missed a point and failed to quote this Sullen Sunday town.
Here we hav the hell of silence
Half a hundred days;
Only church bells take to violence,
And the devil raise.
I am gaping, I am yawning,
From the dawn of early morning.
The papers? Read them through
All the dreary, dreary Sunday.
Pray I for the happy Monday—
Pray, oh pray, what can I do?

MORAL OF THE MUSKETO MURDER.

A giddy Master Musketo said
To his father fond and his mother true,
"I reckon, before I go to bed,
I will browse around for an hour or two."

"My child," said his ma, "it is very late,
And I hate to hav you out o'nights;
Many a youth has met his fate
Running around and seeing the sights."

"Beware, my child," said his pa discreet,
With a wink as his son prepared to go;
"Beware of the women you chance to meet;
They're dangerous people to tackle, you know."

Master Musketo shook his head,
And a sort of a cynical smile he smiled;
He didn't care what his parents said,
The giddy, thoughtless, frivolous child.

Out of the August night and dew,
Out of the moonbeams' mellow light,
In through a window wide he flew,
Singing along in his merry flight.

And his silly heart beat high, I'll vouch,
And his giddy brain was all aglow
As he spied an arm on a downy couch—
An arm as soft and as white as snow.

At the t'other end of that comely arm
Was a maiden hymning a virgin snore,
And she looked so innocent and so calm
That Master Musketo pined for her gore.

Down on that arm he swooped and lit,
Bating his music all so shrill;
Down on that arm he bored and bit,
And stroked his sides as he drank his fill.

Well, ah well! the snoring stops,
And a virgin up on her elbow leans,
And a maiden hand like a mallet drops,
Smashing our friend into smithereens.

O youth! the moral herein you find
Should all of your solemnest thoughts engage:
If our friend had avoided womankind
He might hav lived to a ripe old age.

Revelations of Antichrist

Christ and Christianity.

"ANTICHRIST" proves from history that James, Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus.

The book contains 446 pages, with a full Index and table of contents. Price, $2.00.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. David Swing, of Chicago, says that the lie has declined in popularity. "It is quite certain," he asserts, "that the Hebrews and the Persians and Greeks surpassed America in the steadfastness of their falsification."

ADIRONDACK MURRAY, who was long hidden from the sight of his fellow-townsmen, emerges in Boston this month with three lectures—Free Trade, the Wilderness, Eternal Evidence. He might take, for a fourth lecture, Escapades in Buckboard Wagons.

THE Roman populace delight in a festivity known as the "Ottobrate," or the celebrating of Thursdays and Sundays in October in honor of Bacchus; and last month was observed by them in the hills and vineyards around Rome in an unusually jubilant style.

THE Irish constabulary was for all Ireland on July 1, 1879, 11,159 men and inspectors, leaving 297 vacancies to bring it up to its nominal strength. On June 30, 1880, the total strength was 11,448, leaving the number of existing vacancies on that date only 48.

THE Campbellite church at Washington is a small and mean structure. In anticipation of Garfield's worship drawing a crowd, an enlargement is talked of. The Foundry Methodist church, where Hayes did his worshiping, will now lose its chief attraction for visitors.

PRESIDENT ELIOT has sent to the parents of Harvard undergraduates an inquiry whether their sons hav been accustomed to attend prayers at home, and requesting opinions on compulsory attendance in the chapel. This is a possible preliminary to making religious worship voluntary at Harvard.

THE Republican party in Italy has grown very aggressiv recently under the stimulus of Garibaldi's pronunciamentos; but its more moderate leaders, chief among whom is Aurelio Saffi, are in favor of dilatory and legal action exclusivly. The program of the radical is, "No king on earth or in heaven."

FOUR negroes were found in an Alabama graveyard going through with mummeries which they thought were to giv them certain magical powers. One was on his knees praying at the head of a grave, another was on his knees cursing at the foot, and the other two were playing a game of cards in the center.

ANOTHER Roman Catholic priest, the Abbe de Biegy, has gone over to the new faith of Hyacinthe Loyson. This is the third French priest converted to the Gallican church during the past month; but a priest who joined M. Loyson at an earlier date, and afterward brought an unsuccessful action against him, has returned to the Roman fold.

PRINCE BISMARCK has sent a commission to Alsace to study the condition of the workmen there, especially with regard to their dwellings, which are somewhat on the English cottage principle, every man living in his own house. This system seems to be in favor with the Chancellor, who wishes it to be introduced all over Germany by government help.

THE church is now suffering severely from the disingenuousness and cowardice of preachers who are serving under its colors when they belong to the army of Infidelity. They are afraid to express their honest opinions in public, for they wish to keep their places, and they therefore preach a milk-and-water religion which reduces their congregations to the verge of spiritual starvation.—Sun.

THE partnership of the French Rothschilds, which expired on Oct. 1st, has been renewed. It is to end in 1905. The capital of the house is fixed at two million pounds sterling. Barons Alphonse, Gustave, and Edmond Rothschild are each to furnish one-third. The registration of the deed of partnership cost sixty-two thousand francs.

PART of a graveyard at Morehead, Kentucky, was destroyed in building a railroad, and indignant ghosts from the disturbed coffins hav taken possession of the station house which stands on the spot. So say the ticket agent and other employees, at least, and they hav proved their sincerity by resigning their positions.

DR. HENRY DRAPER has lately been pushing his astronomical photography with great success. He has exchanged his twelve-inch telescope for an eleven-inch one, with a photographic correcting lens by Clark, which performs admirably. He has succeeded in obtaining photographs of Polaris and Venus, with their so-called companions, little stars very near the large ones; also of Jupiter and his satellites. In the case of Vega, the image of the companion was brought out satisfactorily by twenty minutes' exposure, using a dry-plate process.

M. M. POMEROY is to erect a handsome, modern style, business block in Denver the coming year. It will be built of stone and brick, with an iron front. Size 100 feet front by 120 feet deep, with 80 by 120 feet of the second and third story to be made into a handsome lecture-room, to be known as Liberal Hall, and dedicated to free thought and free speech. In this temple of liberty, men and women who hav anything to say can say it; and if old, worn-out creeds cannot stand the racket, let them fall.—Great West.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the best of Liberal papers, and goes courageously on its way in spite of all obstacles. It believes that mortals hav their hands full to get through this world without bothering about a hereafter. It goes for honesty, truth, good morals, and swallows none of the superb natural nonsense known as "religion," but practices the religion of doing right here instead of doing wrong and depending on a pardon in an unknown world. The paper is a large, sixteen-page weekly. Terms, $3 a year. It is worth reading, and will suit a good many.—Star Spangled Banner.

IN Roumelia the rose harvest is reported to hav been an exceedingly abundant one this year, the value of the total yield exceeding, it is estimated, one million francs. The richest harvest of late years, however, was in 1876, when 3,300 pounds of attar of roses, of the value of 932,017 francs, was exported from Philippopolis alone. The attar is principally exported to France, Austria, America, and Germany, England obtaining what she requires from India. The French scent manufacturers, and especially the Parisian, buy the finest qualities of attar, while the second qualities are mostly sent to Russia and Austria.

THE Rev. Dr. Cuyler says, in the Congregationalist, that a vital question is the small attendance at religious services. "It requires but half an eye to discover the alarming fact that this attendance is steadily falling off, both in the cities and in the country, both at the East and in the West. Forty years ago it was claimed that one-half of the population of the city of New York were either wholly or partially connected with some Protestant congregation. Now only one-fourth of the population are ever seen in any Protestant place of worship." Dr. Cuyler adds that on the first Sunday in October the fifteen most popular churches in this city, capable of seating 20,000 persons, held only 10,500.

IT appears by an Odessa circular that the total stock of wheat in that market is eighty thousand quarters, whereas, to keep the mill going until the opening of the navigation in March, no fewer than 600,000 are required. Russia, which ordinarily exports 40,000,000 quarters, will now hav to buy grain. The Golos gloomily points out that there is small grounds for looking forward with any degree of confidence to a good harvest in the future. The thousands of insect pests which, aided by improvidence and the communal system, hav brought things to their present pass, hav defied the efforts made to exterminate them, and lie safely hidden under the snow until spring enables them to resume their destructiv work. The Golos puts the expenditure of Russia this year at 26,843,461 roubles over the revenue. Things are altogether in a poor plight there.

A NEW musical instrument has been invented by a Russian peasant. The York house papers say it is composed of a framework sustaining a number of wheels, with rims so grooved and notched as to make a humming noise when rapidly revolved. Each wheel sounds a different note, and as the required rate of revolution cannot be immediately attained or discontinued, many remarkable effects may be produced, which with the peculiar timbre of the instrument, renders the invention a decided addition to the musical world. It is known in Moscow as the kalophone, and is shortly to be exhibited in Paris and London.

THE Christian Advocate and Zion's Herald are enjoying a spirited discussion as to whether the Methodists of Saratoga were right or wrong in letting the Unitarians use their church for the Annual Council. The Advocate sees in this liberality with the church building the entering wedge of a looseness which will some day allow the Unitarians to use Methodist churches on Sundays. The controversy waxes hot. Both papers seem to hav forgotten that when the Methodists hold their general conferences they hire all the biggest theaters they can procure, and that in the case of the recent conference at Cincinnati an Infidel lecture from Col. Ingersoll was sandwiched in on Sunday evening, when the Methodists used the building on Saturday and on Monday.

THERE is a brisk and busy breeze in what was the Presbyterian church at Dunkirk, of which the Rev. Mr. Adams is or was pastor. The Presbytery deposed Mr. Adams for heresy, and declared his pulpit empty. A majority of the congregation stood by Mr. Adams, and said that the pulpit was not vacant at all and should not be as long as they could get Mr. Adams to remain in it. The minority has been declared by the Presbytery to be the Presbyterian church and to hav a right to the property. Thus the church is divided against itself. The Adams party holds possession, and ex-brother Adams is to preach regularly until further notice. Litigation will at once commence in a civil court with a view of finding out the real owner or owners. The wealth of the church belongs to the Adams party.

THE question of corporal punishment in the public schools has arisen anew in Boston. The superintendent says: "Teachers of both sexes use personal violence with their pupils in such forms and such frequency that the facts if published would cause unpleasantness. Some put children into painful and even dangerous positions; some shake them at times with such roughness as to tear their clothing, while many still apply the rattan as freely as if it were a feather, and strike not merely the hand, but the head and body. Within the last month or two some piteous cases hav been reported to me by parents whose children had suffered. The monthly reports of some grammar schools come in ringing with the echoes of the blows." A committee examined into the subject, and a majority reported in favor of dismissing teachers who inflicted whipping, except on boys in the grammar departments.

THE present standing of the Rev. Hiram W. Thomas in the Rock River Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church is an ecclesiastical curiosity. He is a minister in good standing, for he has neither been tried nor disciplined. On account of the questions raised as to his alleged heterodoxy, he was not assigned to a pastorate at the recent meeting of Conference, and he is therefore free to do as he pleases with his time and effort. His brethren want to try him for heresy, but cannot formulate charges with sufficient exactness, as it seems impossible for them to find in his sermons the declarations which are heretical. When they examined into his case last year they passed a resolution which was in effect "Not guilty, but don't do it again." Then they thought that by this time something would arise which would more definitly pronounce him heterodox, so that radical action might be taken. It was found impossible to try Mr. Thomas for heresy at the meeting of Conference, and so a resolution was passed asking him to step out. He declined to step out until some better cause should be shown than had yet appeared. He announced himself willing to stand trial, and to abide by the result. For this the brethren of the Conference were not ready. Mr. Thomas is too activ a man to remain idle and quietly await the developments of another year. Therefore he makes the best use of the liberty which the Conference has given him, and accepts the invitation which has been made him by a new independent church which is formed of his friends and followers. There is little doubt that his preaching will be closely watched by his brethren, who are so anxious to find out officially whether he is as heretic or as orthodox as themselvs.

Letter from Europe.—No. 12.—Continued.

Among the fine statuary are representations of Prudence and Fame, which I thought quite as commendable as all saints and dying gods. Not very far along are statues of the four cardinal virtues placed alternate, between bas-reliefs—Prudence, Justice, Temperance, and Firmness. Between two of the altars is the statue of St. Bartholomew, flayed, carrying his own skin upon his shoulders. As an anatomical work it does exceedingly well, but the idea of the subject is horrible. The artist who executed this one statue worked eight years upon it. From this some idea may be had of the five thousand statues and carved figures in bas-relief which adorn the exterior and interior of this Christian temple. The bas-reliefs in the next chapel, of the martyrdom of St. Agnes, and the statues of St. Satyr and St. Ambrose, are much admired as works of art; and the altar-table is a masterpiece by Giovanni Strazza. In the next chapel hangs a picture representation of the annunciation, a gift from Francisco Medici, duke of Tuscany.

In the southern vestry, the door of which is decorated with Gothic ornaments, forming six lateral partitions, and three in the middle, are six bas-reliefs of an old work representing "the annunciation," "the visitation," "the adoration," "the presentation," "the flight to Egypt, and "the carnage of the helpless infants by Herod." In the center are "the deposition," the Virgin with child, and another virgin ready to protect the Virgin and child. After the vestry comes another image of the Virgin del soccorso, and above it a sitting statue of Pope Martin V., who, by the by, was rather a bloodly, cruel old fellow. Then comes a splendid monument, all in black marble, save the statues, which are white, by Busti. The six statues which decorate this mausoleum are, the cardinal dying in his pontifical dress, the Savior, St. Hierome, St. Paul, St. Peter, and St. Ambrosius. On the cornice, for a rarity, is the Virgin and the child Jesus. On the base of the tomb is an elaborate inscription. Near here are the principal confessionals of the cathedral, beautifully and elaborately carved in oak.

The three very large stained glass windows in the angles back of the large main altar are very splendid. They are composed of some 144 large plates of glass each, set in a huge sash, and each plate—some old and some new—having a distinct design, taken principally from Bible stories and church traditions. As absurd as the whole thing is, it is an interesting study to stand and look them over and realize what the art and industry of man has accomplished. On each side of the center window are engraved on a black tablet the names of the numerous relics and saints' bodies worshiped and buried in the temple. Among other numerous dignitaries honored, whose names even I will not take the time to mention, is that of Giovanni Pietro Carcano, who gave 230,000 scudi toward the completion of the front of the cathedral. Almost anybody could be gratefully remembered who would make such a generous donation.

We will pass unmentioned several more chapels, altars, tombs, statues of saints, bas-reliefs, paintings, inscriptions, and merely notice the superb altar in one of the following chapels, decorated with six splendid bas-reliefs of, I. Jesus in the stable; II. Jesus disputing with the doctors; III. Jesus at the wedding of Cana; IV. The nativity of the blessed Virgin; V. The presentation to the temple; VI. Mary's virgin wedding. The four major prophets in statue stand between the bas-reliefs. The altar is rich with statues, among which again for another rarity are the holy Virgin and the infant Savior of the world in her arms. In a niche is the Virgin in her celebrated first act, her interview with the angel Gabriel, who, according to Luke (who did not know anything about it), told her just how it would all be when the Holy Ghost made his intended call upon her. On the outward great pillars is the tabernacle in gilt bronze. There is also a splendid bronze altarpiece, just once more giving an accurate representation of the blessed Virgin, and also two scripture pieces. This is only uncovered on holidays, when an extra treat is vouchsafed to the devout worshipers. Six tombstones before this altar record the names of six more noted archbishops who long since did holy service in this most holy temple.

The next chapel belongs to St. Catherine, and is noted for its singular Gothic style, and a great number of small statues. On each stand two larger statues, one of St. Jerome and the other a holy archbishop, with monuments and inscriptions too tedious to mention or to read. The next altar belongs to St. Ambrose himself, and has a picture which represents the Emperor Theodosius imploring from the saint absolution from the ecclesiastical censure. In the next chapel is a vivid representation of the wedding of the Virgin, which there is no account of ever having taken place, as she was only espoused, and not fully married. There are also highly prized statues of saints and prophets. In the next chapel is the veritable wooden crucifix which St. Charles carried in procession in 1576 when the plague was most destructive and deadly. Whether it proved a sovereign remedy and made the services of physicians of no value is not stated. Here are also the statues of the kind-hearted Mary Magdalen and Martha, who I fear are somewhat neglected. In addition are other statues of distinguished saints and Bible worthies.

Near this point is the large and splendid mausoleum of three more archbishops, with a due amount of inscriptions. On the wall near by are eight apostles in Verona marble, which are of an old date. In this neighborhood is a bas-relief of a person who may have been mentioned before, who was called the Virgin Mary. Among the remaining side ornamentations may be mentioned four splendid columns with bronze capitals, supporting a cornice in the shape of a tabernacle. In the center is a rare and precious urn of porphyry, which now contains the baptismal waters, and in olden times served as the grave of St. Dionysius and other saints. The painted glass of the balconies represents St. Ambrose when he was proclaimed archbishop of Milan, and St. Thecla amongst the lions, before her martyrdom.

The high altar is yet to be described. It is at the end of the naves opposite to the entrance, and within fifteen or twenty feet of the outer wall. It and the floor are large enough to hold four or five hundred people, and are elevated six or eight feet higher than the main floor of the cathedral, allowing under it room for private chapels, etc. Doors and windows around on the outside let light and air into these lower chapels, and allow one to look in as they pass around. Long marble steps lead up to the altar floor, which is also marble of different colors laid in mosaic work. At each end of the steps, and elevated perhaps ten feet above the altar floor, is an elaborate pulpit of extraordinary workmanship, bearing on the great pillars which support the great cupola. They are each supported or held up by beautiful caryatides in bronze, representing, under the right hand pulpit, the four doctors of the holy church, and under the left, the four evangelists. The parapets of the pulpits are entirely covered with gilt and silver plates, on which the extolled artificer Andrea Pellizono chiseled historical and other ornamentations.

The vault of the high altar, that is the arch immediately over it, is painted a chiaro scuro upon a very rich gilt ground. On it is also to be seen a niche formed by rays of gilt copper, which contains the holy nail (one of those used in nailing Jesus to the cross). This is a most precious relic, and would probably not be sold for half what the cathedral cost. At a short distance suspended from the vault is a chandelier in Gothic style, and singular shape, decorated with small gilt bronze statues. It is used to support the paschal candle.

The choir is divided into two parts. The first is arrived at by five steps; above them is a balustrade of marble; the other part, called the presbyterium, is separated from the latter by another balustrade, raised higher by six steps. The pews are of black walnut, set in order around the choir, are richly carved and embellished with exquisite artistic skill, representing events in the life of St. Ambrose and several others of the old archbishops of this cathedral. In the first two intercolumns of the choir are two organs, enriched with columns and bas-reliefs of gilt wood, the parapets of which toward the naves are of Carrara marble, exquisitely wrought in arabesques. In the center of the second is the high altar, the small dome of which is supported by eight fluted columns of gilt bronze, supported at the base by metal adorned with relieved figures and various ornaments. The small dome, likewise of bronze, is decorated with nine statues representing the Savior and eight angels with the symbol of the passion. Through a few steps in the rear the dome is entered, where four kneeling angels support the tabernacle in form of a tower. The twelve apostles decorate the upper part of the tabernacle, and in the midst is the statue of Jesus. Many bas-reliefs adorn the circumference beneath. The outside of the choir is round, decorated with seventeen bas-reliefs, all of the finest composition. 1 is the nativity of the Blessed Virgin; 2, the presentation to the temple; 3, the marriage of the Virgin; 4, the annunciation; 5, the visitation; 6, the angel and St. Joseph; 7, the nativity of Jesus Christ; 8, the circumcision; 9, the flight into Egypt; 10, Jesus in the temple among the doctors; 11, the wedding feast in Cana; 12, the crucifixion; 13, the deposition from the cross; 14, the apparition of Jesus; 15, the death of the holy Virgin; 16, the assumption of the blessed Virgin; 17, Virgin Mary's incarnation. The bas-reliefs are divided by thirty-two angels. The most remarkable among this troop of angels is the one representing the annunciation. Among the ten symbols are a palm tree, a plum tree, the tower of David, a lemon tree, etc.

Opposite the two sacristies is a railing through which by means of a staircase descent is made to the subterranean chapels. It is scarcely necessary to describe these lower chapels; suffice it to say they are fitted up in the most approved gospel style and duly ornamented with statues, bas-reliefs, and paintings of the Virgin, of the dead God, numerous saints, and all the rest of the pious dignitaries. The most important, however, among these private chapels is that containing the tomb of rock crystal richly ornamented with silver trimmings and carved work, containing the remains of St. Charles Borromeo. This chapel is immediately in front of the floor upon which is the high altar, and is reached by a descent of nine steps from the other subterranean chapels, when is reached a spacious gallery, all lined with the finest marbles, and a portal which is adorned with beautiful columns, the capitals and bases of which are richly gilt. The tomb of the saint is octagonal in form. The ceiling is adorned with eight massive silver bas-reliefs, the subjects being marked events in the saint's life—his birth at Arona; the provincial council over which he presided; the distribution of money by the sale of his princedom at Oria; the administration of baptism and chrism to those dying of the plague; the attemped murder against the saint during prayer; the saint himself carrying in procession the bust of St. Bamaba during the plague; his death; his canonization. The eight busts or caryatides in the angles around, also of massive silver, represent allegorically his virtues. In addition to the silver mounting of the rock crystal tomb containing the saint's remains are a great number of small silver statues, the whole being a gift from Philip IV. of Spain. Across the glass may be seen the saint's body in his pontifical dress. On his left hand stands a pastoral golden staff, full of precious stones, of which a great quantity glitter also in front of the chasuble. A very splendid cross of emeralds and diamonds hangs in the center of the shrine. These valuables are the presents of different dukes, dignitaries, and wealthy individuals. The whole value of this chapel is estimated at four million francs.

In the meridional sacristy are kept the rest of the ancient and richest treasures of the cathedral, consisting of two colossal statues of St. Charles and St. Ambrose, all of silver, clad in their pontifical garments, and elegantly studded with a great number of precious stones; several silver busts, shrines, chalices of massive gold and silver, silver lamps, silver candlesticks, and an endless quantity of precious objects remarkable for their antiquity. In the same sacristy are also a large number of very rich sacerdotal and altar ornaments embroidered in gold and silver. Among the numerous altarpieces are an embroidery representing the nativity of the Virgin, the next the deposition, and a present from Count Taverna. It is of silver, and weighs 111 pounds. Three thousand bas-reliefs adorn it, some of which have been greatly admired.

Such is an imperfect description of the exterior and interior of the cathedral. Now for the roof, which is a study and a marvel within itself. One hundred and sixty steps take one to the roof, and 486 in all take one to the highest elevation in the spire, the platform of the great cupola. We paid the usual charge for the ascension, and gave two francs to a guide who could talk English somewhat to accompany us up and explain all about things. Upon arriving on the roof one is struck with admiration and bewilderment at the amount of artistic work there spread before the view—an endless number of statues and bas-reliefs executed by distinguished artists, prominent among whom was Canova, who himself executed many of them. Besides the main spire, there are 136 other separate spires of sculptured marble, exquisitely cut in openwork, to the hight of forty feet, or perhaps more, from the roof. Each spire is ornamented with twenty-five statues, many of them considered in the highest style of art. The bas-reliefs up there are also numerous and fine. As wonderful as any part of the work are the sculptures called the Botanical Garden. Every twelve or fifteen feet the whole length of the cathedral, running up and down the roof, is what may be called a marble railing, with little posts or spires in the railings, on the top of which is carved some variety of flower or fruit. There are one thousand of these posts, or little spires, on each side of the roof, or two thousand in all, and all of beautiful white marble. Just think for a moment of the immense amount of work expended in the ornamentation of the roof. The flowers and fruits are well cut, and it is easy to tell the roses, the lilies, the dahlias, the grapes, peaches, apples, pears, and oranges, as they shoot up like a miniature white forest all over that immense roof. The work connected with each one of those little spires must have required weeks of patient skilled labor. The larger spires were still more wonderful, containing niches or openings for all those statues, the largest being at the top, thus for a century or more proudly piercing the sky at a distance of over two hundred feet from the ground. I can give you no adequate idea of the sculptured scroll or lace-like work which accompanies every foot of the work at that high altitude. It is indeed most wonderful. The two turrets, in which are stairways leading to the cupola, are also replete with intricate carving in marble.

The roof itself is also of marble, made of slabs of uniform size, say fifteen by thirty inches, and two inches thick, lapped much like shingles. It is perfectly tight, and I cannot see why it should not last till Gabriel blows his horn. The joints of the hundreds of thousands of pieces of marble composing this extensive structure are all laid in lead and locked together with clamps of iron bars about five-eights of an inch square. The guide told me that four hundred tons of lead were thus used in the construction of the edifice, and two hundred tons of iron bars to lock the whole together. I tell you it is immense. One hundred and eighty-two architects and engineers were employed in the construction of this godly temple, running from the year 1387 to 1877, a period of nearly five hundred years, during which the construction has been going on. The names and periods of all these are given, but not the tens of thousands of artists and laborers who gave their strength and lives even in the construction of this wonderful edifice, which beats the mythical Solomon's temple far out of sight and remembrance.

There is one principal drawback in connection with white marble for a building material. It looks very nice and white while new, or when not more than fifty or one hundred years old, but after that time it shows age and grows black; thus the older parts of the exterior of this cathedral look dark and dingy, which detracts greatly from the clear, beautiful appearance of new, white marble.

I trust you will pardon me if I have been tedious in the details I have given. This is one of the most remarkable cathedrals in the world, and I thought you ought to know something of what an expensive first-class house of God, as approved by his church, is. You may not all be as fortunate as I have been to see it, and I wanted to give you some idea of what it is.

The most beautiful sight of all was from the high elevation I reached in climbing those 486 steps to the platform of the cupola. I had not only a most splendid bird's-eye view of the beautiful city spread out like a panorama below me, but also of the lovely country of Lombardy, laid out like a huge map at my feet, comprising thousands of farms, vineyards, and plantations for fifty miles in every direction, and more particularly the mountains of the Tyrol more than fifty miles away, and also the hoary heads of old Mont Blanc, with its eternal snows, one hundred miles to the north. That view was more than worth the 2 1-2 francs I gave to climb those steps and for my guide. I cannot soon forget that beautiful picture.

When I descended, the guide was very willing that I should pay 5 1-2 francs to go down into the private chapel and look at the rock crystal tomb of St. Charles Borromeo, which I hav given you a description of; but I told him I feared I could not make the sight worth that much to me, and that I would have to deprive myself of that exquisite pleasure. I was glad afterward that I so decided, for I obtained just as good a view as I wanted of it for nothing. A party paid the price, and a guide with lighted candles went into the costly chapel, and as I was standing by the curious open iron screen work which is over the openings to it directly before the high, grand altar, I had a fine view of it, so that 5 1-2 francs were saved to put into the cash boxes when the priests and attendants bring them around to gather up a few centessimi for the Lord to use in his business.

About this time, and after I had seen about all the sights connected with the cathedral, I attended divine service at the high altar. As I was poking about trying, Yankee-like, to see what I could discover, I heard a big cow bell ring, away up high in the vaulted arch—at least it sounded a good deal like a cow bell—and soon about a dozen priests, old and young, came out of one of the private rooms of the temple in Indian file, and I said to myself, "Hallo! here is a change in the programme; we are to have some religious ceremonies. I am not overstocked with religion, and I guess I will take a little while I have so good a chance to get it cheap." So with several other spectators, I took a seat upon the elevated floor of the high altar and was ready for anything the good Lord saw fit to vouchsafe to me, a poor sinner. The priests all had black gowns on, with a night-shirt with a fringe of lace-work at the bottom over the black gown. One of the oldest had on an extra attachment, but as sure as the world I have forgotten the name of it. I fear I am getting rusty in religious nomenclature. You see, I have not seen an English dictionary since I left THE TRUTH SEEKER office. My mind has been filled with various affairs, and for the life of me I cannot remember the name of the over-garment a priest wears when he performs or celebrates mass before the high altar. The names alb, chasuble, surplice, cope, crozier, tunic, dalmatica, chalice, and several other words just as pretty are galloping through my mind, but I fear none of them is just the thing for this occasion, so if you think it is not irreverent I will use the familiar term, horse-blanket. But, understand, it was none of your common horse-blankets, but of a bright scarlet color with spangles on it, with wide stripes of gold running the whole length of it, with a great big cross that came square down the good priest's back. This blanket was not so wide as a large horse-blanket, but nearly three feet wide, with a hole in the center large enough for the priest to stick his head through. When he has this on he is supposed to be duly equipped to serve before the altar in the holy temple, and if not, not. If makes him look very imposing, I assure you. Well, those priests marched up on to the floor before the high altar, and arranged themselves according to Hoyle or Pius or Loyola, Leo, or some other law-giver, some in front of the altar, some at the side, and some behind it. Then the old priest with the horse-blanket on commenced to chant holy sentences in Latin, and some of the younger priests with the night-shirts on, behind the altar, came in with the refrain and furnished the chorus. The priest with the horse-blanket on gave them their lessons in chanting and they either repeated what he chanted or came in with other sentences, which were either a counterpart to what he had chanted or a reply to it. Sometimes they all chanted together, and at other times, after the old priest with the horse-blanket had chanted something extra nice, the choir, up in the gallery, before the big organ—some twelve or fifteen of them with night-shirts on—came in with a splendid chorus or repetition as the case may be. They were capital singers—you know there are no better singers than the Italians; all our great opera singers are imported from this country—and that big old organ came in with thunder tones and made the entire cathedral ring, reverberate, and echo, as it has done thousands of times before. I enjoyed the music hugely and felt as though I was becoming quite religious. When the choir had finished then a small bell, not the cow bell, rang, and one of the younger priests took a great big book in Latin, and took it from one side of the altar and placed it on the other side of the altar, and the priest with the horse-blanket turned his face toward us of the audience and made a few pious motions with his hands and then went before the big book and chanted much more from it, and all the others helped him, and then the old organ roared again and the choir gave us some of the best music they had in their reportoire, and so it went on over half an hour, only there were every few minutes changes made in the positions of the priests and holy men. I cannot give you all the evolutions and maneuvers they made, but I am sure all was according to rule. I liked the music far the best, although the chanting is rather monotonous, only three or four different notes being used. I will say again, the music was excellent.

Well, at the proper time the bell rang again, not the cow bell, but a smaller bell, and one of the priestly attendants brought in the censer, with the holy smoke pouring from it, and the smoke smelt as though the gums being consumed in it were myrrh, frankincense, and a little copal. The young man swung the censer around for a while, when he handed it to the old priest with the horse-blanket, and he smudged the altar, the images on it, the cross with the dying God upon it, the eight candles, six feet high, which were standing on the altar, and which, I forgot to say, were burning, though it was in the middle of the afternoon, and it was not dark then at all. He swung the censer vigorously for several minutes, and sent the holy smoke all over every part of the altar, and purified it and made it acceptable to Jahveh. I inhaled a goodly portion of the holy smoke, and presume I was purified too. I don't remember as I was ever any purer than when I breathed in that holy smoke. When this was all over the censer was taken away, and then we had some more chanting and some more music by the choir. When this was done the choir took off their night-shirts and left the cathedral. The twelve priests left the altar and filed into their private room, and I was left to my reflections. I queried to myself in this wise: "What does all this rigmarole amount to? Is it, indeed, a sensible, useful thing that these, over two dozen men, who might be usefully employed in the harvest field at digging potatoes or something of the kind, should spend this bright, beautiful day in getting off such balderdash as this? Can it possibly be that the God of the universe—to personalize him for the moment—who piled up the Alps, who spread out the vast waters of the ocean, who established the Andes, the Himalayas; who caused Cotopaxi, Chimborazo, Ætna, and Vesuvius to belch and burn; who is the author of the millions of suns, stars, and worlds which course and revolve throughout endless space—can it be that God, the only God that has any existence, is for one moment pleased, benefited, or edified by such insipid nonsense?" "No, no," I replied, "he takes no pleasure, no interest, in anything of the kind." Still regarding him for the moment as a person, "I am sure he takes no pleasure in this vast pile of marble, gilt statues, fine paintings, etc., so far as he is concerned. He takes more pleasure in the happy, humble home of the peasant who gains his bread by honest toil, and who thus helps in doing the world some good, than in all this flummery and sham." This matter being thus definitely settled, I left this most pretentious edifice to hunt up the other works of men about the city.

I should say here that there are many very fine churches in Milan, probably two hundred, all belonging to specified saints, and probably two thousand priests, but I only visited some half a dozen of them, and as I have given you such a tedious detail of the cathedral, I am sure you will excuse me from describing the others. They are all gotten up differently, no two just alike, but still with a general similarity—the same altars, chapels, high vaulted arches, holy virgins, dying gods, sorrowful saints, holy candles, holy water, statues, bas-reliefs, paintings, confessionals, devotees kneeling before some image or painting and crossing themselves, and all the rest of it. Every church has several priests, who have no work to do other than to help God do his. If all this is of any use to him I am glad of it; but in view of the millions that have been spent in Milan alone for houses for God and men to attend to do his work, and the thousands of millions that have similarly been spent and are spent in other cities, it seems like a great pity that God's business is so expensive and that it requires so many able-bodied, hearty men to help him.

Milan has also royal and ducal palaces and public buildings. It has a public library and picture galleries worthy your attention, but I have already kept you in the city too long, and we will soon leave it. I ought to mention a beautiful place, the name of which, however, I will not be able to give you. The French call them galleries, and we call them arcades. This in Milan is a double one, four or five hundred feet one way, and three hundred the other, the two crossing at right angles, with a beautiful high dome at the crossing, all under a glass roof, with stores on either side, with two stories for offices, etc., above. The rows of stores are about seventy-five feet apart. Under the dome are a large number of statues of distinguished men of Italy, arranged over the lower story, so as to present a very imposing and magnificent appearance. The whole is very showy and attractive. The town is suitably supplied with theaters and places of amusement.

Before we leave Milan I should repeat what has been said before about the ladies of this city; they possess the true Lombard style of beauty, fair and gentle, as seen in the Madonnas of Raphael and Da Vinci. The middle and lower classes wear black lace veils, and present a neat appearance. I noticed here a new style of wooden shoes which the women wear. They have wooden soles and heels only, the latter being very high. They have vamps only with quarters, and are worn like an old slipper, and the way the women go clattering about the streets with their wooden heels rattling along is very observable. I noticed also in the windows of the shoe stores many of the very old-fashioned high-heeled shoes, with a wooden part for the heel, neatly covered with leather, as were made two hundred years ago, and like what I myself made at Mt. Lebanon forty years ago.

I wished from Milan to visit Como and the beautiful lake by the same name, almost entirely surrounded by high hills which come down from the Alps, the lake where Claude Melnotte, in Bulwer's play of "The Lady of Lyons," was going to take his lady-love—Pauline, I believe her name was—to spend their lives happily together. It is doubtless a lovely lake. But I remembered that Melnotte and Pauline were both myths, and that it was hardly worth while to spend time to go to see even pretty lakes on account of any myth. I am not much for myths, and so let Claude Melnotte and the beautiful lake of Como pass by.

At 5:30 P. M. the train started for Venice. The country is of much the same character as between Arona and Milan. We passed the old town of Verona, with 60,000 inhabitants, situated at the foot of the Tyrol mountains, where the plot of one of Shakspere's plays was located, but it was in the night and I did not stop to see what it looks like. We also passed Padua, another old town of 45,000 inhabitants, but did not call to see them. We arrived at Venice, or Venezia, as the Italians call it, at a little past four in the morning, rather early for pleasure. Probably I will not be telling news to many of you by saying that Venice is on an island,

The Episcopal Convention.

NEW YORK, Oct. 16.—In the house of deputies of the Episcopal convention to-day, the committee on the state of the church presented the following resolution, which was placed on the calendar :

WHEREAS, The work of the church of Christ and the best interests of Christian civilization are seriously impeded in one of the territories of the United States by the existence of polygamy, which is recognized by a large portion of the community as a religious institution ; and

WHEREAS, Polygamy is not only contrary to the law of God, but also forbidden under severe penalties in the territories of the United States by an act of Congress which has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States ; therefore

Resolved, The house of bishops consenting, that, while there are peculiar difficulties in the execution of this law, owing to religious fanaticism, doubtless oftentimes sincere, by which the institution of polygamy is upheld, and especially to the fact that the interests of many innocent persons are unhappily involved, it is still the duty of every Christian citizen of this republic to use his influence to aid the United States government to bring about, as speedily as possible, the merciful but firm enforcement of the law regarding polygamy or bigamy in the territories of the United States.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir : On reading the above article I am led to ask what right any particular sect has to assume the credit of our modern civilization. This seems to be one of the things that so-called Christians continually advance as an argument for their side of the question, when the truth is that Christianity, so called, or any of its followers, hav had but very little to do with civilization.

Still the devotees of the so-called Christian faith use this argument with great weight in talking to the masses of the people who do not stop to consider the subject. They ask what would we do for hospitals, insane asylums, temperance associations, benevolent societies, etc., etc., if it were not for Christianity. And they point to the rapid progress of this country as compared with pagan countries as an evidence of the work of Christianity. They speak loudly of all great enterprises that are undertaken and carried on, whatsoever the direction or nature. The developing of new sections of country, the building of railroads—in fact they claim everything that is modern as emanating from Christianity.

We hav for a long time remained quiet, and patiently watched the manner in which these self-righteous people conduct themselvs, having at one period of our life been among and of them ; and on the appearance of this article in the secular papers, after perusal, considered it our duty to giv our mite toward changing the current of opinion so long falsely entertained by the masses of people, and giv some good reason, if possible, to show why this country has advanced so rapidly as compared with other nations.

In the first place, we will admit that Christians hav done much toward aiding modern civilization. But when they undertake to assume the entire credit of all that is good, charitable, grand, or beneficial, they are doing that which they know to be false. Any intelligent person who for a moment stops to think will see that the discovery of the mariner's compass, the invention of the printing press, and the discovery of the expansion of steam, added to a desire for conquest, gain, and information, hav been the three great incentivs for civilization. And in those countries where improvements are not fostered, where there is a lack of education, we also find a lack of civilization, although those countries are strictly under the control of the Christian church and Christianity. Mexico, Spain, and France are fair examples, and where do we find more ignorance and less progress and civilization, and more devotion to Christianity, than there ?

But there are other reasons that hav weight, that lead me to account for the rapid strides of this country and the seemingly stagnant condition of other nations outside of Christianity, and that is marriage and interblending of nations by commingling of sexes by marriage of different nations. And herein lies a strong point that I hav not the space at this time to elaborate, simply stating that faces of men are somewhat like species of grain. By long continued intermarrying and propagation of the species the stock runs out and needs a change of pollen, something after the style of the manner adopted to improve the wheat crops years ago in Australia, that had run out, or nearly so. New seed propagated from a few kernels of wheat found in a mummy in Egypt was taken to Australia, and the crops were improved until Australian wheat outranked all the wheat in the world.

So with America. Immigration to this country and intermarrying of different nationalities are doing for this country what the few kernels of wheat did for Australia.

It does not take a very keen eye to observe this. All it requires is a little thought. Let the reader cast his mental eye over his acquaintances, and recall those who hav intermarried and intermarried in this country repeatedly, and see if they cannot see in the white, cadaverous, scrofulous, light-haired, fair-skinned individuals proofs sufficient to convince them of the truth of my assertion.

But there are other reasons that exert an influence on civilization, among which may be mentioned habits, light, diet, and temperaments, which we will not touch on at this time, it being our desire simply to refute the idea conveyed by the above article, that Christianity has any business to interfere with polygamy as practiced by the Mormons, or that "polygamy is forbidden by the laws of God." Where will you find stronger evidence to the contrary than in the laws of God as published in the Bible ? From beginning to end it is full of polygamy, lewdness, debauchery, and licentiousness.

God's chosen ones, his sweet-scented representativ, those whom the Bible says are after God's own heart, are sanctioned, worshiped, and admired for their licentiousness, debauchery, and polygamy at this day, and called God's men. These self-righteous, miserable offscourings of society could hav concubines by the score, could seduce men's wives, slaughter little children and pregnant women by the tens of thousand, and be called Christians, followers of God's laws, even at this late day. The followers and believers of all these things set themselvs up as capable of advising intelligent people that polygamy is against God's laws. I happen to be posted on the character of Mormons as well as the character of many Christians, and when an Episcopalian society of bishops undertake to throw stones they had better see that they do not liv in glass houses. The records of their church and the character of several of their former bishops and clergy will not bear close investigation. Nor will the foundation of the church by Henry VIII., its origin, cause, and history, bear any closer scrutiny than the church of Utah. Both were founded on lust and selfishness, and each one prospered in its pernicious acts of hypocrisy and aristocracy.

When people stop to consider this subject for a moment they will readily see that the safety of this country and the welfare of the people consist in the proper education of the masses to understand these questions and meet these charges face to face. G. M. DANFORTH.

Monthly Bulletin of the League.

As the auxiliary Leagues increase, the need is more and more felt of a means of frequent and rapid communication between them and the Board of Managers. One means for keeping alive, and motiv for activity, is the hearing from each other at frequent intervals. There can be no heart-beat if the blood does not circulate.

But the Secretary cannot write two hundred letters, say once a month, to the local Leagues. The postage alone would be 36 cents each per annum, and for the whole two hundred it would be $72. Then such a written letter could not present half the subjects, nor in sufficient detail, nor place them before one-ten-thousandth part of the number of people. In these days of cheap printing the press must be used wherever possible.

What is needed is a bulletin that will keep standing the Constitution of the League, a list of its officers, a catalog of its auxiliaries and their secretaries, instructions how to form Leagues, its platform of principles, and such like permanent and oft-referred to documents. This information needs to be handed around, scattered abroad, and circulated everywhere, so that every inquirer may know our strength, our purposes, and our principles; and it must be in a cheap convenient form, so as to be circulated liberally.

Then, in addition to these features, there is constantly occurring from month to month the necessity of announcing something to the League secretaries and members—League news and various kinds of League movements.

The auxiliaries also ought to know continually what other auxiliaries are doing. Such a bulletin would be the best medium through which the secretaries could publish short reports of local meetings or movements, or whatever is going on of interest specially to Leaguers. And such a medium would invite and obtain reports from the secretaries. There is little motiv now for a local secretary to write to the national Secretary a detailed report of any proceedings, to be filed away as lumber in his pigeon-holes. But if his report is to be published, a new motiv is added for making it. He sees the reports of others also, and there springs up immediately a spirit of emulation; then activity, enterprise, and work become the order of the day all along the line.

Mr. A. K. Butts, the publisher of Man, to whom we are indebted for placing at our disposal this number of his paper on favorable terms, offers us still further favors in the same line. He allows us to make every fourth number of Man a League number or bulletin of eight pages, half the number in this issue, but otherwise the same in size and appearance, and on such terms that we can supply it to Leagues and Liberals generally for 25 CENTS A YEAR. That is eleven cents at the outset less than just the postage alone on a monthly letter from the Secretary.

The Board of Managers feel authorized by these considerations and figures to announce that they will gather League news, receive League reports, make comments, write a leading editorial and other articles on some subject relating to League work, and edit and publish monthly a National Liberal League Man at 25 cents per annum in advance.

This issue will be considered the first number, and will be sent to subscribers as No. 1. The second number will be published early in December. This will giv time for subscriptions to come in and let us know how many will be likely to be taken; also whether there is a demand that will support this project.

If the money comes in to publish it, the December or January number may also be double (16 pp.) and contain the first day's proceedings at Chicago, from our official stenographer's notes. In that case that number will be extra and cost the same as this one to the general public. To annual subscribers it will be included without extra cost.

Now, then, the proposal and prospectus for a monthly Man, organ of the National Liberal League, are before all Liberals. All who approve will send their subscriptions in at once to T. C. LELAND, Sec'y N. L. L.

The Decline of Church Going.

The Rev. Dr. Cuyler, of this city, has been discussing in a religious weekly what he terms the vital question of the decreased attendance at religious services. "It requires but half an eye," he tells us, "to discover the alarming fact that this attendance is steadily falling off, both in the cities and in the country, both at the East and in the West. Forty years ago it was claimed that one-half of the population of the city of New York were either wholly or partially connected with some Protestant congregation. Now only one-fourth of the population are ever seen in any Protestant place of worship." Taking the first Sunday of last October as an average example, Dr. Cuyler found that the fifteen most popular churches in the city of New York, which are capable of seating an aggregate of twenty thousand persons, were attended by no more than ten thousand five hundred.

The same phenomenon has been noticed in other countries. In England especially, a vast number of families, even when the leading clergymen are as popular as the bishop of Manchester, are found both in the large cities and the small towns to hav abandoned the habit of church going. Dr. Cuyler and the clergy generally rather lament than explain this state of things. But the causes of this decadence of attendance at public worship are not far to seek. It does not imply that the laity hav lost their regard for the essential principles of Christianity or their love for the life and character of Christ. But it does prove that the old standards of ecclesiastical faith are not accepted with the same passiv assent as they were fifty years ago. During the past half century the advancing tide of scientific discovery and biblical criticism has steadily increased in volume and force. The several books of the Bible hav been studied, not as a mysterious whole, whose plenary inspiration made it irreverent to question any particular part, but as separate treatises, narrativs, or poems, stamped with the individuality of their separate authorship and circumstances. "The five books of Moses" hav ceased to hav the awe-inspiring clasp of "Pentateuch" to bind them together and repel the scrutiny of the curious. Genesis no longer leans upon Exodus for support, and the first chapter no longer passes muster under the protection of the later ones. Other hands besides that of Moses are visible, and to some critics the hand of Moses is not visible at all. Thus the historic element of the Bible, as well as the authenticity of each separate part of it, has been and is being subjected to the Pauline test, "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." Thus the old literal, unreasoning acceptance of every word of the Bible as absolutely true and inspired by God, as a word to be believed under penalty of the damnation of hell, though it produced some earnest fruit in the past and giv reality to the life and preaching of John Bunyan, George Whitefield, and many other eminent professors, has given place to a reverential criticism which discards traditional superstition, and looks at sacred writings and church dogmas in the light of increased knowledge. The fatalism of the "decretum horribile" of Calvin and his followers is rejected by the inner conscience and reason even of those who hav been bred in it.

The miraculous portions of the Bible hav necessarily been subjected to the same tests as the historical, of which they are a part. And here the apologists and champions of the book and the churches hav made a great mistake, as well in America as in England and Germany. Instead of submitting each alleged miracle separately to the candid tests of reason and evidence, they hav thrown dust in the eyes of the people by making the controversy turn wholly on the a priori credibility and possibility of miracles at all. Now this is not the question at issue. A man may be quite prepared to believe that miracles are possible, who yet does not believe this or that miracle, as that of Balaam's ass "speaking with man's voice" and kolding a moral suasion expostulation with his walloping and anti-Bergh rider, the prophet. A calm reasoner may accept all that Butler and Paley would claim for miracles in the abstract and yet not accept some of the alleged miracles of the Bible, while in others, as in those of Elijah and Elisha, he would see nothing but tricks of legerdemain and a natural magic that might well bewilder an unscientific and uncritical age. A canary bird is staggered at the phenomena of the looking-glass, and the solidity of the window pane which prevents its exit, but there is no miracle in the mirror or the window pane. A high estimate of the supreme majesty of the Eternal makes it an irreverance as well as a folly to call in the miraculous when there is no adequate cause and when the phenomena are capable of rational explanation.

Following hard upon the footsteps of the miraculous is the moral element of the Bible. The new translators hav been obliged to eliminate as fraudulent interpolations the strange episode of the adulterous woman, not less than the doctrinal text of the three heavenly witnesses and the miraculous incident in St. John of the angel that came down and touched the healing pool at a certain hour of the day. Looking back at the morality of the Old Testament as it is imbedded in the history of the chosen people, the religious intelligence of the present age is staggered at the horrible crimes of lust, rapine, deceit, and murder which adorned the lives even of the best of the Hebrew sages, heroes, and saints. David, "the man after God's own heart," an adulterer who added treachery and murder to lust. Solomon, the wise king, whose proverbs were three thousand and his songs a thousand and five, to whom "God gave wisdom and understanding exceeding much," the progenitor of Mormonism, an inspired libertin, a worn-out rake, who denies in his inspired writings any future state of humanity more than to the brute, and whose old age is spent in transitions between atheism and idolatry. The God of the Hebrews, it is seen by the religious mind, cannot be that father who loves and pities, whose very name is Love and whose nature has no contagion of human passions and vindictiveness. Yet to the pious Jew his very mercies meant cruelty and injustice; for in their interest he slew mighty kings who had justice on their side, because his mercy endureth forever, and gave away their lands for a heritage to Israel, his servant, because his mercy endureth forever. It would be a sickening task to go through the Old Testament, eliminating as one went for separate moral scrutiny the villainies of the chosen people, from the fraud of Jacob, the supplanter, upon his rough, good tempered, elder brother, to the lying and murdering Jael, the wife of Hebar, the Kenite, on whose hearthstone poor, tired Sisera lay down and tarried but a night, during which she slew him with nails and hammer as he slept.

Now the laity hav ceased to say that they believe in all this indiscriminate inspiration and miracle and more than doubtful morality, but the clergy still cling to the horns of the altar even though the stains of blood and crime be upon it. Hence the distrust of the sincerity of the teachers of religion which is so widely diffused. Let confidence be restored, and the churches will be again filled. But the pulpiteers insult the conscience and intelligence of their hearers and of the age when they tell with a long face the old scarecrow fables which nobody believes, and teach dogmas and miracles which the average intelligence of a child rejects at sight.

Taylor's "Diegesis."

This is a masterly, uniform production, irresistible, argumentativ, and profound. He examined into the why and wherefore of things with minute and punctilious observation, and touched every part of his subject with indefatigable diligence; considered and reconsidered the subject he had under discussion; he knew that "errors, like straws, upon the surface flow." He also knew to "act well your part; there the honor lies." His luminitious mind was formed by research of comprehensiv observation and minute attention. We see in him the sincerity of a Paine, the sarcasm of a Voltaire, and the eloquence of a Cicero. I say deliberately that the demoralizing influence of Christianity is without a parallel in the annals of history. Hundreds of innocent men and women hav starved to death chained to floors of stone ankle deep in filth, and the cold and lifeless body rotted to pathetic dust to appease a hellish, bloodthirsty, merciless, and revengeful priesthood.

Robert Taylor discovered this and much more. Speaking of the mythical crucifixion of Jesus, he says, "Such a mockery of a dying malefactor never in any other instance disgraced the judicial administration of a Roman magistrate" (p. 168). I am thoroughly convinced that I never read after such a masterly scholar as the ex-Rev. Robert Taylor. Men of his learning and comprehension are rarely to be found. He was a scriptarian, a biblical mythographist of the first rank. How long will mankind be led by hypocritical and blood-thirsty priests into a bugbear of delusions? How long will mankind support a rotten and anathematizing priesthood? How long will they bend the knee to an unknown and unknowable God and pray to a mythical Christ? How long will mankind be held in mental bondage by these licentious and infamous priests, these despisers of science, these lovers of blood, these admirers of ignorance, these tearers of human flesh, these burners of the living, these beaters of infants, mockers of the dying, these slanderers of the living and damners of the dead? Is this globe to be forever and ever cursed by these human hyenas? It's only commendable justice for the living and unborn to sing peans to the memory of Robert Taylor, and speak praises of honor and everlasting admiration to his name. His work is unquestionably one of the most intelligent and learned masterpieces that ever was produced. It is essentially remarkable to see how he has pointed out the amalgamations, dissimulations, and contradictions of the Bible, and how he has shown up the impossibilities of all claims for Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John to be the real authors of the books that bear their names, and further, to see how condescendingly he has demolished the whole superstructure of the Christian scheme. He presents many of the most extraordinary, unequivocal demonstrations that Christianity was born of paganism.

As a writer, he in some respects resembles Prof. Draper. I know not whether there is a life of this great man or not. If not, Bennett or Parton ought to set his life forth in an elaborate, yea, stupendous form. "The heart smarts for the degradation of outraged reason, for the humiliation of torn and lacerated humanity" (p. 55). He knew how to > "Grasp the whole world of reason, life, and sense

> In one close system of benevolence."

His researches into pagan mythology hav resulted in inexhaustible augmentation of adamantin mountains of proof that the Christian religion in all its forms, doctrins, and precepts is nothing but an outgrowth of previously existing forms. He backs up his arguments by many of the ablest Christian writers, from Origen down to the days when he wrote his irrefutable work, and after all his researches he is obliged to giv vent to the following: "It brings us at once to the irresistible apprehension that the Christian Savior after all is no more than what Esculapius, Hercules, Adonis, Bacchus, Apollo, and Christna were. That is, an emblematical personification of the sun" (p. 174).

If Robert Taylor were living to-day his mighty pen would shake the nations of the earth from center to circumference. "It is easy to trace almost all the Grecian fables and mythologies from Egypt" (p. 180).

Perhaps it will not be out of place to say that the "Diegesis" givs brief accounts of some of the early Christian Fathers, and the reading of a more elaborate work prior to reading the "Diegesis," wherein a full history is given of the bloody wars of Christianity, its hellish persecutions, of crusades, inquisitions, and the wholesale persecutions of the Christian religion from Constantine to Comstock, would be exceedingly beneficial to the reader when coming to pursue the "Diegesis." This bloodthirsty and in many parts inhuman work of the early Fathers is described in Bennett's "Champions of the Church." This work strenuously maintains and most convincingly demonstrates the hellishness of priestcraft. It records in very full detail the rivers of innocent blood that has run from its murdered millions down the hills into the valleys to appease those vicars of God in the lapse of ages gone.

This work ought to be in every house and read by every one. Send to Bennett and get it. B. O. FENTON.

The Religion of Love.

The love question seems to be one that, while it turns the head of many, is not well understood, or properly respected by the masses.

To some it's an absorbing passion only, and to others, a pleasing but transcient emotion.

Why this variety of opinions, and consequent expression unworthy of the name? We answer, because the masses only view the subject from an ignorant or superficial standpoint, when the truth is, it's a subject that should not only demand but command as much attention as any of the exact sciences, to say the least, because the principle of life itself is based in the love principle, or attracting force that exists between the positiv and negativ principles, whose united action is the parentage of all individual representations of form, whether the pebble found on the sea shore, those grand orbs we see in space, or the forms that make up the almost endless variety as well as beauty of all vegetable, animal, or human individuality. Nothing can find expression in individuality without the action of the attractiv force of the love principle.

But alas! alas! how prostituted is man by unholy desire born of culpable ignorance or ungovernable selfishness, often both.

Man, being the highest type of forms that exists in nature's universal domain, ought to aim to be well versed in the normal action of the love principle, and its sublime possibilities under proper conditions and relations. But does he thus aim to reach out for the freest, purest, and best? With very rare exceptions, he does not, neither will he while he only looks on the possibilities of life from a selfish or superficial standpoint.

Society recognizes certain regulations as being lawful, pertaining to the activity of the love principle, but pays very little respect to the subtle laws that govern and control its normal action, or properly regard its possible results.

The religion of love, unlike the popular idea of what is called religion, must be a practical demonstration of its sublime possibilities, to properly worship at its sacred shrine; the fruit it bears depends on the conditions and relations of those who kneel before nature's altar consecrated to love's sanctification.

If the relation is sustained by natural selection, and the conditions are harmonious, the fruit it bears will bless the world with its comliness, fragrance, and excellence. But if none of these things are respected, as is often the case, the world is cursed by the sour crabbed fruit of unholy because unnatural conditions and relations. When the science of life, the product of love, is properly understood and respected it will work a revolution in society.

"But," says one, "what has science to do with the proper adjustment of the life forces?"

With equal propriety one might ask, "What has science to do with the perfect adaptation of means to ends in any given direction?"

If the positiv and negativ principles are allowed to do their perfect work, no barriers will be interposed to prevent the harmonious adjustment of the life forces, so that chemical affinity can perform its proper part, in harmony with nature and reason, and thus recognize and reach love's sublime possibilities, so that the devotee who bows before her sacred shrine will rise from a devotional attitude with higher and nobler thoughts and emotions, because truer and purer aspirations enable him to recognize its power to bless the world to-day, to-morrow, and in all coming time, by the pleasure it brings, the fruit it bears, and the treasures it enables all sincere and devout worshipers to lay up, "where neither moth nor rust can corrupt, or thieves break through and steal" what does not belong to them by the divine right of nature, love, and imperishable attractions.

JULIA C. FRANKLIN.

Political Consistency.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Capital says to labor: "Rest and be thankful. Do not agitate or disturb the present relation in affairs." In Buchanan's time, just before Sumpter was attacked, the same sentiments prevailed—Let alone; do not agitate.

Mr. Ingersoll's maxim, "Liberty for man, woman, and child," is a noble maxim. But his liberty only means the liberty to labor for the upper ten. Mr. Ingersoll announces the time is approaching when to be a millionaire in the midst of misery will be a disgrace. But he labors for a faction whose chief aim seems to be to make and perpetuate millionaires. The gutter snipes of the city, the pauper, the criminal, the occupant of the tenement house, and hosts of the industrious but degraded in society, your factious Republican party has for long years helped to increase and perpetuate. Your set speech, "Liberty for man, woman, and child," is a caricature on your public canvass for a faction that alms to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

Repudiation of a bargain is disgraceful, says our politician of every stripe. But to double a bonded debt by law, by changing the currency, is not called repudiation of a bargain. To revert back to the first contract the factions would call repudiation. To pay double what you agree, if paid to a bondholder, is called strengthening public credit. But to pay what you agree to pay a soldier, instead of cheating him out of one-half, is not strengthening credit, but is called communism, etc.

To tax highly for instruction, but to depress the taxpayer so as to make it difficult or impossible to pay his taxes, is called promoting the cause of education. To stuff the mind and starve the body is called progressiv education. Again, to discuss physiological matters with a view to gradual improvement of the race, mentally and bodily, is obscenity. But to trot out nude girls and try to get them punished, to lay traps for all sorts of crime and then punish for falling into the trap, is Christian morality. To cheat on a large scale officially is not recognized as an offense against law; it is only a discrepancy. But to steal to satisfy hunger must end in the penitentiary or the reformatory, and the law must be vindicated.

High tariff favors monopoly, and is called protectiv. It protects monopolies, and subjects the crowd, unprotected, to extortion and shoddy.

Railroad extortion for freight is a vested right, even so far as to take two-thirds of a crop or of a commodity to pay its freight. Having once been vested, it must never again be divested of any wrong inflicted on the public. A vested right that hurts the public is irrevocable. If it hurts a corporation it is quite revocable.

The numerous cathedral and church spires that point to heaven and pretend to lead the way miss their mark egregiously. Founded on a fallacy, built by funds raised in a great measure from the hard hands of poverty, exempt from tax, ever crying giv! giv! it is doubling its immense property every eight years. On pretense of spiritual supervision, this church is the great enemy to enlightened progress and liberty! The poor and plainly clad hav no seat in godly palaces. "Praise God from whom all blessings flow" is not for the unblest poor. Church blessings must be roundly paid for.

Our old party politicians are too much tied to debt, extravagance, church domination, high tariff, high freight, abuse of patent laws, military "glory," and legislation for cliques. F. J. EMARY.

From the Iowa State League and State Committee of the N. L. L.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The more deadly the danger which threatens this country the more firmly stands the patriot in her defense. The true man or woman is never awed by popular clamor or turned aside from the path of duty through fear of being cast in the eyes of the unthinking devotees of the idol of the hour. And the man and woman of principle cannot remain silent whilst freedom is stricken down by the merciless tools of the Republican party, and the Christian church, and her pretended friends pour into her bleeding wounds the acid of hate and the caustic of truthless criticism as they turn boldly away and leave her to perish beneath the pitiless stars of the winter night.

Believing that at this juncture every loyal Liberal should speak his honest thoughts, we, the officers of the Iowa Liberal League and the members of the State Committee of the National Liberal League, do hereby fully and unreservedly indorse and approve the action of the Fourth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League in demanding the total repeal of the Comstock postal statutes. We hold that these laws are unconstitutional, invasiv, and tyrannous, destructiv of the dearest rights of the citizen, and a constant and deadly menace to the freedom of thought and expression, of the press and the mails.

We hold that the repeal of these inquisitorial laws is part of the legitimate work of the League, but if it were not we are not such blind worshipers of authority and precedent as to refuse to grow. We believe that Liberalism means justice in every department of life, and, believing this, we shall continue to work with the National Liberal League until the hand the church shall hav been torn from the postal keys of the nation.

THE sea is to the land, in round millions of square miles, as 160 to 40, or as 4 to 1.

a mile or two from the main land in the Adriatic sea, in the northeast part of Italy; that it has canals in place of streets, that gondolas carry people and freight about from one part of the city to another instead of carriages, drays, etc. There are no horses in Venice, they have no use for them. Many people are said to have grown up and died there without seeing a horse or mule. I saw but two wheeled vehicles in the town, and they were wheelbarrows. There are some sidewalks where these can be used.

Venice has 128,000 inhabitants, but she falls far short of being now what Venice once was. Though not as old as many Italian towns, she was once mistress of the seas and commanded the commerce of the world. For many long centuries she was a power among the nations of the earth; her merchants were not excelled by any in the world, and her merchandise found its way to almost every mart. Her navies held dominion upon the broad seas, and her soldiers showed themselves valorous in many battles, not alone her own. She found it in her power to assist those in need who called upon her. "Six hundred years ago," says Clemens, "Venice was the autocrat of commerce; her mart was the great commercial center, the distributing house from whence the enormous trade of the orient was spread abroad over the Western world. To-day her piers are deserted, her warehouses are empty, her merchant fleets are vanished, her armies and her navies are but memories. Her glory is departed, and with her crumbling grandeur of wharves and palaces about her, she sits among her stagnant lagoons, forlorn and beggared, forgotten of the world. She that in her palmy days commanded the commerce of a hemisphere, and made the weal or woe of nations with a beck of her puissant finger, has become the humblest among the people of the earth, a peddler of glass beads for women and trifling toys and trinkets for schoolgirls and children."

Still there is much that is charming about Venice, this once queen of the seas, and however much we may mourn at her departed greatness, it is pleasant to glide over her numerous canals and visit the very places where valor once dwelt and commerce once reigned. When we arrived at the station—the railroad reaching the city over a long bridge—the canal in front was bountifully supplied with clamorous gondoliers extremely anxious to transport us all to hotels or wherever we wished to go. I had no use for a hotel at that time in the morning, and made up my mind that I would not patronize one that day; but when I stepped forth to see what Venice, her canals, and her gondolas were like, these persistent fellows were disposed to give me no rest. They thought I ought by all means to take a gondolier, and every particular one of the fifty who were clamoring thought I ought to patronize him. I could not understand a word they said, except the oft-repeated one, seignor, but I easily enough understood they wished me to ride and that I should give them some of my money. I was not ready to do either, but they were not disposed to give it up so, they still pursued me. I took refuge in a coffee room, and after sipping a cup of Mocha or Java and it had become daylight, I sauntered forth and thought I would walk down a long street on which there is no canal, and which led through some small squares or campos, where the vegetable and fruit dealers were already exposing their wares for sale. I tried to walk along unconcernedly as though I was no stranger, as though in fact I had always lived in Venice, but those astute, persistent, ill-mannered rascals were too sharp for me. I could not fool them, they knew I was a stranger, and they fulfilled the injunction of scripture by visiting me and trying to take me in. In fact they followed me for two or three squares, keeping up a continuous jabber of their unintelligible jargon, and whether they wanted me to ride in a gondola, to accept them as a guide, or to give them a few centessimi of my hard-earned money, I could hardly decide. At first I was imperturbable and paid no attention to them, thinking they would weary of the pursuit and allow me to pursue my way in peace, but there was no weariness about them; they considered me their legitimate prey, and they were determined not to let me escape. It was in vain that I motioned to them with my hand to return and let me alone, but they were perfectly impervious to motions and gentle persuasions, they still followed. At length my patience became exhausted, and I turned upon them and in my most emphatic style recommended them to go to —— well, that hot country that only preachers know anything about. In fact I pointedly commanded it, and then they turned back muttering and cursing, doubtless, that ungenerous American. Whether they followed my injunctions, I cannot say, but I cannot think they would have had far to go, had they done so. The Venetian beggars are the most persistent, the most numerous, and the numbest in understanding no of any I have met with. Many, many times that day the hat or the hand was extended to me, asking me to give. Had I given to all who came, I would soon have nothing to give. To the cripples and old crones I occasionally dropped a soldi, but to the young and able-looking I was not very charitable.

The first thing was to follow my pious bent and visit the churches; they are always open and ready for business. The morning is as good a time as any to call upon them. I looked into several and found them fully supplied with blessed virgins, crucified gods, holy saints and statues and pictures generally. I was most anxious to see St. Mark's cathedral, the most noted of all the churches. It must be known that St. Mark is the patron saint of Venice. The citizens evidently think more of St. Mark than any other dead saint. They have a legend about him which runs in this wise: St. Mark had a pet lion which followed him about like a little dog (this is extremely probable, as lions are apt to do that sort of thing). Wherever St. Mark traveled the lion would travel too. The lion was to St. Mark what the little lamb was to Mary. Wherever St. Mark went the lion was sure to go. And from this circumstance the lion is still pictured as Mark's companion; and to make a saint of the lion as well as of Mark, they have given wings to the lion, and he is now always represented as a winged lion—a flying lion, why not? Why have they not as much reason for having wings and flying as men and women after they are dead? Besides, the wings are just as probable as any other part of the story, especially Mark himself, and the wings should not be discarded. Thus Mark and his winged lion are often placed before your eyes in Venice in the square of St. Mark and other places. The lion is represented with the Bible under his paw, which still more proves that the lion is also a saint.

According to Christian traditions St. Mark died at Alexandria, in Egypt, where in fact he was said to have suffered martyrdom, but still it is claimed that his ashes now repose under the altar of his cathedral in Venice, and the way it was brought about was in this wise: In the fifth century a holy priest of Venice had a dream—a holy dream of course—that an angel told him that until the bones and ashes of St. Mark were conveyed to Venice the city could never prosper nor rise to great distinction, and that those same ashes must by some means be brought to the city in the sea, when it would rise to distinction and wealth more especially if a magnificent church were built over the sainted remains. When the holy priest told his holy dream all the holy people set about devising some means by which the holy ashes of the holy saint could be transferred to Venice. Expedition after expedition set on foot for those valuable bodies and ashes but expedition on expedition signally failed. The Mohammedans in possession of Alexandria, when anything so valuable as a dead Christian's ashes should be removed from their city, utterly refused to part with them. But the Christians proved themselves rather too smart for the followers of Mohammed, as they have on nearly all occasions. A commander of a Venetian expedition disguised himself, stole the bones (stealing is one of the best Christian fortes), and packed them in vessels covered with hog's lard. Now, their abhorrence for all the products of swine is equal to that of a Jew, and so, when the authorities in examining what the wily Christians were about to carry away with them, came to the hog grease they shrank from it with horror, and thus the holy bones of the holy saint were transferred to Venice and duly deposited, and a holy church built over them, and that is the reason why Venice became so great; but it is seriously to be feared that the old bones have lost their strength and virtue, for within the last several centuries the city has had less than usual prosperity. Perhaps if the bones of Archbishop John Hughes or Saint Joe Smith could be transferred there and placed under the altar of the cathedral Venice would immediately revive her trade and the ships once more come back to her docks. The bones of St. Mark are said to have been stolen in the ninth century, after four hundred years had been wasted in the attempt. It is not explained how the saint's bones could be distinguished from other bones so as to enable the thieves to get the right ones, but perhaps they had a holier look than common sinners' bones, so that the pious thieves could make no mistake. At all events, there are hundreds now in Venice who verily believe that if those bones of St. Mark were by any great calamity to be removed from Venice, the city would assuredly lose her protection and be no more prosperous than ordinary cities. It is barely possible the old bones have been disturbed.

In front of St. Mark's cathedral is the piazza (public square) of the same saint. It is surrounded by palaces and fine buildings. The doges of Venice used to live in the palace, and two red marble columns were pointed out to me in the second story of the long edifice where the terrible doge used to come out and read the death sentence of the poor unfortunate victims of the "council of ten," or still worse the secret "council of three" whose fiat was as irrevocable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. The very place was also shown me where great numbers of those poor wretches had their heads taken off. The dimensions of the piazza are 580 feet in length by 230 feet in breath. The piazetta (a little square), 320 feet by 150 feet, runs from the campanile down to the mole by the side of the Grand canal.

The cathedral of St. Mark (duomo of St. Marco), is in the Greek shape and purely Byzantine (or Constantinople) style. It was begun in 976 by artists from Constantinople and finished in 1071, so it is one of the oldest grand cathedrals in existence. It is supposed to have been copied from a church in Alexandria. It is not so large as many cathedrals, being 205 feet long and 164 feet in breadth through the transepts, but it is built of fine marble from oriental countries, and for this reason is a very rare old edifice, notwithstanding its antique, eccentric appearance. It is said to stand upon 1,200,000 piles, but some of them have settled or rotted away so that the pavement of the floor has settled also, in some places several inches; this with the constant wearing of the feet of countless thousands for nine centuries gives the marble, mosaic floor greatly the appearance of age.

The ancient edifice is rich with works of art, including bas-reliefs, statues in stone and bronze, paintings, especially its profuse antique frescoes in the numerous arches overhead. There are over 500 columns of the finest oriental marble and porphyry, verde antique, serpentine, veined, and other columns in the edifice, and they even point out to one the identical columns that once stood in Solomon's temple in Jerusalem. Of course you can judge how much of the yarn about the columns from Solomon's temple I swallowed, when I tell you I do not believe there ever was any Solomon's temple, or any Solomon to build a temple. If there was any such temple or any such man there is not the slightest proof of it save the old Jewish legend or myth, which is of little more value than the legend of William Tell, St. George and the Dragon, St. Mark and his bo nes Don Quixote and his contest with the windmills,, Claude Melnotte and Lake Como. If there ever was such a wonderful king as Solomon, and such a wonderful temple as he is said to have erected, it is very singular that nobody ever knew anything about it; that no contemporaneous nation has left a word on record about them, that no historian of the time wrote one word about them; that even Herodotus, the great Greek historian of the times, who wrote largely about many countries, and who made two or three journeys into Syria, writing about all he saw and heard of on his travels, yet said not a word about Solomon or his temple. I repeat, there is not a particle of proof that there ever was such a man as Solomon or such a building as his temple. There is not in Jerusalem to-day one stone lying upon another that ever helped to form the foundation of that mythical temple. All the record there is to look to for proof is the Bible and the writings of Josephus, both, doubtless from the same unreliable, fictitious source. At the time Solomon is said to have lived, the Jews were little more than a set of wild barbarian shepherds and nomadic Arabs; and after their captivity in Babylon they became civilized and enlightened and felt the need of a history and religion, and all their legendary story as it appears in the Bible and in Josephus was made up and written after that time, and is just as little entitled to credit as any mythical, fabricated legend that was ever written. Still the Christians of Venice point out with most sanctimonious unction the very pillars in their cathedral which once stood in Solomon's temple. Thus lies are piled on lies, and one lie is used to make another lie seem like a truth.

Under the altar of the cathedral, as observed, are said to repose the ashes of St. Mark, and if it were claimed that the ashes of Saints Matthew, Luke, and John were also there, with those of St. Joseph, the Virgin Mary, her Son, the angel Gabriel, and even the Holy Ghost, I presume it would be just as true. While a falsehood is being fabricated, there is no reason why it should not be of extensive proportions.

The cathedral is surmounted by a heap of ten or twelve oval domes round the five large central ones, besides several pinnacles. The façade presents in its recesses a numerous collection of columns as valuable for the quality and variety of the marble as for their Greek workmanship. There are five large gold mosaics in the lower recesses, the first two representing the raising of the bones of St. Mark, the middle one is the last judgment, the next is the reception of the saint's bones by the doge, and the last is a mosaic of the church itself. The four mosaics in the upper vaults or arches are the descent from the cross, the descent into hell, the resurrection, and the ascension.

In the façade, over the entrance, are the famous four horses of St. Mark, weighing 1,860 pounds, bronzed, but preserving traces of their former gilding. The claim that they are Christian horses, or St. Mark's horses, is false, for they are the veritable horses which were cast at Chis, transferred to Athens, and from thence were sent to ornament the triumphal arches of Nero and Trajan at Rome. They accompanied Theodosius to Byzantium, and in the thirteenth century were transported to Venice to become the veritable horses of St. Mark, who, when living, kept a tame lion, which finally had wings. So Christian lies are made up and grow into pious truths. These same horses of St. Mark were taken by Napoleon to Paris and placed on the top of the Arc du Carrousal, to be again returned in 1815 to their old place in Venice. They are about all the horses that Venice can boast of.

Above the great door of the vestibule is St. Mark in pontifical garb. Below him are seven small mosaics representing the crucifixion and burial of Christ. On two crescents, to the right and left above the principal entrance, are the resurrection of Lazarus and the burial of the Virgin; in the tower side corners, the four evangelists; in the upper, the eight prophets; on the frieze the angels and doctors. To the right of the vestibule, in the Zeno chapel, is a highly-ornamented Lombardy altar, ornamented with a profusion of bronzes and marbles; also four great columns of the greatest delicacy, with three bronzes—the Virgin and child, John the Baptist, and old St. Peter. Farther inside the principal door is one of the most ancient mosaics in the church—of the eleventh century—Christ, the Virgin, and St. Mark.

The great arch of the nave is very rich, and is incrusted with gold and marble mosaics in five divisions, the subjects being taken from that crazy book called Revelation. The vault of the vestibule, which is in a line with the arch just alluded to, and is prolonged to the exterior façade in five compartments, is completely full of these elaborate mosaics. I took half an hour to study the first one, and almost broke my neck looking up at them; and then I saw pictured out in mosaic, made of small pieces of glass, gilt, etc., the same old, old story upon which Judaism and Christianity are founded. There was represented the great deep, without form and void, when the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. The great deep looked black, desolate, and incongruous, and the spirit of God was in the form of a big dove. Then God is represented as a venerable-looking old man with a good deal of glory and other fixings around his head, and he was separating the earth from the water, but it looked pretty dark and dreary still. He was again represented with a wand in his hand, causing herbs, grasses, flowers, shrubs, trees, etc., to grow up out of the earth, though no sun had yet been formed. The next day, the fourth, he was represented as performing that small job of creating the sun and moon and the millions of other suns and worlds that exist. That was a pretty good day's work, and no mistake. Next, the same extraordinary person, with an immense halo all around his head, was shown as speaking into existence the elephants, the lions, the rhinoceroses, the hippopotamuses, the tigers, bears, wolves, hyenas, giraffes, camels, horses, cows, asses, sheep, goats, hogs, and all the rest of the animal creation. That was a pretty good day's work too. The next representation was the same beneficient being making Adam out of a lump of cold clay. He had him pretty well molded in his own shape, and had him up endwise and about ready, after drying a little, to blow the breath of life into him. In the next picture Adam was alive and kicking, and God had him out giving names to the millions of the animal creation, not one of which was worth even a name. But Adam looked sort of lonesome, and God seemed to take pity on him—put his studying-cap on to see what could be done for his poor, lonely Adam. All the masculines had mates of an opposite sex; and after God had studied on the matter over night he concluded to be as favorable toward his higher being as he had been toward the bears, the skunks, and the alligators; so he gave Adam a dose of chloroform, or some other very sleepy stuff, and the poor fellow went into such a sound sleep that God performed a surgical operation upon him, and extracted one of his ribs so dexterously that Adam never knew what hurt him. The next operation is shown by God's taking that small rib-bone and drawing it out into the form of a beautiful woman. When Adam saw her he looked pleased, and love could be seen beaming from his very eyes. The young woman looked pleased, too, and they seemed ready to rush into each other's arms. God, he looked pleased, too, as much as to say, "Well, I have done it this time." I am not sure whether that was a good day's work or not. The question is mixed. I reserve my opinion.

Everything would probably have gone on swimmingly had not God, for some inexplicable reason, made a big snake with the ability and disposition to ruin all that had been done, and send the man and woman, and all their future offspring, to the devil. The snake is shown climbing a tree close by where the woman was standing, and just, unfortunately, when her husband happened to be away on private business; and the way that snake was stuffing his soft nonsense into that woman's ears was enough to fill one with indignation. The snake was too much for the woman, just as he was also too much for the being who had made him, and the woman began to look sort of willing, and the snake was laughing out of both his mouth and eyes, the villainous scoundrel, and the poor, inexperienced, and unsophisticated girl absolutely tasted of the apple, and that was a terrible bad piece of business for this poor, one-horse little world, and the snake looked as though he could dance with very joy.

When Adam came back he little knew what his wife had been up to, and when she offered him some of that tempting fruit he forgot all about that God had said he must not eat of it, and the poor, absent-minded fellow had no more sense than to eat one of those apples that God had made and placed before him; and that is the reason why we are all so totally damned. I'll be d——d if it aint. The snake had worked his cards first rate and took every trick, and God was taking a nap just above the tops of the bushes and did not mistrust what mischief the snake was playing with his young couple. But after his nap was over and he came down to take a walk in the shade where it was kind o' cool, the young man and woman hid away from him because they were ashamed to think they had eaten an apple, and strangely enough they found out they were naked, which they thought was not quite the correct thing. So they took fig leaves and sewed them together and made aprons for themselves and put them on. What they sewed them with the mosaics do not state, but they represent them first without aprons, and then with aprons, and I must be honest enough to say they looked better without the aprons than with them. If a little bit of an apron is all the clothing man and woman decide to wear I think they had better go without altogether—that is, if those mosaics are to be taken as a criterion to go by.

Well, when God was taking his little walk he missed the man and woman and could not imagine where they were. So he called for Adam and asked him where he was. Adam felt as guilty as a dog which had been eating stolen meat, but he tried to act innocent, and stepped out from behind some bushes and said, "Here I am." But when God saw that apron of fig leaves, wasn't he mad, though? He turned pale in the face and in very angry tones asked Adam what he was up to. Adam said, "Nothing." But God spoke up sharper than ever and said: "None of that, tell the truth. How did you know you were naked?" Then Adam blubbered out that it was not his fault; that Eve gave him a nice-looking apple, and, having a pretty good appetite at the time, he just ate it, and he thought it did him good. But god was terribly angry and asked the woman what she meant by such conduct, and to excuse herself she said she had never heard anything about its being wrong to eat apples, and the snake came along and persuaded her to try one by way of experiment, and she did so and found it very pleasant. Then God was awful mad at that snake, and in a minute saw what a mistake he had committed in making so smart a snake, and gave the snake an awful cursing and told him he should crawl on his belly all the days of his life and eat dust. Now the joke of it is that the cursing and sentence did not amount to very much, for the snake had crawled on his belly before that and had no other way of getting along unless he rolled over on his back or his sides, which was not natural for him to do. As for the dirt part of the sentence, probably it was revoked after God got a little over his pet, for no man has ever seen a snake eating dust.

Now don't understand that all this is exactly represented in those mosaics away up in the arches of that vestibule, but the main part of it is. Of course the conversation between the snake and Eve, and Adam and God, is supplied from the same source whence the mosaics were drawn. Other mosaics show how that inexperienced young man and woman were driven from that beautiful garden and made to go to work for a living. They also show how God took pity on them and turned tailor and made them garments of the skins of animals, that they might not catch cold from exposure to the bleak winds, and you ought to see him dressing them up in those raw-hide garments, making them look more like wild beasts than anything else. And I could scarcely help feeling sorry for the unfortunate couple, to see them grubbing the earth, causing the perspiration to ooze from their brows in their efforts to get some bread to eat. It made me entertain a very poor opinion of the snake, and a not very exalted one of his maker.

Then further on is shown Captain Noah playing the part of a carpenter, sawing timbers with a hand-saw to make an ark large enough to contain all the animated creation; but by dint of sawing, pounding, and nailing, he finally got the big scow done, and then all the animals with four legs and two legs and a hundred legs came marching up to the big door of that vast scow, and particularly I noticed the eagles, sea gulls, geese, and swans trying to get in when it would be supposed they could get along outside nearly as well as the eels, fishes, turtles, and frogs. When they all got in God closed the door and then made it rain most fearfully for forty days and nights. It was the biggest rain storm on record. Why, it rained several hundred feet in a day, and kept it up right along day after day, all over the earth for a month and a third. So wet a time was never known before, and the poor fellows, by the hundreds and thousands, whom the mosaic makers represented as struggling and kicking around in the swelling flood, looked as though they wished it would clear off. But there was no clear off for them; drowning was almost too good for them. Has not their great-grandfather eaten an apple? Yes, let rain keep on without cessation until the last one is drowned and the tops of the Himalayas and Alps are completely covered. It serves them right. They had no business to be born of such parents. No matter where all the water came from, no matter where it went to afterward, let the poor devils drown and give place to another lot worse than themselves.

You ought to have seen Captain Noah after he had his craft ready for sailing, and with Mrs. Noah, and the three young Mr. Noah's and their wives, all standing there by the ark with their best clothes on, ready to take a sea voyage, far more remarkable than the one which brought me to Europe. But probably they were glad when it was over, for it could not have been what might be called a first-class ticket to be shut up in that air-tight old scow in the dark, with three millions of beasts, birds, reptiles, and insects, for thirteen months. It is not strange that they grew impatient after a while, and that the captain is represented in these holy mosaics as opening the window of the ark and sending out birds as messengers to take soundings as to the depth of the water. It was, however, a rather cold way of beginning the world anew—especially when all hands had gone far longer without eating than Dr. Tanner did just at the time I left America—to land the ark on Mount Ararat, 17,000 feet above the level of the ocean and some 7,000 feet above the line of perpetual frost.

However interesting and beautiful this old story may seem to be to thousands I must not dwell too long upon it here, but while I stood there with my head thrown away back looking up at those mosaics, and viewing the representations of the silly old Chaldean fables upon which the Jewish and Christian religions were founded, I said to myself, "What utter fools human beings have been to entertain such views of God and truth and to found upon such silly falsehoods that which they call the greatest religion in the world, the acceptance and belief of which is the only possible means by which man can escape eternal burning!"

I did not stop to study the mosaics in the other arches, for to do so I would have wished another neck or a good easy couch upon which I could recline and look up at my ease. I saw, however, they were all incidents taken from the Old and New Testaments, that source of more falsehoods than any other volume I know of in existence.

The baptistry of the cathedral is ornamented with marbles, bas-reliefs, and other carvings of Christ's baptism, with a due amount of virgins and angels thrown in for good measure. In the right transept of the church is the oratory of the cross, formed by six columns, one of which is of rare black-and-white porphyry. On the wall, to the left, are more delicate marbles and a mosaic of Paradise—of course accurate. In the left aisle is the chapel of Madonna de Mascoli, with a beautifully-sculptured marble altar of the fourteenth century, and some more excellent mosaics of points in the history of the Virgin. Other chapels are of a similar description.

The high altar stands under a canopy on four pillars of Greek marble covered with various subjects in sacred history. This altar is remarkable for its two ancient paintings, the one serving as a cover for the other. The first is in the Greek style, in oil, on wood, in fourteen divisions, relating to the events in the life of Jesus. The second altarpiece, called the Pala d'Oro, is a Byzantine enamel, on gold and silver plating, set off by very elaborate chased work and a great quantity of pearls, cameos, sapphires, emeralds, and other precious stones. This is regarded as a wonderful piece of art, and is kept carefully covered with two thicknesses of shutters. I sat down before it to rest and witness the performances of the priests in chanting, administering the holy wafer, or transubstantiated body of Christ, to the penitents, etc.; and when all was over a goodly number of spectators had gathered, and the priests and assistants took the shutters down and allowed us to look at that remarkable piece of Byzantine art. I can scarcely describe it correctly. It is very intricate figuring and interlaying on a metallic base of black and other colors, most neatly executed. The whole was perhaps twelve feet in length by eight or ten in hight, and divided into sections or squares containing distinct designs of a pious character. Great value is attached to it.

The bas-reliefs in white marble on the door of the sacristy are by Sansovino, and took him twenty years to execute. Among the relics of great value are pieces of the "true cross," with one of the nails used upon it, the very sponge with which gall and vinegar were given Christ, or wine and myrrh as one of the narrators stated. No matter which of them told a falsehood. The sponge is in St. Mark's, also the knife which cut the bread at the Last Supper; the thigh-bone of John the Baptist, as well as a great number of articles pertaining to St. Mark. Oh, what lying absurdities! In the cathedral are numerous tombs of the dead doges, archbishops, and other dignitaries.

The Campanile Tower, standing but a short distance from the cathedral, is forty-two feet square at the base, and tapers slightly from the ground upward. It is 320 feet high, and at the top are several heavy bells. The ascent is by an inclined plane next the outer wall, and not by steps. Napoleon once rode his horse up this ascent to the top; thus there are two places at least he ascended that I also ascended. From the top a splendid view is obtained of the city and surrounding country. The mountains of the Tyrol, fifty miles or more to the north, proudly held up their lofty heads, and the Adriatic Sea and the beautiful plains were spread out like a lovely panorama. The tower was begun nine hundred years ago, and was over two hundred and fifty years in being completed. Bas-reliefs of heathen deities are near the base, and the whole is a fine structure of ornamental brick work.

The Ducal Palace, the old seat of the doge, is a place of considerable interest. It was formerly the seat of government and contains the halls where the Senate and the Council of Ten held their sessions. Another hall was for the meetings of the horrible Council of Three. The table is still there where once they sat, and likewise the stations where masked inquisitors and executioners once stood till they received their bloody orders, when without a word they moved to execute them. Many a deed of bloody cruelty was there performed.

In the upper story of the palace is also the Salla della Bussola, so called from a compass on the door. A hole marks the place of the lion's mouth, by means of which persons were anonymously denounced to the Council of Ten, to whose room this was the antechamber. In addition to the hall for the Council of Three and for the Senate were also splendid rooms for the reception of embassadors from other governments, as well as many other halls and rooms for governmental purposes. All are ornamented with statues, bronzes, and paintings. In the galleries and chapel of the Procuratie Nouve are several good paintings.

There are many public buildings, palaces, and galleries of works of art which I will not attempt to describe. I visited a part of them only, deeming them fair representatives of the others. I visited a number of churches, and was considerably interested in that of Santa Maria di Frari. It is five hundred years old, and contains many rich works of art, including statuary of high order, paintings, bas-reliefs, etc. The tomb of Canova in this church attracts great attention, and thousands visit it to look upon the tomb of that great artist. There are numerous other churches, nearly all of which contain noted works of art and the tombs of various noted saints and dignitaries. To attend to the duties of these numerous churches twelve hundred priests are kept in constant employment. There were formerly a greater number, but the government came to the conclusion that the holy men were in excess, and cut down their number some hundreds. If God is able to get along in that one town of Venice with what twelve hundred priests can do for him, let me say I am glad of it. It is well enough to be a little economical in heavenly expenses.

I took three hours' ride in a gondola; and here let me say a word by way of description. A gondola is a slim, sprightly boat, thirty-five feet long, flat on the bottom, with no keel, turning up somewhat at the ends. The place for the passenger is in the center, and that locality often has a covering over the seats, which has been likened to a hearse, sometimes having curtains and sometimes windows. The gondolas would look far more attractive if not painted black, according to an ordinance of the Senate passed many years ago, when they were fearful the common classes were painting and decorating their gondolas too finely, equaling even the patricians' or nobles'.

The gondolier is a sort of rakish, piratical-looking individual, who propels his craft with a single oar, standing a few feet from the stern end, skilfully turning corners, avoiding other gondolas, and making good landings at the steps leading from buildings and sidewalks. They can shove them along at a rapid rate; but when they work by the hour I noticed the gondolas went much slower, the force expended on the oar being much less. Mine was hired on time, the charge being a lira or franc per hour. I soon perceived, besides going slow, he was especially fond of calling at the churches, galleries, and workshops of curiosities, which he thought I ought to visit while he took his ease outside, but of course under pay. He took me to an establishment where fine mosaic work for ornamentation in buildings, and for personal ornaments and jewelry, is manufactured. It is interesting to see with what skill thousands of pieces of glass of different colors are fitted together so as not to show a joint in a small piece of work, representing flowers, figures, persons, etc., as neatly as the finest painting. Ladies' jewelry, breastpins, bosom-buttons, are thus composed of hundreds of pieces of glass skilfully fitted together. Glass-spinning was also executed in the same establishment. Patronizing it to a small extent, I pushed on; but when I saw my gondolier persisted in keeping me inside of some establishment I remonstrated with some emphasis. We could not understand each other's language, but I made him underatand by pantomime that I wanted to go outside in the harbor, among the shipping, etc. He took me out into the Grand Canal by the Rialto bridge, and the Bridge of Sighs, which I thought not a bridge of large size, no matter how many sighs it had caused the poor criminals who were forced to pass over it for execution. My gondolier soon got tired again and wished me to make more calls, do more shopping, sight-seeing, etc. At every landing a man was standing with a pole in his hand with a hook upon it, with which he pulled in the gondola and held it while I stepped out, for which very valuable services he expected a few pennies. These services were unnecessary, and is only one of the many ways of Venetian begging. Again I made a more vigorous pantomimic demonstration that I wished to ride out in the broad expanse of water. He complied, but with evident reluctance, and was careful not to hurry himself. The third hour was enough for either of us.

There are many showy stores in Venice, especially those around one of the piazzas near St. Mark's. Many of the streets where there are no canals are not more than ten or twenty feet wide, with no sidewalks. The streets were clean. As no carts or vehicles are used wide streets seem hardly necessary. The open places, or small squares, are called campos, and invariably belong to some saint.

I visited the quay on the grand canal, where considerable traffic in market goods is transacted, also the markets near the Rialto. Fruits were plentiful and cheap. The fish market was well supplied with numerous kinds of fish new to me, and among the rest large quantities of eels. Here I saw fresh sardines in profusion, a little fish about the size of the little finger. Many were also for sale, recently fried. I thought I would see if they were as good when fried as when packed in sweet oil. I handed out twenty centesimi and the dealer gave me twenty-five nice sardines, enough for a meal. They were excellent, and I would like some every day.

The Italians are very fond of cooked squash. I saw many pedlers of squash, much like the Hubbard variety, just baked. The squash dealers were often met with. Sweet potatoes and Irish potatoes (boiled) were also for sale on the streets. So if a man has a few soldi in his pocket he can in Venice obtain a meal at a low price.

The city being free from the rattle and noise of stages, drays, and carriages of all kinds is remarkably still and quiet. The gondolas glide around without making the least disturbance. But as Mark Twain suggested, the canals all over the city giv it the appearance of a town submerged by high water, and that soon the flood must subside, leaving the earth again in view. As a novelty a city of this kind does very well, but I do not wish to see it adopted in American cities. One street like Broadway in New York, with all its noise and confusion, is worth all the canals in Venice with its thousands of gondolas and larger boats thrown in.

As I remained in Venice till 11 o'clock at night I had a good opportunity of seeing the gondolas glide around by lamplight, each gondola being supplied with one or two lamps. The reflection of them in the quiet water has quite a novel effect. The city seems to have no water works but depends on public wells in the squares or campos. It is very common to see a dozen or two around these public wells drawing water to carry to the houses. This is more frequently done by women and they carry off two large bucketfuls by means of a kind of shoulder spring-board, a la Chinese. A round piece of board is floated upon the surface of the water to keep it from slopping over, and the sturdy Italian women march off with pretty heavy loads of fluid. Many other articles are transported in the same way by both men and women. These shoulder boards are six or eight feet in length. As the water in the Adriatic and in the canals is salt, I hardly understood how wells dug in the city should afford fresh water, but probably they are dug lower than the salt water penetrated. It might be thought, however, that the salt water would leak in and make all brackish, but it seems not.

As may well be imagined since coming into Italy I have an entire new language to learn. I find no words in use with which I am familiar. But so long as people will persist in talking that which is not English I find it makes but little difference to me what it is, as I am about equally familiar with French, German, Italian, and Choctaw, though perhaps Italian is considerably more unknown to me than French or German. The names of money are all changed. In Switzerland francs and centimes were all the currency; here they have changed to lire and centesimi, a lira having the same value, as a franc, and containing 100 centesimi or twenty soldi. A soldi is about the value of one cent with us.

Paper money is largely in use here; very little silver is seen and reminds me of the time when our fractional currency was in use. I have seen these small bills from half a lira up to ten, twenty, and fifty lire. Twenty francs or lire in gold is worth nearly twenty-two francs in paper. French, English, and German gold pass here very well, but not the silver and copper; the latter will not go at all, no more than the copper of this realm will pass in France, Germany, etc. It stands the traveler in hand to be careful and not carry the small coins of one kingdom to another.

We also no longer have the same word for street. In London, as in America, the word is street; in Paris, Brussels, and in Switzerland it is rue; in Antwerp it is canal; in Germany it is strasse; while here in Italy it is via (the i being sounded like e). I notice the Italian has many words similar to the Latin, from which it was partially derived. Thus water is aqua, way is via, and the same with many other words. It seems to me nearly all the words end in a vowel. I estimate them about in this wise:

|---|---|
| Words ending in o, | 35 per cent. |
| " " " i, | 25 " " |
| " " " a, | 15 " " |
| " " " e, | 10 " " |
| All others, | 15 " " |

I think I could learn the terminations tolerably easy if I got familiar with the rest of the words, and by some possibility could be able to discover their meaning. I would willingly give a week's work to be able to speak the language as well as some of those apple-women do in New York, and just for the next ten days.

We passed in the night the town of Bologna, a city of 100,000 inhabitants, the birthplace of eight popes, one hundred cardinals, several artists and distinguished characters. It has an old cathedral, 130 churches, twenty convents, leaning towers, 1,300 priests, and is the original place of manufacture of the celebrated Bologna sausages. I did not stop to pay my respects to it and to see if they were still making good bolognas there. Not long after passing it we began to climb the high ground of the Apennines, steadily rising, until we reached an altitude of over 3,000 feet. We passed through no less than twenty-four tunnels, one after the other, in rapid succession, one of them nearly two miles long and another nearly half a mile. The mountains were piled up in wild grandeur and would do no discredit to Switzerland. For twenty or thirty miles the making of the road must have been attended with great expense. It cannot be denied that the Italians are capable of accomplishing great undertakings. I could not help feeling proud of them when I saw what mountains of rock they had drilled through. As the cars emerged from these wild mountain peaks and crags and we began to descend gradually into the smiling valley below, the views were lovely. It had just got to be good broad daylight, and nature presented a charming appearance. I could not help saying as we glided from one beautiful picture to another, "O beautiful nature, how I love you!" As we descended from the points where only wild, stunted trees were growing, we reached the belt where are hundreds of vineyards, looking neat, thrifty, and vigorous, and soon the olive trees were seen in profusion all around us. These were the first olive trees I had seen. They have a peculiar green of their own and are quickly distinguished from other trees. Peaches and apple trees also abounded, and some fig trees. The mulberry in some locations is largely grown. As we descended into the valley, patches of Indian corn were often met, and they looked as though the yield was good. I saw growths of vegetation with which I am not acquainted. One kind is especially beautiful, tall, and luxuriant. It grows ten feet high, with upright stalk, with long, sharp, clean-looking leaves in profusion and which are very numerous near the top of the stalk. The plant has a tropical appearance and is magnificent. I must try and learn its name.

Pistoja is rather a pleasant town of 12,000 inhabitants, situated at the foot of the Apennines, and is called by the Italians La Ferrigna, because of the large iron manufactories conducted there. It is the Birmingham or Pittsburgh of Italy. It is claimed pistols were invented and first manufactured there. Machinery, nails, plows, cutlery, pins, pistols, etc., are manufactured there in considerable quantities.

An hour's ride through a most beautiful country, teeming with almost every desirable production of the earth, brought us to the old, historical, and even beautiful town of Florence, called by the Italians Firenze, the Florentia of the ancients. It is a city of 150,000 inhabitants, and but for one thing would be a very beautiful city. It was laid out many hundred years ago before people had learned that streets of good width are preferable to narrow ones, and that it is better to have them straight and at right angles than crooking and curving about in every conceivable way. It has a few tolerably wide and straight streets, but the greater number are narrow, irregular, and without sidewalks or gutters. They are, however, smoothly paved and largely with flagstones, and are kept clean.

Florence is situated on the river Arno, four-fifths of the town being on the north side. The Arno is not equal to the Hudson, nor to the Thames, nor the Seine even. It has a fine bed for a river, but the water for a large river is not there, and what there is very turbid. The soil seems to mix freely with the water, and to remain in solution. I judge by the marks on the walls, built upon each side of the river, that in the spring season, when the snows on the Apennines melt and pour down in profusion their contribution to old ocean, that the river gets pretty high.

In a topographical point of view Florence is a beautiful city, and has a lovely situation in a lovely valley, with the Apennines in the distance on the north, and hills rising gradually on either side at sufficient distance to afford the needful charm, and cultivated to their very tops. When one enters the town he is struck with the unusual aspect which her palaces present, by their solidity of construction, as well as their simplicity, by the severity of their style, without porticos or columns, and their black façades which look like old citadels. He wonders at the indescribable genius of severity impressed in those almost castles, monuments of the middle ages, which still give so characteristic physiognomy to the city. Florence has often been called the Athens of modern times, from the attention it has given to literature and art. Art has indeed had a home here for many centuries, and the storehouses of the works of art of all kinds are a wonder to investigate. Four stone bridges (pontes) cross the Arno and unite the two portions of the city, and they are solid and massive.

The town is well supplied with public squares or piazzas and these are richly ornamented with fountains and statuary in both marble and bronze. The Piazza della Signoria has the precedence for importance, antiquity, and embellishments. It is rich in monuments of architecture and sculpture, and is the center of Florence. The principal edifice there is the Palazzo Vecchio, the severe and characteristic aspect of which recalls to memory the fierce and haughty disposition of the ancient republicans who lived here. It was built early in the fourteenth century. It was designed for the Signoria of Florence to gather in and transact the business of the public. It has been enlarged at different times in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Over the door are two large carved lions with an inscription in Latin. Under the arches, after the entrance is made, one is struck with the great amount of carving and decorations which line the arches overhead. I will not attempt a description, only mentioning the large fountain of porphyry, and return to the piazza in front. A colossal group of statuary at the entrance is Hercules and Cacus, and is a work of merit. On the left corner is the celebrated Neptune fountain. The statue of Neptune in the center is nineteen feet in hight. The four horses attached to his car appear very spirited Equally animated are the tritons, nymphs, and satyrs which are sporting around the large basin. A few feet farther to the left is a tall, fine, equestrian statue of Cosmo I., with bas-reliefs in bronze on the square portions of the pedestal. The whole has a rich appearance.

On the south side of the piazza stands the Loggia d' Orcagna, erected in 1355 for the purpose of providing a place for the magistrates of the city when they wished to convoke the people. Next to the piazza is an extensive terrace or porch richly decorated with statuary. On each side of the entrance up the steps is a colossal marble lion. On one side at the rear of the terrace are the six vestals, all Greek sculpture, brought to Florence in 1788 from the Villa Medici at Rome. In the center are very fine groups, one of the rape of Sabines, another the death of Ajax, and again the contest of Hercules and the Centaur. On the north side are the four cardinal virtues, and on the east side the theological virtues. The bronze figure of Perseus, with its base ornamented, is a fine work. In front is a fine bronze statue of David holding up the head of Goliah which he has just severed.

This imperfect description will hardly give an adequate idea of this piazza, with the imposing buildings and grand statues around it. There are thirteen piazzas in the city, and many of them ornamented with statues and fountains, but I will not attempt a description. The piazza of Cavour is very large and surrounded with uniform porticoed buildings. On one side there is a public garden called Parterre. Its triumphal arch was constructed in 1745. A colossal statue of Dante stands in the center of the piazza of St. Croce, and in front of the very rich church belonging to the same saint. The statue was inaugurated in 1865. A fine marble fountain is in the same piazza.

I had but one day to devote to Florence, and the question arose in my mind which sights I should pay my attention to first. My piety soon got the upper-hand in this debate, as it most always does, and I decided to look at the churches, of course including the cathedral. There are over one hundred and thirty churches in Florence, and it was clearly out of the question that I could inspect them all in one day, and also examine the ninety-seven acres of paintings and statuary with which the city is so rich. I can do considerable, but I could not accomplish all that during the sunlight of one day. So in starting out from the station I came upon the very fine church of St. Maria Novella in the square owned by the same excellent saint. This church was a favorite of Michael Angelo, and he called it his bride, so why should I not call in and look at it? The foundation stone was laid in 1279. The frontispiece was finished two hundred years later. The length of the church is 300 feet, and the width 90 feet. It is one of the prettiest churches I have seen. It is in the German-Gothic style. The frescoes overhead in the high, vaulted arches are very fine, but I will not stop to name the subjects. You may know well enough that they embraced holy virgins, dying Saviors, and all that godly sort of business. The paintings on the wall are very fine. The numerous chapels are finely decorated with statues and rich paintings. On the walls of the large Strozzi chapel are very large paintings, not less than twenty-five feet in hight, representing the judgment day, and heaven and hell. The conceptions of hell I judge were taken from Dante's Inferno; they are horrible in all conscience, with the monsters writhing in the flames of the everlasting fires. It would seem that none but a mind very much diseased could imagine such horrors.

One of the priests seeing me poking about in my green sort of way, and observing I did not know much about what I was looking at, very kindly pointed out many of the remarkable pictures and told me who they were painted by; this one by Angelo, that one by Torrento, and that other one by some other Italian fellow whom I never heard of. They were all very fine, and it was doubtless extremely interesting to know what dead Italians did it all, but as he spoke exclusively in the language of this country, I could not understand but a word or two he said, but I appreciated his kindness all the same, and dropped a few soldi in his hand and we parted happy.

I could use up several sheets of paper in describing the beautiful paintings, statues, and decorations in the various chapels, but I will not, but will give you one as a specimen of the entire lot. The Spanish chapel is celebrated for the frescoes with which it is covered, and they are by the very best artists. On the southern wall are the histories of St. Dominic and St. Peter Martyr. On the eastern wall the militant and triumphant church is represented as the gate of paradise. On a throne are seated the protecters and defenders of the church, the pope, the emperor, the king, the cardinals, bishops, priests, and many other distinguished personages. I said to them at once: "Well, if you set of fellows make up the inhabitants of paradise, you need not count me in. I don't want to go there." St. Dominic was showing his auditors the way to heaven, St. Peter was opening the gates, while Jesus was seated on a throne surrounded by angels. On the north side was Jesus bearing his cross, the crucifixion, and the descent into hell. On the west side St. Thomas Aquinas was surrounded by angels, saints, and patriarchs, and at his feet were the condemned, the leaders of heresy and false philosophy, among whom were Arius, Sabellius, and Averroes. I thought again to myself, "I had rather any day go to hell with such men as Averroes than to heaven with such men as St. Dominic and Thomas Aquinas. The fourteen figures in the niches represent, 1. Civil right with the Emperor Justinian; 2. Canon law, Pope Clement V.; 3. Speculative Theology, Peter Lombard; 4. Practical Theology, Severus Boëthius; 5. Faith, Dionysius the Areopagite; 6. Hope, St. John of Damascus; 7. Love, St. Augustine; 8. Arithmetic, Pythagoras; 9. Geometry, Euclid; 10. Astronomy, Ptolemy; 11. Music, Tubul Cain; 12. The Dialectic, Zenon of Elis; 13; Rhetoric, Cicero; and finally, 14. Grammar, Donato. Those pagan fellows did well enough, but I am not partial to saints. On the ceiling are the resurrection, the ascension, the descent of the Holy Ghost, and as a symbol of the church, St. Peter's ship preserved through the storm. There, is not that enough for one chapel of a church where there are a dozen more equal to this if not more so?

After this I came to a gallery of paintings and antiquities; I walked right in, and in the hour I was going through I saw more paintings, more statues, more carved book-cases, bureaus, sideboards, chairs, more antique tables, with fine tops of mosaic work, and more old furniture inlaid with ivory, pearl, and gold than I shall undertake to describe.

The next thing was to take an omnibus and ride for three soldi, or cents, wherever it pleased to take me. I watched the buildings and people until I found myself at the west end of the city. I then remembered I wished most of all to visit the Duomo, or the cathedral of St. Maria del Fiore (of the flower or Red Lily), and invested three more soldi with another omnibus to take me to the piazza del Duomo, which is the cathedral square. The cathedral is in many respects a remarkable structure. The walls are of stone with a veneer of black and white marble very skilfully put on in figures of great variety. The length is 500 feet and the width 310 feet; width of nave 128 feet feet and hight 153 feet. There are three large doors in front and two on each side, all richly carved. The veneering for the front of the cathedral has never been put on but is now being done. I saw some thirty or forty artists in marble, sawing, chiseling, drilling, cutting, chipping, rubbing, polishing, inlaying, making mosaics, etc., etc., for the front of this temple. They are at work by the side of a part of the cathedral, where a high plank inclosure is made for the purpose, and there they have an engine at work driving such machinery as is needed. The edifice being entirely faced with the most beautiful variegated marbles presents a very rich appearance.

It was begun in 1298, but met with some vicissitudes, for in 1586 one of the pestiferous Medici family demolished the entire marble front. It was designed by the republic to be the largest and most sumptuous building that could be invented, in order that it might correspond with a "very great heart," because originating in the minds of most of the citizens united together in one will. Michael Angelo is said to often have looked at it and said it could never be surpassed, and it is probably excelled only by St. Peter's in this city. Among the Madonnas on the front is the Madonna del Fiore by Giovanni di Pisa, with Ghirlandejo's mosaic of the assumption; G. Gaddi's mosaic of the coronation of the Virgin is over the middle door within the church.

The interior of the cathedral is of dark mottled stone with a variegated marble pavement for floor, inlaid with lilies, in red, black, and white marble designed by Angelo and Gallo. It is lighted by narrow stained windows. The vast nave is flanked by four great painted arches on each side of the middle aisle (55 feet wide) which are carved with armorial bearings. The windows of the side aisles are small, and those of the clerestory at the distance look like mere circular holes. The choir is octagonal inclosed by an Ionic colonnade, and corresponds in shape with the dome above, which is also eight sided, and double-cased (one dome within another). The interior of the dome is covered with rich frescoes by Vasari and Zucchero. It is 140 feet in diameter inside, and 100 feet above the ridge of the roof of the cathedral. From the pavement to the top of the cross is 380 feet. There is a hole in the top through which the sun, shining in line with a mark on the pavement of the north transept, shows the direction of the meridian, first traced by Toscanelli in 1468. In the choir are bas-reliefs by Bandinelli and his pupils. Behind the high altar is a Pieta, the last work of Michael Angelo.

Among the monuments are, Giotto, the painter, a portrait bust of Majano. Brunelleschi, and a bust of Ticino, the friend of Lorenzo de Medici—the same Lorenzo who, when his brother Giuliano was killed at the high altar by the Pazzi, escaped death by flying into the old sacristy. In the five chapels round the tribune are statues by the first old sculptors of Italy. These chapels, with their pictures and other relics, are contained in the three apses which surround the base of the dome at the east end of the church. It is said on Easter eve the cathedral is crowded with the farmers of the surrounding country to watch the motion of an artificial dove, which at the Gloria in Excelsis glides along the nave on a rope, sets fire to a combustible car, provided for the purpose, in the street, and then flies whizzing back. All the hopes of the superstitious farmers for a bountiful harvest are fixed on the safe return of the dove to the altar. Such is exactly the nature of Christian superstition. The cupola over the dome is magnificent and is said to surpass that on St. Peter's at Rome. Though it has been struck by lightning several times it still remains intact.

It is not necessary for me to describe all the statues and paintings of virgins and saints in this cathedral. I have probably done quite enough already. Suffice it to say I am getting pretty familiar with nearly all the saints. I have learned when I see a fat, old, monkish-looking saint leading a tame lion about, that it is St. Mark. When I see one with a book and pen in a brown study to think what big story he shall write next, I know in a moment that it is meant for St. Matthew. I am sorry he was so given to big stories. When I see a hungry-looking sort of fellow with a cow by the side of him and no other companion but a pen and inkstand, I know in a trice that he is St. Luke. He was in the habit of making statements of things he knew nothing about the truth of. When I see an extra-meek, delicate-looking saint, with the dyspepsia, I take it for St. John, especially if he looks as though he had just had a vision. When I see a very calm and serene individual sitting on a rock, with his placid countenance turned toward heaven and a skull by the side of him, from the information I have I take it to be St. Jerome. When I see one more pious looking than all the rest, standing up straight, nearly naked, with his body shot full of arrows, and he looking as though he did not care a cent for them, I know without being told that he is St. Sebastian. When I see a venerable, tall, stoop-shouldered man with a little babe in his arms, which I am sure he could not be the daddy of, I know he is St. Christopher; and so of lots more of those old fellows. I hav got so I know them just like a book. I know them as quick as I see them. And I fancy they hav got so they know me. As I passed St. Sebastian the other day I thought he nodded at me, and that St,

Sermon on the Liberal League Congress.

DEARLY BELUBBED AN' BELUBBEDESSES: De sarmen dis lubly Saturday ebenin' am one which will start out with no blast ob de gospel trumpet. If you doesn't understan' dis flowin' langwidge, den I will say plainly dat your pastor haint got time to hunt through de obscenest ob obscene books for a tex'. No; his time an' feelin's won't allow ob such triflin' at de present time. I see seberal ob de pillars ob de church, an' some ob de pillaresses, an' doze wild boys in de gallery a-stretchin' dar moufs from ear to ear expectin' dat your pastor is a-gwine for to say somethin' funny. Jess you bring your moufs down to somethin' like dar normal condition, for I'se not in de humor to play de pulpit clown or enact de mountebank an' monkey a la Talmage at de present juncture.

Dat a la business am French, but you needn't on dat account slip an extra quarter in de contribution sasser.

No, dar ain't a-gwine for to be a gospel starter dis heat. I'se jess a-goin' to pick up de ribbons, hold a stiff rein, start when I please, an' arter I do start you'll see de dust fly. If it chokes you or makes you sneeze dat's a sign you's too close. All I want is a clear track, an' I isn't gwine for to run ober any one 'less day is too stubborn to git out ob de way.

Now, jess keep cool while I starts off with de starter—United we stan', divided we don't. Dat ain't de exact Kaintuck langwidge, but de essence am dar all de same. What am I a-dribin' at? Jess you hold your hosses, an' before I'se done spinnin' round de track you'll know to a sartinty. Dat's more satisfaction dan you can derive from de expoundin's ob de Bible-bangin' galoots, an' consequently it am a big satisfaction to me. Now, some ob you jess commence a-duckin' your heads, for I'se got my howitzer loaded, an' it am pinted right square at de Liberal fold.

Before I make another start I will simply state dat dar am not gwine to be any twenty-onethy's or thirty-twothy's in this, but will consist solely ob a great, big, plump, fat fustly. Now I'se ready. I was at de last Liberal League Convention. I was pleased to see so many good men an' woman present. Dar was boss intelligence an' way-up genius in dat assemblage. Dar war; but I isn't gwine to dwell on de side dat was golden, but say dat dar war some things cooked up by a few an' forced upon de balance. Dar war some ob our leadin' lights who refused to partake ob de dishes; an' our heart aches an' our eyes grow dim as we say dat de greatest an' most accomplished Liberals ob both hemispheres war present. Dat trumpet-voiced an' silver-tongued Liberal orator, massa Ingersoll, was one ob doze who would not be forced to do dat which was agin his sense ob right, an' so he bid farewell to the Liberal League. Den dar war dat honest an' valiant soldier, massa H. L. Green, who would do right eben if de heavens tumble in consequence darof. Others hab departed likewise, an' de voice ob your pastor praise dem for so doin'. Does you think, honeys, kase massa Bob quit de narrow stage ob a League dat he hab stepped out ob de Liberal harness? Why, bress your hearts, de whole earf am his platform, an' all civilized humanity his audience.

I say it boldly, an' I'se not detractin' from de good work done by de members ob de Liberal Leagues, but put dem all together, an' dey has not made one-half as many converts to de Liberal cause, dey has not drummed up half as many recruits into de Liberal ranks as has dat great apostle ob humanity, massa Bob Ingersoll.

But, here, I'se done with personalities, an' will strike out in a different gait. Dar am not the slightest reason why dar should be any dissensions in our ranks. I despise all such doin's, for it brings us down on a lebbel with de eber-quarrelin', caterwaulin, an' wranglin' churches ob Christ Jesus.

How am it to be remedied? De means am simple. As Christ spoke in parables, I'll follow suit, as I'se ob de opinion de occasion demands. Keep your moufs a little more closed, an' your ears a trifle wider open, so's you can take in all dar am ob

DE PARABLE OB DE FEAST.

1. Dar sojourned on de face ob de land a community ob de choicest spirits, both male and otherwise.

2. Day was constituted different from de other portion ob de human race, inasmuch as each an' ebery one ob dem had a mind.

3. He had his'n, an' she had her'n.

4. Therefore dey war not called upon to hire black-gowned dervishes to do dar thinkin' for dem.

5. Dis was good for dem; but, verily, it war mighty rough on de dervishes.

6. In doze days it came to pass dat de wise brethren said, one unto de other, "Let us spread a feast, an' let all nations an' races partake darof."

7. An' you bet they had a bully good one.

8. Years passed, an' time made de community strong in numbers.

9. Day came from de tabernacles ob de Catholics, ob de Mefodists, ob de Presbyterians, an' all doze shops whar day bow down to a false God.

10. An' soon it came to pass dat de last comers war afflicted with a disease.

11. Some more dan others.

12. It war de big head.

13. An' lo, an' behold, another feast dey gib.

14. De ole wise men shook dar heads in sadness; for lo, instead ob de clear an' sparklin' Liberal wine an' de wholesome Liberal food, dey chucked on rot-gut whisky an' half-cooked fodder.

15. "Think dey this is a hash-house," said the elders, "dat day sling on such dishes, et cetera?"

16. "Nay, verily," responded the extremists, "but we bring our dishes as proper adjuncts ob de great Liberal ones, dat ye may partake ob dem also.

17. Den spake de great apostle, "De Liberal dishes only am designed to grace de festiv board." He also spake unto dem, sayin', "If ye hav need ob sich things, partake ob dem at de lunch-counter, or in your homes, for day smell in our nostrils."

18. But dey came with dar dishes all de same.

19. An' Bill Jones, sired by ole Jones, an' damned by Susan Jane Jones, an' all others who knew him, spake as the spirit moved him. "Lo, here am a high ole game dish ob de bird ob burden, de Jack. It am now known as Communism, an' he who refuses to partake ob de same am no Liberal, an' he who does partake an' says he likes it not is a liar if he thinks so."

20. Then arose J. Smith, de last ob his race, an' spake these words, "Lo, dis black puddin' a-swimmin' in rum sauce is Democratic, an' he who partakes not ob it is no healthy Liberal.

21. Den Zebedee Johnsing climbed unto his feet an' dar-upon soliloquized:

22. "Verily, de aforesaid J. Smith is a liar, a hoss-thief, repeater, an' ballot-box stuffer. Partake not ob his vile truck. Lo, here I offer unto you a rich ring-cake, slightly moldy, but it is a genuin Republican all de same. So be it ye partake not ob dis, den you am no Liberal, an' may ye be damned.

23. Den a noise was heard in de midst ob de gatherin' as J. Cæsar Boggs, ob de lan' ob Boggsville, brought in on an inflated rubber platter a very small canvass-back duck, stuffed with rags. He said, "Dis am de Greenback dish, an' he who eats it not, stuffin' an' all, is no Liberal, an' may he be damned.

24. But de damnin' didn't hurt any one.

25. Den de great Tom Brown, ob de tribe ob Brown on his father's side, flew in with a little pastry known in de lan' as a puff. He spake, "I know de same am rather thin, but if ye partake not ob dis spiritual dish, den are ye not a Liberal."

26. Den a wild-eyed virago, with a flowin' garment, cut low under de chin, made her voice heard above all de uproar.

27. "Behold, I bring unto de feast a roasted female lamb.

28. "The fleece hath not been removed, nor hath the entrails been taken away, yet am it a savory dish, an' dem who partakes not ob dis Freelove dainty am not, nor neber was, Liberals."

29. Den de great apostles gathered dar robes aroun' dem an' walked off into a corner a-holdin' dar noses.

30. An' dey dus spake one to another:

31. "Lo, if we partake of all dese dishes we will, perad venture, bust. What do you say if we climb out an' git."

32. An' day clumb an' got.

33. An' lo, a angel appeared, sayin', "Look at de next feast dat will come in de future."

34. Lo, an' behold, dar appeared a banquet spread with many dishes, but de Liberal viands an' dishes war not on de board.

35. And dar sat at de banquet not a single Liberal.

36. An' I spake unto de angel, cryin', "Verily, dese claim to be Liberals. Wherefore are dey not."

37. An' de angel cried out in a loud voice, "Oh, you thick headed galoot, go an' hunt up your Webster an' find out what a Liberal is, anyhow."

38. An' I went as de angel directed, an' lo, I'm willin' to bet two dollars an' a half dat de ole flyin' sharp knew what he was talkin' about.

39. Amen.

I doesn't wish to wound your feelin's, but I jess want it 'stinctly understood dat dar am too many isms a-creepin' into de Liberal ark. I doesn't care what your politics am, or whether you is a Communist, Spiritualist, Freelovist, or a damfoolist generally, but I do care if you is gwine to try to force your opinions down de neck ob any ob my flock, or a-tryin' to make it a cause ob debate in dis heah church.

Now, honeys, let us stick to de ole bedrock Liberal principles. Let us vote for doze men whom we deem de best friends ob de cause we hab nearest to our hearts. Let us try to hab de costly churches an' cathedrals pay taxes jess de same as de little blacksmith shop down in de lane. Let dem worship as dey please, but let dem pay for de amusement as we do for ours. Let de Bible be kept out ob de reach ob de innocent children in our public schools. Let us be Liberals, an' not fanatics. Our clipper ship, the Liberal, am no canal or freight boat for every hobby or ism dat comes along, backed up by some wild-eyed hyena who thinks he's got de world by de tail simply bekase he has thought ob some wild thing one man out of a thousan' wouldn't countenance. We doesn't want such aboard. We's got on all de freight we can carry. Look at dat water-logged ole mud-scow, Zion, nearly to de water's edge filled with all sorts ob rubbish an' filth. Don't you see she am a-sinkin' an' a-goin' down stream all de time. Well, dat war what she was built for—to carry eberything dat was rotten. Our Liberal craft wasn't designed for such use. So if any ob you think you's a-gwine to soil de clean decks ob our noble ship with your dirty freight you's mistaken. When you run down to de landin' with your dirty luggage you'll find dat de gang plank has been drawn in. Honeys, believe what you please. Be good Liberals, an' no matter what your opinions may be on other questions, keep dem outside ob our Liberal conventions an' papers. Now look out. De sasser will soon come aroun', an' I'se sailin' home under de string an' come agin to de starter, "United we stan', divided we don't."

Theological Impudence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It has always seemed to me a most remarkable fact that we who hav borrowed the sacred books and a part of the religion of an ancient people, and hav at the same time rejected a very large portion of their religious creed and ceremonies, should pretend to hold their books so borrowed in greater awe and respect than did their high-priests and learned laymen. Here we are carefully studying, and commenting upon with extreme reverence, every word and line of certain chapters of these books, and giving to them a literal signification, whereas their greatest priests thousands of years ago really had no such books if we may credit the thirty-fourth chapter of Second Chronicles and the twenty-second chapter of Second Kings and that chapter of Esdras wherein the writer declares the Lord's book is burned, and tells how he restored it.

One of the most valuable of all the literary productions transmitted to us from antiquity is the essay of Josephus against Apion. Josephus was one of the greatest men his nation ever produced, and a priest of the Jews. His learning is most remarkable when we consider the age in which he flourished and the people among whom he was educated. Every page of his writings evinces his extreme respect for the religion of which he was a hereditary priest. In this essay, among many memorable statements, he declares: "Our sacred books are twenty-two in number. The five first are the books of Moses, in which he has given us his own laws and the traditions among mankind of the origin of creation."

His own laws, not God's laws, and the traditions of the origin! Yet to-day our priesthood has so wrought upon itself and us as to make us regard every line, every word, every letter, as the very word of the most high God. How wonderful! But 'tis of a piece with that which compels us to observe the first day for the seventh, although Constantine the emperor is the only authority for it (see Sozeman, and also Brand's Encyclopedia), and allows us to neglect the first day of the seventh month, although it was enjoined forever, with most awful penalties for disobedience (see Lev. xxiii, 23-33), and of a piece with that unfairness which shudders with well-assumed horror at anything unfamiliar to us in the rites of heathen religions, but reconciles us to the human sacrifices ordained by Jehovah himself (see last verses of Leviticus) for the Jews at a time when Christna was uttering the doctrins of the Sermon on the Mount to the cultivated population of Hindostan.

Who has read Philo Judæus's works? Over eighteen hundred years ago he stood as the foremost man of his race before all the world. His people, scattered over all the known world then, as they had been from immemorial time, selected him as their representativ on an occasion of vital import to their national religion, their honor, and even their lives. In the famous schools of Alexandria none stood more eminent than Philo. Venerable by his years, his virtue, and his renowned learning, a high-priest and a philosopher, the world held him in the greatest respect. Philo has given us at great length his views upon the scriptures. He was called the Plato of his age. One would naturally infer that our modern theologians would hail with joy the opportunity of receiving from such a one, who in addition to all his titles so justly earned, bore that of Jewish high-priest, his opinions of the scriptures of his own religion. But no such thing. They carefully refrain from any allusion to him lest they might destroy the delusion of their subjects. Philo treats the whole story of Genesis and much of the remainder of the scriptures as an allegory. Here we see where Swedenborg got his ideas of scripture. Here is the source of his inspiration. Philo ridicules the idea of any person having so little sense as to regard the narrativ as literally true. He says (book 1, Allegories of the Sacred Law): "It would be a mark of great simplicity to suppose that God made the world in six days, or in any time at all." "For let not such impiety ever enter our thoughts as to suppose that God plants paradises; let no such fabulous nonsense ever enter our minds." "God runs and implants terrestrial virtues." "World means law; light, intellect; city means doctrin; deluge, sin." "Nature began from an insignificant seed and ended in the most honorable of things—animals and men." "Heaven is mind, earth is sensation," etc. Cain built a city. "How ridiculous to say a man built a city! He founded a doctrin." And so throughout does this great man explain to the Jewish people the scriptures. He knew very well that intelligent men among them would hav laughed to scorn the idea of a literal interpretation. No, that "mark of great simplicity" was reserved for the barbarians of Europe and their "cultured" descendants of the nineteenth century.

Reading Philo we find that the ideas of advanced scholars then were about the same as those of the advanced thinker of to-day. Development, protoplasm, the motion of the earth on its axis, the attraction of the magnet for the wire ("Just as they say the wire is attracted by the magnet"—Rewards and Punishment, vol. iii), and numberless other ideas and facts were known to them, although our school-books tell us otherwise. We also find in reading him (chapter on the contemplativ life) that a sect existed, and had for a long time, similar to what we might suppose the early Christians to hav been. DeQuincy ridiculed Josephus's account of this sect, calls him a liar, says he made up the story to destroy Christianity, admits if it were true it does overthrow Christianity, for it would prove that Christianity existed in the world before Christ and without Christ. He forgot Philo's account, or rather never saw it, and it would be difficult to do away with the testimony of both.

Behold, then, our unparalleled impudence and folly. Steal a religion from its founders, and thousands of years afterward by our blunders and ignorance regard it with a mistaken reverence and pretend to know more about it than those who were its ancient high-priests! HOLT.

Sexual Intemperance.—No. 9.

"Mrs. Slenker, there are thousands in this land who only need your indorsement to agree to anything. How, then, can you teach them that intercourse between husband and wife is wrong or pernicious except it be for purposes of procreation?"—W.

I am always sorry when my friends are unable to think as I do upon important subjects; but as we are all differently organized, educated, and environed, it is impossible for any two of us to think alike on all subjects. It is a solemn and awful thing to possess the power of swaying the minds of others. It is a responsibility few of us are fitted to hold. I know it is pleasant to feel that you can bring the convictions of your readers into sympathy with your own, and of course all who speak or write aim to hav their readers believe what they say. I confess I do this even while it makes me tremble with a sense of insufficiency to be told, as thee tells me, "I hav sworn by you so long it is with reluctance I now find it necessary to take issue." But deeper than even my fear of not guiding and leading my readers aright is my sense of the importance of the subject which has so deeply agitated the minds of so many of my TRUTH SEEKER friends. I am trying to go slowly and surely and make no misstep nor utter any untruth, even by implication. And right here will friend W. please inform me how many years he has been studying upon this all important subject, sexual intemperance? As for me, I can hardly remember back far enough to tell when I first began to think, investigate, read, and ponder upon the union of sex and all its varied and ramified consequences. I could see the terrible evils of free lust and promiscuity and the greater evils of married lust and enforced parentage; but, Bible-reared and priest-taught, I supposed it God's will and nature's law. As years passed I read Fowler, Trall, Owen, Foote, and others who preached temperance, but no line was drawn—just as thirty-five years ago a temperate and moderate use of spirituous liquors was advocated as right, natural, healthy, pleasant, and happifying. Liquor was stimulating, medicinal, invigorating, flesh-producing, and so good. Wine, cider, beer, and old Jamaica rum, brandied peaches, and all sorts of drinks were found in our homes; and when the temperance prohibitionists began the work of teaching and preachiug total abstinence, what a clamor and furor were raised! It was depriving people of their rights; it was fanatical; it was going to extremes; it was anything but good and proper. It was all a piece of bosh and nonsense." But slowly, patiently, and persistently the reformers worked on; temperance meetings, newspapers, and songs, temperance talks and temperate lives, all did their share toward creating a new era of thought, and now where are the advocates of moderate drinking? Medical men held on to the "demon of the still" just as long as they could, but one by one they too are giving up prescribing liquor as a medicin, and even the churches are using colored water for sacramental purposes, believing it can be changed into blood just as well as if it had the true color.

Now we Alphaites expect to hav a much longer and stronger battle with the spirit of lust and sexual intemperance than temperance advocates hav had with the fiery spirit of rum and its degrading and debasing influence. But we shall just as surely conquer in the end as hav all others who hav inaugurated and labored in the great reforms that are elevating and refining the world of mankind.

Thee says, "I hope you will recant and mend the mischief you hav wrought." If I do recant it will be the first backward step I hav ever yet taken in any of the reform movements I hav endeavored to advocate, and they hav comprised no small number either, and every one of them has either been accomplished in its entirety or is fast on the way toward being so.

I should hav taken hold of this subject years ago could I hav found a solid foundation upon which to stand.

The old Bible gave it not, neither did Christ as half man and half god, nor did Paul, who taught that it was best not to touch a woman. The celibate monks and nuns, as well as Shakers, all took wrong grounds as a starting-point, believing it wrong to marry, from religious motivs. Noyes, with his complex marriage, was off the track. Mormonism, with its one-sided plurality, was sex slavery, and our own monogamic system was little better in that line and far worse as regarded the health of mothers and children, and Free-love was too often lawless, selfish lust. So I was all unsettled till at last, like a bright meteor flashing through the darkness of night, came the Alpha preaching continence in marriage and out, and no sexual intercourse save for propagativ purposes. True it took a whole year's reading of that before the truth fully dawned upon my mind that there was no safe medium, no moderate indulgence, no easy, pleasant way of evading the stern, solemn edict of entire chastity save for procreation. To go backward is impossible. Onward and upward is my motto, and I hope and trust thee will read, think, and investigate concerning these great truths, and be convinced that though the road to right is not always the most easy or seemingly natural one to take, yet in the end it will lead to the highest mental and moral perfection, and consequently to the greatest happiness of the greatest number.

"If he who liveth, learning whence woe springs,
Enduring patiently, striving to pay
His utmost debt for ancient evils done
In love and truth alway;

"If making none to lack, he thoroughly purge
The lie and lust of self forth from his blood:
Suffering all meekly, rendering for offense
Nothing but grace and good;

"If he shall day by day dwell merciful,
Holy, just, kind, and true, and rend
Desire from where it clings with bleeding roots
Till love of self hav end;

"He, dying, leaveth as the sum of him
A life-count closed, whose ills are dead and quiet,
Whose good is quick and mighty, far and near,
So that fruits follow it."

"The Mystery Solved."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of Oct. 23 I noticed an article upon the above subject. I read this article through the second time before I could believe that it was not intended for buncombe, but finally concluded that the author meant what he said, and this view was somewhat enhanced by the title which preceded the name of the author, for "Rev." to me has become almost a synonym for ignorance of astronomy, geology, philosophy, and the sciences in general. If you will allow me the space I will make a few comments upon the article in particular, and the "Rev." fraternity in general.

The gentleman begins by telling us something we already know, that astronomy and geology are alike adverse to the Christian religion. There is, indeed, an uncompromising war going on between these sciences and Christianity, and the fact that all the concessions hav been made by the latter imbue us with confidence in the ultimate success of truth over error. More than three hundred years ago Copernicus gave to the world his "heretical" theory of the universe; then it was buried beneath the slime and filth of Catholicism and had set about its tomb the minions of the church to guard against its resurrection. The church then taught the Ptolemaic theory. It taught that the earth was the all, and that all else was created only to fit it for the great end—man. It taught that the earth was an immovable center about which revolved the sun, moon, and stars in a series of cycles and epicycles. It taught the Mosaic theory of the creation, and astronomy was then a great proof of its correctness. When the truth was made known the church fought it. First it declared Copernicus a "simpleton" and hooted at his doctrin. When Galileo avowed himself a champion of that theory it sought debate; it got it; and when vanquished in argument it took refuge behind the Bible; it worked upon the superstitions of the masses, and twice forced Galileo to denounce his belief by torture and fear of death. God, Bible, and church—the trinity of superstition—were all opposed to Galileo, but truth came to the rescue and his vindication has been as complete as it has been glorious.

He says the system of the world, according to Sir Isaac Newton, was not created by the God of Moses. Well, Sir Isaac is undoubtedly correct in his insinuation. Christians hav quit claiming that the book of Genesis is more than a tradition; and traditions are not necessarily truths, and must be very plausible before they can be accepted as such. Genesis is neither probable nor possible, and the sooner the Christians stamp it as a lie the better it will be for the remainder of the Bible.

His hint to the clergymen is unnecessary. They hav been following the plan he proposes for more than a thousand years. When geology was first reduced to a science the clergy denounced it; and while it may be retarded, it will not be crushed out, but will rise over and above all, purer, brighter, and better for the persecution it has endured.

In your citation of the case of a gold body becoming reduced at a given distance from the center of the earth to the specific gravity of cork, perhaps a misconception of the case or a malicious translation of the premises, has led you into error; for while gold will sink into water a few hundred feet, there is undoubtedly a depth beyond which it will not go. Philosophy teaches and offers good proof that some atoms are heavier than others, while our conception of all atoms is that they are equally compact. Besides, your Bible tells of a remarkable instance in which a man was reduced to the specific gravity of cork, at the same distance from the center of the earth, and why not a lump of gold; or is a lump of gold less a myth than was the famous gentleman from Galilee. But suppose it is an absurdity; then science does not teach it. Science is truth. There may be innumerable mistakes in Newton's "Principia," and when once discovered none are more ready to correct them than the Infidels; for, my dear sir, one of the greatest distinctions between the Infidel and Christian is that the former can discern error and is always anxious to correct it, while the Christian assumes that he has a solution for life and every phenomenon of the universe, and turns a deaf ear to the entreaties of reason, and seeks consolation in that infamous book which tells us the first attempt of man was to acquire knowledge, and that it was met by a blighting curse. I care not what your Bible says, the researcher after knowledge is the object of my admiration—the only monarch before whom I care to bow.

Christians may overwhelm Infidelity, but we hav confidence in a future when men will be wiser and better. The Medes and Persians overrun Greece. Her great institutions of learning were made the training schools of gladiators and her noblest scholars made the gladiators themselvs; her libraries were used to light the camp fires of barbarians unable to comprehend the matchless worth of the volumes they burned; her finest buildings—wonders of architecture—and each advancement in architecture is a step increasing the wide interval between civilization and barbarism—were made the barracks of armed men; where once was heard the merry laugh of innocence now come naught but the horrid yells of demi-savages in debauchery and drunken revelry. Though smothered down and made the slave of beastly power, yet the literary culture and social refinement of Greece was not exterminated, but burst out anew in the Roman Empire. The Goth and Vandal swept down upon Rome, and among her ruins we find here and there a relic of her departed glory. But not yet was to be extinguished that fire which must eventually reach each human mind, but which, like the smelting furnace, only separates the gold from the dross. After the ruffianism of the dark ages the sun is breaking upon a better day. Science has ever been the slave of superstition, but truth is the mailed knight which shall eventually rescue her from the hand of the coarse and vulgar libertin who would be her ravisher. Greece was the home of Leucippus and Democritus, in whose minds first dawned the atomic theory. The men who captured Greece were barbarians who saw in every star a deity and heard in every thunderbolt the mutterings of an angry god. Those who defended Rome had arisen above the worship of Jupiter and his associates, but in the ruins of Rome was planted a religion far more infamous than the worship of mythology. Where once burned the philosopher's lamp we now hav the inceuse upon the altar; where once the preceptor taught the student now meet the bishop, nun, and sponsor; from the same forum where once the eloquence of Cicero held the enchanted multitude, now come the mutterings of an ignorant or hypocritical priest.

Newton's "Principia" may be erroneous in some particulars, but it contains gems of priceless value. It is a volume woven in the loom of his own genius and its woof was gathered from the broad field of his ceaseless researches. No monarch ever proclaimed that it should be a law; no priest ever commended it in thanksgiving nor children sung its praise in vespers. It went before the world with its truths and errors, and scientists hav ever found upon its pages more valuable than gold much to commend, a little to censure. The name of Isaac Newton is as a brilliant star, beckoning the student on to a brighter land, with streams of purer water and fields of fairer flowers, just beyond this vale of ignorance and superstition.

A comparison of the "Principia" with the "geocentric hypothesis" is a slander upon Newton and a flattery to Ptolemy. The latter theory was only advanced to please the fancy of the great masses: it was only the prevalent ideas reduced to a system. It did not emanate from thought and did not contain one gem of truth, It was fostered by the wealth of pomp and power, and from the vast number of observations he was enabled to make Ptolemy was but little more than an ignoramus not to know that he was wrong. But years after he was dead the "wise" men defended his theory, for how else could they explain how Joshua made the sun stand still, or how that kingly orb of day could be turned back in its course. But the entire system has been proved to be false. What, compare Newton to Ptolemy? When Ptolemy, Christianity, the Bible, and all the paraphernalia and senseless show of the church hav been buried in the chaos of the forgotten past, the glory of Isaac Newton will be but in its dawn.

He seems to think the assaults of Infidelity upon Christianity are as ethereal as a dream. Well, I think after the gentleman makes a few denunciations as "simpletons" of some of the philosophers who hav made a great many of these attacks, he will awaken to a sensibility of the fact that he has been doing the dreaming himself when he thought to make the American people believe that our "renowned astronomers and geologists are simpletons."

By the way, it would really be amusing to hear Joe Cook denounce Leucippus and Democritus; David Swing, Copernicus, Galileo; Isaac Loomis, Isaac Newton, and Beecher Epicurus, for Beecher practices what Epicurus taught, while he teaches what Epicurus practiced.

Yes, go on and hurl your foul epithets and base insinuations at the noble men who are giving their days to scientific research; this is the only argument you hav left; use it by all means. Those people are trying to do something to better the condition of man, of our country, and leave behind them something for which their children will love their memories. But you and your seventy thousand brother clergymen, what are you doing? You are stalking up and down this land, reaping where you hav not sown, like so many cancers sucking away the very substance of honest toil. This may seem dogmatical, but when a man without brains enough to be anything better than a preacher talks about denouncing men who had more brains than his entire race, I usually become dogmatic.

But let nothing impede you in your puril attack upon the astronomers and geologists; it will last but for a day. You cannot fetter the hurricane nor manacle the ocean wave; neither can you stop the onward march of science. You may shut and bar your gates, but the war is now an aggressiv one, and soon your rotten ramparts must fal before the hot shot and shell of truth. M. WATSON.

An English Physician on Dr. Tanner's Fast.

Dr. RICHARDSON, who stands high among English medical men, thus sums up the results of Dr. Tanner's forty-day fast:

"One or two writers out of the few who hav credited Dr. Tanner with any intention of usefulness hav offered an opinion that the experiment he has performed may prove beneficial as a matter of economic science, and that a good many persons may learn a great deal from it.

"It may fairly be admitted that the experiment is of some value in this direction.

"When we know how little food is really required to sustain life we may the more readily surmise how very much more food is taken by most persons than can ever be applied usefully toward that sustainment.

"I hav no compunction in expressing that while the fasting enthusiast was subjecting himself to considerable danger from his abstinence, many hundreds of thousands of critics were subjecting themselvs to an equal danger from indulging in excesses or foods and drinks.

"The only difference on their part would be that they were not so wise as to confine their self-imposed risks to a limited period of forty days.

"They keep up their experiment, and with every vessel in their bodies strained to repletion and seriously overtaxed, continue to replete and strain the more.

"If we could induce, therefore, such persons to contemplate their proceedings and to strike a fair comparison between their own foolhardiness and that of Dr. Tanner, the moral they would easily draw would not be without its worth on their understandings.

"Unfortunately the comparison cannot be made with effect, because the feat of excess is in the swim of fashion, while the feat of fasting is very much out of it.

"The first is a vice which, by familiarity, begets favor and competition; the second is a folly, which by its oddity begets amusement, compassion, and contempt."

Christopher gave me a wink with his left eye, but I am not sure it was so, for the next time I cast my eye toward them they were looking as serious as ever. Perhaps it was only an optical illusion. If I see them nodding and winking at me any more I shall make sure that I am not mistaken, and then, perhaps, I may report them at headquarters. I don't think the bishop would allow their cutting up with an old Infidel like myself, and I do not wish them to be putting on any of their familiarities with me, if I am a long way from home.

While in the Duomo I had the pleasure of listening to twenty priests or more—out of the three hundred which it takes to run this establishment—chant Latin before the high altar while thirty-two candles were burning and while the sun was shining brightly out of doors. Some of the candles were not less than twelve feet high, candlesticks and all. This chanting is a peculiar process, and I wish I understood music so I could give it to you in notes. Sometimes they chant all together, and sometimes one set will lead off with a sentence and then another set will reply to it, and again sometimes repeat the same over again. I presume it is the liturgy—thanking the Blessed Virgin for what she has done, and asking her for numerous other favors. It is supposed God is very partial to that kind of music, but I don't believe he is, because I am not.

The Campanile, or bell tower, stands near the cathedral. It is a light, square, good-looking tower, and over forty feet square at the base. It is relieved by octagonal projections at the corners, and covered, like the church, with slices of variegated marbles, and adorned with fifty-four bas-reliefs and sixteen statues. It is 269 feet high, and was to have been supplied with a spire ninety feet higher. It is ascended by 415 steps. I ascended them, but I was not particularly sorry that they left off those ninety feet. My knees ached before I reached the top; but I had a magnificent view of the city, the lovely valley in which it lies, the beautiful residences in every direction, and the grand old Apennines off in the northeast. It is curious to look down on the people from these high altitudes, who look like pigmies trotting around in every direction.

The baptistry of the cathedral is an octagonal building standing a little way from the Duomo, on precisely the spot where once stood a temple of Mars. It is 108 feet in diameter, and was built in the thirteenth century. Here all the children are christened by the archbishop twice a year. There are plenty of pillars, statues, and bas-reliefs about it which you can easily imagine without help from me.

From the Duomo I went a dozen squares or so to the fine church of St. Croce, located on the square or piazza which he is the proprietor of. This is called the Pantheon of Florence, and belongs to the Black Friars. Within the walls Michael Angelo, Galileo, Machiavelli, Alfieri, etc., are buried.

> "Ashes which make it holier, dust which is > Even in itself immortality.
> Here repose
> Angelo's, Alfieri's bones, and his,
> The starry Galileo's, with his woes;
> Here Machiavelli's earth returned to whence it rose."
> —Byron.

This church was built in 1294 in the German-Tuscan style. It is 460 feet long. Many marble slabs are in the pavement, and ancient frescoes are at the east end. There are twelve or fifteen chapels around the church, and I would give you a full description of the grand statues, paintings, and bas-reliefs, but I am quite sure I have already tired you with these. In the second chapel is the monument of Michael Angelo, with his portraits looking toward the dome, and statues of painting, sculpture, and architecture. There is also Ricci's monument of Dante, with figures of Italy and poetry. His body, however, lies at Ravenna. Here is also the monument of Alfieri, by Canova; as well as the monument of Machiavelli, by Spinnezzi. Several other monuments are also in this chapel.

On the left of the nave is the monument of the great Galileo by Foggini. Tardy justice was at last rendered to the memory of the astronomer and philosopher. After his body had remained unnoticed for one hundred years in unconsecrated ground (just think of it) his bones were removed to this church of St. Croce and a monument erected to his honor. The respect which the world paid to the great ability of this distinguished man doubtless forced the church to this step. When the old man first enunciated the great truth that the earth is a sphere and revolves daily on its own axis, the high dignitaries of the church told him he lied and that such doctrines were subversive of the teachings of the Bible and of theology. When he persisted in announcing the truth they pursued him, thrust him into the dungeons of the Inquisition, and applied torture to him though nearly blind and over seventy year, of age; and by the arts of cruelty and oppression which those inquisitorial villains knew so well how to ply, they forced the good old man, in order to save his life to recant what he knew was the truth. But when he was released from the clutches of the church, he still repeated the truths he had for years uttered about the rotundity of the earth, and exclaimed, "Still it moves." Thus after the church absolutely drove the old philosopher in sorrow to his grave, and did not even allow him to be buried in consecrated ground, but as an outcast and a heretic—after thus leaving him over a century, they were at last compelled by the justice and appreciation of mankind to take up what remained of Galileo and enshrine him in one of their first churches among others of the highly honored dead. And now they even wish to claim him as a son and to appropriate to their own honor the great discoveries he made. Such is the perfidy and falsehood of the church.

In St. Croce I again sat down to rest and listen to the chanting of a lot more of priests. It was different from anything I had heard. On the seat behind me were two women, one a matron, the other a maiden, and they both took an active interest in the worship, especially the maiden. Her responses to the chanting of the priests were musical and interesting though all in Latin. I wish I could give you a specimen of the words and drawling monotonous strain in which they were rendered. But despite all the sincerity they might be credited with, I could not help thinking it a very useless way to be spending time on such a bright sunny day. The money-box was brought around more than once, but it was not made largely plethoric from my pockets. I would rather spend my spare change for grapes.

The next place visited was the Palazzo Uffizi—the picture gallery of Florence—a most interesting place too, in which to pass a few hours. Many days could profitably be spent there in studying the thousands of the works of high art kept on exhibition. I cannot say how many acres of paintings I saw, but a large number I assure you, and many of them were of the finest quality. It was founded by the Medici family and is among the good deeds which are to be set down to the credit of that cruel bloodthirsty family. This extensive gallery is contained in the Uffizi, or offices, a range of buildings forming three sides of an oblong court, between the Palazzo Vecchio, and the Arno, about 500 feet long and 125 broad; originally serving as part of the corridor—extending more than 1,000 feet over the Arno and connecting with the Pitti palace which is a museum of art in itself. Besides this there are several other rooms, halls, corridors, etc., filled with works of art, including statuary, paintings, tapestry, engravings, mosaics, furniture, etc., etc.

The whole is far more than I expected to see, and with the exception of Paris is far more in the way of paintings, etc., than I have yet met with. Three or four of the corridors are 500 feet long. Many of the rooms are vaulted and magnificent, and the long corridor reaching from the palace across the river to another palace must be over a thousand feet long. All, all filled with fine statues, paintings, and grand specimens of mosaic and inlaid work, embracing tables and other rich furniture. I know many of you would highly enjoy looking at these thousands of fine paintings, and I am sorry I am unable to give you an adequate description of them. I cannot take the time to specify any of the paintings or the contents in any particular room or corridor, but can only give the names of some of the departments or divisions: First and Second Vestibule; First, Second, and Third Corridor; the Feroni Gallery; Cabinet of Ancient Bronzes; Hall of Niobe; Hall of Baroccio; Hall of Inscriptions; Cabinet of the Hermaphrodite; Cabinet of Cameos and Engraved Stones; Hall of the Portrait of Painters, Nos. 1 and 2 (three hundred life-sized portraits in all); Cabinet of Medals; Venetian School, first saloon, second saloon; Cabinet of Gems; French School; Flemish and German School, first saloon, second saloon; Dutch School; Italian School; the Tribune Statues; Tuscan School, First Hall, Second Hall; Hall of Old Masters; the Long Corridor to the Pitti Gallery; Room of Original Drawings, great assortment of tapestry; Hall of Venus; Hall of Apollo; Hall of Mars; Hall of Jupiter; Hall of Saturn; Hall of the Iliad; Hall of the Stufa; Hall of the Education of Jupiter; Hall of Bath; Hall of Ulysses; Hall of Prometheus; Corridor of the Columns; Hall of Justice; Hall of Flora; Hall of the Pocetti, etc., etc. All, all these filled with fine paintings, statues, and works of art; and it being Thursday, the admission was free, and I saw all these thousands of paintings, etc., for nothing. I have also to give my testimony that but a small proportion of them are pious or holy paintings; but few blessed virgins, but few dying and dead gods, and but few sanctimonious, unhappy saints. I was rather surprised to find in Italy so large a number of paintings with so small a number of the character named. The assortment embraced a wide range of subjects, historical, classical, personal, ideal, poetical, and nearly all beautiful. Some are very faithful to nature, and I thought as I wandered through some of the corridors and saloons, "Oh, what a field for Comstock." What a good thing it would be if he would emigrate to Florence, Kamchatka, the North Pole, or the infernal regions.

I visited two or three other galleries, but not equal in extent to the one just alluded to. I was much interested in the private gallery of Seignor Leopold Dumini, Piazza Pitti No. 16. His pictures are copies from the most valued paintings by the old masters, and as they are recently executed they look bright and fresh. They are for sale at reasonable prices, and if any of you or your friends wish to obtain good Italian paintings you will do well to send to him. I saw some dozen of artists in the large gallery copying paintings.

After seeing all the pictures I could make a good use of, I strolled through the public gardens, called Boboli Gardens, and belonging to the Pitti Palace. On entering to the left of the palace a fine grotto presents itself opposite, supported on both sides by statues of Apollo and Ceres. Immediately behind the palace is a beautiful ampitheater, with raised seats in the outer circles and twenty-four classical statues on the outer wall. Fine fountains are in the center. Throughout the garden are fine shaded walks and arbors, interspersed with statuary. On ascending the hights the colossal statue of Plenty is very conspicuous. At the highest portion is an old fortress of several centuries ago. From the tower in the garden I had another splendid view of the city and the splendid country surrounding it. I had not seen all the picture galleries nor all the museums, but I felt I had seen enough for one day. I, however, wished before the day was over to visit the house of the man for whom I entertain the highest respect of all the men who ever lived in Florence—the man whose studies, researches, and discoveries have done more good to the world than all the Medicis, all the priests, bishops, cardinals, and popes that have lived in Italy. I mean Galileo. So, inquiring out the locality, I climbed the steep street, Via della Costa, near the south bank of the Arno. The street is too steep for horses and carriages to ascend it, but it is nicely paved with square blocks of stone. As slowly ascending the hill I thought how often had the wise and great Galileo climbed that same street, for there he lived many years, and in that still, good old house on the hillside he died. I well knew when I reached the house, for a life-size bust of the old astronomer is upon the house, and this inscription on a marble block in the front wall:

> "Qui ove Galileo
> Non Sdegne Piegarsi alla potenza del genio
> La Maesta de Fernando
> Dei Medici."

I presume this inscription and the portrait were placed upon the walls of the house long after the philosopher's death. The portrait is a pleasing one, representing a man about seventy years of age, and bespeaks a high order of intelligence and kindly disposition. The house is a very substantial one, being a basement and two stories above. It is of stone and plastered over, and laid off to represent hewn blocks. I went into the house, but as the dwellers therein speak only Italian I could not converse with them or make any inquiries about relics or mementos. But Galileo will ever live in the memory of men who love the truths of science more than the falsehoods and superstitions of theology.

On crossing over the Arno I met two nuns or sisters (virgins of course) differently clad from any I had ever seen. They dressed in dark snuff-colored wollen cloth, with a large cape of the same goods that came two-thirds the way to the ground, and on their heads leghorn hats, with brims nearly a foot wide. I thought it the most grotesque custume I ever had seen. The evening I spent in strolling through the narrow streets, looking into the stores, and noticing the customs of the people.

At 10 o'clock I took the train for Rome. It being the third night in succession that I had rode all night, with the hardest kind of sight seeing through the day, I did not very closely watch the country through which we passed, but I think most of the way the country is good. The distance is some 130 miles. As we approached Rome the country seemed somewhat broken and sterile in places. Some of the ground seemed by the moonlight not to be much cultivated. Again I saw peach trees, apple trees, fig trees, olive trees, and I thought orange trees, with many vineyards and many fields of vegetables, etc. For the first time I had a compartment to myself nearly all the way. I think there was no American or Englishman on the train. No foreigners are coming to Rome just yet, and will not till about the middle of October, when danger from the fever is over. On all other trains I have found Englishmen, Americans, Frenchmen, Germans, etc., but on this only Italians who live hereabout. The visitors come as far south as Florence, but not much further for yet a few weeks. On the ride from Venice to Florence I met two gentlemen from Philadelphia. They wished to come to Rome but should not do so for a few weeks yet. One of them edified me with an account about a friend of his who last year wished to visit Rome, but waited at Naples till the safe period arrived, but while waiting took the fever and died. I learn since arriving that there are few or no strangers yet here. So it seems I am about the first arrival. But I do not feel afraid. I have taken a room for ten days, and intend to stop that long, sick or well, living or dead

Although I have spun this letter to an inordinate length already, I must still tax your patience with a recital of my introduction into the Eternal City, and a few of my experiences here. The train reached the Rome station at six in the morning. I deposited my baggage there, and started for the city nearly a mile away. I preferred to walk. My first purchase was an enormous cluster of fine white grapes, weighing nearly one and a half pounds, and for which I paid four soldi, or four cents. They tasted good and they constituted my breakfast. With a little inquiry I made my way to the Piazza di Spagna, where Cook's Tourist office is located, where I expected to receive letters from home, but the clerk was late and the office not open, so I patronized two or three omnibuses, and took a view of the great city of Rome. I liked it tolerably well, but it is not equal to some of the cities I have visited. The new part of the town up toward the station is very fine, and there are a number of streets in that quarter wide and pleasant like our American cities and the streets of Paris; but in the older part of the city the streets are narrow and irregular, as they are in many of the European cities. I visited the river Tiber on which Rome is built. It hardly comes up to my expectations. It would take several dozens of such rivers to make one the size of the Hudson at New York. I judge it is about four hundred feet in width, and the water is far from being clear. The larger portion of the city is on the east side of the Tiber, though St. Peter's and the Museum of the Vatican are on the west side. The omnibuses are a cross between a street car and a common omnibus. The wheels are 2 1-2 feet in diameter, and the body is little higher than a street car. You can ride from one end of the route to the other, say two miles, for 3 soldi or cents. I have patronized them considerably. I visited several piazzas or public squares, the most important of which is Piazza del Popola. It is the most richly ornamented square in Rome, being decorated with semicircular terraces, statues, etc. In the center is a granite Egyptian obelisk. It is about one hundred feet high, is covered with Egyptian carvings and inscriptions, and at the top is a large cross, and that seemed to me like a profanation, a desecration. A Christian cross surmounting an Egyptian obelisk! What sacrilege! But what better can you expect in Rome? Fine fountains are at the foot of the obelisk, the water issuing from the mouth sof stone lions. I judge the Piazza del Popolo contains about two acres, and is paved with stone.

Upon returning to Cook's office I found about a dozen letters, mostly from home, which I was most glad to receive of course. The next thing was to secure a room. I could not afford to stop so long at a hotel. I must study economy. I did not have to search very long. I walked down in what is called the Strangers' Quarter, in Via Groce. I saw a card out indicating apartments to let. I called, but found it was a suite of five rooms, one flight up, and quite too expensive to suit my purse. The lady, however, who spoke French, was very polite, and took me up two more flights, where other families resided, and where she thought I could get a petite apartement, as I told her I wished. The dwellers in the upper part of the house, consisting of some four ladies and one gentleman, were soon gathered together and seemed to be very friendly people. I laid my case before them as well as I could, speaking but two or three words of their language. I told them I was an unsophisticated stranger all the way from America, had no parents living, and that I was looking for one small, wee, petite apartement for myself alone. They looked very pleasant and friendly—as though they would be glad to accommodate me if they could, and glad to see me at any rate. The man gave me to understand that he had been to America—to Venzuela. That is not the America as is America; and as he could not speak English, our facilities in the conversational way were quite limited. He, however, offered to share his room with me, and it was a good large one; but preferring to be by myself, I gratefully declined. If one of the others had made the same offer, I do not know as poor, weak human nature would have refused. But the offer was not made, for which let my stars be thanked. Thus finding I could not be accommodated there, I bid them good-bye to look farther. Seeing no place on Via Groce that I thought would suit I turned into Via Vittoria, the next street east. I found rooms for rent three flights up. I applied. A young damsel came to the door. I told her as explicitly as possible my wants, of which she could not understand a word. Soon the mother and two other daughters were in attendance, and I opened my case with as much eloquence as could be expected under the circumstances, they not being able to understand a word I said, nor I a word they said. I found the mother could speak French, and I had nearly half a dozen French words at partial command, so at it we went with all earnestness and due patience. I was glad to see they took an interest in me, and glad, too, to see that I took a corresponding interest in them. We soon began to make progress. I tried my best to tell them what I wanted, and they tried their best to understand me. There was a language of sympathy between us if not a language of words; and when we could do nothing else, we would all stop and laugh heartily. This we did several times. How could we help it when the case was so ridiculous? I notice all nationalities laugh in the same language. I succeeded in due time, by pantomime, a word or two in French and half in Italian, with several in English thrown in for make-weights, to convey to them that I only wanted one leetel apartement pour dix jours (for ten days). The lady had three rooms, which she kindly showed, and with which I was duly pleased. I told her either of them would answer my purpose, and one was all I wanted. I saw she was inclined to accomodate me, and hope in the moral thermometer rose several degrees. But whether I wanted meals with the room, whether I had company, and all those little et ceteras, had to be arrived at, as well as the price. We, however, progressed fairly; after nearly half an hour, the mother, the three daughters, and myself, by counting fingers to show how many days I wanted the room, resorting to pencil and paper once or twice, and laughing outright half a dozen times, closed the bargain, and I paid twenty-five lire for the room for ten days, from September 24th to October 4th inclusive. One of the daughters wrote a receipt in pretty fair Italian, and happiness was restored. To get my baggage from the station occupied about an hour, and then I took a nap, for I was weary and needed rest.

Yes, here I am pleasantly located. The mother is friendly, the daughters are friendly; the father, (whom I take to be a music teacher) is friendly, the son (half grown), is friendly, and also I am friendly. I have now been here two days. I am keeping "bachelor's hall." I have laid in my provisions, consisting of three boxes of sardines, a section of bologna sausage, half a pound of Italian cheese, half a pound of Italian butter, a dozen eggs, a loaf of bread, six pounds of grapes, with peaches, apples, and figs quantum suf. I must also not forget a small demijohn (two quarts) of wine. You see I do not exactly know what the effects of Romish water may have on me and I feel as though it will be safer to trust to grape juice. I have considerable confidence in grape juice, even if three or four years old. In fact, it is thought to improve by age. And then wine is so cheap here a man can afford to drink it, for one two-quart demijohn, with wicker-work of flagging all over it, cost only one lira or franc, besides the bottle. If wine was that cheap in America, I am not sure but my consumption of Croton water would be somewhat decreased.

My ideas with respect to the use of wine have modified since I came to Europe. I see people use it largely, and not get at all intoxicated. It is healthful and agreeable. I cannot see that any harm arises from the use of it. It is a comfort, and as I believe human beings are entitled to all the comforts they can find in existence without harming themselves or their fellow-beings, I am getting somewhat in favor of wine. If our people would grow more grapes, make more wine, and use far less whisky, I think it would be better for them.

I cannot exactly say I admire Italian butter. It has no salt in it, besides not being any too clean. It seems more like ointment than butter, but by working sal (salt) into it and picking out the black specks and hairs I make it go very well. My landlady makes me a cup of tea in the morning and boils my eggs, and I get along swimmingly. I like it far better than hotel life. My provisions are all handy. My grocer is on the ground floor in the same building, my baker is just across the street, my wine merchant is within half a square, and the man who sells me the nicest kind of grapes and fruits is still nearer. They all begin to get acquanted with me and I with them. I think we shall have no contentions; harmony prevails and I hope to leave a good name behind me. I am feeling very happy here. I feel that I am, temporarily at least, beyond the reach of my enemies. The arrows of malice and the spears and darts of hate cannot reach me here. I have not sent in my card to Leo yet. I am hesitating a little as how to act toward that individual. I wish to preserve my dignity. Among the numerous faults through life I have committed is the one of being undignified, and now that I am in Rome I am more than ever anxious to keep up my dignity. Perhaps if I send in my card to Leo he may think I am anxious to court his acquaintance. But I am not. I consider myself as good as he is. If he is vicegerent for Jahveh and Jesus I am vicegerent for myself and run THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that is considerably ahead of his time. No; I believe I will stand on my dignity and not coax around him by sending in my card. Possibly Cardinal John may have prejudiced him against me. I would like well enough to have a talk with him if he could talk English, and tell him what errors he is laboring under, and inform him as to my views as to the best course to pursue to make the race happy, but I will not run after him. There are half a dozen people here already who know I have arrived, and if Leo has half the omniscience that he and others pretend that the person has whom he is vicegerent for he will find out himself that I am in town, and he may govern himself accordingly.

I am on the corner. One window in my room opens on Via Vittoria, and two windows open on the Corso. The Corso is considered the finest street in Rome. So you see I am in aristocratic quarters. Yes, please do not forget, two of my windows open on the Corso. If any of you can make it convenient to call on me during my stay of ten days here I will be extremely glad to see you, and will give you some grapes, treat you to wine, and let you taste and smell of Italian cheese. In short, I will treat you as well as I know how.

I have much to look after here. Old Rome, where the Cæsars used to live, with the Forum, the Quirinal, the Coliseum, and Palatine hill, have to be hunted up. The Catacombs must be visited. There is no end to picture and art galleries, with not many less than a thousand churches, at the head of which stands St. Peter's—all to be examined. Even with my rapid way of doing things I will be fully occupied during my ten days' stay here, and I will try to keep you posted and let you know what I think of it all. In the mean time I trust you will hold me in remembrance. I will be with you again in a few weeks. Adieu, D. M. B.

Home Again.

NEW YORK, NOV. 9, 1880.

DEAR FRIENDS AND READERS: I hav the pleasure to inform you that I hav arrived home sound and well. I took the steamer Gallia at Liverpool on Saturday, Oct. 30th. We halted four hours at Queenstown on Sunday, waiting for mails, and arrived at the dock here at 6 P. M. last evening, making the voyage in less than nine days of absolute running. A part of the trip was pretty rough.

I find upon returning that I hav sent in letters more profusely than room has been found for them, but if no objection is made, as they are written they will be continued for a few weeks until completed. I trust they may prove interesting to a portion, at least, of my readers.

I take pleasure in informing you that on the night I left London the branch of the National Secular Society of England of which Mr. Charles Bradlaugh is President and Mrs. Besant, Edward Truelove, Dr. Edward B Aveling, and others, are Vice-Presidents, tendered me a supper and gave me a parting farewell upon my departure for Liverpool to take steamer for this country. The evening was a very enjoyable one. The viands and refreshments were all that could be desired. Excellent speeches were made by Mr. Bradlaugh, Mrs. Besant, Dr. Alice Vickery, Dr. C. R. Drysdale, Dr. E. B. Aveling, and Mr. U. N. Das, a learned Hindoo. A beautiful illuminated testimonial from the society was presented to me, in consideration of the bravery it is conceived I hav shown in defense of freedom of speech and freedom of the press. I bore the same with great pride to these shores, feeling that it is a recognition and inlorcement for which any person might be truly grateful. Those who tendered this testimonial hav a lively appreciation of the wrong by which an ecclesiastical society enters courts of justice and secures the conviction of persons holding views not in harmony with its own. A detailed report of the meeting and a copy of the testimonial will be laid before you in due time.

I am glad to be able to assure you that I return with improved health, and that I very cheerfully renew my co-operativ work with you. Very truly, D. M. BENNETT.

Darkness Made Visible.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A few of your correspondents are discussing "What is Thought?" Is thought a substance or a function of the brain? Before attempting to giv any view upon the subject please allow me to answer a few questions asked by M L. Sherman, who is "waiting a reply."

"Is there anything in nature which should not exist?"

Most assuredly there are many things in nature that ought not to exist. Crime and ignorance ought not to exist. Nature is red in teeth and claw. The worst man upon the earth never could be so bad as nature. She has passed the sentence of death upon all living. No human being can come into existence without another being laid at the door of death. Man from the cradle to the grave is ever protesting against nature, ever striving to impress nature, ever striving to make nature better by his humble endeavors, unceasing exertions, by his patience and skill at art.

"When we look into the mirror, is the face we see upon the plate substance, or do we see nothing?"

We see the light reflected from our person that givs the form and shape, color, and apparently the age. A nice experiment for your correspondent. Put or take his mirror before a large assembly and see if the thousands of forms will make the mirror one thousandth of a grain heavier.

"In sitting before the camera, do we throw anything from ourselvs upon the plate that is material?"

If any material leaves us, and goes to the plate in the camera, that material is not under the will, therefore has nothing to do with the argument or inference of spiritual life. If a material leaves us it is no longer a part of us; it has changed, and the change has made it something else. Change, time, space, color, light, and function are substances according to the philosophy of Mr. L. Sherman. "I never had a father," said the orphan. "I hav heard my mother say that when my brother was alive his father and he were of one age; my mother and I are of the same age." This puzzle can be seen through and proved to be true, but who can prove the promise true that Mr. Sherman and Mr. Chapman reasons from? The atom is both a spiritual and a material substance. That premis is begged, therefore not worth replying to because it is neither proved nor granted. All argument built upon such a premis is a waste of time and labor. Yours, etc., CHARLES AUDLEY.

Free Love.

BY ALHAZA.

"A low, sweet moan, I cannot pass the door,
A pale leaf, where the winds hav played,
Cast to a chilling autumn shade,
Yes, I will look on her sad face once more,"

The room seems dark, yet lighted from above,
As if white wings were waving there,
The couch is cooled with perfumed air,
And haunted with a form of stainless love.

Like Ghul's rich gardens in their snowy bloom,
She gently waits as Death comes near,
His presence sweet she does not fear,
The fairest roses guard the silent tomb.

"My father robbed me of my angel bride,"
When William clasps her to his breast,
He kisses all her cares to rest,
But Crosby, peeping, has them both descried.

And stamping Cook, with knotted snakes in hand,
"Oh, take them to a loathsome cell;
The guilty woman knows full well
He has a wife, within a mansion grand."

"Even if I had a dozen wives and more,
One is a fierce and spiteful fiend,
But my fond heart shall n'er be weaned
From Ida, lingering on this mournful shore.

"Oh, could I bear her to some fairy home,
Where the wan waters calmly sleep;
With nought but holy silence deep,
Where no despair or gloom can ever come!"

His wife comes penitent and sobbing near,
"Oh, let me soothe poor Ida's woe,
She is your angel bride I know
Nor Crosby's lies your sacred peace shall mar."

An Improvement in the Christian Sunday-School Suggested.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER,

Sir: Yesterday closed up the quarterly meeting of the Methodist Episcopal church of the town of Berlin.

The good Lord has been instructed what to do for the speedy reformation of this town, and especially of these corners.

A holy Sunday-school has just been put in motion. And to complete the machinery, and not hav it appear selfish or one-sided, the following new improvements are suggested:

First, that seven holy teachers be procured, one for each day of our calender week, for the oftener a good thing comes the better, of course.

Hence these seven teachers are to be selected from seven different nations whose holy Sunday comes on the several days of the week as named in our Methodist almanac, to wit, our Monday is a holy day with the Greeks, Tuesday with the Persians, Wednesday with the Assyrians, Thursday with the Egyptians, Friday with the Turks, Saturday with the Jews, and Sunday is a holy day at these corners—that is, if our city of Berville almanac is correct.

But when Sunday would come at the north or south end of the globe, where they hav six months alternate day and night both Moses and our Christian almanac fail to tell us.

Yet we are bound to hav a new improvement in the Sunday-school business. In our holy school we hav some quite warm and some frosty officers. At the last council of these officers it was proposed to negotiate with the above named nations that each should send us one of their pious Sunday-school teachers, so that we can hav a real Sunday-school show on each day in the week, agreeable to the Christian almanac.

Of course we leave out the frigid zones, for it is most too cold there for either men or gods to rest. But nevertheless we propose a new improvement. We want seven Sundays each week. And as soon as the hat is emptied the officers will send to the seven nations above named. And when the pious teachers come won't it be a blessing?

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1880.

I wish to notify the public that a Mr. Baldwin, of Chicago, also Rhodes & McClure, of the same place, are publishing pamphlet editions of my lectures. All the lectures published by them are grossly inaccurate—filled with mistakes, horribly printed, and outrageously unjust to me. These men are simple literary thieves and pirates, and are obtaining money from the public under false pretenses. I take this course to warn the public that these publications are fraudulent. The only correct copies of my lectures are published by C. P. Farrell. All others are published by people who are willing to steal from me and defraud the public vender. These wretches hav published one lecture under four titles, and several others under two or three.

All of C. P. Farrell's editions of Col. Ingersoll's works, and none others, are sold at this office. D. M. BENNETT.

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY.
BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,
Graduate of the Hygeio-Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.

The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Nathaniel Vaughan.
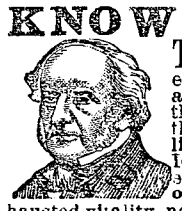
A NOVEL.
By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,
Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.



The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth: price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers by permission to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Association.

Address Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

Superstition in all Ages.
By JOHN MESLIER.
A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To Miss Anna Knoop, Dear Madam;

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"
BY
ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

[From the Western Reformer.]

"DR. R. P. FELLOWS is a highly educated and scientific physician. He has an original system of practice, and is perfectly reliable and trustworthy. We hav heard many flattering reports of his successful cures of diseases incident to humanity."

JUST OUT!

Another Extraordinary Book!

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind.

Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Of Kentucky.

Held in Kirksville, Mo., during nine evenings —May 20-29, 1878. Synopsis report—official. This book of 320 pages gives an interesting presentation of the theological questions which divide Christians and Liberals. The Rev. Ditzler is regarded as an able defender of his favorit Christian doctrins, but it will undoubtedly be admitted by the reader that Prof. W. F. Jamieson fully met all he had to offer. Christian readers will take more kindly to a work of this kind, giving both sides an equally fair chance, than to books on our side only.

A DIALOG ON

LAND, LABOR, AND REFORM

By F. E. BOYD.

Outlines of a plan for a new American national land and labor co-operativ system, by which land and comfortable homes may be secured to the poorest classes of every race, without money or price, with the educational and social advantages of modern civilization. Designed to ameliorate the condition of the struggling masses; to equalize population; to prevent vice, crime, and pauperism; to prevent the recurrence of industrial crises and feuds, labor riots, and popular insurrections; to terminate Indian wars; to avoid or do away with an oligarchy of landlords and capitalists; and to preserve or restore the liberties of the people and the rights of self-government by bringing immediately together the two great elements of universal progress, land and labor.

"The land shall not be sold forever; for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. xxv. 23).

A tax on humbug, an excise
On solemn plausibilities;
A stamp on everything that's canted!
No millions more if these were granted.
Henceforward would be raised or wanted.
—Henry Luttrell.

THE doctrin of inherited sin, of depravity born in the bones of men; the notion that the mass of men are doomed by the God of mercy to eternal woe, immortal only to be wretched, is not a strange thing in the nineteenth century. Modern savages hav foul notions of God; ancient civilization has sins enough on its head, hideous sins unknown even in our day, for the world has been worse, but both are free from such a stain.—Parker.

IF we hav a precept or principle which we would advocate to others as a rule of action, we must aim to liv in accordance with the theory we wish to hav accepted, and we must liv it so well, purely, thoroughly, and practically that no shadow of blame can, by any means, fall upon us which will react upon those theories and ideas. What we do will impress others far more than what we say. Our example is more effectiv as a convincing agency than our theories can possibly be. So let us, one and all, aim to liv out our views of the highest possibilities to which we believe humanity is attainable.—E. D. Slenker.

IT is a most notorious fact that the apostles and evangelists were greatly mistaken in some points. It is easy to show, if we hav the exact words of Jesus, that he always was mistaken in some points of the greatest magnitude—in the character of God, the existence of the devil, the eternal damnation of men, in the interpretation of the Old Testament, in the doctrin of demons, in the celebrated prediction of his second coming, and the end of the world, within a few years. If religion or Christianity rest on his authority, and that alone, it falls when the foundation falls, and that stands at the mercy of a school-boy.—Theodore Parker.

O THOU, who in the heavens dost dwell,
Who, as it pleases best thyself,
Send one to heaven and ten to hell,
A' for thy glory,
And no for any guid or ill
They've done afor' thee!

I bless and praise thy matchless might,
When thousands thou hast left in night
That I am here afore thy sight,
For gifts and grace,
A burnin' and a shinin' light,
To a' this place.
—Burn's "Holy Willie's Prayer."

COURAGE, liberality, charity, and other good qualities, are often highly prized by those who do not possess them in any great degree; but the zealous, thorough-going love of truth is not very much admired or liked, or indeed understood, except by those who possess it. But truth, as Bacon says, "only doth judge itself," and "howsoever these things are in man's depraved judgment and affections, it teacheth that the inquiry of truth, which is the lone making or waving of it—the knowledge of truth, which is the preserver of it—and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature.—Archbishop Whately.

THE crucifix is, on the one hand, the visible and tangible pledge of the remission of sins to the faithful; and on the other hand, however, it is the deification of sorrow generally; it is humanity in its saddest plight, broken and shattered in all its limbs, so to speak, and in a certain sense rejoicing thereat; it is the most one-sided, rigid embodiment of Christian world renunciation and passiveness. In a symbol of this kind, mankind rejoicing in life and activ can now no longer find the expression of its religious consciousness; and the continued regard accorded to it in the modern Protestant church is, after all, but one more of these compromises and untruths which make it a thing of such feeble vitality.—Strauss.

SO LONG as prayer strove to adapt the seas to the ship it went down. When science adapted the ships to the seas, it sailed on. It cost a long period of study before chemists discovered that the basilisk which haunted cellars, which was invisible, but which killed all whom it looked upon, was carbonic acid gas. But when this was discovered, the basilisk's dreadful eye was no longer fatal. The world is still filled with invisible basilisks, invisible save as knowledge makes them visible, but killing their millions. Epidemic diseases, cruel and false social theories, vast social wrongs and oppressions, great theological wastes of wealth relativly to no purpose, compared with the good it might effect, are among these basilisks. Incantations hav been chanted over them, but they still kill. Anathemas and prayers hav failed to exterminate them. Slowly but surely the world's great workers are exterminating them, for what they think to-day forms the creed of educated men to-morrow and of all men on the day after.—Denslow's Modern Thinkers.

Odds and Ends.

No matter how old a crowbar may be, it remains as pry as ever.

THE report that the oyster crop has been damaged by mildew is a canard.

SEE who Mrs. to change from Miss
Has Mr. Chance of married bliss.

A NEVADA ball report says: "Honora X was full of eclat; in fact, the eclatest lady present."

IT is said the ordinary life of a bee is only ninety days. The end of a bee, however, is very lively.

AN Arkansas man was offered a plate of macaroni soup, but declined it, declaring that they "couldn't play off any blied pipe-stems on him."

ANOTHER poet comes forward and says: "And I hear the hiss of a scorching kiss." Beats all what a man can hear, if he is only mean enough to listen.

THE greatest lover of the human race is a Toledo man. When he slips down, he prefers to hav a crowd see him, so they can hav the fun of laughing.

A DULL old lady being told that a certain lawyer was "lying at the point of death," exclaimed, "My gracious! won't even death stop that man's lying?"

AN Iowa weekly, having 350 circulation, feels its perfect right to begin an editorial with, "As we advised him last week, Gladstone is shaping out a new policy."

HOW time changes! In the good Old Testament days it was considered a miracle for an ass to speak, and now nothing short of a miracle will keep one quiet.

A YOUNG lady wrote some verses for a country paper about her birthday, and headed them "May 30th." It almost made her hair turn gray when it appeared in print, "My 30:h."

JUST as soon as a man finds himself doomed to political disappointment, he discovers that it is necessary for him to giv all his time and attention thenceforth to his business.

A STROLLING theatrical company was at the dinner table. A waiter approached one of the members, and said. "Soup?" "No, sir!" replied the guest; 'I am one of the musicians."

IF Pro Bono Publico means anything at all, it means that some chap has got mad at somebody, and thinks that some newspaper man will be fool enough to help him abuse a better man than he is.

PEOPLE say they shell peas when they unshell them; husk corn when they unhusk it; dust furniture when they undust it; scale fishes when they unscale them; weed their gardens when they unweed them.

A NEBRASKA Indian contrived to swallow a lot of dynamite, and now he can stand around the corners and call a white man anything he chooses, without being kicked for his insolence. They're shy of jarring him even.

A YOUNG wife, remonstrating with her husband on his dissipated habits, was answered, "I am like the Prodigal Son, my dear. I will reform by and by." "I will be like him too," she said. "I will arise and go to my father."

"IF you are a quiet, honest citizen of Galveston, how did those skeleton keys and brass knuckles happen to be in your coat-pockets?" "I reckon, Judge, me and the policeman must hav changed coats in the scuffle. We were very much excited."

A YOUNG gentleman was passing an examination in physics. He was asked: "What planets were known to the ancients?" "Well, sir," he responded, "there were Venus and Jupiter, and—(after a pause) I think the earth; but I'm not quite certain."

A GALVESTON man went to a doctor and complained that he suffered from loss of appetite and drowsiness. The doctor examined his tongue, and said, "You should walk two hours every day." "Two whole hours! When, then, am I to find time to eat and sleep?"

LITTLE Johnny: "Pa, did you read in a paper how a parent was fined twenty-five dollars because his little boy hung on a street car?"

Parent: "What of it?"

Johnny: "Nothing, except I thought you wanted to giv me some car-tickets. There is money in it."

FASHIONABLE young lady at a social gathering jestingly to Gilhooley, "I wonder how much I would bring if I was put up at auction and sold to the highest bidder?" "Just about $3,000." "Why, my jewelry alone is worth that." "Yes, that's what I put it down at in my estimate."

When spelling is "reformed" she'll write:
"I'm saillug on the cshun.
The se is hi, no sale in site,
It fills me with emoshun."
But one "spell" will not change its name,
For she'll be se-sic just the saime!

As the triangle sounded the old man arose and said: "In scatterin' dis meetin' let me say to you dat some of the biggest an' bes' lookin' watermelons in the market are a fraud when you come to set down to enjoy 'em. It's the same way wid men. Dey look purty, an' dey go back on you. Befo' you buy a melon plug it. Befo' you put faith in a man watch if he am willin' to crowd 'long in a street kyar; if he'll sheer his umbrella in a rainy day; if he kin wait two minits at de pos'-office winder widout sw'arin'; if he wants all the clothes in the family on his own back; if he kin h'ar the cry of a lone chile as quick as the voice of a man axin' him to drink. Dat's all, an' we will softly recede homeward."—Detroit Free Press.

Notes and Clippings.

MANY monks who hav been long teaching school at Rome were arrested by the police last month and ordered out of the city.

MRS. AGNES ROBERTSON BOUCICAULT brought her dramatic season to a close at Chicago, a few days ago, and disbanded her company.

MME. RACHEL, of "beautiful forever" notoriety, died suddenly in jail, and the jury returned a verdict of "Died by the visitation of God."

MR. FROUDE is reported to hav said that a residence in Ireland for a few years is enough to deprive even an Englishman of common sense.

THE Universalist ministers of Connecticut, in order to awaken interest in their denomination, hav resolved to hold pretracted meetings throughout the state.

DR. TALMAGE began his last Sunday morning prayer, "O God, we flock together under thy wing, and find ourselvs at rest under the feathers of the Almighty."

PROF. SWING, of Chicago, says that the Methodists no longer hold "that if a sinner should come back from hell, and be permitted to liv in a furnace, he would freeze to death."

IN breaking the ground for a Methodist church in St. Louis, a hundred women took part in the ceremony, each tossing some earth into a cart with a polished brass shovel.

THERE has been an extraordinary increase of suicide in Switzerland. In 1879 there were 540 suicides; in 1877, 590; in 1878, 642; and in 1879, 701. This last givs one in every four thousand of the population. The hard times are probably the cause.

A DELAWARE man afflicted with heart disease, and possessed with an inexplicable wish to die with his head to the north, was accustomed to lie down in the desired position whenever he felt an attack coming on. The final illness found him at a political meeting. He stretched himself on the floor, his head northward, and died with a smile of satisfaction on his face.

THOMAS HUGHES givs this as the most characteristic negro verse he has thus far heard sung in Tennessee:

> Do debble chase me round a stump,
> Gwine for to carry me home;
> He catch me most at ebery jump,
> Gwine for to carry me home;
> Swing low, sweet char-i ot,
> Gwine for to carry me home.

THE house of refuge on the top of Mount St. Gothard, founded in the fourteenth century, will be permanently closed two years hence. The opening of the tunnel will render it useless, as not even beggars will then cross the mountain on foot. At present the Hospice affords shelter, food, and a bed to 20,000 people yearly, and is supported by private and public charity. The ride through the tunnel will cost only twenty cents.

THE Rev. Edward Everett Hale caused a stir by his article in the North American Review on insincerity in the pulpit. He says, in the Independent: "I cannot but observe, and with a good deal of regret, that every so-called reply waves the real point. The question is not, Does this clergyman say all he knows in the pulpit, or does that one? The question, as stated in the article, is, Do the American people, as a whole, believe that the preachers say all they know? Thus far this question has been avoided in those comments of the religious press which I hav seen."

A TABLEAU after Millais's familiar picture, "The Huguenots," was part of an entertainment in the Baptist church at Cantor, Kansas. The Rev. Mr. Banker, the young and handsome pastor, was chosen to pose as the male figure, but the question who should tie the scarf and be hugged was not easily settled. The pretty wife of a leading member was finally accorded that felicity. The tableau is said to hav been a success; but afterward some of the sisters said that there had been a needless amount of rehearsing, the husband got furiously jealous, and the pastor resigned.

OF the popular fallacies about law and equity, says the St. James's Gazette, it is needless to speak. All that need be said of them is contained in a conversation which took place between a lady and a lawyer: "Law is the law of man; but equity is the law of God." "Well, madam," said the lawyer to the lady, "I never before heard that God had laid down rules about marshaling assets." Of course the truth upon the subject, now perfectly well known, is that law and equity are simply names for two bodies of law and for the practice of two sets of courts.

GEN. GARIBALDI is as popular as ever in Italy. He arrived in Milan on Nov 1. The town was decked with flags and it seemed as though the whole city went forth to greet him. There were at least 200,000 persons assembled. The crowd took the horses out of his carriage and dragged it themselvs. On reaching his hotel he was received by the Syndic of Milan. There was no display of police, and perfect order prevailed from first to last. Among those by whom the General was received were many of the survivors of the revolutionary battles and the French campaign.

THE bridegroom of a Waukegan wedding was a Baptist and the bride a Methodist. They had agreed that immediately after the ceremony they would decide by chance which should embrace the other's religion. The officiating clergyman declined to toss up a cent, partly because he would not countenance such a proceeding, and partly because, being a Methodist, he might be accused of fraud if the bride won. The bride herself finally threw the coin, and lost. When she went to join the Baptists, however, they rejected her because she did not believe in close communion. That displeased the husband, and he went over with her to the Methodists.

A HOLSTEIN (Germany) peasant, uninstructed in microscopical research, and not possessing the requisit instruments of precision, has devised for himself a new test for the presence of trichinæ in pork. When he killed a pig he was careful to send a portion of it—a ham or a sausage—to his pastor, and then waited the consequences for fourteen days. If his pastor remained healthy, then he felt perfectly easy in his mind, and well assured that his pig fulfilled the requisit conditions of soundness for food, and he proceeded to dispose of it accordingly in his own family. This ingenious method of research has not been considered satisfactory to the district physician.

FROM recent statistics issued by the Norwegian government it appears that the mercantil marine of that country is increasing at a remarkably fast rate. During 1878 the increase amounted to 33 690 tons, and at the commencement of last year the fleet consisted of 7,942 sailing vessels and 309 steamers, being about 88 per cent of the former and 12 per cent of the latter class of vessels. The proportion of steamers to sailing vessels in most countries is much larger than it is in Norway. The great bulk of the Norwegian sailing vessels are employed in the American trade, the export of produce from the United States alone during 1878 producing in the way of freights 33,733 000 crowns, against 25,000,000 in 1877, and 17,000,000 in 1876.

THE flag of the prophet is in the custody of the Mohammedan chief priest, Sheik-ul-Islam, and is kept in the mosque of St. Sophia in Samboul. It is made of green silk. There is a large crescent on the top of the staff from which hangs a horsehair plume, claimed to hav been the tail of Mohammed's favorit horse. On the folds of the flag are displayed the crescent and certain quotations from the Koran. Mohammed adopted green as his emblematic color because nature is green, and it is everlasting and universal. The following words are on the flag: "All who draw the sword will be rewarded with temporal advantages; every drop of their blood shed, every peril and hardship endured by them, will be registered on high as more meritorious than either fasting or praying. If they fall in battle their sins will be at once blotted out, and they will be transported to paradise, there to revel in eternal pleasure in the arms of black-eyed houries. But for the first heaven are reserved those of the faithful who die within sight of the green flag of the prophet. There may no man giv or expect mercy."

THE Rev. H. L. Kutchin, pastor of the Baptist church at Waupaca, Wis., spoke as follows in a recent sermon: "I believe the scriptures and the revelation of the Lord's will, but that the Bible is not absolutely infallible. I believe that the Old Testament is merely a history, and in a great deal of it there is no need for any inspiration. In relation to the atonement, I believe that Christ by his life and teaching is made unto the world a moral force leading humanity on to the truth, and that all truth centers in him. In relation to future punishment I am not sure as to its duration, and I believe that God will never refuse to listen to a cry of repentance that comes from a contrite heart. I believe when sin ceases to be, hell shall be no more. I believe that God is compassionate and loving, and I do not believe in a hell of material fire. These old ideas are fading away, and humanity is coming out into the sunlight of a better knowledge. A great many churches are cursed with a few ecclesiastical dead beats and gospel consumers who are never satisfied, and this class of people it is who furnish nine tenths of the heresy hunters." At the close of his discourse, Mr. Kutchin said that of course he resigned his pastorate, preferring not to wait to be kicked out.

AN idiot who, perhaps, surpasses all rivals in memory and in the capacity to make mathematical calculations in his head, was recently examined before the students of the medico-surgical academy of St. Petersburg. He is 27 years old. In his youth he was noted for his brilliant ability, but was addicted to the immoderate use of liquors, and led a dissipated life. He was attacked by an acute disease. When he recovered he was found to hav lost all his mental faculties except memory and the power of mathematical calculation. These increased proportionately as his understanding and power of logical thinking vanished. Now he is a living phonograph and calculating apparatus. In the lecture room Prof. Merjevsky requested him to square numbers containing five or six figures, to extract the square roots of like numbers, and so on. All the questions were correctly answered by the patient in a few seconds. No mathematician present could do anything like it. Then the professor requested some one to read poetry aloud for several minutes, and the patient repeated it as correctly as a phonograph. The professor declared to the audience that he was unable to explain this psychical phenomenon. The memory and the calculating capacity of the patient are still growing, while in other respects he is becoming a more hopeless idiot.

THE French in equatorial Africa hav taken steps to open up commercial communications with Timbuctoo and the surrounding regions. A few days ago the chief officers of a great military and surveying party left Bordeaux for the capital of Senegal, the West African possession of France. From thence the expedition will proceed up the river Senegal to a place called Medine, 200 miles from the Atlantic coast, and from Medine as a base of operation it will explore and map a belt of country lying to the eastward between the Senegal river and the Niger. The immediate purpose is the construction of a railway along the belt of land surveyed, in order to tap the rich resources of the Niger country, and promote trade between the natives and the French. The expedition will be dual in its character, and will consist on the one hand of a column of soldiers and sappers, under the command of M. Desbordes, and on the other hand of a company of civilians, including civil engineers, astronomers, and naturalists, under the direction of M. Derrien. The military party will act as an escort to the scientific party, and likewise build a line of forts across the country at convenient points. The duties of the scientific party will be the mapping of the country, the studying of its mineral, vegetable, and animal productions, and, above all, a preliminary selection of a route for the future railway. A subsequent expedition will take the working levels and surveys for the line, which will forthwith be constructed. Communication being thus opened between Senegal and the Niger, it will be no difficult matter to ascend that river as far as Timbuctoo, and establish a French post there as a center for trade with the vast and fertil plains of the Soudan and equatorial Africa.

THE RUINS OF ANCIENT ROME.

81 VIA VITTORIA, ROME, Sept. 30, 1880.

DEAR FRIENDS AT HOME: I have now been here several days at the headquarters of Christianity, and begin to see a little how affairs are managed, and it is only my duty to keep you posted as to how I am getting along. Before I begin with my explorations through ancient and modern Rome let me say a few words about my surroundings here on the Corso. You of course remember I have two windows opening on the Corso, the principal street of Rome. Perhaps you would like to know more about it. I have taken its measure and will report. It is about a mile long and thirty feet wide, between the curbstones. The sidewalks are six feet wide in some places, and half that distance in others. The stores on it are diminutive, and not very attractive. I think it would take at least one hundred and seventy-five such streets to equal Broadway, New York. My other street, Vittoria, is about twenty feet wide, with no sidewalks.

The houses here are of a permanent character. The stairs are generally stone, and the floors are tile or stone. My room has a plain tile floor, about a third larger each than a common brick. They seem a little rough without carpets, but when carpeted do very well. They have the advantage of not being noisy. I can scarcely hear the people on the next floor above. The brick deadens the sound.

The Italian pedlers about the streets are a noisy set of fellows. They keep up a pretty constant outcry which becomes tiresome to the compulsory listener. Whether it is figs, grapes, fish, or whatever these peripatetic dealers have to dispose of, they take good care to let the people know they are about, and though they may be little in body they are powerful in lungs, and their dolorous tones are so much like the chanting of the priests in the churches that I cannot help marking the similarity. I often think they make a great ado over a small amount of business. Perhaps the most noisy of any of these criers are the newsboys, or rather newsmen. Two of these noisy fellows station themselves under my windows on the Corso, and for several hours from early in the morning they keep up an incessant outcry of the names of their wares. If the news contained in them equals the noise made over them they deserve to meet with a more extensive sale than they seem to. If they would only cry out the New York Times, Herald, Sun, or Truth their music would sound sweet to me, and I would surely patronize them.

When an extra comes out, as has been the case twice since I have been here, the newsmen run the streets in a wild manner, and make a worse outcry than usual to let the people know that something extraordinary has happened, and that their papers should be bought. I thought our newsboys in New York could make quite as much ado as needful on the appearance of an extra, but their Roman brothers can throw them in the shade and not half try.

I have attended two funerals since I have been here—that is, from my window. On Sunday afternoon last, while writing in my room, I heard an outcry, sounding something like that of the newsmen just spoken of, and said I to myself: "What direful calamity has happened now that the newsmen should make such a noise as this? I hope the Pope has not choked himself to death, or anything of that kind." I went to my window and saw it was a funeral procession, and one of the most singular I have ever witnessed. It was principally made up of monks, and they were singing or chanting in a most dolorous manner. They were dressed in various colors, and were members of different orders. The first fifty wore a snuff-colored cloak and cowl, and marched two abreast; then came about as many in black (perhaps they were the Black Friars); then a company in red, and then another in a darker snuff-color, and another company still in white, after which came the carriage containing the corpse, with six monks on each side, with their faces veiled, carrying lighted candles four or five feet long. After the corpse came a few carriages with mourners and friends, with fifty or more persons on foot, who brought up the rear. The monks made a most grotesque appearance, and their doleful, unearthly chanting produced a decidedly singular effect. I afterward saw another similar funeral procession, only pall-bearers of monks carried the body instead of a carriage; but the lighted candles were used, possibly, to give light to the departed on his way into or out of purgatory, and the dismal chanting was a fitting accompaniment.

Monks are numerous here. The Augustines, the Dominicans, the Franciscans, the Capuchins, the Benedictines, and all the other varieties are fully represented. They are seen walking about the city at all hours of the day with nothing on their heads save a small skull cap, which merely covers the crown. They are a perfectly useless sort of beings, in fact worse than useless, for they often swindle, frighten, persuade, and cajole weak-minded, superstitious people near the end of life to save themselves from the horrors of the damned by bequeathing a large share of their property to the monkish orders. In this way natural heirs have been wronged out of what justly belonged to them by these insinuating, ingratiating, conscienceless monks who care nothing for desolate widows or helpless children so they can secure to themselves the bulk of the dying man's fortune. In the capacity of priest or confessor they make the poor simpleton think it is far better for him to enter the other world after having given the larger share of his property for the service of God than to go having selfishly left what he had for his wife and children. Millions upon millions have in this way—by preying upon the superstitions and fears of dying people—been torn from wives and orphans to further enrich the pretended men of God and the church that claims to be God's special pride. Sometimes, however, they get foiled. I was told of a case where a widow was about to die, and the Dominican monks had access to her to administer to her in her dying hours; and by dint of persistent talking and persuasion they made her believe that as she had done little or nothing for the church during her life, it would be very unsafe for her to enter the other world without doing something to insure her happiness and to shun the doom of the damned. She had about $70,000; and working upon her fears, they induced her to will to their order all she had save $4,000, which was left for an only daughter. Soon after the will was made she died; but the daughter was spirited, and indignant that the power and influence of the priests had thus been employed to deprive her of what was justly hers. She placed her claims in the hands of a skilful lawyer, who brought suit to recover the property on the grounds that undue influence had been used on the mind of the helpless, dying woman. The Dominicans stoutly contested the case, and employed able lawyers to defend it; but after they had done all they could, carrying the case from court to court, they were finally defeated, and had to return the property, besides paying all the costs that had accrued.

Some of the orders of monks are poor, and live by begging from house to house. When asked why they do not go to work and earn their living, and why gifts should be made to them, they reply by saying: "Oh, we pray to heaven and the holy Virgin for you. When you commit sin we pray that you may be forgiven; and but for us you would not be forgiven, and it is your duty to give to us." Thus these worthless, cheating idlers, and holy vagabonds are a pest to the earth, and Italy is greatly overrun with them.

I judge the Italians are very fond of dandelions as an article of diet. I see them in profusion with every dealer in vegetables. I think I had not been an hour in Rome before I saw fifty bushels of dandelion tops. Women from the country carry them for sale in baskets and sacks on their heads, and dealers sell them on the street. I have seen four donkeys together, loaded down with dandelion tops closely crammed in sacks, and one on each side larger than the donkeys themselves. I have also seen men coming to the city carrying on their backs large sacks filled with the same commodity. Such a general use of dandelions should serve to correct the tendency to biliousness to which the Italians are disposed, if taraxicum possesses the medical virtues ascribed to it.

ANCIENT ROME.

In prosecuting my sight-seeing in this ancient city I deemed it would be proper to do so somewhat chronologically, taking those parts first which are the oldest in years, or in centuries. Rome is divided into five divisions; thus, 1. The Strangers' Quarter, in which I am located. It is in the north part of the city, running south in a wedge shape toward the center, bounded by the Corso on the west and Quirinal and the hills of Rome on the east; 2. Comprises the hills of Rome, including the Quirinal and several palaces and fine residences. It is immediately east of the Strangers' Quarter; 3. Is Rome on the left bank of the Tiber west of the Corso, and is made up of narrow irregular streets, and is upon the whole rather uninteresting; 4. Is the portion of the city on the right bank of the Tiber, including St. Peters, the Vatican, etc.; 5. Is ancient Rome in the south part of the city, and includes the Capitoline, the Palatine, the Aventine, the Cœlian, the Esquiline, the Velian, and Viminal hills, on which seven hills the ancient city stood. In approaching this ancient Rome from the more modern city we come first to the Capitoline hill, so called, it is said from finding the head (caput) of Jupiter when digging for a foundation of a temple to him. It was here the kings in ancient times held their capitol; it was here the senate met and passed laws during the five hundred years that Rome was a republic, and it was here the emperors, for nearly three hundred years after the republic, still made their capital. It is the smallest save one of the seven hills of ancient Rome, but is the most important of them all. It was originally only the south spur of the Quirinal from which it was separated by a depression which was enlarged by the operations of the Emperor Trajan.

As important a place as this hill was in the days of the kings, the republic, and the empire, its glory has greatly passed away, and in the place of the edifice which once crowned the summit now stand a Christian church and monastery. It was on this area capitolina that Romulus is said to have founded his asylum. It was here that popular assemblies were afterward held; and it was here in 133 B.C., on the occasion of the suppression of the revolt of Tiberius Gracchus, that the blood of the citizens flowed for the first time in civil warfare. One of the peaks of the hill was occupied by the Arx, or citadel, with the temple of Juno Monita, while the other was the site of the Great Temple of Jupiter. It is needless to say that as utterly absurd as I regard the religious superstitions of the ancient Romans I cannot look upon the substitution of Christian superstitions and Christian edifices as any improvement. In many respects the pagans were superior to what the Christians have proved themselves. In this light the tearing away of the ancient temples and building in their places churches and monasteries seems like a desecration, a species of vandalism at which my inmost feelings revolt. Here and in many places the strongest proofs exist that it has been the purpose of Christians to demolish everything pagan, to convert it to their own use and appropriate to themselves everything in the pagan system popular and dear to the people; and on every pagan temple and over every pagan shrine they have erected a temple of their own upon which they have placed the cross, with a dying god upon it and an image of the Virgin.

The temple of Jupiter was built by Tarquinius Superbus, the last of the kings, and consecrated over five hundred years before the Christian era. It was 800 feet in circumference and possessed a triple colonnade, and three cellæ, that of Jupiter being in the center, and one for Juno and Minerva on the sides. In the year 83 B.C., during the civil war, the temple burned down and was again rebuilt, but was burned again in A.D. 69, on the occasion of the struggle between Vespasian and Vitellius.

This most sacred shrine of ancient Rome was magnificently restored by Domitian, and was preserved down to the year 455, when it was plundered by the Vandals and robbed of its gilded bronze tiles. The numerous shrines which once surrounded it met with the same fate, and the entire hill now presents the appearance of modern times. For five hundred years little or no mention was made of the Capitoline hill or its temples; it was in the possession of the monastery of Araceli, and the name of Monte Caprino, or hill of goats, was given it, which shows the desertion which had fallen upon it. In the eleventh century, however, when there was some revival of a spirit of municipal independence, it again became the center of the civic administration. The prefect of the city resided here. Among the ruins of the venerable citadel the nobility and citizens held their public assemblies, and in 1341 Petrarch was crowned as a poet in the great senate hall.

Originally the hill could only be practically approached on the south side, the north being precipitous and almost inaccessible, but in 1348 the northwest side was made accessible from the newer quarter of the city by the construction of a long flight of steps, and which was about the only public work performed during the exile of the papal court at Avignon. About 1389 Boniface IX. converted the palace of the Senate into a kind of fortress, but its present form dates from the sixteenth century. Two new approaches from the city having been constructed in 1536, the capital has since formed a kind of termination of the modern part of the city in the direction of the ruins of ancient Rome. At the head of the 124 steps leading to the capitol is a beautiful piazza. On the summit is a she-wolf kept in a cage, in memory of the fable of Romulus and Remus being suckled by a she-wolf. At the foot of the steps are large statues of two fine Egyptian lions, and at the top two colossal statues of Castor and Pollox in the celebrated horse-training groups. In the center of the piazza is a bronze equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius. On the right is the Palace of the Conservatori, formerly the Town Hall, but which now contains important collections of Roman antiquities. On the opposite side is the Capitoline museum, which contains a still larger collection of Roman sculptures and antiquities. The designs of the sculptures on the piazza are by Angelo, and the capital museum building was founded by Innocent X., extended by Clement XII., Benedict XIV., Clement XIII., and Pius VI. There are in the museum numerous rooms, halls, saloons, corridors, etc., well filled with ancient Roman sculpture, gods, goddesses, heroes, philosophers, critics, poets, warriors, statesmen, etc., with bronzes, pottery, lamps, inscriptions, mosaics, and other works of art in marble and bronze. Here are statues enough of Jupiter, Juno, Mars, Hercules, Venus, and all the rest of those imaginary deific worthies to fill a pantheon. There is also a full line of the old Roman emperors. These were largely excavated on the Capitoline hill and its surroundings, while some were brought from other parts of the Roman Empire.

On the south slope of the Capitoline hill is the remains of the temple of Saturn, of which eight fluted granite columns remain standing; three columns of the temple of Vespasian; the arch of Septimus Severus, still embellished with the designs in basreliefs, executed at the time it was erected. Below in the corner is the colonnade of the twelve principal gods of Rome. The basement of the temple of Saturn is sixteen feet in hight, and was originally consecrated by the consuls Sempronius and Minucius about five hundred years before the Christian era, and was restored by Munatius Plancus about 44 B.C.. where from the earliest times the Aerarium Publicum, or government treasury, was established. Below the temple of Saturn, but concealed by the earth and rubbish which forms the modern road, once rose the triumphal arch, erected in A. D. 16, to the Emperor Tiberius to commemorate the defeat of the Germanic tribes and the recovery of the Roman insignia which had been lost at the battle of the Zeutoburgin Forest. Fragments of the arch and inscriptions still lie scattered around. Below the tabularium of the upper gallery, of which one arch only now stands, and in the angle formed with it by the street, lies the Schola Xantha, with the colonnade of the twelve gods of Rome as observed, whose images were erected A.D. 367.

Farther towards the south is the temple of Concordia, founded in the year 366 B.C., and rebuilt on a larger scale by Tiberius at the very beginning of our era. It was dedicated to Concord to commemorate the termination of the protracted struggle between the patricians and plebeians. On the ruins of this temple was erected the Christian church of St. Sergis and St. Bacco, but it was taken down in the sixteenth century. In front of the temple of Concordia, and above the Via Sacra, rises the triumphal arch of Septimius Severus, already mentioned. It is seventy-five feet high and eighty-two wide, with three arches or passages. It was erected in honor of the emperor whose name it bears by his sons Carsalla and Geta, in 203, to commemorate his victories, and was surmounted by a brazen chariot with six horses, on which stood Severus crowned by victory. Above the arch are figures of victory; at the sides are crowded scenes from the life of the emperor and the warlike struggles of his times. An arched wall near the Arch of Severus is what remains of the Rostra, the orators' tribune.

Next south is the ancient Roman Forum, from which about twenty-five feet of the accumulated rubbish and dirt of over fifteen hundred years have been removed, leaving the floor of the Forum as in ancient days, with the bases of the columns as they used to be, and many pieces of broken columns two and a half and three feet in diameter lying around. The Forum was erected in what was a marshy hollow between the Capitoline hill and the Palatine. In this hollow tradition asserts occured the great conflict between the Romans under Romulus and the Sabines under Titus Tatius, after the rape of the Sabine women. After the hostile tribes were amalgamated into one state they chose the Forum as its center; and it was here that many of the most noted scenes in Roman history occcurred. On the north side was the Curia Hostilia, or Council-Hall, which is said to have been erected by King Tullus Hostilius. On the south side, and at the foot of the Palatine hill, rose the temple of Vesta, with its eternal fire, and the Regia, or dwelling of the Pontifex Maximus, the president of the Roman hierarchy. The Comitium, or open space in the center, was the place where popular assemblies were wont to be held. The Forum was bounded by streets, the most important of which was the Via Sacra, ascending to the Capitol. In the Forum and its environs building operations and various changes have been taking place at intervals of upward of two thousand years, and it is not to be wondered at that it is now somewhat difficult to fully establish the bounds which belonged to this ancient popular edifice. It is, however, well settled that the Forum extended from the foot of the Capitol to the Basilica Julia on the south, but the eastern boundary has not been clearly decided. There are now fully twenty-five feet of earth on what was this portion of the Forum, including the remains of subsequent buildings, and until all this is cleared away the full extent of the republican Forum in this direction cannot be fully established.

Soon after the temple of the Capitoline Jupiter, were founded the temples of Saturn and Castor, and all nearly five hundred years before our era. At the period of the Samnite war, which resulted in the extension of Rome's supremacy over the whole of Italy, we are informed that the Forum underwent many embellishments. At length, however, as its length was but 450 feet, its area became too confined for the extensive business of many kinds transacted there, when it was considerably enlarged; basilicas and quadrangular courts were added, with a view to drawing off a portion of the business which had centered in the Forum. This was prosecuted with vigor under Julius Cæsar. He added largely to the previous size of the Forum, and created the spacious Basilica Julia on the south side. Augustus continued the plans of his uncle, and to him is due much of the arrangement of the Forum which modern excavations have disclosed. All the edifices of the republic were restored by him and his successors, whose extensive building operations extended over the first four Christian centuries. These ancient buildings were restored for the last time in the reign of King Theodoric, in the fore part of the sixth century, and the last new monument erected in the Forum was the column of Phocas, in the year 608, which is still standing; but the rudeness of the architecture bespeaks the degraded condition into which art had then fallen. It was in the first half of the sixth century that was vigorously waged the war of Christianity against paganism, which was continued through the middle ages. Ancient pagan temples, as observed, were changed into Christian churches, and in place of the gods Jupiter, Saturn, Castor and Pollox, Juno, Minerva, Vesta, etc., came such presiding spirits as St. Giuseppe, St. Luca, St. Adriano, St. Lorenzo, St. Francisco, and as many more saints as you please to call for. Amid the saintly churches thus changed from pagan temples or built upon their ruins were interspersed the towers and castles of the late Roman nobility erected among the ruins of the ancient buildings in the style best adapted to the prosecution of their perpetual feuds. As the ancient edifices were on too extensive a scale to meet the wants of the degenerated successors, a great amount of surplus material was left on hand, and from this storehouse building material was taken for edifices of all kinds for more than a thousand years.

A large number of the churches in and around Rome were largely constructed of material literally stolen from the ruins of the temples and edifices of the ancients. Hundreds of columns and thousands of tons of marble were thus appropriated, and what was still more destructive, thousands of tons of the marble used in the construction of the ancient temples and noble edifices were burnt to make lime for building churches. Much even of the marble which now lines St. Peter's cathedral at the Vatican was taken from the temples and public edifices on the Capitoline hill and the palaces of the emperors on the Palatine. In the same way it is asserted that a splendid statue of old Jupiter now makes an excellent St. Peter in his cathedral. In this and in many other ways has Christianity stolen from paganism—not only its errors, dogmas, rites, and ceremonies, but the very building material of which its churches are composed. By placing the cross over the edifices thus purloined they all become very holy, and after a time they blatantly exclaim, "See how much superior is Christianity to paganism." When one realizes the vast amount of richly carved and sculptured marble bearing valuable inscriptions and artistic enrichments which have thus been ruthlessly destroyed, it is quite enough to fill him with honest and earnest indignation at the spirit of robbery which the church has evinced. In the Basilica of Julia alone have been discovered lime kilns and stone yards at three different places. The bronze was also seized upon with mercenary avidity by the conscienceless robbers of the Christian era. The pagan Goths and Vandals of the north were bad enough in all conscience, but the Christian Vandals were far worse, being quite as destructive in their depredations and continuing their robbery more than a thousand years.

After this systematic destruction of the Forum, its remains were gradually buried beneath the rubbish and debris of not less than four centuries, so that the ancient pavement is at places even forty feet below the present level. In the middle ages and down to the present time the glory of the ancient Forum and its surroundings had become so departed that it was termed the Campo Vaccino, or cow pasture, or the common for cattle. Its desolate area was covered with the teams of buffaloes and oxen of the peasantry, and smiths and carpenters established their workshops around it, while a few isolated columns protruding from the rubbish alone afforded a reminiscence of departed glory. Thus it remained till the present century, though as early as the fore part of the sixteenth century Raphael had formed a plan for restoring the ancient city in his lifetime, and about 1546 a beginning was made to excavate in the vicinity of the temple of Castor and Faustina. The object, however, being to find monuments and works of art, the excavations were soon filled up again. But during the present century the spirit of investigation became fully aroused and over sixty years ago the Clivus Capitolinus with its temples were disinterred under the superintendence of Carlo Fea, while the French during their occupation directed their attention to other quarters. Napoleon Bonaparte showed much interest in having these works of antiquity cleared from the rubbish which covered them and to have their treasures of ancient artistic wealth, so far as possible, restored to the world. In 1835, and during the republic of 1858, part of the Basilica Julia was excavated by Canina, but from that year to 1871 the work was discontinued. From 1871 to 1874 the Italian government resumed the excavations with considerable, but latterly decreasing energy. By these last operations the Basilica, the temples of Castor and Cæsar, and a great part of the Comitium and the neighboring streets have been brought to light, and an admirable clue to the arrangement of the entire locality has thus been pretty clearly defined. In addition to the excavations some of the monuments have been restored so as to convey an opinion of how they once stood and looked.

On the floor of the Forum is an oblong block of marble said to have been sculptured in the time of Julius Cæsar. It has the figure of a hog, a sheep, and an ox skilfully carved upon it, and on the reverse side are other carvings. I do not now remember the subject, but think it is some historical event in the career of Cæsar. The place is pointed out where Mark Antony made his celebrated speech in favor of the assassinated Cæsar and against Brutus and Cassius; but the place where the deadly knife was thrust to the heart of Cæsar is toward the Quirinal, and is now occupied as a vegetable market.

South of the Forum are several walls and arches, the ruins of antiquity, but of a later period than the Forum and the Capitol. The foundation of one of the ancient palaces is said to have been laid in the time of Vespasian, as bricks have been dug out which bore his name. Here is also an ancient temple of Vesta, on the top of which a Christian story has been added and converted into a Christian chapel. It was not far from this place of which Gibbon thus wrote: "It was at Rome, on the 15th of October, 1764, as I sat musing amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the barefooted friars were singing vespers in the temple of Jupiter (Aracœli church) that the idea of writing the Decline and Fall of the city first started to my mind." A greater work than this has hardly been written, and a clearer head than Gibbon's has scarcely existed. It is well for the world that he made that visit to Rome, and that while thus meditating among the ruins of the ancient city it entered his mind to write the history of its Decline and Fall

THE PALATINE.

To have access to this ancient seat of imperial grandeur required two francs for myself and guide, whom I deemed I needed to point out the locations of the palaces which once stood there, the eras when they were built, and the names of the builders. The Palatine is on the southwest side of the Forum, and between that and the circus Maximus, which was flourishing twenty-five hundred years ago. Its top is somewhat in the form of an irregular triangle, and it is probable that scarcely any spot on the earth of the same size has been the site of grander palaces, more extravagant wealth, more sumptuous abodes, than this same Palatine hill. I can hardly enter into details and give you all that should justly be said about this locality, for I am well satisfied that I weary you with my details. This hill, 1,900 yards in circumference on the summit, has been closely connected with the history of Rome from the first. It was site and center of the embryo mistress of the world, the Roman Quadrata, fragments of whose walls have been brought to light in several different places. The wall appears to have encircled the hill—the highest point of which is 168 feet above the level of the sea, or 114 above the level of ancient Rome—about half way up its slopes, and to have been furnished with gates to the number of three or more. Tradition places on this hill the dwellings of its heroes Evander, Faustulus, and Romulus, and a reminiscence of them was preserved down to very late times.

My guide (Mr. Adolf Neuhauser, a German, formerly of the city of Vienna, and who speaks pretty fair English) pointed out to me from the Palatine hill the rock where Romulus was said to have landed when he floated down the Tiber, Moses-like, in the cradle of wicker-work in which he was placed, and from whence he was rescued and nursed and suckled by a she-wolf. For a long time sacrifices were made upon that rock, and it is still highly venerated by the citizens of Rome.

In explanation of the fable of Romulus being suckled by a wolf, he said the error arose from a figure of speech. Romulus was really found by Faustulus, and was nursed by his wife, who was a very cross termagant, and so unamiable that she was termed, as was common to call that class of females, a wolf, and from that fact the fable had grown that

An Appeal.

To the Patrons of The Truth Seeker: When I am in trouble or in sore need I come to you. You hav been my steadfast friends. When over seven years ago I launched my little craft upon the sea of journalism many of you came to my aid and hav remained faithfully with me since. I began with slight resources, and hav about held my own since. Had it not been for your kindness and support my little enterprise must long since hav proved a failure. With your aid I am publishing the largest Liberal paper in the world, and consequently the most expensiv. With your aid it will continue to be a success; without it, it cannot. To meet its current expenses a steady income is most essential. If this fails, the results are most serious.

For the last several weeks, owing to the political campaign, to my absence in Europe, and perhaps other causes, the receipts hav been smaller than usual, and the consequences are upon me. I find upon my return that bills hav not been paid that should hav been, and I now ask you to again aid me. Many of you are in arrears, leaving me to furnish the paper to you without the necessary funds to do so. I ask those of you who are behind to renew at once; and if you will advance a year, I will regard it as a special favor. If you will all be thus generous with me my financial circumstances will be much improved. If all the readers of The Truth Seeker will promptly contribute the yearly subscription price, its success will be secured. A little from a large number makes a goodly sum.

I hav practiced industry and economy. The only extravagance I hav been guilty of is my trip to Europe. I felt a strong desire to visit a part of the old world; and after spending a year in prison I felt that it was almost my due. I enjoyed my trip highly, and feel that my health has been improved thereby. I tried to make you sharers with me in what I saw so far as possible. Still, if I erred in going, none can regret it more than myself. I tried to be economical, and feel sure I did not expend more than one-third the sum which many hav spent going over the same ground. That I hav made mistakes I will not deny; but I hav wished to be in the right, and my aim has been to do injustice to none. I feel that far greater wrongs hav been done me than I hav desired to do to others. I hav endeavored to serve you faithfully.

I trust you all wish that The Truth Seeker may regularly continue its weekly visits, and that those of you who are behind will catch up without delay; and I hope that those whose time will expire in a few weeks, and can conveniently advance the price of another year, will kindly do so. Every one can tell when his time expires by the date on the wrapper.

This appeal would not be made were it not necessary, and I ask that it may not be disregarded. Let it be remembered, too, that I am still in the Liberal book trade, and will fill your orders with the greatest cheerfulness. The reading season of the year has come again, and surely there are not as many Liberal books extant as should be. Let us all endeavor to do what we can to make the cause of truth successful. Fraternally yours, D. M B.

The Passion Play.

The peasants of Oberammergau, in their representation of the Passion Play, or the reputed events in the life of Jesus, hav attracted the attention of thousands of tourists who hav visited that town. Many hav considered it the greatest piece ever placed upon the stage. With a belief that it would draw largely in our community, one of our theatrical managers has decided to place it upon the stage of one of our most popular theaters. Some of our Christian people of the Baptist persuasion evince strong objections to the proposition, and wish to prevent it. Inasmuch as the stage is a most forcible means of depicting the important events that hav taken place in the world, it would seem that Christians should not object to having the tragical close of the life of Jesus thus represented. If the story is true when they preach it in the pulpits it is equally true when portrayed upon the stage of a theater. Possibly the clergymen wish a monopoly of the business. The crucifixion of the savior Prometheus as an expiation for the sins of the world was represented on the stage in the theaters of Athens five hundred years before the story of Jesus was ever told. It is difficult to see why it is not equally proper to represent the termination of the earthly career of the more modern savior in a similar way. There is no doubt that the crucifixion of Prometheus was a subject of as much sacredness to the Athenians as the crucifixion of Jesus can be to New Yorkers.

Paine Memoral Suit.

We are glad to learn that the vexatious suit instituted by certain malicious persons against friend Mendum as trustee of the Lick Lecture Fund has come to naught. The case was brought into court on the 1st, and the Judge, after hearing the complaint and the answer, told Mr. Mendum's accusers that they were trifling with the time of the court, and dismissed the case, imposing costs of court upon the complainants. It is confidently hoped that this will be the last of the troubles connected with Paine Memorial, except to raise funds to clear off the debt of a few thousand dollars still hanging over it. This decision of the court is so largely an indorsement of the conduct of the managers of the property that they feel confident the Liberals of the country will take up the remainder of the stock, the price of which is $25.00 per share. Money should be transmitted to J. S. Verity, Treasurer, Paine Building, Appleton street, Boston, who will forward stock promptly.

Gain in the Population of New York City.

From the census of the present year it appears that this city has made a remarkable increase in population since the census of 1870. Then the population was 942,292. Now it is 1,206,577, showing an increase of 264,285, or about 33¼ per cent. This is perhaps the first instance where any city has increased its population over a quarter of a million in ten years, the increase alone being enough to make a city of large magnitude. If New York keeps on increasing at this rate its population will reach two or even three millions of people during the lifetime of many now upon the stage of action. This gain seems to be largely from the growth of the newer wards in the upper part of the city, but nearly one-half of the increase is in the older wards. In the 12th, 18th, 19th, 20 h, and 22d wards the present population amounts to 435 304, showing a density in many instances of over four hundred to the acre—more dense than London or any European city, and too dense for comfort, health, or morality.

One of the evils of our time seems to be the massing of overgrown populations into large cities. It would be much better could hundreds of thousands of these people be located in the rural districts of the South and West cultivating the millions of acres now imperfectly tilled or wholly neglected. The accumulation of people in the large cities in excess of their needs must necessarily lead to crime and ill health, while their dispersion over the arable lands of our extensiv country would be conducive to health, virtue, and happiness. One of the great problems to be solved in the future is, What shall be done with the vast and rapidly increasing population, and what shall be done with the almost countless millions of acres of farming-land in excess of the amount men are able to properly cultivate. By birth and right of existence all men hav an equal claim to the soil of the earth, as to its air and water. How to bring about a just apportionment and by what tenure lands shall be held are subjects that must seriously engage the attention of the men of the future. Unless a righteous apportionment of the land can be effected the results of an over-population will soon be upon us, and a train of evils terrible to contemplate may be looked for in coming generations. Millions of men without homes and with nothing to do, and millions of acres whose owners cannot till them, and which they hold in excess of their needs, are evils which may be made to correct each other.

Book Notices.

The Scientific Basis of Spiritualism. By Epes Sargent, author of "Planchette; or, the Despair of Science;" "The Proof Palpable of Immortality," etc. Colby and Rich, Boston, 1880. 372 pp. Price, $1 50.

Mr. Sargent is well known among the readers of Spiritualistic literature, and his statements are received in confidence. For many years he has been an earnest investigator in the field of psychic phenomena, and this volume is the result of his labors and his search. He givs many facts and incidents which hav come under his own observation, together with the experiences of many others similarly engaged. He exposes the misrepresentations, which hav been many, even by those occupying positions in the scientific and literary world. His effort is—and many will decide that he has accomplished it—to show that Spiritualism has a scientific basis, and that what are known as its phenomena are susceptible of scientific examination. The work will doubtless hav a wide reading among those interested in this line of study. Perhaps nothing has preceded it more acceptable to those looking for the data and facts pertaining to Spiritualistic manifestations.

Fundamental Physics. An Account of Experimental Investigation. From the scientific treatises of Johann Carl Friedrich Zöllner, Professor of Physical Astronomy at the University of Leipsic; member of the Royal Saxon Society of Sciences, and member of several scientific societies. Translated from the German by Chas. Carleton Massey, London. Colby and Rich, Boston. Price, $1 50

This work is principally composed of detailed accounts by Professor Zöllner and others of remarkable phenomena which took place under his own observation in the presence of Henry Slade during his late visit to Europe. The high character of Professor Zöllner will cause this work to be received with an unusual degree of confidence. The greatest care seems to hav been taken that no fraud could be used in the experiments, and that honest results should be obtained In the appendix statements are given of opinions expressed by Samuel Bolachini, court conjuror, of Berlin; of John Nevil Maskelyne, conjuror, of Egyptian Hall, London; Robert Houdin, the great French conjuror, and the professional conjuror of Paris, to the effect that from their observation, phenomena do take place in the presence of certain mediums which cannot be fraudulently produced, and with which trickery has nothing to do. The work is produced in a spirit of fairness and scientific research.

Witchcraft of New England. Explained by modern Spiritualism. By Allen Putnam, author of "Bible Marvel Workers," "Mesmerism, Spiritualism, Witchcraft, and Miracle," "Agassiz and Spiritualism," etc. Colby & Rich, Boston, 482 pp.

The author, as will be inferred from the title, endeavors to prove witchcraft only a phase of mediumship. He enters into an examination, so far as historical data is at hand, of the cases called witchcraft that occurred in Salem, Mass., and other New England towns two hundred years ago. Commencing with Margaret Jones who was hanged in Boston, June 15, 1648, and continuing down to the great excitement from supposed witches, at Salem, near the close of the century. He takes the cases up separately and analyses them with patience and skill, and many of his readers will decide that he has made out a clear case. The work will prove interesting to a wide range of readers.

John Swinton's Travels. G. W. Carleton & Co., New York. 25 cents.

Mr. Swinton, assistant editor of the Sun, is one among the many New Yorkers who made a journey to Europe the present year, and he prepared this little volume after his return home. It is not a detailed account of his travels, but rather the impressions made upon his mind by what he saw in France and England. He is a man of clear mind and observation, possessing an ability to take in the facts and deduce proper conclusions not enjoyed by many. His observations are terse and to the point, and though his impressions and conclusions are often at variance with those who hav written of those countries before him, the correctness of his views will be accepted by the great bulk of his readers. Probably no more sensible observations hav been made by any one who has written of Europe. He was evidently highly pleased with his journey.

A Challenge Recalled.

To Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. Dear Sir: I hav repeatedly called upon you to prove your accusation against Junius that he was a coward and a sneak. I beg now to recall the challenge for reasons which I will state.

Within the past three weeks I hav made a grand triple discovery—first of a Junius placer full of big nuggets; secondly, of a Paine placer close by; and, lastly, of the fact that the two placers are one and the same, the pseudonym of Paine being cut on the bed-rock of both gulches.

These new and unexpected discoveries positivly identify Paine with Junius. You will readily see, therefore, how unfortunate it would be for you to attempt to prove that Junius was a coward, a calumniator, and a sneak, only to be followed by a demonstration on my part from new evidence that Paine was Junius; and not only so, but that the charge which you hav made against Junius, if at all capable of being supported (which I deny), can be equally well sustained against Paine from this new evidence.

It always hurts my feelings to put an adversary hors du combat, and the more so when I hav a high esteem for him, as I certainly hav for you. Therefore I beseech you to defer any attempt to prove your accusation until I shall hav submitted an abstract of the new evidence connecting Paine with Junius. After that, if you think I hav not made the demonstration complete, you may do as you please about maintaining your accusation; but if you find the new evidence of identity satisfactory, I trust you will magnanimously own up that you were mistaken in your estimation of Junius, and come and do penance at the shrine of the great apostle of republicanism. Wm. Henry Burr.

Straightening Out.

By an inadvertance, such as will happen even in the best-regulated printing-offices, an article by Mr. E. C. Walker, after lying long in type, got printed in The Truth Seeker after it was somewhat out of date. Mr. Leland made inquiry as to how recently it was written, and, by another inadvertance, was informed that it was comparativly recent. Hence his brief reply. Mr. Walker complains of this in terms which we omit, and makes this explanation.

Mr. Walker then makes a further statement, which puts his apparent proposition to bolt in a better light. He says:

"Now a word about that game. I did say, 'There is no dishonesty where fair notice is given of the player's intention.' Mr. Leland interprets it thusly, 'That is to say, it is at the option of any player to giv notice of intention to violate rules of the game.' Exactly. And what follows? Why, the other players hav the option to refuse to allow the unruly one to play with them. As a matter of fact, I do not expect when the new party is formed, contemplated by the action at Chicago, that all Liberals will join it, or that any will giv in their adherence to it simply because they are Liberals. On the contrary, I do not suppose that one man will vote with us who does not accept the platform which the party shall hav adopted.

"Had the Congress decided that Hancock was the best man before the country, I should not hav 'bolted' from the League, but I should hav voted for Weaver and Chambers 'allee samee.' I should hav 'staid in the League and tried to put it right upon the record in the future, just as Col. Ingersoll and Co. should have done upon the other question, they deeming its present course wrong.

"E.C. Walker."

God's Opposition Hotel.

BY M. BABCOCK.

St. Johns has several hotels which are trying to sustain themselvs and make an honest living, and most men would be glad to see them prosper, believing that good hotels are as essential to the success of a town as are churches. But no man who pays for his supplies can compete with God's hotel, whose tables are supplied with cold victuals that hav been begged from house to house.

This year God ran a cheap eating house on election day, for the benefit of the Congregational church. Prof. Yntema's sacred school book says his God is able to feed a multitude of five thousand people on five loaves and two little fishes, and hav enough left to start an extra hotel; then why not let him furnish the supplies for the Congregational church, and let the good ladies, when they want to beg, gather provisions for the poor? God has six churches in our little town, each one pulling against the other, and notwithstanding he also has the Bible in school, folks will steal. The Ladies' Library never dares buy more than one-half of a cord of wood at a time, for the reason that it will not do to trust it out over night. Now if God would quit the eating house business and go to watching wood piles, it would be better for the landlords, and better for those who hav to buy their wood.

"Our heavenly Father!" how he answers prayers and comforts the afflicted! An example of his "loving kindness and tender mercy:"

OPEN LETTER TO THE ST JOHNS SCHOOL BOARD.

GENTLEMEN: Please read the following article, which w clip from this week's Clinton Independent:

"DYING OF STARVATION.—A MOTHER AND DAUGHTER FASTING TO ATONE FOR IMAGINARY SIN.—A special dispatch from Syracuse, N. Y., says: A mile north of the village of Phœnix livs Joseph Smith, an honest, industrious farmer. Not until about three years ago did Mr. Smith evince any particular interest in church matters. At that time a revival occurred in the Methodist church at Phœnix Mr. and Mrs. Smith attended regularly and experienced a change of heart Three or four weeks ago Mrs. Smith became impressed that she and her daughter, a bright, intellectual girl of sixteen, were filled with sin. The daughter became imbued with the same belief, and the two were convinced that nothing but protracted fasting and prayer would cleanse their souls. They told a minister of their contemplated action and he sanctioned it. Accordingly at noon of the 4th instant they both took a little milk, and for five days neither of them tasted nourishment of any description; but at the end of that time Mrs. Smith resumed eating. The sustenance of the infant at her breast was exhausted, and, as she says, obeying divine instructions, she broke her fast. The girl, however, continued her fasting until the 14th, when she was given a slight quantity of nourishment in liquid form. She was so weak that she had frequent fainting spells. On Saturday evening, the 16th, friends learning the condition of the girl called a doctor, but she was past aid and died the next morning. While fasting she moistened her mouth with a damp cloth, and twice washed it out with water. On one of these occasions she accidentally swallowed a single drop, and for this supposed sin she atoned by praying for eighteen consecutiv hours. When she became so weak that she could not get upon her knees, her mother informed her that her prayers were just as effectual while sitting in her chair or lying in bed, and in this way she continued them until her physical strength was exhausted. In the family were several other children, but none of these participated in the fast. Mr. Smith, although not fasting, interposed no objection to his daughter's abstinence. An investigation will be held, and if it is found that Mr. and Mrs. Smith are insane, as it is supposed, they will be sent to an asylum."

Now, gents, tell me why your God didn't answer this poor girl's prayer? Why didn't he fill her soul with joy and let her know that her sins were forgiven? Do you say she was insane? She was acting in accordance with the advice of the father, mother, and the priest. If she was insane, why didn't God restore her reason and giv her comfort in compliance with her prayer?

Do you think that a God who unmoved by pity could look on that poor girl in her distress, and see her fast and pray herself to death without stretching forth his hand to save her, will answer the prayers of Prof. Yntema? I don't believe it, you don't believe it, nor does Prof. Yntema believe it. Then why go on with the farce?

When little Tommy Thomas, a short time since, was burnt to death in that burning barn, if the meanest whisky seller in St. Johns had been there he would hav saved that innocent, helpless little child if he had been able to do it. But, according to your sacred schoolbook, your God was there looking on with the utmost indifference, and although he could hav saved the child just as easy as rolling off a log he wouldn't do it. A God who would refuse to answer the screams of agony of a poor helpless little child, praying and begging for help, is a God for which I hav no respect. And, gents, there are a good many others who feel just as I do about paying Prof. Yntema for praying to such a God.

Matter and Motion.

The first, derived from mater, mother; the mother of us all, the diversified constituents of all things, the great universal truth; eternal, ever changing, the sole factor of all acts and forms, the substance of all entities, the sole occupant of the universe, the original and ultimate divisibility gas. Excuse me, then, in my dotage, should I widely differ from many of your correspondents. Years ago I ventured to ask, in the Investigator, for light, more light, on matter and its acts, and I hav all this long time waited and watched patiently the varied phases of the consideration by diversified mentality, and tried to garner the many gems of thought that hav lighted the way. Whether matter and motion (truth and act, factor and fact) will ever generally be clearly understood and defined, must remain for the future to determin.

Let me, then, say that matter and its acts are all there is to be cognized; the first a factor, the second a fact; and if this basis be timely and well taken, it would appear that there should be but little diversity in the ultimate well understood though even vaguely expressed, a condition as yet to be tolerated.

Of the many phases of the subject to be considered, and the one apparently the most interesting yet least understood is matter and mind, upon which all hav ventured to think their best thoughts, and hav the right to claim the best of others; and should I be able to make the subject as clear to others as I fancy it is to me, then by reflection shall we be able to determin and relegate the many varied factors and facts that make up the universe of matter and motion to normal conditions in the same.

Brevity, then, compels me to say that animated man, as an organized being, is a conceded truth; that the materials of such an organization are taken from his surroundings is evidenced by growth, decay, and chemical analysis; that this aggregation of matter has been built up by matter, activ, moving, or doing, no one can rationally deny. That the brain is part and parcel with other components is clearly self-evident, and that there was a time when this organization did not exist we are forced to admit, but to deny the eternity of the material would be to deny the plainest philosophical fact.

Now the very term "organize" implies motion, and if this be only "the relativ change of matter," it can not be material considered separate from matter. It does not occupy space, nor can it be appreciated by any or all of our special senses. Then if be not an entity, why longer hesitate to call it "nonentity?"

Surely we can not conceive of any motion independent of matter, or that any formation or change can take place without a material; nor yet that any force (action) can transpire in the absence of a factor. Our inability to describe minutely all the varied series and combinations in all the varying forms and their components is certainly no valid argument against a self-evident factor and its facts.

One great trouble in understanding this problem appears to be, we hav been taught to call hundreds of non-entities factors, and traveled on the old tread-wheel so long that it has become next to impossible to think without a legion of ghosts. Now, to think is a fact, and all facts are the results of factors, and facts in and of themselvs are not truths, but merely the evidence of truths, because they are truthful or according to truth. When we relegate thought to brain, we admit that brain thinks and that there can be no thought without brain; that the brain to think must act, and this we call mental action, and we are therefore forced to admit that such act takes place only withing the cranium, and never gets without, yet the organs of speech may enunciate, and signs may convey to other brains, through the organs of sense and other substances, that certain motions, we call mental, did take place in the brain. That the brain learns to think and the limbs are taught to walk, are evidently facts, being the acts of factors, and that thought or thinking is no more a substance than the walk or walking; abstract thought then is evidently not material, nor is it even a property of matter, but may be termed a phase. We should hardly consent to call two thoughts mind, but the comparison of these we do call reason or mind, and that all these changes are only the diversified acts of brain fiber, I can no longer doubt, or that these acts are any more or less than the diversified changes of matter it would seem unphilosophic to affirm.

Forced then to admit the classification of factor and fact, we are forced also to admit that no two factors or facts are identically the same, either in time or space, and further if there be a law of acts, and this "the accustomed action of matter" then must it change with the changes of matter, and as these changes are only similarity in diversity, we hav no further use for the term immutability, while every motion in the past has ceased with the act, as evidenced by the non-existence of all motions that hav ever been made, and the inevitable conclusion that all acts of the present and future will like ghosts, find the same unoccupied nonentity. Thus we relegate all life (vital action,) to the same silent tomb to which pass all forms save the molecular, beyond the grace of existence or the possibility of a fancied resurrection, while matter eternally is.

The sooner this subject is placed beyond the reach of mythological travesty the sooner will truth be recognized as the absolute, with reason in unity. So let the work go on; destroy the bad, but save the true. ABRAM BRONSON.

Nordhoff, Cal., Nov. 4, 1880.

A New Society.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A society has started in the seventh assembly district in this city, having for its aim the partial enfranchisement of women, based upon an educational qualification. The committee rooms are at No. 24 Clinton place (Mrs. Burnz' School of Phonography), and a general meeting was held on Saturday evening, Oct. 30th, at Cooper Institute, in room 24.

At this meeting Mrs. Burnz urged, as a spelling reformer, that were our orthography made sensible, an educational qualification based upon the ability to read and write would amount to practically no distinction.

Here is a two-edged sword, wielded by a blind justice. Would an educational suffrage, based upon the ability to read, when reading could be learned by merely learning the alphabet, accomplish the ends for which educational qualification are instituted?

Not at all. You might as well make the ability to plan and fit a garment a qualification, for it requires fully as much exercise of the mental powers to do the one as the other. While, as our spelling now stands, the ability to read and write means much, it means months and years of soul harrowing difficulty, days of failure, and nights of toil. A child or uneducated adult can be taught mathematics from once one is one up to and through its commercial and mensural applications, in less time than they can learn to read. I tell you an educational qualification based on the ability to read, to "read with some degree of facility," means under the present circumstances a great deal.

But the sword is cutting frightfully on the other side. What a terrible distortion of the thinking faculties is to be perpetrated here in order that rational men and women may cast their votes for candidates they know no more about than they do why t h o u g h represents a word of two elements. It is curious that Mrs. Burnz, as a spelling reformer, should not bend her energies to the institution of spelling reform as prior requisit to educational qualification. She would hardly assert boldly that the country would gain anything by imposing a distortion of the people's minds as a requisite to suffrage, and yet she would hav women learn to read before allowing them to vote, although to read requires no logical development, but the reverse—a blunting of logical powers through years of irrational study.

I do not wish to discuss the general folly of educational suffrage, but would suggest that if it is to be based on the ability to read newspaper lies in illogical spelling after years of toil, you had better, by far, let poor souls vote by pure instinct, and spend their spare time in washing and dressing and filling their stomachs. If their ambition is to be appeased on the attainment of reading and writing, they would vote as well without the qualification.

GATHERN O'MOSS.

The Creed of the Middle Ages.

The earth is a flat expanse, Europe, Asia, and Africa comprising the land, all the rest water—Oceanica, Australia, and America with their inhabitants as yet unknown—this narrow flat earth stationary in central space, the sun, the moon, and stars rolling round it. Above the solid firmament is heaven, full of angels, the visible residence and court of God, conceived under the imagery and elaborate etiquette of an oriental monarch. Underneath is a huge, hollow region of gloom and fire, the penal prison of the devil and his demons. The entire interest of the drama of the universe centers in and circles round the human race, who, with the angels and demons, are the only intelligent creatures in being. The whole human race, descended from Adam, who lived five thousand years before, are, in consequence of his fall in the Garden of Eden, the bond slaves of the devil and the victims of endless punishment in hell. Christ, one of the persons of the triune Godhead, was born as a man, suffered crucifixion, and founded a church, to cancel that fatal debt, ransom the souls of men, and secure heaven for them. The Bible, a mysterious book dictated by the spirit of God, containing an infallible record of what is most important in this scheme of salvation, is withheld from the laity, but intrusted to the church, because the church has an exclusiv supernatural commission to teach the true meaning of its contents. The actual power or seal of salvation is made available to believers only through the sacraments of the church—confession, baptism, masses, and penance—legally administered by her accredited representativs. Those who humbly believe and observe these doctrins shall be saved; all others are lost forever. For Christ is to reappear in the last day, raise the dead, sit in judgment, separate the sheep and the goats, burn the world, and return to heaven with his elect, while the reprobates are abandoned to torment without end and without hope.—Rev. W. R. Alger, at the Free Religious Association, 1877.

Most of our readers hav outgrown this creed so completely that it will, perhaps, require an effort on their part to believe that such ideas could ever hav got "board and lodging" among two legged rational creatures. Such preposterous beliefs seem so far off that they carry us back to the age of the Megatherium, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that they are still alive and in activ operation. They are embodied in brick and metal, and may be looked on any day in the R C. and Anglican cathedrals, in the M. M. Metropolitan, and in all our churches down to the modest tabernacle and the shanty of the Bible Christians. It is fortunate for humanity that in the bushel of falsehood there are a few precious grains of truth, and there will yet in the fulness of time and under the "skyey' influences," as friend Carlyle has it, overshadow the earth, and bless every son of man. ## A Clerical Ass.

Jesus Christ's Methodist representativ at Pawlet, Vt., who is noted for his ability to read old sermons in an eloquent and impressiv style, has been making himself ridiculous for some time. A Spiritual convention was held in the town, the clergy being challenged to meet the speakers in debate. But those chicken-hearted men of God were afraid to meet them. After they were gone this clerical parrot happened to come across an old sermon against Spiritualism. This he read to his flock, and had it printed in a newspaper. It was a weak production, full of flaws, as all the attempts of the ministers to explain Spiritualism are. It of course made an impression upon the audience, as they were much opposed to Spiritualism. Soon after the statement was made in the paper that the sermon was second hand, whereupon he got right gloriously mad, wrote the editor a letter, and threatened to sue him for libel. The editor printed his letter and a reply to it in which he called the beast of pray an ass, which animal he does resemble very much, the only difference being that one prays, while the other brays; one is all mouth and little ears, while the other is all ears and little mouth.

When a servant girl leaves his family, and he has to go to the trouble of hunting up another, he circulates a story around to injure her character. He has been known to read other people's letters, and lie about them also. But such little things don't hurt his reputation any. His love for Jesus is only exceeded by his affection for his sister-in-law, who objected to his occupying the same bed with her. Jesus Christ had an ass of his own to ride around with, but there is a mortgage on his agent's horse and wagon. This man of God has made himself so ridiculous that in order to keep from starving he has to teach a select school. He said he would read whatever the scholars wrote to each other whenever he got hold of it. He has a lady assistant. A girl wrote on a slate, "Our teacher does not look as though she wore stays." This the clerical ass read aloud to the school. He still continues to shout gospel to a portion of his former congregation, and will doubtless continue to do so as long as he can get his cash for it. "Money makes the mare go," and money makes the minister go, and as soon as he gets a call where he can get more pay he will go. ***

WHEN on the higher levels of life we can remember the lower levels; but when on the lower we cannot remember the higher.

Romulus was nursed by a wolf. It is quite likely many other fables have grown in a similar way.

A piece of wall was pointed out to me which was laid in the time of the early kings of Rome, fully seven hundred years before the Christian era. Other walls were also shown which were laid before cement and mortar were known among the Romans. The stones are about two feet across, and were so accurately jointed that the joints scarcely show now, and the walls still lie solid and strong.

The orators Hortensius, Cataline, Cicero, and his bitter enemy the tribune Clodius, and other celebrated men of the republican period, had residences here. Augustus was born on the Palatine, and after the battle of Actium he transferred his residence to the ancient seat of the kings. His place was on the southern portion of the hill now occupied by an extensive nunnery; and adjoining it were a large temple of Apollo, erected by him, and the Greek and Latin library, so highly extolled in Roman literature. The Emperor Tiberius also had his palace here, and extended the Domus Tiberiana to the Velabrium; and the vain Caligula, who pretended to be the son of the gods, and consequently should not mix with the people, later built an expensive bridge (some of the remains of which I saw) from his palace to the capitol so he could pass to the capitol without going among the people. It must have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars and was made to humor the false whims and pretensions of a vain, unprincipled man. Vespasian had his palace also on the Palatine, and it was greatly enlarged and enriched by his son Domitian, who made the Domus Flavia, probably one of the finest edifices ever built. Portions of the mosaic floors, the frescoes of the walls, and the columns in the adjoining temples, the nymphæum and bathing rooms, the banqueting hall, and all were of the most sumptuous character. I descended into what seemed like subterranean rooms and beheld there fine arches, mosaics, and some ancient frescoes, some of the latter of which are claimed to be 150 years older than the Christian era. The palace of Domitian was lined with costly polished marble of many kinds, but all this was taken by the Christians to help construct the rich cathedral of St. Peter at the Vatican. The site of the Laraium, or the temple to the household Roman gods, called the Lares, was also pointed out. Also the Ogorium, which was the abode of the Ogre which the ancient Romans used to consult regarding future events, the result of approaching battles, and things of that character. Of course the answers of the Roman ogres, like the Greek oracles, were given in such a vague, non-committal sort of way that let the result turn out as it might the prediction could not be said to be false.

I might add to what I said of entering the rooms below the surface into the three chambers, that in the first chamber is a sculptural representation of Io guarded by Argus in the employment of Juno, with Mercury approaching in the interest of Jupiter, who after putting Argus to sleep by enchanting music and getting all his hundred eyes closed, cut off his head and set Io at liberty. On the wall opposite the entrance are Polyphemus and Galatea. The central pictures represent large windows whence a view of the mythological scene is obtained. There are two small pictures representing the sacrificial scenes. The walls of another room are adorned with magnificent garlands, from which masks and other Bacchanalian objects depend from the columns; the walls of the third room are divided into sections edged with red and green, above which are light arabesques between winged figures on a white ground. Street scenes are represented on the walls. The mural paintings are counted very good. On the entrance-wall are two glass vases with fruit; on the right the attributes of Diana—a large indented crown, a stag's and wild boar's heads. On one of the walls are large leaden pipes for conveying water, on which are inscriptions which have aided in determining the history of the establishment.

On the south portion of the hall are the ruins of the palaces built by the Emperor Septimius Severus, including the Stadium which separated his buildings from the older palace of Augustus. The stadium was a kind of ampitheater where horse-racing and gladitorial sports were once practiced. It was a magnificent place, and the decorations on the private box or room of the emperor are still visible. The length of the stadium is 625 feet. The structure is thought to date from the time of Domitian. The whole of this plateau was once inclosed in a colonnade consisting of pillars of masonry encrusted with marble with half columns in front of them. In the center the colonnade was adjoined by three chambers of the time of Hadrian, covered by the imposing apse of a later edifice. Traces of mural paintings and mosaic pavements are still to be seen.

The ruins of the Pedagogium or school for the imperial slaves are worthy of mention. It is creditable to the Roman history of slavery that a good education was given to the slaves, and in this respect it was far superior to the slavery enforced by Christians. A portion of the marble column in this apartment called the Pedagogium is still in existence. The walls are covered with writings executed by a stylus, which in ancient times was used instead of the pen. These writings consist of names, sentences, and sketches, similar to what mischievous boys will execute in our own time. A caricature of Jesus on the cross was among the sketches, now in the Museo Kircheriano, found here. On one of the walls is a sketch of a mill driven by an ass, also the figure of a Roman soldier. Not far from here is a grotto, supposed to be the Lupercat in which the she-wolf is said to have sought refuge when driven from the twins when sought by the shepherds.

On the northern part of the hill contiguous to the palace of Caligula are, as the guide asserted, one hundred and fifty subterranean passages. Where they all lead to I will not attempt to say. That the plans and conspiracies of some of the emperors demanded secret avenues there is little doubt.

From the central projection of Domitian's palace a view is obtained in a straight direction of the scanty remains of the temple of Jupiter Stator, the foundation of which, tradition says, was laid by Romulus himself. Remains of a substructure of blocks of tufa stone (which bear Greek names) doubtless belong to an ante-Neroian restoration of the temple, recently brought to light; and not far distant in the foreground, near the inscription "Roma Quadrato," are the remains of what is thought to be the wall of a most ancient city, constructed of regularly hewn blocks of tufa.

In the third apartment of the Basilica was where the emperor Domitian pronounced his judicial decisions. The semicircular tribune was separated from the space allotted to the litigants by a marble screen, a fragment of which still remains. This place was flanked by a narrow colonnade, traces of which still remain. But I must omit much.

The place was pointed out to me in one of the passages connected with the palace of Caligula where that emperor was assassinated, and also the place where Claudius hid behind a screen or curtain, and, when found, pleaded for his life, expecting it would be taken, but in place of which, to his great surprise, he was elected to be emperor. He was a weak man, but he completed the system of aqueducts which Caligula had commenced.

From the Palatine was pointed out the Tarpeian rock from whence condemned criminals were hurled to be dashed to pieces. It was said once to be nearly three hundred feet in hight, but if that is so it has strangely become very much lower, for it is now only about forty feet in hight.

Another temple of Vesta on the west of the Palatine erected by Numa Pompilius, a round edifice, was also pointed out, and on the top of it another story has been built and used as a Christian chapel, as many others have been treated. It was the custom in pagan times for mothers on every Thursday morning to take their children to the temple of Vesta, the goddess of purity, especially when they were in ill health, and implore that good goddess in their behalf; and so, since the Christians have appropriated it to their use, they avail themselves of the traditions and ceremonies of their predecessors, so popular with the people, and continue this custom of taking children every Thursday morning to the same temple and imploring the Virgin in their behalf. When children have been vaccinated, and while under the operation of the virus, they are every Thursday morning taken to this old temple, whereby it is believed they will meet with a favorable result from the action of the virus. This is only a single instance where Christian ceremonies and traditions have grown out of pagan ceremonies and traditions. The aphorism will bear the closest scrutiny that there is nothing new in Christianity. All, all has been borrowed from paganism.

The little museum on the Palatine is worth visiting; it contains many statues and antiquities executed in old Roman times, and which have been excavated on the Palatine, while many others have been taken to the Vatican and to the museums in other cities. I saw there the statues or busts of many of the Roman emperors, among whom are Nero, Caligula, the Cæsars, and others. There is also a bust of the wise and good man Seneca, who gave utterance to as excellent morals as any man has ever spoken. I saw there also many of the earthen lamps which were used in olden times, and many other implements and articles.

To Napoleon III. much is due for the information now possessed in relation to the ruins of the Palatine. In 1861 he purchased the grounds from King Francis II. for 250,000 francs, and at a great expense caused the ruins of the imperial palaces here imperfectly described to be systematically excavated under the superintendence of the celebrated architect Pietro Rosa. The Vigna Nussiner was presented to the city by the emperor of Russia in 1857, after he had caused excavations to be made in it for the nine preceding years, and since 1866 important discoveries have been made in the Vigna del Collegio Inglese, which was purchased by Pius IX. Since the annexation of Rome to the kingdom of Italy, and the purchase of the Farnese Gardens by the Italian government in December, 1870, for a sum of 650,000 francs, all these excavations have been intrusted to M. Rosa, who has caused the different parts of the ruins to be connected by paths, thus rendering them conveniently accessible. In many places twenty-five feet of rubbish, debris, and earth have to be removed to even reach the foundations of the old palaces, and under the comparatively late edifices are the foundations of those still older. It seems curious how such an enormous deposit could have taken place on a hill like the Palatine. On the lower grounds of the Forum it is not so singular.

In addition to the nunnery named, there is also on the Palatine hill the monastery of Saint Bonaventura, opposite the arch of Titus. Thus the rule is again verified that all the important places in pagan times are now seized by Christians, and covered with Christian churches and institutions.

Some considerable space on the Palatine is under cultivation as gardens. I saw there thrifty olive trees a hundred years old, famous fig trees, one of which is said to have been planted in the twelfth century, fine orange trees hanging full of oranges not yet fully grown, beautiful European cypress trees, which in shape resemble the yew tree, only of a larger size, also the beautiful accacias. Among other vegetable curiosities I saw some eight plants of the aloe, or night-blooming cereus, commonly known as the century plant, which blossomed this season, the flower stalks and the flower clusters still remaining. It is a singular plant, that exists one hundred years before it blossoms, and on the hundredth year, in May, the flower stalk shoots up suddenly and grows to the hight of thirty feet or more in about three weeks, and blossoms at night, yielding a most agreeable odor. The flower stalk is fully six inches through at the base. The effort of the plant made in flowering exhausts it to such extent that it takes it two or three years to recover. In America this plant is so rare that its flowering is a great curiosity, and people have traveled hundreds of miles and paid an admission fee to see it, but in this part of Italy the plant is so common, and the flowering of some among them is so frequent, that it is considered no curiosity at all.

THE COLISEUM.

Prominent among the ruins of ancient Rome is this largest place of amusement in the world, and the one built the strongest and at the greatest expense. Perhaps no more imposing edifice has ever been erected. On its completion it was inaugurated by gladiatorial combats continued one hundred days, in which five thousand wild beasts were slain, and naval combats represented. Eighty-seven thousand spectators could be accommodated at one time within its walls. Having been injured by fire in the reign of Macrinus it was restored by Alexander Severus. In 248 the Emperor Philip here celebrated the thousandth anniversary of the foundation of Rome with magnificent games. In the year 405 gladiatorial combats were abolished by Honorius as inconsistent with the advanced taste and civilization of the period, but wild beast fights continued down to the time of Theodoric the Great. In the middle ages the Coliseum was employed by the Roman barons as a stronghold. In 1312 the Annibaldi were compelled to surrender it to the Emperor Henry VII., who presented it to the Roman Senate and people. In 1332 the Roman nobility again introduced bull-fights. Soon after this period the destruction of the Coliseum began, and the stupendous pile began to be regarded as an immense stone-quarry from which anybody and everybody could help themselves at their pleasure. In the fifteenth century Pope Paul II. here procured the material to erect the palace of St. Marco, in the Piazza di Venizia. Here also Cardinal Riaro obtained the material for the edifice called the Cancelleria, and Pope Paul III. took the material from the same pile for the Palazzo Farnese. Sixtus V. proposed here a cloth manufactory, and Clement XI. used the building as a storehouse for salt. Benedict XIV. (1740–58) was the first to protect the building from further demolition by consecrating the interior to the passion of Christ, on account of the frequency with which the blood of Christian martyrs was claimed to have been shed there. He caused the erection of small chapels within its walls, where sermons were until quite recently preached by a Capuchin monk. Pius VII. and Leo XII. very commendably prevented the further falling of the walls by the building of huge buttresses. The stairs in the interior were restored by direction of the late Pius IX.

The Coliseum is constructed of blocks of stone called travertine, originally held together by iron cramps, and tufa and bricks were also used in the interior. It is slightly elliptical in form, and is 1728 feet in circumference, or nearly one-third of a mile. The long diameter is 615 feet, and the shorter 510 feet. The area is 279 feet the longer way, 174 feet the shorter way. The hight is 156 feet. Above the arena rise the tiers of seats, intersected by steps and passages, most of which are now in ruins, and only partially accessible. The walls are very thick, and an abundance of room was allowed for passing from part to part of the building, and several places of egress were provided. On the exterior the still preserved northeast portion, on the side next to the Esquiline, consists of four stories, the first three being formed by arches, the pillars of which are adorned with half-columns of Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian order, in the first, second, and third stories respectively. A wall with windows between Corinthian pilasters forms the fourth story. Statues were originally placed in the arcades of the second and third stories, as appears from the representations on ancient coins. At the ends of its diameters are the four triple principal entrances, those next to the Esquiline and the Cælius being designed for the emperor, the others for the solemn procession before the commencement of the games and the introduction of the animals and machinery. On the side next to the Esquiline are still seen traces of the stuccodecorations, which have been once restored, and were used as models by Giovanni da Udine, the pupil of Raphael. The arcades of the lowest story served as entrances for the spectators, and were furnished with numbers up to LXXX. (Nos. XXIII. to LIV. still exist), in order to indicate the stairs to the different seats. Below, on the exterior, are two rows of arcades, and then a massive superstructure for the seats. Every fourth arch contained a flight of stairs.

A part of the tiers or seats is still distinguishable, the foremost of which, called the Podium, was destined for the emperor, the senators, and the vestal virgins. The emperor occupied a raised seat, and the others had seats of honor. Above the Podium rose three other classes of seats, the first of which was allotted to the knights. The humbler citizens occupied the last division in a colonnade, on the roof of which were stationed sailors of the imperial fleet for the purpose of stretching sail cloth over the amphitheater in order to exclude the scorching rays of the sun, for the exhibitions were conducted by day as well as by night. Apparatuses are still seen in the external coping, with corbels below them, for the support of the masts, to which the necessary ropes were attached. Under the arena were chambers and dens for the wild beasts, and an apparatus by which means it could be laid under water. A part of them have been filled up, and a part still remain.

When the wild beasts were let loose into the arena it was necessary for them to leap twenty feet before they could reach the spectators. The tigers could jump this distance; but, to prevent all danger, a course of rollers were placed before the spectators, and when the tigers or other animals leaped to them and attempted to cling to them the rollers would at once turn and render it impossible for the beasts to maintain their hold.

I saw the place, with windows with bars, where the beasts were let up from the compartments below into the arena. One could not help thinking of the carnage that must have taken place there when five hundred wild beasts were put to death in a single day, and the bloody sport kept up for a hundred days at a time.

The gladiators, or beast-fighters, were of course killed in the conflict. Besides the blood shed in that way, the Christians claim that great numbers of the early believers were made martyrs of by being thrown into the arena to be devoured by the beasts. It is highly probable that their representations are much exaggerated; but if some Christians were cruelly put to death, their successors learned the business of putting people to death for opinion's sake, and most vigorously have they practiced it. For every Christian that the pagans put to death it is probable that the Christians put to death and most cruelly tortured, by the most fiendish devices, ten, twenty, and even fifty or a hundred heretics.

Although only about one-third of the gigantic structure of the Coliseum remains, the ruins are still grandly impressive. An architect of the last century estimated the value of the materials still remaining and intact, and his estimate was 1,500,000 scudi, or nearly $3,000,000. That structure has ever been a symbol of the greatness of Rome, and gave rise in the eighth century to a prophetic saying of the pilgrims of that age:

"While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand;
When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall,
And when Rome falls, with it shall fall the world."

I ascended several flights of pretty long steps, about 150 in all, and, when near the top of the wall, had a fine view of the ruins lying about me, also of the several churches in the vicinity, the Campagna, south of Rome, the ruins of the aqueducts, and also the mountains, twelve miles to the south, over which Hannibal is said to have led his army when he marched upon Rome. The town of Albano, which lies on the hillside, is easily discerned from this place of observation.

A short distance west of the Coliseum is the Triumphal Arch of Constantine, the best preserved of the ancient ruins. It was erected after the victory over Maxentius at Saxa Rubra in 311, when he claimed to have seen the wonderful vision of a cross in the heavens, and for that reason to have embraced Christianity. The arch has three passages, and is adorned with admirable sculptures from a triumphal arch of Trajan, which stood at the entrance of Trajan's Forum, contrasting strongly with the rude additions made by Constantine. The sculptures from the time of Trajan are larger, fuller, and much more artistically executed.

Before the Coliseum was erected, the circus Maximus, west of the Palatine, between that and the Tiber, was in operation some hundreds of years, and for much the same character of sports—gladiatorial contests and fighting with wild beasts. Its first dimensions were capable of holding eighty thousand persons, but it was twice enlarged, so that at last it was capable of accommodating 385,000 people. It was a vast oblong structure, but was probably not so heavily built as the Coliseum, as I think but comparatively few of its ruins remain. It was pointed out to me, but I did not visit it.

The Thermæ of Titus is east of the Coliseum, or rather their ruins are. Mæcenas once possessed a villa there, but it was afterward incorporated with the golden palace of Nero. On the site of the latter, in the year 80, Titus hastily erected his sumptuous Thermæ (baths), which were greatly altered and enlarged by Domitian, Trajan, and others. The ruins oocupy an extensive space, and are scattered over several vineyards. A small part only, excavated in 1813, is accessible.

The earlier structure of Nero is easily distinguished from that of Titus. The long, vaulted, parallel passages first entered belong to the Thermæ. They form together a semicircular sub-structure, the object of which is not clearly ascertained. Most of the chambers beneath were filled up by Titus in the construction of his baths, and, re-excavated at the beginning of the sixteenth century, belonged to the golden palace of Nero. A suite of seven rooms is first entered here. To the left, near that in the center, is the remains of a spring. Traces of beautiful paintings are still observed. Colonnades appear to have flanked both sides of these rooms. A passage leads hence to a bath-room. To the left, at right angles with this suite, are a number of small and unadorned rooms, probably the dwelling of the slaves. To the left again, opposite the first suite, is a passage once lighted from above, the vaulting of which was adorned with beautiful frescoes, still partially visible.

In the plain to the northeast of the Forum of the Republic lie the Fora of the Emperors, which were erected by their founders rather as monuments and ornaments to the city than for political purposes, and were chiefly used for judicial proceedings. The principal edifice in the fora was always a temple. The Forum Julium, the first of the kind, was begun by Cæsar and completed by Augustus. The second was constructed by Augustus. The temple of Peace, of Vespasian, is often mentioned as a third, and another was founded by Domitian; and lastly, the most magnificent of all, the Forum of Trajan. They are enumerated here in their order from the Temple of Peace, which is thought to lie on the site of the Basilica of Constantine, to the Forum of Trajan, as they all adjoined each other within this period.

Adjacent to the temple of Peace lay the Forum founded by Domitian and completed by Nerva, whence called the Forum of Nerva. Here stood a temple of Minerva, taken down by Paul V. in order to obtain marble for the decoration of the Fontana Paolina—another instance of the works of the ancient Romans being destroyed to build up Christian structures.

The Via Bonella is terminated toward the north by an ancient wall with a gateway. In front of the latter to the left are three beautiful and lofty Corinthian columns with entablature, which belonged to one of the sides of the temple of Mars Ultor in the Forum of Augustus. The Forum was enclosed by a lofty wall, of rock of a volcanic nature, a portion of which, about 450 feet in length, is seen near the temple, and particularly at the Arco de Pantani. This wall was adjoined by the back of the temple erected by Augustus in consequence of a vow which he made whilst engaged in war against Cæsar's murderers, and inaugurated by him in the year 2 B.C. The Forum is now occupied by the nunnery of the Annunciation. Between this and the ancient republican Forum lay the Forum of Cæsar, with a temple of Venus Genetrix, scanty remains of which are now only visible. As ascent is made to the left through the Arco de Pantani by the huge wall which now forms part of the nunnery, and a little farther on descend to the left by the Salita del Grillo to the busy Via Campo Carleo, whence immediately to the right the Piazza della Colonna Trajana is entered. The Forum of Augustus was adjoined by the Forum of Trajan, an aggregate of magnificent edifices, designed by architect Apollodorus of Damascus. This was considered the most magnificent of the numerous palatial edifices of Rome. According to the legend of the seventh century, Gregory the Great, while admiring the structure one day, saddened by the thought that so just and benignant a monarch as its founder should be condemned to everlasting perdition, succeeded by his prayers in obtaining the release of Trajan's soul from purgatory. This of course is easily believed by the faithful. In the tenth century this forum lay in ruins, and the church of St. Nicholas was erected near Trajan's column. This was succeeded by other churches. In 1507 Sixtus V. crowned the column with a bronze statue of St. Peter. At length in 1812–14 the French government caused the two nunneries and other buildings to be demolished, and thus partially restored to view the center part of the forum.

The project of effecting an easy communication between the old town and the buildings in the Campus Martius by means of a vast cutting between the Capitol and the Quirinal was at length carried out by Trajan. This passage must have been some six hundred feet in width and still more in length. In the part already excavated (475 by 150 feet) have been discovered the foundations of four rows of columns, belonging to the five-halled Basilica Ulpia, which lies with its sides toward the present piazza. The central hall was eighty-one feet and the whole building 184 feet in width. The pavement consisted of slabs of rare marble. Numerous broken granite columns have been excavated and set up where it was supposed they originally stood. Between this Basilica and the Forum of Augustus lay the Forum of Trajan. A part of the southeast semicircular wall is still seen in the court of No. 6 Via della Saltila del Grillo, two stories in hight. The rooms on the ground floor are thought to have been used for shops. In the center of this Forum stood Trajan's equestrian statue. On the north side of the Basilica rises Trajan's column, the shaft of which is eighty-seven feet high, the whole including pedestal and statue being 147 feet. The diameter is eleven feet at the base, and ten feet at the top. Around the column runs a spiral band three feet wide and 660 feet long, covered with admirable reliefs of scenes from Trajan's war with the Dacians, comprising, besides animals, machines, etc., upward of 2,500 human figures, the hight of those below being two feet, and gradually increasing as they ascend. A copy of this column is in the museum of the Lateran. I saw a copy of it, also, in the South Kensington Museum, London, and I think another in Paris. Beneath this monument Trajan was buried, and on the summit stood his statue, but the Christians could hardly endure such honor to be shown to a good pagan emperor, so they took the statue of Trajan down and put up one of St. Peter in his place, precisely as from the column of Marcus Aurelius—of a very similar character, containing basreliefs referring to his war with the Marcomanni and other German tribes on the Danube, the same consisting of twenty-eight blocks besides the basement and capitol, being altogether 95 feet in hight—the statue of this excellent man who taught better morals and said more good things than all the popes that have filled the pontifical chair was taken down by Pope Sixtus V., and a statue of St. Paul put up in its place. Such conduct shows an amount of meanness sufficient to arouse the indignation of every good man. This column of Marcus Aurelius stands in the Piazza Colonna.

To the Forum of Trajan also belonged a temple dedicated to Trajan by Hadrian, a library, and a triumphal arch of Trajan, all situated on the other side of the column. The reliefs were taken from this arch to decorate the arch of Constantine—still another instance of Christian unfairness. Trajan was a far better man than the murderer Constantine.

To return once more to the Forum of the Republic, let me say the temple of Faustina was converted into a Christian church. On the east side of the Forum, with its front toward the Capitol, is situated the temple of Cæsar, to which Cæsar in addition to the other alterations made by him, transferred the tribune of the orators. This was afterward called the Rostra Julia, and it was from this very place that Mark Antony made his impassioned address in favor of the murdered dictator on the 19th or 20th of March, 44 B. C. A funeral pyre was then hastily improvised, and unto Cæsar was rendered what was considered a great honor, being cremated in view of the most sacred shrines of the gods of Rome. A column with the inscription, "Parenti Patriæ" was afterward erected here to commemorate the event. At a later period Augustus erected this temple in honor of Divus Julius, his deified uncle and adopted father, and dedicated it to him in the year 29 B. C., after the battle of Actium. At the same time he adorned the Rostra with the prows of the captured Egyptian vessels. The foundation of the substructure of the temple, consisting of columns, was discovered in 1872, but their covering of solid stone has been removed. In front of the temple are the remains of a platform still partly paved with slabs of stone, which is believed to have been the Rostra of ancient Rome. Its present form appears to have resulted from subsequent alterations.

I think I have said nothing by way of description of the Triumphal Arch of Titus. It stands on the summit of the Velia, close to the Palatine and southwest of the Forum. It was erected to commemorate the defeat of the Jews at Jerusalem in the year 70, and dedicated to him under his successor Domitian in 81, as the inscription on the side next to the Coliseum records; Senatus populusque Romanus divo Tito divi Vespasiani filio Vespasiano Auguste. The arch is embellished with fine reliefs. On the same side as the inscription is a representation of a sacrificial procession on the frieze. Inside is Titus crowned by Victory in a quadriga driven by Roma; opposite, the triumphal procession with the captive Jews, table with the show-bread, and candlesticks with seven branches. In the middle ages the arch was used as a fortress by the Frangipani, crowned with pinnacles, and strengthened by new walls. When these were removed in 1822 the arch lost its support and had to be reconstructed, as the inscription on the other side informs us.

As the ground descends toward the Coliseum various ruins are passed. On the left is the double apse of the Temple of Venus and Roma, or Templum Urbis, erected by Hadrian in 135, and restored after a fire by Maxentius in 307. This was one of the most superb temples in Rome. The gilded bronze tiles were, Christian-like, taken from this pagan temple and used on St. Peter's by Pope Honorius in 626. There were evidently two temples under the same roof, with entrances from the street next the Coliseum and next the Capitol, and with adjacent cells, so there was a niche on each side of the central wall for the image of a god. One half of this temple is appropriated for Christian use and built into the wall of the monastery of St. Francisca Romana while the other toward the Coliseum is open. The vestibules of the cells had each four columns in front. Around this ran a first colonnade of ten columns at the ends and twenty at the sides (length 360 feet, width 174 feet). This colonnade was inclosed by a second, consisting of about 200 columns, 540 feet long and 330 feet wide, and projecting as far as the street, where it was supported by a massive substructure. To this colonnade belonged the granite shafts scattered about. The cells were incrusted with the rarest marble, which the Christians found very convenient in the construction of their rival temples.

Descending still further toward the Coliseum are observed the remains of an extensive square basis of masonry to the left below. Here once stood the gilded bronze colossal statue of Nero, as god of the sun, surrounded with rays, and about 117 feet in hight, executed by Zenodorus by order of the emperor himself, to grace the golden palace which he erected with lavish splendor after the burning of Rome in 64. The palace fell to decay soon after the emperor's death in 68, and the statue was removed thence by Hadrian to this pedestal. In the space occupied by an artificial lake in the gardens of Nero Vespasian founded the Ampitheater Flavium, which was completed by Titus in the year 80, and since the eighth century has been named, after the colossal statue of Nero, the Coliseum.

It will be impracticable for me to mention all the ruins in the part of the city called Ancient Rome, as I did not see them all, neither would it be necessary. I visited the grounds three different times and freely confess I felt a deep interest in contemplating the race of men, with many errors and faults of course, who once flourished there, but greatly superior in every manly, noble quality to the degenerated and thieving set of beings who succeeded them. Of the remaining "seven hills" of Rome not mentioned it is only necessary to say that the Aventine has become comparatively deserted. It was formerly covered with the temples of Diana (copied from that of Ephesus), Juno, Bona Dea, etc., but now it is principally occupied by convents and vineyards.

The Cœlian hill (Celio) was formerly an oak grove, and has some ancient ruins, but it has two churches—St. Gregory and St. Stefano Rotondo. The Lateran church and palace are also near by.

The Viminal hill is between the Esquiline and the Quirinal, and its name came from the willows (vimini) which grew so abundantly about it. Here were the baths of Diocletian, but now the church of Santa Maria degli Angeli and some other buildings for Christian purposes occupy the ground.

The Esquiline is the locality where Mæcenus had his gardens, and here are the remains of the baths of Titus, on the site of Nero's golden house. A part of it was used for fuel for burning the dead before depositing the ashes in the tombs and catacombs along the Appian Way and elsewhere. Here is the church St. Maria Maggiore. The piazza in front is embellished by a handsome column from the basilica of Constantine, crowned with a bronze figure of the Virgin and placed there by Pope Paul V.

The Quirinal hill is larger than any other of the seven hills of Rome, and continues and extends along the east side of the city for half a mile or more. Here once stood the pagan temple of Quirinus, dedicated to the founder of Rome, but that long since was removed, and the principal edifice there now is the building called the Palace of the Quirinal, built for a summer residence for the popes, but now occupied as the winter residence of King Humbert. I will have more to say of this palace in another letter.

Thus it is seen that the seven hills, which were the seat of the ancient grandeur of Rome, have become greatly deserted, or are taken possession of by the Christians and used as churches and convents. Those hills must indeed have been very populous in the days of Marcus Aurelius, when the inhabitants of Rome reached two million people, and must correspondingly have greatly fallen off in the middle ages, when the population of the city was reduced to twenty thousand. The city now contains three hundred thousand inhabitants, and is growing. The additions being made to it, mostly in the southeast quarter of the city, are in modern style, with handsome buildings, wide streets, etc. It will be decidedly the handsomest quarter of the city.

While the remains of ancient Rome are under consideration, I will mention the Pantheon, standing on the south side of the Piazza del Rotondo, in a northwest direction from the Capitoline Hill. It is the only edifice of ancient Rome which is still in perfect preservation. But this edifice, like all the rest of the same character, has not escaped the rule of Christian vandalism, which has seized and appropriated the temples and structures of the old Romans, converting them into churches. Though the Pantheon is now a Christian church, called the church of Santa Maria Rotonda, it stands much as it was originally constructed. The huge circular structure, with its vast colonnade, still presents a strikingly imposing appearance. The walls are of excellent brick work, and are twenty feet in thickness, and were originally covered with marble and stucco. The ground in the vicinity has been gradually so raised that the floor of the temple, which was once five steps above the ground, is now nearly as much below. The portico, 108 feet in width and 42 feet in depth, consists of sixteen Corinthian columns of granite, thirteen feet in circumference, and thirty-nine feet in hight. The tympanum formerly contained reliefs, and the roof was embellished with statues. Eight of the columns are in front; the others form three colonnades, originally vaulted over, terminating in niches, in which stood colossal statues of Augustus and his son-in-law, M. Agrippa. The latter, according to the ancient inscription on the frieze—"M. Agrippa L. F. Cos. tertium fecit"—caused the edifice to be erected about twenty-seven years before the Christian era. The central colonnade leads to the entrance, with its ancient, very large and heavy door strongly secured by bronze plates. The interior, which is lighted by a single circular apperture at the center of the dome, some twelve or fifteen feet in diameter, produces such a beatiful effect that it was currently believed at an early period that the temple derived its name of Pantheon from its resemblance to the vault of heaven. The hight and diameter of the dome are equal, each being 140 feet. The surface of the walls is broken by seven large niches, in which once stood the statues of the gods, among which were Mars, Venus, and Cæsar. The architrave is supported by fluted columns of giallo antico, or pavonazzetto in couples, the shafts being twenty-six feet in hight. Above the latter, and corresponding with the niches, formerly rose a series of round arches, borne by caryatides, but they were removed by the Christian modifiers. The coffered ceiling of the vault, which consists of concrete, was decorated with gold leaf, and the whole roof was covered with gilded bronze tiles, which the Christian emperor Constans II. caused to be removed to Constantinople in 665. It seems the edifice was restored by Domitian, Trajan, Septimius Severus, and Caracalla. The names of the last two are recorded by an inscription on the architrave of the portico.

The Pantheon was consecrated as a Christian church by Pope Boniface IV. in 610, and in consideration of this the festival of All Saints was instituted. The same pope removed from the portico the brazen tubes on which the roof rested, and caused them to be converted into columns for the canopy of the high altar, and cannons for the defense of the castle of St. Angelo. This vandalism justly gave rise to the complaint of Pasquin. "Quod non fecerunt barbari, fecerunt Barberini." While I viewed the grand old temple I could not restrain the wish that the Christian vandals had been generous enough to have left this one ancient structure in the condition in which it was erected and not have desecrated it with the symbols and paraphernalia of their mongrel, counterfeit religion. They at least might have left one solitary place unpolluted by their hands; but I am grateful that they did not utterly demolish this landmark of a former era, and have allowed us to look upon something that was constructed for the purposes of another religion which existed long before theirs was devised and made up from the pre-existing systems.

In the Pantheon lie the remains of the great painter Raphael. His tomb is at the third altar; he was born in 1483 and died 1520, not yet forty years of age. On the wall is engraved an epigram, and also a lengthy inscription, announcing that Raphael's remains were placed in a new sarcophagus in 1833. The Pantheon is also the last resting place of Caracci, Zucchero, Peruzzi, Perino del Vaga, Giovanni da Udine, and other celebrated artists.

A visit to the Pantheon by moonlight is said to be most delightful, affording a magnificent view, but the moon has an engagement just now, giving her evening light in some other quarter of the globe.

At the back of the Pantheon are situated the ruins of the Thermæ of Agrippa, the proximity of which to the Pantheon once gave rise to the absurd conjecture that the temple originally belonged to the baths and was afterwards converted into a temple.

A little way southeast of the Pantheon is the very fine church of St. Maria sopra Minerva, erected on the ruins of a temple of Minerva founded by Domitian, the only Gothic church in Rome. It was begun in the latter part of the thirteenth century, and was restored in 1846–1855, and contains many valuable works of ark, and the tombs of many distinguished persons. The whole interior of this large church is lined with polished marble and decorated with showy chandeliers of ornamental glass. The floor, as is the case with nearly all the floors of the churches, is of fine marble laid in mosaics and ornamental figures. Among the valued works of art is a Christ with his cross by Angelo and a painting or two by Raphael. The church is rich with fine paintings and statues.

What was once the Stadium or circus of Domitian is now the Piazza Navona, the largest in Rome save that of St. Peter. It is embellished with three fountains, the largest in the center. At the corners of a lofty mass of rock, the different parts of which represent the four quarters of the globe, are placed the gods of the four largest rivers, the Danube, Ganges, Nile, and Rio de la Plata. The whole is surmounted by an obelisk which was formerly in the circus of Maxentius, and was originally erected in honor of Domitian. One of the other fountains is adorned with masks, Tritons, and the statue of a Moor. This use of the former Stadium of Domitian is commendable, but the Christians have three churches standing upon its borders, the church of St. Agnes, St. Maria del Anima, and the church of St. Maria della Pace.

While having the ruins of ancient Rome under consideration, it will be quite proper for me to say something of the Appian Way (Via Appia). It is the celebrated military road constructed by the Censor Appius Claudius Cæcus, 312 years before the Christian era. It was first constructed to Capua, and afterward extended to Beneventum and Brundisium. The parts nearest the city were excavated in 1850–53, and it well deserves its title, "Queen of Roads." It probably affords the finest of all the excursions in the Campagna, being lined for many miles with the ruins of ancient tombs and villas, and running near the ruins of the Claudian and other aqueducts, of which history has so much to say. It leads directly to the Alban mountains, twelve miles south of the city, and affords most attractive views of those regions and the town of Albano and other villages. On one pleasant afternoon I chartered a carriage and rode out some seven miles on this famous road. The blocks of basalt with which the road was originally paved are still in many places intact, though, of course, somewhat worn. It may be said to begin at the Arch of Constantine, between the Palatine and Cælius, and follows a direct southerly course. Near the Via de Porta was anciently situated the Porta Capina, or Capuan Gate, whence the Appian Way issued.

The first ruins worthy of notice are the Thermæ of Caracalla. They were begun by Caracalla in 312, extended by Heliogabalus, and completed by Alex. Severus, and were capable of accommodating 1,600 bathers at one time. The magnificence of the establishment was unparalleled. Numerous statues, including the Farnese Bull, Hercules, and Flora at Naples, mosaics, etc., have been found there; and bare as the walls now are, and notwithstanding the destruction of the roof, they still afford a reminiscence of the technical perfection of the structure. It was quadrangular in form surrounded by a wall, and had its porticoes, race-course, etc.; length 720 feet; width, 372 feet; total area of grounds, 1,080 feet each way. There was a great number of chambers in the establishment, which it is difficult to now clearly define as to their uses.

A spacious oblong room is first entered, once surrounded by columns and containing scanty remains of mosaic pavement. Keeping to the left, a large saloon is entered, which seems to have been the Calidarium, or hot air bath, something like our modern Turkish baths. By the last pillar on the right is a new stair, ascending ninety-eight steps to the roof, a magnificent view of the Campagna and of ancient Rome is obtained. From the Calidarium a second peristyle is entered corresponding to the former, and also containing remains of mosaic pavement. Next is traversed the semicircular Exedra to the Tepidarium, or warm bath, situated in the center, next to the Calidarium. To the left is the Frigidarium, or cold bath, a large round space, the vaulting of which has fallen in. A stadium, or circus, also adjoined the establishment. Many ruins of the property are scattered over the premises, and many fragments of architecture and sculpture are preserved, including a head of Marsyas, a head of Apollo, and a torso of Cupid. Two Christian churches and a monastery in the vicinity are probably sufficient to make the old bathing place as holy as there is any need for. One of the churches is St. Giovanni (the Italian way of spelling John) in Oleo, from the legend that St. John was thrown into a caldron of boiling oil at this spot, but having come out unhurt, was set at liberty.

In a vineyard near by is a columbarium in a good state of preservation thought to date from the imperial period. There were tombs capable of containing a great number of cinerary urns, or the ashes of many bodies which had been cremated. They were generally constructed by several persons in common, or as a matter of speculation, and each recess could be purchased or inherited. The names of the deceased are inscribed over the niches on the marble tablets, on which their mode of acquisition of the spot and other remarks were also occasionally recorded. Each niche contained two, or more rarely four ollae, or cinerary urns, and was closed by a slab. The nature of the decorations depended upon the means and taste of the family. The larger building contains six hundred cinerary urns. The third, discovered in 1853, consists of three vaulted passages, into the niches of which are built ædiculæ and small sarcophagus-like monuments. The adjoining dark passages were used for the interment of slaves. The columbarium, containing interesting decorations in stucco and colors, is the so-called tomb of the freedmen of Octavia. A stair, partly modern, descends to a niche decorated with plaster, below which is a cinerary urn with shells and mosaic. The tomb is vaulted; on the right is an apse with painted vine wreaths and victories. Here and along the wall are several ædiculæ, or cinerary urns, in the form of temples, with inscriptions and figures. The ancient Romans certainly exhibited a great degree of good taste in the manner in which they preserved the remains of departed friends.

Near by is the celebrated tomb of the Scipios, discovered in 1780, but now containing a model only of the ancient sarcophagus of peperine stone which Pope Pius VII. caused to be moved to the museum of the Vatican. This sarcophagus once contained the remains of L. Cornelius Scipio Barbatus, consul of Rome, three hundred years before the Christian era, the eldest member of family buried here. The bones of the hero, which were found in good preservation, were interred at Padua by Quirini, a Venetian, in order to withdraw from them the gaze of the curious. Here, too, were interred the son of the latter consul in 258 B. C., many of the younger Scipios, the poet Ennius, and several members of other families and freedmen. The tomb was originally above the surface of the earth, with a lofty threshold. The interior was supported by walls hewn in the solid tufa rock. It was probably injured or at least altered during the imperial age, when freedmen were interred here.

About one and a quarter miles from the arch of Constantine is the Arch of Drusus, a sadly-mutilated monument, probably the one that was erected in honor of Claudius Drusus Germanicus eight years before our era. It is constructed of travertine blocks, partly covered with marble, and still possesses two marble columns. It terminated in a pediment, until Caracalla constructed over it an aqueduct to supply his baths with water, the brick remains of which seriously mar the effect.

Near the brook Almo ruins of tombs are on both sides. Further on are met the baths of Aqua Santa and the so-called ruins of Roma Vecchia. Still further on and east of the road lies the circus of Maxentius, constructed in 311, and now sufficiently excavated to show the arrangement of the structure which was destined for chariot races. Length, 1,590 feet; breadth, 258 feet. Facing the Appian Way was once an extensive colonnade, and behind it a grand entrance, with another opposite to it in the semicircle which terminated the building. At the sides were other gates, of which the first on the right is supposed to be the Porta Libitina, by which the dead were carried out. On each side of the first-mentioned main entrance were the carceres, or barriers. The chariots starting hence had seven times to perform the circuit of the course, which was formed by the seats of the spectators and the spina, a wall erected longitudinally in the center of the arena and embellished with statues and obelisks. At the end of this wall stood the metae or goals. The spina was placed somewhat obliquely for the purpose of equalizing the distance as much as possible to those starting in different positions, and for the same reasons the carceres are in a curved line. The spectators sat on the surrounding tiers of steps, on which 18,000 persons could be accommodated. Pottery was used in the formation of the seats.

The ruins of a circular building near the circus on the Appian Way are supposed to be those of a temple of Romulus, the son of Maxentius, who died at an early age, and in whose honor it is also thought it may have been constructed.

In a short distance from this temple the tomb of Cœcilia Metella is reached, which forms so conspicuous an object in the views of Rome and the Campagna. It is a circular structure, sixty-five feet in diameter, on a square pedestal, both of which were originally covered with travertine. The frieze which runs round the building is adorned with wreath of flowers and skulls of oxen from which last the tomb is sometimes called Capo di Bove. On a marble tablet is inscribed, Cœciliae Q. Cretici Filiae Metellae Crassi, that is to the manes of the daughter of Metellus Creticus, wife of the triumvir Crassus. The interior, now almost entirely filled up, contained the tomb-chamber of the deceased. In the thirteenth century the Gaetani converted the edifice into the tower of a stronghold and furnished it with pinnacles. To this extensive castle, which subsequently passed through various hands, and was destroyed under Pope Sixtus V., belong the picturesque ruin of a palace adjacent to the tower, and a church, of course, opposite.

As far as this neighborhood extends a lava-stream which once descended from the Alban mountains yielded paving material for this ancient road. From the tomb just alluded to the Via Appia becomes more interesting. The ancient pavement is visible most of the way; the road is skirted on both sides by continuous rows of ruined tombs, and the view becomes more extensive at every step. On the left is seen the adjacent arches of the Aqua Marcia and the Aqua Claudia. The houses of over two miles from the city gate the entrance is attained to the excavated part of the Appian Way, flanked from this point by a constant succession of tombs. Many of these contain interesting ancient reliefs, inscriptions, and broken sculptures. The scenery continues to be strikingly beautiful. On the left, a mile or more from the entrance, is a casale built within the walls of an ancient church and called San Maria Nuovo. Beyond it lie the extensive ruins named Roma Vecchia, which appear to have belonged to a spacious villa of the Quintilli: several of the chambers were employed as baths.

A large tomb on the left, the site of which is now occupied by a small farm, three-fourths of a mile from the last named is the Casale Rotondo. It lies at the sixth mile stone, and is said to have been erected for Messala Corvinus, a statesman and poet of considerable reputation under Augustus. I went upon this eminence and obtained a commanding view of the surrounding country, including the mountains and villages to the south. The Casale I must say does not present a very neat appearance. A ragamuffin of a boy was trying to drive a hog from one apartment to another, in the basement of the old castle, and I thought the two stood about on an equality; the hog was as clean as the lad, and everything around was about as untidy as could well be imagined. I am very sure the present occupants of the premises do not equal the statesman and poet for whom they were prepared.

The relics of antiquity, from this point, continue less frequently. The broken statues and portions of carved architectural work are met less often by the roadside. The villa of the wise and great Seneca was on the Appian Way, where Nero caused his death, but it is not known with certainty at what point it was. He had reached the age of over one hundred years, and when Nero ordered his death he opened his veins in a warm bath and died very easily. Few men have lived who uttered better and wiser moral precepts.

Via Appia Nuovo and Via Latina, which are roads that diverge from the Via Appia, have also the remains of many tombs, but as I thought I had seen quite enough in that line, I did not care to extend my trip over them. In fact there was not time for it on that arternoon.

THE CAMPAGNA.

Let me say here a few words about the Campagna of Rome. It is a large, uneven plain, in the center of which the city is located, and extends on the north to the Ciminian forest, fifteen or twenty miles away; on the east to the Apennine chain of the Sabine mountains, sixteen miles distant; on the south twelve miles to the volcanic mountains of Alban; and on the west to the sea, which is distant thirty miles or more. The mountains make a most interesting outline or border to this plain, but it is far from being such a productive country in an agricultural point of view as it ought to be. It was once covered by the sea, and owes its origin to powerful volcanic agencies; lava and peperine are of frequent occurrence, and the red volcanic tufa is seen everywhere. A great number of ancient craters are distinguished, the most important of which are the lakes of the Alban mountains, the lake of Bracciano, the lake of Vico in the Ciminian forest, and the crater of Baccano. The historical associations connected with the plain, however, are of still higher interest than its natural features. The narrow strip of land which stretches between the Alban mountains and the sea is the Latinum of antiquity, which victoriously asserted its superiority over the Etruscans on the north, the Sabines on the east, and the Volscians on the south, and which subsequently effected the union of the Italian peninsula, and finally acquired supremacy over the whole world. Once a densely peopled land, with numerous prosperous towns, it is now a vast and dreary waste, of which barely one-tenth part is furrowed by the plowshare. In May, when the malaria begins to prevail, herdsmen and cattle retire to the mountains, while the few individuals who are compelled to remain behind are rendered miserable by continual attacks of fever. The cause of the change dates from so remote a period as the last centuries of the republic, when the independent agricultural population was gradually displaced by proprietors of large estates and pastures. This system, as it always must, inevitably entailed the ruin of the country, for a dense population and a high degree of culture can alone avert the malaria which is produced by defective drainage and the evaporation of stagnant water in the undulating and furrowed volcanic soil. In the middle ages the evil increased. The papal government has been inadequate to revive the agriculture of the great waste. Its attempts have been and must be abortive so long as such a large body of land is owned by a few persons and is pastured on a large scale in preference to other tillage. An active revolution in the present system, energetically and comprehensively carried out, will alone avail to restore the prosperity of the land. About one-half of this territory belongs to the church or to ecclesiastical corporations, one-third to the nobility, and the remaining one-sixth part to small proprietors. These large estates are usually let by mercanti di Campagni, or contractors on a large scale, of whom there are not more than forty altogether, on leases of three years by the ecclesiastical bodies, and of nine years or more by the lay proprietors. These contractors intrust the management of the land to a fattore, or baliff, who resides at the tenuta, or casale, as the farmhouse is called. The system of tillage and the farming implements employed are of a very imperfect character. From the number of stacks of hay I saw in various directions I judge a considerable share of the Campagna is mown and afterward pastured. I saw but little evidence of grain being raised, and vineyards are scarce. The soil in some places is undoubtedly poor, but the larger share, with proper tillage, is capable of producing good crops.

TIVOLI.

Before leaving the subject of the ancient ruins of this country I must give you a brief account of my visit to Tivoli, a town of seven thousand inhabitants on the lower part of the Sabine mountains, sixteen miles east of the city. One day was spent in this excursion, and not a few ruins were overhauled. A railroad of a somewhat peculiar character runs from the city to Tivoli, and was, I think, constructed with less expense for grading than any railroad of the same length I ever saw. It runs close by the side of the old road of the Roman empire used two thousand years ago. The earth seems to have been leveled sufficiently to lay the track, and no grading was done on account of the uneven surface of the ground, and no fence divides the railroad from the old road. It is a series of uphills and downhills all the ways, the grade often being 200 feet to the mile. Rising the heavy grades the engine would puff, and "stick in its toecorks" and thus just effect the ascent and then go down the other side fast enough to make it up. Tivoli must be 400 feet above the plain, and the engine makes that ascent within a distance of two miles. But little freight, however, is conveyed over this short road; it is principally for passengers, and they in limited numbers.

The ride out through the Campagna is monotonous and dull, little but partially deserted wastes being seen on either side. Some twelve miles from the city a bathing establishment or water cure of ancient popularity—Aquae Abulae—is located and which seems to be considerably patronized. By the smell I judge the water is very highly charged with sulphur. A narrow canal conducts the water from three small lakes to the Tiber. In this vicinity are extensive quarries of lapis Tiburtinus, or travertine, which have furnished ancient and modern Rome with building material—for the Coliseum and St. Peter's alike. Just before reaching the baths we passed Castel Arcioni, an ancient stronghold of robbers. On the left, three or four miles to the north, are three independent hills or mountains in the form of large mounds, on the barren summits of two of which are located monasteries or convents.

The range of the Sabine mountains reach an altitude of 4,200 feet; they are of limestone, and in this particular are entirely different from the Alban mountains south of the city, which are of volcanic formation. The upper portions seem little else than solid rock without the growth of trees or much other vegetation. The mountains have their name from the Sabines, who once made their homes among them. As the mountains are approached the picturesqueness of the scenery increases; in climbing to the town of Tivoli we passed through thousands of acres of olive orchards. The olive tree is much the shape of apple trees, branching and spreading around in a similar way, but are of slower growth and live to be hundreds of years old. The olives are now not more than half grown.

Tivoli is decidedly the oldest looking, quaintest,

Rational Morality.—Concluded.

BY W. S BELL.

These definitions meet with general if not universal acceptance among writers on ethics, but society pays no practical regard to them in many cases. The enforcement of Sunday laws is a violation of individual rights according to those definitions, and so also are Bible readings in the public schools, and enforcing the legal oath, refusing to enfranchise woman, and the Comstock law. And when the individual rights are to be invaded, that object is not boldly stated, but the revolutionary measure comes in the name of God, of Christ, or of morality. And every law thus established in the interests of religion has been at the expense of individual liberty.

To most minds it seems necessary that there should be some definit and fixed standard by which all actions may be tested. The multitude must hav leaders. This necessity originates in man's weakness, ignorance, and helplessness. He needs help, and will take it from the one who givs it to him cheapest. In his delirium of misery he is led to imagin that he needs to be saved in the next world, while he is oblivious to his lost condition in this. In fact he courts suffering here that he may hav glory hereafter.

When such objections are offered against the delusions of superstition the reply is often made, What has Liberalism to offer in place of Christianity? What definit standard is there in Freethought? What is the moral balance in which human actions may be tested? We answer that in place of religion we would substitute morality, and for a criterion of conduct we prefer reason and science to all supernatural revelations. Reason is man's natural guide, and until he comes into supernatural conditions, or the other world, wherever that may be, he had better be governed by this natural guide. No benevolent deity will make a bird with wings and then damn it for flying, and neither will any such God form man with a brain and then damn him to endless hell for exercising it. Therefore the exercise of reason is man's only true guide.

But it is urged that reason is inadequate to redeem the race from misery and crime. Reason and morality hav never yet been tried upon the race, but religion has, and it has failed in every land and in every age to raise society above misery and crime.

Again it is urged, "There are no incentivs in Infidelity to lead men to nobler thoughts and better lives." Let us see. What can incite man to a higher life better than truth seeking? Is not the pursuit and love of truth ennobling? Moreover, Freethought is the champion of morality. We insist that it is sufficient, and that religion is worse than superfluous, it is a delusion. Morality stands upon its own basis, and needs no incentivs. He who is governed by reason is moral, and requires no incentivs to make him recognize the right.

Beauty needs no incentivs. When we come into the presence of "a thing of beauty," which "is a joy forever," we do not hang back and say we shall hav to receive some incentiv before we can call it beautiful. So it is with the moral man; he needs no bribe of heaven or lash of hell to make him see that truth is truth and love is love. We need no incentivs to appreciate music. It is a law to itself. We hav only to hear delightful music and immediately we are charmed.

These illustrations serve to show us that the moral nature of man needs no incentivs to stir it to activity. The sense of pleasure from right action is as keen as that derived from beauty or music. The old saying that "virtue is its own reward" is true. But Christianity has always proceeded to bribe the worshiper with a reward. In the golden rule of doing to others as we would wish them to do to us, the moral nature is appealed to, but this rule is not of Christian origin, it fell from the lips of the first mother of two children who said to them, "Be good to each other; let each do by the other as he would wish to be done by."

All through the Christian writings runs this idea of reward. The promises of God and the lust for remuneration are cherished at the expense of man's moral nature. The Sermon on the Mount, which has been looked upon as a monument of lofty teaching, is cankered and rusted through and through with the selfish incentivs of gaining something for doing right.

"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

"Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted.

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.

"Blessed are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.

"Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

"Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God.

"Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

"Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven."

The key-note of all these teachings is, Do this and that, and "great will be your reward in heaven." The motivs of right action and the moral nature are not appealed to. The fitness of right conduct is not explained or referred to.

What kind of morality is that which teaches that the smallest sin unrepented of will cast you to the lowest hell with those who hav committed the most terrible crimes?

"For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, is guilty of all." "The law of God," says Mr. Moody, "is like a chain. If you break one link all is lost." In looking over all the Christian doctrins I am unable to discover one which is not unequivocally immoral in its tendency.

The whole system of theology is "baseless fabric," resting upon empty faith, and cherished at the expense of the moral nature of man. Save thyself, for the next world is a delusion which has led millions to court poverty, misery, and martyrdom.

Another thing to be borne in mind is that the moral nature is law to itself, and when interfered with the development of man is thwarted. There is a wide difference in the musical talents possessed by various persons; some hav a rich inheritance in this direction, and we say of them that they hav musical natures. A similar diversity of talents is found in those who excel in mathematics, painting, and poetry. The moral dispositions may be found equally diversified, sometimes in the members even of the same family. And yet, while the consensus would not attempt to enforce the observance of the science of music, it would nevertheless compel the observance of morality. If anything, it would be more practicable to make all men equally good musicians and composers than to equalize their moral natures or conduct. To do either is quite impossible. Moral and musical aptitudes are not manufactured by legislativ or judicial decisions.

The talent for music, painting, poetry, invention, morality, needs only adaptable surroundings for its development. The effort to produce talents in these departments, where there is no inherited aptitude, is like the force work of the hothouse, artificial. Inventor, poet, painter, and artist of whatever sort, must be left free. Heaven and earth may be set before him, but he must be at liberty to accept or reject and work as he can. This is the soul of genius, individual sovereignty, and morality.

There is no moral law. Charity is an element of a moral nature, and so are truth speaking and truth-seeking, honesty, etc.; but all these elements hav never been formulated into a moral law any more than all the sweetest and grandest tunes hav been formulated into a musical law.

Music has no actual existence until it is individualized into tunes. It has potential existence in the possible combination of sounds; and the arrangement of them into actual tunes is the work of a musical mind or nature. Just so is it with morality. It has its potential existence in human nature, and when man begins to studiously regard his own well being and that of his fellow-men, his moral nature is at work. His theories about duty are like the silent sheet of music, but his good deeds are sweeter strains in the world's heart than ever fell from Æolian harp. We must conclude then that morality, like genius, exists nowhere outside of the atmosphere of freedom.

Subtil-Materiality of Mind, and its Individualized Development.

The universe is here considered as composed of intelligent and non-intelligent materials, the former, as mind-matter, to be its highest subtilty and most important functional energy. Their association is by mechanical action and reaction, in a unity of reciprocal accordant motions, which, in the expression of an infinit mind-force, givs laws to the actions of matter, and thus produces all phenomenal acts of unintelligent matter for a purpose, as does the finite material mind, limitedly acting upon its body, for its purposes. Universal mind-matter is individualized by the attractiv character of organisms in proportion to their sensitiv nerve structures, as oxygen is attracted to animal lungs in proportion to their structure, both being foreign to their incipient organisms, but equally necessary for their completion. All our impressions and expressions are mechanically from and upon matter.

Hence it may be scientifically claimed that minds are also material and separate entities, only temporarily associated with particular organisms, and equally capable of associating with other organisms elsewhere upon being released from the present ones. Therefore mind, as a material entity, is here presented as the only explanation of mental characteristics in their known relations to surrounding matter, by reciprocal mechanical acts, as separate forces, intelligent and non-intelligent materials, as the following elucidations will, I think, fully confirm.

Those minds which acquire knowledge most readily are those which hav associated the most sensitiv impressibility of the nerves of the five senses, and with memory for comparison hav the highest powers of discrimination for mental development.

The mechanical connection of our material minds with other matter, through the nerves of the five senses, is thus readily seen to be the exclusiv medium, and so is the foundation of all finite knowledge of objects, the basis of all observations of the mind (in its separate entity), to weave its judgment of their import into tangible will-force expressions. The extent of our knowledge or acquirements, therefore, depends upon the sensitivness of our nerve structure to impressions from the motions of other matter and our perceptiv use of the same.

All minds are thus dependent for their power of development in the acquirement of knowledge upon the sensitivness of their nerve structures, which exclusivly convey the impress emanating from the motions of other matter to their material minds. Therefore all minds may become intelligent in proportion to the sensitivness of the structure of their five nerve-senses and their perceptiv use of the same.

This sensitivness differs with individuals, families, classes, and nationalities, largely hereditarily dependent upon the comparativ long line of ancestral cultivation of such sensitiv media. All mental attainments are thus also comparativ with other animal organizations—as with our own—in proportion to their structural nerve sensibility, both as compared with individuals and races, as with our own, there being no such anomaly as instinct with any animal, as instinct, if it means anything, must be intuitiv knowledge, which is godlike and so is far above any finite mind acquirements, being possessed and infallible rather than acquired by experience, through which alone man can attain to knowledge of any kind, and even then is more or less fallible, races and individuals, by their structure, having peculiar adaptability to acquire knowledge rapidly.

When all the sense-nerves belonging to individuals of our race are especially sensitiv to impressions emanating from objects, then they possess the primal impulses for the highest attainable knowledge by such delicate means of observation conveyed from objects to subjects.

These more or less delicate nerve-sense impressions are generally more or less divergent, and often in strong contrast with different individuals of the same family or race, as with different animal races and individuals of their respectiv kinds. With some animals far below our race in general organization, they possess some one of the sense-nerves far more delicately sensitiv, and so more instructiv, than our most favored individuals—such as the sense of sight with the eagle, as more far-reaching and discriminating; with nocturnal animals, as being able to see in comparativ darkness; and in insects with microscopic vision, etc., all of which far exceed our powers of sight. So in hearing with many animals, whose acuteness exceeds ours; and in scent, as with the dog, whose perception in that line we cannot emulate.

Some people hav a great repugnance to the thought that minds are material, however subtil, considering such to belong to an obnoxious doctrin called materialism; not from any investigated reasons, but simply from a vague horror, the results of unreasoning prejudices. We all know that we are as much immersed in the matter of the atmosphere everywhere surrounding us as are the fishes of the sea, and, with associate matter, are equally adapted to our existence and contributing to our every pleasure, while such excite our admiration for their wondrous adaptability to varied useful and esthetic purposes, beauty being prominently associated with use in every department of nature. And as our bodies partake of the same beautiful arrangements of matter, and our minds, of whatever supposed character, are in immediate contact and harmony with our comparativ gross brain matter, there can be no real derogation in considering that our minds are also material—a high subtility of matter as a distinct entity and most important functional force in nature.

Rational persons could not consider it as gross if our minds are as subtily material as the gases of the atmosphere. As every thought is connected with our universe material surroundings, so they are related to and mechanically associated with such environments All our mental impressions and expressions are necessarily in connection with matter in all its phases, from its most gross to its most subtil manifestations in all phenomena of material characteristics. Our minds feel an infinit variety of impacts from the motions of matter through the medium of our sense-nerves, conveyed by light, sound, touch, or from electric emanations; thus mechanically impinging vibratorily upon our delicate senses, and thus to the brain and perceptiv mind attuned to vibrating, accordant motions, from that emanating from subtil odor of a rose through all grosser manifestations of motion to the distant twinkling star. From the life-like material expressions of the eye, the soft cadencies of the voice, or the loving touch, etc., etc., without even considering such as gross associations with mind, and why should we any the more if mind itself should equally partake of such subtil characteristics of matter, as adaptable conditions in co-relation with all unintelligent and unconscious materials of the universe. Grossness is essentially a vulgar idea as connected with matter in its laws of action, as that idea is a reflection upon its disposition by an intelligent creator. All its grossness we ourselvs inaugurate by its misconception and misuse.

Material minds are a necessary association with life in their mechanical relations and acts toward other material minds, as manifested through our organisms, as well as our acts upon and reciprocal impressions from other matter that is not intelligent or conscious. No other philosophy or understandable estimate of mind can explain how minds are made cognizant of our exclusiv material surroundings unless our minds are also material, and so are mechanically sensitiv to the impulses or impacts from other matter, and reciprocally by such mechanical impulses emanating from our minds and passing through our nerves and muscles, can we enforce the actions of our bodies into all their accomplishments with matter. In short, this rational and necessary doctrin consistently presents the universe as a unity in action of independent intelligent and nonintelligent materials in reciprocal accordant motions of effectiv oscillations, tremors, and impacts, matter acting upon matter for mental impressions and expressions which constitute the sole sources of our consciousness of existence, the knowledge of our environments, and the mechanical powers of our bodies upon other matter. This doctrin of the materiality of minds, is, too, our only scientific proof of our immortality, as matter and material forces, like such minds, are alone indestructible. Whereas, supposed spirit minds can only be fanciful existences, as must be all immateriality, which, as not occupying space, cannot be operativ upon anything, as all effects in this universe of minds and unconscious matter must be by the reciprocal associate mechanical acts of the motions of matter only. All other hopes of immortality are simply chimerical, emotional, a belief without reason, or even the shadow of a substance.

In the development of mind the imagination is necesarily very much excited, and so naturally proceeds from object impressions to idealistic presentments, and especially leading to superstitious beliefs in spirits or genii, as controling different natural objects, and thus mingles the real with the imaginary. There are two closely related subjects, the religious and poetic, which especially partake of this dualistic tendency of mind. As in all theistic biographies of God, assuming that they were written by inspiration, and so necessarily, by dictation, they, therefore, must be autobiographies—when it is self-evident that such assumed inspirer, or author could not hav given himself such a character as each one of those theisms so anomalously presents. Probably those writers were as much inspired, as poets are said to be, by their subjects—the sun, the moon, the planets, the stars, the oceans, the lakes, the rivers, and waterfalls, the mountains, the glens, the rocks, the plains, etc.—all being alike, inanimate inspiraters; only that the poet has the advantage over the heavenly biographers, in that he portrays tangible objects, though the poet frequently mingles equally imaginary beings with his objects. Hence all such particular theistic biographies of the intangible controling the universe are akin with the poets genii, associated with especial objects, and so must be alike relegated to the realm of the imagination to simple fantastic superstitious dreams; as non-realistic to the human mind as therein portrayed.

All that one mind can know of another is by its acts of body and inferences therefrom, of its general character, therefore, all that we can know of God is from the book of nature (his metaphysical body), in its adaptable works, and inferences therefrom of his general character, which must partake of infinit duration, wisdom, power, and benevolence as the provider—as unintelligent matter cannot, unaided, either adapt or provide. Hence a God-mind is a necessary co-operating factor throughout cosmos—which is the only rational realistic conception of nature's phenomena as originating in an intelligent infinit will-force.

Finally, no other inference, or conclusion than that of an intelligent origin of all the phenomena of cosmos can be fairly deduced from observations of nature, as co-operation of the varied elements, in definit proportions are always necessarily provided by its impressed laws of action for every compound—intelligence being a necessary associate for co-operation. It is, therefore, an axiom that intelligent matter, of itself cannot co operate for a purpose; hence, intelligent association and direction of the laws of matter becomes the necessary factor for all the coherent co-operativ acts of unconscious matter. Therefore atheistic doctrins are wholly inadequate to account for co-operativ acts, in the production of any compound, and much less for the wondrous mechanical structures in organic nature—indeed all nature is a great mechanism, made up of countless machines of the most admirable constructions, and like all artificial machines, must hav an intelligent designer and co-operativ controler of the laws of matter for their construction, co-operation always denoting intelligent association, and observations of nature fully confirm such necessary association as the only clue to its marvelous productions. Thus universal unconscious matter becomes the metaphorical body of an infinit, intelligent God, for all his expressions and impressions, like our bodies and other matter to our mind.

These consecutiv and analogous reasonings, on the association and mechanical relation of all minds with other matter, infallibly lead to the conviction that all minds are material and as culminating in the happy conclusion, in the scientific basis, that all life is motion and that material minds only can hav motion and alone be mechanically impressed with and expressiv upon other matter; that there is such subtil-material governing intelligence (infinitly above man's) for the production of all phenomena of matter and its perpetuity in ever-changing forms, including the immortality of all minds in other organizations as individual material forces and co-workers in his creations, by which we are and will continue to be participants (as with all animal life down to microscopic formulists) in the furtherance of creativ progress, we here cultivating the adaptable uses of matter, and many minute forms of simple life contributing to the growth of the vegetable kingdom and building many of our islands and long mountain ranges, all life being designed for useful and æsthetic purposes.

Conclusions.—No one can discover any limit to the functions and adaptability of different kinds of matter; and as minds exist in association, so they are the only co-operativ factors—infinit and finite—in the coherent dispositions of matter. Thence it may be fairly claimed that the functions of some matter is that of volition, mind characteristics, and so is the great factor in giving coherent laws for the actions of all unintelligent matter, as we giv actions to some matter which cannot be otherwise explained. As this doctrin cannot be contravened, and as it comports with every known fact of the reciprocal mechanical relations of minds with unconscious matter, so it becomes not only the most rational conception, but the only doctrin that consistently describes mind influence upon general as well as particular matter. While the adaptability of unconscious matter can only be conceived in its association of co-operation with intelligent direction for its coherent acts, by such intelligent mechanical impacts or impulsiv forces, which are necessarily always material, matter acting only upon matter, as we observe in all our mental performances with matter.

Therefore as this doctrin of the materiality of all minds alone fully comports with all known acts of minds upon matter, and, conversely, of matter upon minds, so it is the only rational doctrin of the existence of an understandable infinit mind as the comprehensiv Great Function and Factor controling all intelligent matter into its coherent accomplishments, and of our minds as partaking of the same functional element of intelligence individualized for limited purposes; and as such minds are material forces, they cannot become immaterial. This doctrin alone scientifically insures our immortality as conserved material forces. All other supposed forces, as spirit-minds, being immaterial, cannot be conserved, as they only belong to the imaginary non-existences; not occupying space, can neither act upon anything, nor can anything act upon such nothingness.

All that we hav any knowledge or cognizance of or can conceive in this universe is matter, its reciprocal relations, and its performances; from subtil gas to liquids and solids. Hence all known forces, being mechanical in their operations, must be material also; and as mind-force acts similarly through our organisms, materiality of our minds are the only philosophical inferences—a scientific necessity.

So the great subtil element of mind pervading the universe, in correlation with unconscious matter. Its metaphorical body is the great functional law-giver and cause of all co-operativ acts of unintelligent matter, by will force impress upon such metaphorical body, and so is the factor in the great mechanisms of cosmos, for infinit intelligent purposes, just as our individualized mind element, by its will force, gives laws to and so controls our organizations and much other unintelligent matter into their varied accomplishments for finite purposes.

The materiality of minds and their interdependence with universal matter, so the metaphorical body for all mental expressions and impressions here shown to exist, are proofs that in cosmos all is utility in unity of matter, intelligent and non-intelligent materials, and so effectually disposes of all supernaturalism and Spiritualism (as simple fancied existences or powers) in nature to the foolish realms of superstition. Beyond adoration for such great functional energy of matter as infinit wisdom, power, and beneficence, to excite our intelligent observations and moral progress, we must discard from such rational and practical conceptions of nature and nature's God, all irrelevant bigoted fears and chimerical fancies relating to the same, as derogating from the practical majesty of cosmos, having no warrant in this world's experiences. Some matter possessing intelligence, and so controling all unintelligent matter, gives to such its inexorable laws of action to which all must succumb to its inflexible purposes, as spasmodic acts can hav no contradictory part in the general provident order of effects of the greatest good to the greatest number. Man, though biased by heredity, being free to act, so forms his own character, and thus molds his own destiny and conscious innocence or guilt in this world, there being a providence in cosmos, but not in microcosm, in individual care of man.

Sexual Intemperance.—No. 10.

A WORD TO THE DOUBTING AND FEARING.

I am sorry any one thinks the great and important subject of sexual intemperance is one that should not be discussed in our public papers, or that any think it injures the cause of Liberalism. No one can love our papers, and especially our beloved TRUTH SEEKER, more than I do, nor is there any one who would feel a greater repugnance to doing or saying aught to its real injury; but while my sole aim is to do good and to help the paper both at the same time, yet I confess I hesitated long ere I ventured to take the stand I hav for sexual purity. Born and educated a Quaker, and for twenty-seven years a member of a society composed almost wholly of these pure, modest, temperate, and refined people, it may well be said that it was a great departure from early impressions to thus come out from them all and talk of the awfully tabooed subject of sex. "As the twig is bent the tree's inclined," and few of us are straight enough to fully overcome old prejudices and bents. I am just as warm an admirer of modesty, purity, and true refinement as I was in my old Quaker days, but I hav learned that impurity is not so rare a vice as I then deemed it. The veil has been lifted, and the horrible countenance of the Mokanna of lust has been revealed in all its deformity, and I must speak. For ten years I hav smothered my convictions and kept back the utterances that cried for voicings, for I felt the world was not yet ready for them, and also realized that I was not standing on solid ground. But when I began to read the Alpha, and the truth dawned upon me that the sexual nature was solely for purposes of procreation, I saw that I had a foundation whereon to build, and as light came to me so also came the impulse to share it with others. Mr. Bennett agreeing with me that the time had come for giving the great masses of the world an insight into the real laws of physiological sexual conditions, needs, and requirements, I commenced—with some inward trepidation, I must confess—the present series of articles on sexual intemperance. It is truly wonderful, the encouragement I hav received from all over the land. Where one has condemned, hundreds hav commended and encouraged. A few hav taken exception to now and then a position or a sentiment, but still approved on the whole. I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 9th that friend Foote thinks I hav made some "mistakes," and probably I hav, as I am far from faultless or from being well posted on all sides of any subject. I simply giv my views and those of others as I know them. Now, though figures never lie, the observations of those who make the figures may be at fault. If only one out of 216 cases of obstetric practice, instead of one in 28 is fatal, it is still a great mortality, considering the enormous number of births continually taking place, and one, I believe, greatly due to sexual intemperance—to demands made upon the wife during pregnancy. Of course there are other unhygienic influences that also bear heavily upon the child-bearing woman, all of which should be properly and plainly set before the world—tight lacing, heavy skirts weighing upon the hips, etc, etc. In proper hygienic conditions (a healthy mother living a true life) there would be little if any pain, suffering, or danger in parturition.

And I think, judging from personal observation, that I am not much mistaken as to the fact that celibacy is conducive to long life, present statistics to the contrary notwithstanding. I do not mean the celibacy of nuns, shakers, or monks, or of prostitutes and their paramours, but in a society where hygiene, health, and happiness reign and rule; a society where cordial, free, loving relations exist between the sexes; where the real magnetism of contact, of affection, of sympathy, and all the little tender, gentle amenities of true friendship exist; each for each, and where all are educated on the higher plane.

But I do not think a celibate life the happiest or the most natural. A true marriage of one man and one woman, and a child or two to gladden and brighten the home, is best of all. But purity, continence, and the other virtues must there abide or all is lost that is most valuable and precious. We can well afford to lose a little for the sake of our children; to giv of ourselvs, of our vital force, for the benefit of posterity, but we cannot afford to waste and throw away vitality for a mere momentary enjoyment that has no higher end in view. As I hav before said, all plants and trees that fruit lose strength and vigor by so doing. All flowers that seed are brief in their seasons of flowering. Clip the seed-pods, and they continue in their efforts to produce more. Take off one-half the overplus, and the tree flourishes, and the fruit that's left is far finer.

Ovid says truly,

> "Frequent births too soon will youth impair;
> Continual harvest wears the fruitful field,
> And earth itself decays too often tilled."

Incendiary Publications.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In July, 1835, a public meeting was held at Charleston, South Carolina, for the purpose of taking action in regard to a number of Abolition newspapers, said to hav been received at the post-office through the United States mail from the North on the 29th inst. The postmaster had written to the postmaster-general, Amos Kendall, and asked to be authorized to arrest the circulation of "incendiary matter," and had stated publicly that he would retain the newspapers until he would receive instruction from Washington. Notwithstanding this, the meeting passed a resolution that the mails should at once be searched and the mail matter complained of taken therefrom and burned; and this was accordingly done, the postmaster making no objection. In a day or two the postmaster-general replied as follows to the postmaster's letter:

"I am satisfied that I hav no legal authority to exclude newspapers from the mail, nor to prohibit their carriage or delivery on account of their character or tendency, real or supposed. Yet by no act of mine, official or private, could I be induced to aid, knowingly, in giving circulation to papers of this description, directly or indirectly. We owe an obligation to the laws, but a higher one to the communities in which we liv; and if the former be permitted to destroy the latter it is patriotism to disregard them. Entertaining these views, I cannot sanction, and will not condemn, the step you hav taken. Your justification must be looked for in the character of the papers detained and the circumstances by which you are surrounded."

At the next meeting of Congress, President Jackson recommended that a law should be passed forbidding the circulation of incendiary matter through the mails, and this portion of his message was referred to a select committee of the Senate. The chairman, John C. Calhoun, reported as follows on February 4, 1836:

"Nothing is more clear than that the admission of the right of Congress to determin what papers are incendiary, and, as such, to prohibit their circulation through the mail necessarily involves the right to determin what are not incendiary and enforce their circulation. If Congress may this year decide what incendiary publications are, they may, next year, decide what they are not, and thus laden their mails with real or covert Abolitionism. It belongs to the states, and not to Congress, to determin what is or is not calculated to disturb their security."

He also stated that it would be a violation of the Constitution for Congress to pass such a law; and it was never brought before the Senate in the manner proposed by Jackson. It was reserved for a Congress of a later day to pass a law forbidding the circulation, not of abolition documents, for that term of opprobrium was out of date, but of "obscene" literature, with the understanding that this word should include everything of a literary nature objectionable to the orthodox churches.

The Constitution givs the general government no right whatever to infringe upon the liberties of the people of the several states; and of all rights dear to an enlightened American there is none more sacred than that of publishing his opinions freely and sending them fearlessly through an unviolated mail. And if we submit tamely to a censorship of the mails, established by Congress under the auspices of Comstock & Co., we as certainly deserve to lose our liberty as we are certain to lose it. Would it not be well to circulate a petition for the repeal of the blue law, to be presented to Congress next month? HESPERIA.

LOCKE A PRE AGNOSTIC.—I own freely to you the weakness of my understanding, that though it be unquestionable that there is omnipotence and omniscience in God, our maker and I cannot hav a clearer perception of anything than that I am free; yet I cannot make freedom in man consistent with omnipotence and omnipresence in God, though I am as fully persuaded of both as of any truths I most firmly assert to, and therefore I hav long since given up the consideration of that question, resolving all into this consideration, that if it be possible for God to make a free agent, then man is free, though I see not the way of it.—Locke's "Familiar Letters."

"JOHN'S WAY" received. I cannot say too much in its favor. A well-written story is the best way to reach the understanding of those who cannot be made to read other Liberal books. W. RYNE, M.D.

"JOHN'S WAY" is good and true. I like it very much. MRS. SHERMAN.

and most unattractive of any town of its size I have seen. Its streets are narrow, crooked, and run in all directions, and the buildings look extremely antiquated. The people also compare very well with the town; they are dark and swarthy, and seem to belong to a different race from the inhabitants of Rome.

The town literally stands on a massive pile of rocks, and taken altogether is one of the most picturesque of places. The river Anio, which descends from the mountains, leaps down the rocks in six or eight places making the most delightful cascades and waterfalls in the world. The Tibur of antiquity, existed, according to tradition, as a colony of the Siculi long before the foundation of Rome. Nearly four hundred years before the Christian era Camillus subjugated Tibur along with Præneste, after which it formed a league with the Latin towns allied with Rome. Hercules and Vesta were especially revered at Tibur. Many of the Roman nobles, including Mæcenas, and the Emperor Augustus himself founded beautiful villas there. Under Hadrian the place attained its climax; and in the middle ages it participated in the fate of Rome. In 1460 Pius II. founded the citidel on the ruins of the amphitheater.

The finest relics of the town, and the first to be visited, are two ancient pagan temples, one of Vesta or Hercules, and the other called the Temple of the Sibyl. The first is a circular edifice surrounded by a colonnade of Corinthian columns, ten of which still remain. It is close by the brink of the precipice, and but a short distance from two of the beautiful waterfalls, a fine view of which is enjoyed from the temple itself. In the middle ages it was used as a church. The door and windows contract at the top. Close by the side of this stands the other temple, which is oblong in form with square corners. It has four Ionic columns in front, and is now the church of St. George. The Sibyl, or Tiburtus, as the case may be, is crowded out, and St. George let in. So the religions of the world have succeeded one another.

In 1826 a serious inundation raised the mountain stream so high that about half the town was washed away, and to avert a similar calamity a new outlet for the river was cut through the solid rock for a distance of a thousand feet, or rather two apertures side by side, and in 1834 three-fourths of the water of the river followed the artificial channel and the other third went the old way; the result is a new and splendid waterfall of 330 feet, some two or three hundred feet above the old one, and which makes a most grand display as it leaps down the rocks, turning as white as milk in the rugged descent. A beautiful rainbow was created in consequence of the thick mist raised by the dashing of the waters. I walked around for a mile or more by the curve of the road, directly opposite this larger fall, where a splendid view of the fall is obtained. By continuing the walk further down, six different waterfalls are seen at the same time, one above the town and five below. A portion of the water is used for turning machinery, though not the one-hundredth part is made available.

To visit the caverns under the rocks where the whole river used to pour down, a guide was deemed necessary. We descended down, down, in the narrow cave in the rocks where a part of the river still empties itself in a fall of nearly three hundred feet. Two or three streams are falling, and the roar of the falls with the spray and the wildness of the surroundings produce a striking effect. Away down where the fall dashes in the basin below, closed in as it is on all sides, is the Grotto of the Sirens. It is huge, with wildness and grandeur, but hardly equals another grotto reached by passing through a tunnel. Ascending and descending the rocky stairs, we reached what is called Neptune's Grotto. It is a cave of the grandest character, with rocks overhead, rocks on every side, which look open or porous, as though the water had coursed through them for thousands of years. The noise of the waterfall is almost deafening. I have been behind Niagara Falls (on the American side); it is, of course, a much larger body of water, the roaring is still louder, and it is perhaps wilder, but here in this Grotto of Neptune is something peculiarly grand, wild, and at the same time pleasing. I was filled with awe, and the sentiments of sublimity. In a feeling of veneration, I took off my hat, and said: "O Neptune, if you really reside here, I now make my most reverential bow to you, and pronounce you a great old fellow. But as you are not here, Nature is, and to Nature I pay my devoutest adoration." The day was warm and sunny, but away down there it was cool and refreshing. There the rays of the sun never reach. I felt a sort of worshipful feeling in consequence of the grandness and wildness of the surroundings. The excellent paths and passages around and among the rocks and waterfalls were constructed by order of the French General Mollis, who deserves thanks for the pleasure he has thereby afforded to thousands of his fellow-beings. There are numerous points where grand and beautiful views are obtained, but it is not necessary to dwell upon them. Those of you who make a visit to Rome must not fail to go out to Tivoli and view its picturesque scenery for yourselves. At one place an ancient wall is seen, supposed to have belonged to the Villa of Vopiscus. The Villa of Horace is also pointed out, though it is asserted that Horace never resided there. The Villa of Meccenas, with its ruins, is also pointed out.

VILLA HADRIAN.

When the beauties of Tivoli were sufficiently enjoyed we walked a mile or more down the hill to the celebrated Villa of Hadrian, which is located where the plain and mountain join. It was once a place of great magnificence, covering an area of some two square miles, but is little now but heaps of ruins. The magnificent grounds were unsurpassed in the Roman empire, and contained palaces, theaters, a circus, academies, etc., where the Emperor Hadrian was wont to enjoy himself and rest from the arduous labors of government. He proposed, also, to erect here plans and models of all the celebrated buildings and districts which he had visited, particularly those of Egypt and Greece. These costly structures which he erected stood till the sixth century, when they were destroyed by the Goths under Totila. Innumerable works of ancient art, extricated from these ruins, now adorn churches and museums; and there still exist extensive remains of the buildings themselves, to which various names are applied. The Palace of Hadrian, the oldest edifice, appears to have stood on the highest ground, at the back of the hippodrome and academy. A theater with adjacent halls and saloons belonged to it. The Thermae were reached hence by the Canopus, a building fitted up in the Egyptian style, containing a number of Egyptian statues, etc., which are now in the Vatican. To the east flows the river Alpheus. A large space above the canopies is named the Hippodrome, or race course, which, however, shows traces of aqueducts. To the north of the palace are stretched the Elysium and Tartarus, the heaven and the hell of the pagans. A subterranean passage leads east to the River Peneus, and beyond it to the Vale of Tempe. On the west are extensive ruins, supposed to be the Prytaneum, adjoining which are the Scuola, a circular edifice with niches for statues, the Stoa Pœcile, a stadium with a colonnade, and other remains. There are also two other theaters and many other ruins. The walls of these old buildings are massive, some of them more than six feet in thickness, and in places thirty or forty feet high. The floors of the palaces are yet in several instances quite good, and the skill of the mosaic pavements of the floors is very perceptible. The stuccoes on the walls and some of the frescoes are still to be seen. Although the valuable sculptures have been removed, there still remains on the ground much ancient carved marble in the form of ornamentation, pillars, capitals, etc. Hadrian must have spent an immense sum of money on his lovely villa.

We walked a mile to the railroad station, where we had to wait till nearly 8 P.M. for the train to take us back to the city. While thus waiting I saw not less than a score of carts laden heavily with casks of must, or the fresh juice of grapes, being conveyed to the place where it is to undergo fermentation. The carriage on these mountain sides is done by donkeys. It is not at all uncommon to see loads packed on each side of them much larger than themselves. One donkey-load attracted my attention particularly; besides a lot of freight on the top of the pack saddle, mostly in sacks, was a small load of lumber, consisting of boards fourteen feet long and some fifteen inches wide, and six or eight in number. One would hardly think such freight could be easily loaded on a donkey but little larger than a Newfoundland dog, but the boards were lashed to the pack-saddle and pointed over the animal's head, a part on each side. He trudged along with his mixed freight of lumber and sundries with as much dignity as though he thought the existence of the world depended upon his good behavior.

I reached my quarters at a little past nine and found the Corso brilliantly illuminated in memory of this day ten years ago, when Rome decided to join her interests with united Italy.

I will remark that a part of the water which furnishes the city of Rome, of which the supply seems most ample, is from the Sabine Mountains, fifty-six miles distant. It was originally constructed by Praetor Q. Martius Rex in 146 B.C., and was restored in 1869. It is called the Aqua Marcia. It is considered the purest in Rome. Over it, where it enters the city, flows the Aqua Claudia, erected in the year 50 by the Emperor Claudius, extending from the vicinity of Subiaco, a distance of fifty-eight and a half miles. The Aqua Felice, completed by Sixtus V. in 1585, and afterward frequently restored, begins at the base of the Alban Mountains, near Colonna, twenty-one miles distant (two-thirds subterraneous).

Thus, my friends, I think I have told you enough about the ruins of ancient Rome and vicinity. Of course I have not repeated half there is to be said, but I am quite sure you will excuse me if I tell no more. Wishing you to hold me in remembrance, I will say farewell. D. M. B.

QUESTION FOR LIBERALS.

MARTINDALE, N. Y., Nov. 10 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: What if the commandment of the Lord's Host, the inspired Joshua, like Sir Isaac Newton, had recorded: "This calculus is founded on the hypothesis of the earth standing still." Would Joshua command your respect for scholarship like as the unblemished Newton does? Yours,

REV. W. ISAACS LOOMIS.

ELGIN, ILL., Nov. 8, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: It affords me great pleasure to announce the fact that Mrs. H. S. Lake, that noble, intellectual, logical, and ever-industrious advocate of Freethought, now a resident of Chicago, Ill., was the last but not the least who highly delighted a goodly sized audience in Mendelssohn Hall, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 7th, in our usually quiet little burg, selecting for her sermon the subject entitled, "Infidel Integrity vs. Christian Creed." She soon had them tested on the scale of reason, and in a very explicit and satisfactory manner readily proved to the surprise of some that the latter was sadly in wanting Her evening discourse was "Thomas Paine," and it proved to be a very fitting tribute to the immortal statesman and patriot, and aroused considerable enthusiasm among her very attentiv and intelligent audience. Respectfully, METCALF.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: One G. Gray, fired with righteous indignation at my rebuke of D M. Bennett for wine-drinking, magnanimously donates twenty-five cents that the said D. M. Bennett may solace himself with an extra glass.

Friend Gray argues as a reason why wine should be drank in the old country is its cheapness (only twenty-five cents a glass)—cheaper, he tells us, than tea or coffee. I know of several people on this side of the Atlantic who consider water a very cheap and wholesome beverage; but I should infer from friend Gray's letter that they don't hav any water over there, and so are obliged to drink wine or go thirsty.

To clinch his argument, friend Gray points to the Bible and says that "wine-drinking is encouraged all through the book." This may or may not be so. As I hav not read its pages since the days of childhood, I am unable to say; but I know that a great many bad things are encouraged in it, and for that reason I hav given it a wide berth for many years. One verse I remember, "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging," but do not remember in what part of the book it may be found.

As to the foolish advice of one Paul to a young man who was so far ahead of his age that he refused to take wine even as a medicin, I will say that I think the poor old saint ought to be excused for the reason that in all probability he never read a book upon hygiene in all his life. James Parton's admirable essay, "Will the Coming Man Drink Wine?" had not been written at that time. If it had, and Paul had read it, he never would hav furnished an argument to all the pious wine-bibbers from his day till ours.

As to D. M. Bennett's drinking my health, if I could hav his ear, I would say to him, "Don't do it; too much drinking other people's health may impair your own." Besides, it is no uncommon thing for old and wise men, when their heads are confused by the fumes of wine, to commit grave offenses against morality and decency. Therefore, I say unto you again, Don't do it. C. L. MORGAN.

A FEW REMARKS.—Intemperance is evinced in more than one direction. A person may even be intemperate and unreasonable in the advocacy of temperance. True temperance with regard to any article means its use in moderation. There is probably quite as much intemperance in eating as in drinking, but still it would hardly seem reasonable to demand that for this reason we should never taste of beef steak or plum pudding. There are those who insist that animal food, including butter and cheese, should never be eaten. Others cry out against tea and coffee and tell us we should never drink them. These are extremists and are intemperate in their advocacy of temperance and abstinence. In our belief a person may use in moderation roast beef, corned beef, mutton, fowls, butter, cheese, fruits, tea, coffee, and even an occasional glass of wine, without being guilty of intemperance, without committing a crime, or doing anything to shorten life. While in Europe we noticed in several continental countries that wine is used by nearly all classes of the populace, and, so far as we could see, without injury or the production of intoxication. In our two months' intercourse with those people we did not see a single case of intoxication from the use of wine, or other evil effects arising from it. Among the rights and privileges of human beings is that of obtaining from existence all the happiness possible, and this includes a reasonable and moderate use of food and drinks. If the juice of the grape proves a comfort to the sons and daughters of humanity, it is difficult to see why they are not entitled to it as much as to the grapes in their natural state. An immoderate use of wines of course is an evil, and so is an immoderate use of beef, bread, potatoes, coffee, buttermilk, and even cold water. Many a man has lost his life by the intemperate use of cold water. Still it would be very unreasonable for extremists to insist that cold water should never be drank. We would be glad to assure our friend that he or she need entertain no fears of our making an intemperate use of wine or other fermented or distilled liquors. We very seldom taste of them, but we think we hav sufficient control of ourselvs to taste a glass of wine without endangering our present or future happiness or welfare.—ED. T. S.

ESCANABA, MICH., Nov. 5, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find three dollars which I believe pays for THE TRUTH SEEKER until the first of January. Continue to send it and I will try and not keep you waiting so long after this for your money. I can't think of doing without the paper. Thank kind fortune that we hav one paper where one can giv public expression to our opinions, even though it may be in opposition to Christianity, for it is quite time that this stumbling-block in the way of human progress and enlightenment were removed, for there can be but little done in the way of improving the condition of the laboring classes of people until it is. Church and state go hand in hand with the capitalist in robbing the loboring man of his share of the profits of labor. The church encourages vice by holding out the promis of forgivness, and yet every minister and priest well knows that there is no escaping the effects of vice. And yet the laboring man, although needing every dollar of his wages to procure even the commonest necessaries of life, cannot think of enjoying the comforts of life, as we conceive of comfort, nowadays, will spend his time and money frequenting saloons, and there doing what he knows is injuring his health and his mind, for he robs himself of needful rest.

Why will not the morally disposed part of the people frown down the social habit of drinking liquor as a beverage and find some way of social enjoyment that does not make the use of liquor a necessary part? Now that we hav so much to read and talk about, it does seem as though this old habit might be got rid of, and perhaps it will, but it seems so foolish to me that I hav hard work to wait, and can't help but manifest some impatience that the better informed and well-to-do class of the people are not willing to be the first to move in this grand reform. If it is ever accomplished it must be done by this class of people. The laboring man can't be expected to be the first to move in this matter. They through their poverty are cut off from many social advantages that should help take the place of this old custom of drinking liquor. A. C. DARLING.

ST. CATHARINES, ONT, CAN., Nov. 2, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you hav the goodness to define the sentence, "Base ingratitude;" for instance, if a son-in-law in connection with his wife, after accepting without murmur some ten or twelve thousand dollars of his father-in-law's accumulations, at his death should burn or be instrumental in burning said father-in-law's books, such as D'Holbach's "System of Nature," etc., because, forsooth, they did not coincide with his pueril notions of religion, might not that be termed base ingratitude, or does it deserve a stronger expression? I am aware of a circumstance of that kind, and when it was first made known to me I did think it deserved some strong expression by way of condemnation. Said father-in-law lived a good moral life worthy of example up to a good old age, and then, after bequeathing to the daughter and son-in-law the above-mentioned amount, which he is not capable of accumulating, to be treated in that manner, I think is mean, low, contemptible, yea, to repeat, base ingratitude.

Having been intimately acquainted with this gentleman for a score or more of years, put me in possession of his life history, which is in part that he was remarkably prone to reading, and had therefore read most of the leading prominent authors on history, science, literature, and religion, and had (as he expressed it) been silly enough at one time to preach Methodism to the people for a term of years. The final result, in so far as religion was concerned, was that he ended his life career on this earth holding in embrace what is now termed Liberal views, to which his family (the son in-law more especially) much objected to, and would fain make the people believe after his death that he recanted, but the evidence against it was too overwhelming.

Howbeit, there is a mighty revolution pending which will in time blot all orthodox nonsense out of existence. D. M. Bennett's European letters are very interesting. I am sorry R. G. Ingersoll stepped out of the traces, but I presume the sun will continue to shine.

Inclosed with this please find $2.00 on subscription.

Thine as ever, C. B. THOMPSON.

REPLY.—"Base ingratitude" is indeed a mild term for the conduct alluded to; a much harsher term would hardly be out of place. It was more than ingratitude; it was villainy.—ED. T. S.

DETROIT, MICH., Nov. 7, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of Oct. 16th, under the head of "Gems of Thought," there is a communication or a quotation from Elmina D. Slenker, on sunshine, stating that the energy of affinity like that of gravity is nothing but transmuted sunshine. That the sun's heat is really the source of all energy as well as all light, and all energy is ultimately converted into heat, and that heat will develop electricity, and that light produced by electric instruments and combustion of metallic substances is hoarded sunshine. That light is propagated by means of the ether, and light waves thus pass through space, and the number of the waves in a second seems to determin the colors of the objects we see; that red has the least number of waves, and has only four hundred and fifty millions of millions of waves in a second of time, and that violet has the most and requires only seven hundred and twenty-seven millions of millions of those little waves to produce that beautiful color, and all these waves are produced by sunlight if we go to their real primary origin.

Now, Mrs. Slenker says she does not profess to be a chemist nor a philosopher, and I am not going to undertake to disprove any of her statements in regard to the light of the sun or how light originates or anything of that kind, but would just like to know how Mrs. Slenker or any other material being in this universe ever managed to count that number of waves in one second of time, admitting that those light waves could by any possibility be identified by any or all of our senses combined. I cannot count twenty in a second and do my best. And then how are we to account for the different colors in a bunch of flowers, on the green leaves, and red or purple or violet flowers side by side or overlapping each other, in the same cluster. I should naturally suppose the waves would strike them all alike, and then the colors would all be alike.

It looks to me like a good deal of the nonsense that nowadays passes for truth with those who never stop to think of the utter absurdity or truthfulness of any proposition that some quack philosopher may impose upon mankind.

If those waves could be counted by the millions in a second of time it would be no more unreasonable to suppose that the size of them could be given as well as the numbers, and that we might be informed whether they are all of the same size or vary like the waves of the ocean, every third wave larger.

You will please pardon my inquisitivness.

Yours truly, JAMES HALE.

REPLY.—Of course no person can count the vibrations produced by the different colors. It is only done by the most delicate mathematical instruments which scientists hav invented, but with which we are not familiar enough to describe. That different colors produce different velocities of vibrations is true, and that they can he computed is also true.—ED. T. S.

ROCHESTER, MICH., Nov. 8, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Please find three dollars to apply on my subscription to your paper. Thanks for kindness in waiting.

As between the National Liberal League and the late seceders my sympathies are with the former, decidedly. The contumely and odium that the seceding minority would attach to the opponents of the Comstock law are no worse than was heaped upon the Garrison Abolitionists of thirty years ago on account of their Infidelity, as I happen to well remember.

In the light of the past it is not worth while to tremble overmuch. The truth will doubtless finally prevail, though it may take all summer.

In your paper of November 6th, George W. Morehouse's article on "The Field of Liberalism" suited me immensely. It was an inspiration.

Hoping for the success of your paper, the return of Mr. Bennett as a rejuvenated war-horse and ready for the battle to come, and a God's blessing upon the present editor, Leland the bold, and a number of other fellow-friends, I subscribe myself Yours most sincerely,

C. H. GREEN.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: To my surprise, in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I was pleased to see that you announced yourself as arrived at your office again, invigorated and prepared by foreign observations for more useful home work.

Your letters from Europe hav been very interesting and instructiv, as faithfully portraying their subjects, and pleasantly and pungently varied by your useful attacks on Christian dogmas and their crazy superstitions, so glaringly portrayed in their cathedral strongholds. I hav read those letters to a company of emancipated and so of interested, cultivated, and approving listeners of both sexes.

JUDSON, ARK., Oct. 22, 1880.

D. M BENNETT, Dear Sir: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER best of all the papers published, because in it all can hav a hearing. It does not play the choke-off game, and so I wish to say through its columns a few words to some of our Northern friends who seem to be so very unfriendly toward rebels.

I was in the rebel army, and there is but one thing I feel more ashamed of, and that is having once belonged to Garfield's church. Most of us see our mistake after it is over. 'Tis human to err. But are they never going to forgiv us, or hav we committed the unpardonable sin?

I believe, friends, you are extremely prejudiced against us. Are you not aware that dangers from other directions threaten us? I think so. I fear that the moneyed sharks hav the schemes laid which are to undermine our free institutions. If I am wrong in my opinion, why all this cry by them for a strong man and a strong government? Be careful; you might do something, as we rebels did, to regret in after years. You may warm a serpent that may bite you. I am in favor of the South not casting a vote for president for several terms, or if we do, vote the straight Republican ticket, so us to help you to enough of such glory. We are unable to do otherwise and effect anything. Did we not elect Tilden, and did not a combination of tricksters count him out? I believe the men concerned belonged to both parties.

Now, friends, look fairly into this matter. Be a little charitable. Giv the devil his due. There may be some other ox gored. Friend Stebbins in particular let me most earnestly request to cool down his blood. It is too warm, and may bring on disease. He doubtless knows that, having an M.D. as a handle to his name. He has already the chronic grumbles.

The North whipped us—that is all right; but they should not crow so about it, or it will spoil the glory of it, in the eyes of fair-minded people at least.

Yours for justice, W. A. CHILCOTHE.

MARTINDALE DEPOT, N. Y, Nov. 13 1880

BRO. D. M. BENNETT: I hav been longing, as lovers do, to read "Home Again," and grace, mercy, and peace be with you, with the sanctification of your improved health and glowing hopes.

To see you, who had been a prisoner for the faith. I entered your sanctum and saw your pearl of a wife, and a rosy youth you had left in charge, most gentlemanly in deportment. Of him I inquired the object of your paper, and received the answer, The overthrow of the Christian religion. Immediately my heart glowed with a desire to see the sparkle of your eyes, the curl of your lip, and the lightning placidly reposing on the brow of your majesty.

I looked on a multitude of books—the mental tools you use in sapping and mining a myth, the only bliss the dying hav ever had, and prayed, "The God and Father of all, bless thy servant Bennett, his books, paper, and readers, their lives, fortunes, and sacred honors, for thou workest all things after thy good pleasure."

I wish you may be inclined to notice the Liberal statement of the saint and martyr, the evangelical Giordano Bruno, who confessed the Bible to be a book of morals, but not of science, coinciding exactly with Galileo and Sir Isaac Newton.

Wishing you and yours the imperial character of the righteous, and the final triumph in the truth as an heir of the universal brotherhood, I have the honor to subscribe,

Your beloved brother, REV. W. ISAACS LOOMIS.

JOHN'S WAY.—The children from ten to eighty like it.

J. A. MILLER.

I THINK "The Darwins" better than "John's Way."

A. JOHNSON.

Agnostic.

Within the last decade a new word, not yet incorporated into our dictionaries, has been introduced into our vocabulary. Who coined the word I do not know. But it was much needed, and with thinkers finds ready currency. It is the word "agnostic." It is derived from two Greek words, signifying without knowledge. An agnostic has come to mean one who assumes to hav no knowledge of God. There are thousands of people who call themselvs agnostics and there are thousands of people who are agnostics without being aware of it. An agnostic is not, in the proper use of the word, an Atheist. An Atheist is one who denies the existence of a God, who says, "There is no God." An agnostic does not deny the existence of a God. He neither denies nor affirms his existence. He simply says: "I do not know, and I see no reason to believe. There may be a God or there may not be one. I do not know. I hav no faculty by which I can know. Nature and her laws I see and know. Man and the duties of man to man I see and know; but as to God, if there is a God, I know nothing about it." This is the position of the agnostic. As I said, a very large number of people, including some of the finest intellects of the age, are agnostics. Herbert Spencer is their great philosopher. Leslie Stephen is their most aggressiv magazine contributor. Robert Ingersoll is their most popular expounder in this country. WM. H. SPENCER.

The following letter from Mr. Elizur Wright to Miss Lucy Churchill, West Richfield, O., explains itself. Miss Churchill has the badge-pins for sale.

BOSTON, MASS, Oct. 8, 1880.

LUCY L. CHURCHILL: On my recent return from the West I found your letter and beautiful badge-pin waiting for me. I am quite delighted with it, and could not ask for anything better. I fully agree with you as to its utility and importance, as well as its beauty. It is not obtrusiv or ostentatious, but unique and attractiv and comprehensivly Liberal. This round, terragneous globe, so motherly and grand to us, though such a tiny white, blue, and green speck among the immensity of worlds, ought to be unspeakably dear to every man, woman, and child of us. We should be proud, every one of us, to beautify it and wear its image in pure gold on our bosoms. This sign that we embrace the whole of it in our hearts, and mean to do our best to make it a heaven, is the sign to conquer under.

Yours truly, ELIZUR WRIGHT.

The Religion of Reason.

Reason in man is the action of the mental faculties sustained by the moral accountability, if well unfolded in the top brain, as is usually the case where the religious sentiments are activ and strong, which is exemplified more in the feminin mentality than in the masculin.

"What has this definition to do with the religion of reason?" asks the impatient critic or material scientist. We will tell you. The religion of reason, when not softened and refined by the spiritual intuitions, is very liable to be uncharitable, unkind, and sometimes vindictiv and intolerant, its devotees neither seeing or feeling that there is any excuse for not accepting the logic that the cold calculating intellect presents for general acceptance.

"But," says one, "women are more zealous in what they believe to be right than men." Admitting such to be the fact, their knowledge of the value of life, and what it costs in sorrow and suffering to unfold it, as a rule they would never fight with deadly weapons to defend their cherished opinions, even on religious subjects.

"But," says the Materialist, "what is this I hear, that the religious devotee is a reasoner?" Certainly. He reasons in harmony with his mental bias as persistently as yourself. He sees a God to fear, while you recognize only law, natural or unnatural, in harmony with the clearness or obtuseness of your perceptions. And he may be just as sincere in his convictions of right and duty, but less tolerant, because he cannot understand why you should look at life from such a standpoint when you take no stock in the idea of a life after physical dissolution, and seeing your danger, and fearing he pernicious effects of your teachings, he feels in duty bound to try and counteract or destroy your influence, to save the world from being demoralized by your teachings.

If neither are quite right, you are not so far apart as you appear to be. The one claims to worship the divinity of law, the other the divinity or God of the Bible, while both are striving to reach the goal called human happiness.

To those who are sincere in their religious convictions, whether Materialists, Christians, or even Spiritualists, we would say in conclusion, study nature more and books less, and see if you cannot learn to be more tolerant and respectful toward each other while traveling the rugged pathways of life, and all hoping to find in the end a "haven of rest," even though your reasoning faculties compel you to choose different roads to reach the condition or place all hav in view. ## A Way Out of It.

In a tight little schooner there want to sea
Three Jack-tars (there were more than three
If you reckon the whole ship's company).

But the vessel it came to grief, d'ye see,
On a Friday night, as it may be,
And on Saturday morn there were but three.

In a horrible storm they could hardly float
In the small cockel shell that was called a boat;
Still manfully with the gale they fought.

But a storm will shatter the stanchest barks,
When a stiff nor'wester's up to his larks,
And the crew will be meat for man-eating sharks.

So our tars in their boat were well aware
That death—that specter so grisly and spare—
In each of their faces did grimly stare.

Small blame to them then, if, in a scare,
They thought they might just as well prepare,
And get, if they could, to "the land over there."

"Can you pray?" says Jack, "'cause I can't," says he.
Says Bill, "That's hexactly the case with me;"
And Tom groaned, "I guess we're a graceless three."

"Mayhap if we sang a hymn or two,"
Says Jack, "a morsel of good 'twould do;"
But, alas! not a line of a hymn they knew.

Their faces grew pale for affairs looked blue,
Since nothing like worship could one of them do;
And they lacked a most woe-begone, broken-down crew.

At last a light on their gloom did break—
It was Bill from the stern-sheets that cheerily spake—
"I hav it, by Jove! a collection we'll make!"

MORAL.

This moral I draw, after careful reflection—
If 'tis wrong, I am open, of course, to correction;
But the clergy, I know, will indorse the direction—
Though you can't pray or sing, don't forget the collection.

And the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones.—Rev. xxi, 19.

For modes of faith let graceless bigots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right;
In faith and hope the world will disagree,
But all mankind's concern is charity;
All must be false that thwart this one great end;
And all of God that bless mankind, or mend.
—Pope.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1880.

I wish to notify the public that a Mr. Baldwin, of Chicago, also Rhodes & McClure, of the same place, are publishing pamphlet editions of my lectures. All the lectures published by them are grossly inaccurate—filled with mistakes, horribly printed, and outrageously unjust to me. These men are simple literary thieves and pirates, and are obtaining money from the public under false pretenses. I take this course to warn the public that these publications are fraudulent. The only correct copies of my lectures are published by C. P. Farrell. All others are published by people who are willing to steal from me and defraud the public vender. These wretches hav published one lecture under four titles, and several others under two or three.

All of C. P. Farrell's editions of Col. Ingersoll's works, and none others, are sold at this office. D. M. BENNETT.

New and Important Work, entitled
OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY.
BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,
Graduate of the Hygeio Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.

The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,
Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth: price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers by permission to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Association.

Address Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

Superstition in all Ages.
By JOHN MESLIER.
A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.
To Miss Anna Knoop, Dear Madam:
The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"
BY
ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

JUST OUT!

Another Extraordinary Book!

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind.

Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

As if meditation were only possible in a church! edification only to be found in a sermon! Why hold fast by an antiquated, exhausted form at a time and in a state of culture when there flow so many other and more abundant sources of intellectual stimulus and moral invigoration? After all, it is nothing but habit. It is so difficult to think of the place as empty where something used always to stand. Sunday must continue Sunday, and on Sunday one goes to church. As we hav already remarked, we hav no wish to quarrel with anybody, "Let each act up to his own light."—Strauss

Rest, rest! oh giv me rest and peace!
The thought of life that ne'er shall cease
Has something in it like despair,
A weight it is too weak to bear!
Sweeter to this afflicted breast
The thought of never-ending rest!
Sweeter the undisturbed and deep
Tranquility of endless sleep.
—Longfellow.

Old age cannot, from the very law of its nature, conceive itself endowed with the bounding energies of youth, and without that vigor, both of exertion and desire, renewed existence can offer no inspiring charms. Our being upon earth has been enriched by vivid interests and precious joys, and we are deebly grateful for the gift. But we are wearied with one life, and feel scarcely qualified to enter on the claims, even though balanced by the felicities and glories of another. It may be the fatigue of the fancy as well as of the frame; but somehow what we yearn for most instinctivly at last is rest, and the peace which we can imagin the easiest, because we know it best is that of sleep.—W. R. Greg.

And thou, grim power, by life abhorred,
While life a pleasure can afford,
Oh, hear a wretch's prayer!
No more I shrink appalled, afraid;
I court, I beg thy friendly aid
To close this scene of care!
When shall my soul, in silent peace,
Resign life's joyless day?
My weary heart it's throbbing cease,
Cold moldering in the clay?
No fear more, no tear more,
To stain my lifeless face,
Enclasped and grasped
Within thy cold embrace.—Burns.

What crime had Thomas Paine committed that he should hav feared to die? The only answer given is that he denied the inspiration of the scriptures. If this is a crime the civilized world is filled with criminals. The pioneers of human thought, the intellectual masters of the world, the foremost men in every science, the kings of literature and art, those who stand in the front rank of investigation, the men who are civilizing, elevating, instructing, and refining mankind, are to day unbelievers in the dogma of inspiration. Upon this question the intellect of Christendom agrees with the conclusion reached by the genius of Thomas Paine. Centuries ago a noise was made for the purpose of frightening mankind. Orthodoxy is the echo of that noise. —Ingersoll's Vindication.

The improver of natural knowledge absolutely refuses to acknowledge authority, as such. For him, skepticism is the highest of duties: blind faith, the one unpardonable sin. And it cannot be otherwise, for every great advance in natural knowledge has involved the absolute rejection of authority, the cherishing of the keenest skepticism, the annihilation of the spirit of blind faith, and the most ardent votary of science holds his firmest convictions, not because the men he most venerates holds them; not because their verity is testified by portents and wonders; but because his experience teaches him that whenever he chooses to bring these convictions into contact with their primary sense. Nature, whenever he thinks fit to test them by appealing to experiment and to observation, nature will confirm them. The man of science has learned to believe in justification, not by faith, but by verification.—Huxley's "Lay Sermons."

The first and strongest objection I hav to the use of tobacco is its effect upon bodily health. It is a rank poison, and only persistent effort will enable one to learn its use. In time the system adapts itself to the innovation, just as it would to that of arsenic, and then it begins to crave the stimulus, precisely as the constitutions of those who hav become slaves to strong tea or coffee crave their accustomed invigorators. Tobacco lowers the general tone of the whole physical and mental system. No man who uses it can be perfectly well and happy. The spirits will feel depressed, and all natural jubilance of pure, healthy, happy humanity will be lost. He may think he feels well, but it is because he has forgotten what real health is. Then its use predisposes to consumption and cancer, as well as many other diseases. It is always considered as a low and vulgar habit. Clergyman generally use it under protest, and feel criminal in doing so at all, for they know that they are considered to be guides and leaders of the people, and that it is their highest duty to be living examples in their every day conduct and behavior. The president of a great nation like ours should never smoke, chew, or drink. No teacher or parent should be guilty of these habits, for they are leaders and guides, and they cannot guide with a full heart and earnest spirit unless they first walk therein themselves.—E. D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

A gun has no feet yet it can kick.

Buffalo mulattoes are called Buff fellows.

Strong cheese is rank, but hatred is rancor.

"Mr. Ford has an abominable gait; don't you think so?" "No, indeed; I think it is quite handsome, especially since it was painted." "Excuse me, but you don't understand me—I alluded to his carriage." "Why, la me! he has no carriage; he rides in the hoss cars."

At a theater in Dublin a gentleman requested a man in front of him to sit down, adding sarcastically, "I suppose you are aware, sir, that you are opaque." "I shall sit down when it suits me," was the response; "and if you want to handle my name, mind, it's not O'Pake at all, but O'Brien."

When a Boston girl gets miffed at her husband, she says, "Base tyrant, I shall leave thee and fly to my parental home." When a Western girl becomes similarly affected she simply remarks, "Old man, I'm going to git up and git, and if you don't like it, just climb up on your eyebrows and see if you can stop me."

She is beautiful and fair to look upon at any time, but bathed in sorrow's tears, her face is angelic. In his nocturnal rounds ye local found her. With a heart full of tender sympathy, he inquired, between the piteous heart-sobs, the cause of her grief. She lifted a pair of glorious orbs, made to look into man's heart and read love's lore; and while she wiped the pearly drops from her rose-tinted cheek, said, "She's gone, and my heart is broken. The purple cord was severed by a knife in a ruthless hand, and I can lick the galoot that stole my pup." Ye searcher after items passed on with his tender impulses somewhat blunted.

A gentleman of Teutonic extraction came into our office the other day and inquired if we were in. We replied we were.

Said he, "I vant to haf my vife put in der paper."

"How?" we benignly inquired.

"I vant to haf my vife put in der paber," he repeated.

"Oh!" we considerately returned, "you wish your wife advertised."

"Yaas," he retorted.

"You see," he explained, "ve haf lots drooble about dot poy Yawcob. He vas my vife's son by his own fader, und I vas told her, Who vas dot fader? Und she say, 'Dot's not some of your business,' und she vas gedt madt, und dis morning she vent auf mit her fader's house. Now I vandt it in de paber dot she not drust any beebles on my accoundt."

"Has she left your bed and board without cause or provocation?" we sympathetically asked.

"Val," he said, "she dake no pedts mit her, und no lumber too."

"You don't understand," said we; "I mean has she gone away without any reason?"

"Oh, val, I don'd know if she shtay midout soom reason oder not, aber I vant her in der paper so she dondt vas coom pack," said he. "How long she vas in de paber before I can get married again?"

"You can't get married again without first obtaining a divorce," we explained.

"Deforce! vot ish dot?" he asked.

"Why, you must bring her into court and hav a lawsuit; then if the judge thinks she ought not to be your wife any longer, and says so, then you are at liberty to marry again," we replied.

"Got to haf a lawsuit!" cried he, terrified. "Py a tam sight no! I vant no more lawsuit; she haf a lawsuit on me ven ve vas marriet, und if I dondt vas married her she vas coshi me more ash twenty toliar. No, py cracious, I vandt no more lawsuit. I run avay mit my bruder-in-law's vife und cosht me notting. Good-pye." And he was gone.

A colored revival near Little Rock has just resulted rather seriously. Parson Greenleaf, Methodist, and Elder Hawbush, Presbyterian, united their forces and held a union meeting. The preachers worked faithfully, but at the end of one week, and when only five conversions had been effected, the preachers closed the meeting with religious disgust. When the two men began to settle up a dispute arose as to the division of the convert spoils.

"I oughter hab three," insisted the Methodist. "I wucked harder den yer did. My voice is stronger, an' hit had more 'fect."

"No, sah," said the Presbyterian, "I shall hab three myself. Yer may take de figgers ob ebery union meetin' hi' de las' ten yeahs, and yer'll see dat de Metodis' tried ter git away wit de Presbyterians. I'll hab hit said dat yer can't pull de lamb's wool ober my eyes."

Here the congregation sang a hymn, and to make a great effort toward conciliation old knock-kneed Len, the man who used to make breadtrays, prayed.

"I'll tell yer what I'll do," said the Methodist. "I'll gin yer two, an' we'll fling up a bench leg, wet or dry, fur de udder one."

The Presbyterian agreed, but when he picked up a flat bench-leg and spit on it the Methodist minister exclaimed:

"I kicks agin sich perceedins'! Mr. Hawbush, I doan perticular want any truck wid yer, but when I goes ter do de countin' of yer interfere den dar'l be a 'sturbance!"

"Lemmy tell yer," said Hawbush, gripping the bench leg. "I'll be dinged ef I'se ur gwine ter be counted out. I'se been counted out fur justice of de peace four ur five times, an' dinged ef hit ain't gettin' a li tle screr tiresome."

"I'se gwine ter hab three ob dese converts," exclaimed Mr. Greenleaf, as he began to drag two sis er converts toward the door. "Ketch a holt ob Sandy Jones, brudder Simmons," yelled the preacher.

Notes and Clippings.

TRANSLATIONS of Mill, Spencer, and Darwin are common in Japan, where the "Origin of Species" has a large sale.

EVERY pastor in New Albany, Indiana, has preached a sermon declaring that the political campaign in that state was deplorably demoralizing.

How do those people who insist that the Christian graces—forgivness of course included—are dying out explain the phenomenon of the Emperor of Austria sending a congratulatory telegram to Von Moltke on his birthday?

SPIRITUALISTS may count among the accessions to their ranks Prof. Hiram Corson, of Cornell University, who will justly rank among the very first philologists in the country. He believes that since his daughter's death he has on several occasions seen her materialized spirit.

WHATEVER turn affairs take in Ireland this fall and winter, it is a safe prediction that ten years from now the present land-ownership system will be only an ugly memory. Landlordism, as it has hitherto existed in the British islands, is going the way of feudalism.

FIFTY million bushels of wheat is a great year's yield for a single state, but Ohio reaches it this year, and with two and a half millions more on top. Thus far this promises to be the champion wheat score of the year, though Illinois and other rivals of Ohio are yet to get in their final statistics.

WHAT a commentary on the savage destruction of war is furnished by the statement of Quartermaster-General Meigs, that in eighty national cemeteries there are buried the bodies of 147,495 men whose names are still unknown! Of the known there are 170,997, and therefore nearly half these graves are of men of whose identity every trace is gone.

D. C. IVESON, of Connelsville, Pa., went to Scotland to look after an estate which he thought he might hav inherited, arrived there just in time to listen to positiv testimony that he was dead, got one hundred thousand dollars in cash as his inheritance, saw the perjurors sentenced to prison for twelve years, and returned home with the money.

EVER since his release from prison, in 1876, Adrian Gertier has figured as a pretended Roman Catholic priest, imposing upon the clergy wherever he went, hearing confessions and even at times acting as pastor. As soon as exposed under one name he took another and continued his swindling. He is likely now to go to prison again at St. Louis.

THE Rev. Mr. Cox lodged one night in the residence of brother Halley, at Chatanooga, Tenn. At daylight he presented himself at a hotel in his night shirt, and sent a boy to buy a suit of clothes. He says that he walked into the street in a somnambulistic state. Halley said, however, that he kicked the visitor out, in consequence of his conduct toward Mrs. Halley.

VESUVIUS has broken out again and is erupting with something of his ancient vigor, to the great gratification, doubtless, of Prof. Palmieri and to the no less considerable alarm of the shareholders in the railway recently constructed upon his volcanic slopes. But streams of burning lava and showers of scoriæ are not the only perils with which the ascent of this maleficent old mountain is beset.

PROF. BLACKIE of Edinburgh University has made a speech to his students, in which he advocated the study of at least two modern languages and one ancient, as indispensable to culture. The study of one modern language ought to be included in the master of art curriculum. It was foolish to spend one's energies on the subject of "evolution out of an antediluvian rat, or the infinitesimal brain of a preadamite 'slater.'"

THE Harvard "Annex," as the private collegiate instruction of women at Cambridge is called, has made its first annual report. The institution is not officially connected with the college, but the teaching is wholly by college instructors, and is as nearly as possible identical with that of the same departments of the college. There hav been twenty-seven students, two of whom hav withdrawn, four hav taken the regular college examination for the freshman class, and the rest hav only pursued special studies.

THE Rev. George Newbold ran a bakery while pastor of the Methodist church at Bartonville, Canada, and further diversified his pursuits by forging checks. While serving a term of imprisonment for his crimes, at Belleville, he made love to the warden's wife, and on his release eloped with her. On his wedding tour he visited Mansfield, O., and accidentally meeting the Rev. Mr. Gilroy, who had once denounced him, gave that gentleman a sound whipping. He is now to be prosecuted for bigamy because he has three wives.

THE Rev. J. H. Gallahorn and a party of evangelists were conducting revival meetings at Hannibal, Mo. Perfect happiness was their especial theme and their energies were directed to arousing true piety among church members. They were highly successful, and every evening they drew a crowded congregation to the Academy of Music. Suddenly their mission was closed by the publication of a statement, signed by clergymen of several Western places where Gallahorn had labored, that he was a grossly immoral person, and had lately been exposed by a church council.

A SECTION of the German press is at last beginning to admit that the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine was a blunder, and that it is another German Venetia. The immense sums sunk in extending the fortifications of Strasbourg and constructing new ones made a great gap in the war indemnity, and now that it is exhausted their maintenance and that of the army of occupation weigh heavily on the already overburdened finances of the empire. The anniversary of the surrender of Strasbourg was the occasion of numerous articles favorable to restoring the territories wrested from France in exchange for a pecuniary equivalent.

THERE are in Russia about five hundred convents, sheltering over ten thousand monks and nuns, the latter being one-third of the total number of religious. As a rule, the brothers and sisters do not work at all, for all their wants are amply supplied by the pilgrims, who are exclusivly peasants and merchants. Moreover, the monasteries from olden times possess a large quantity of fertil land, which they usually giv to the peasants for cultivation on the condition that the third of the whole crop shall belong to the convent. It is obvious that these modern Levites are more exacting than the ancient ones, who were satisfied with a tithe.

IN a recent letter Mr. Ruskin expresses the opinion that the theater should be educational and not commercial. "Meantime, the one thing I hav to say mainly is that the idea of making money by a theater and making it educational at the same time is utterly to be got out of people's heads. You don't make money out of a ship of the line, nor should you out of a church, nor should you out of a college, nor should you out of a theater. Pay your ship's officers, your church officers, your college tutors, and your stage tutors what will honorably maintain them. Let there be no starring on the stage boards more than on the deck, but the broadside well delivered."

A CLERGYMAN in the west of England gives his experience of a tricycle as a means of locomotion in large country parishes. He says: "My first journey was ten miles, the third forty-two, across Devon into Cornwall. I hav traveled about 800 miles by this time on pleasure trips in North Wales and laterly in Darbyshire, on my work of deputation for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and hav found it a great comfort and pleasure. From seven to eight miles an hour is my speed, and I can do fifty miles per day. I can ride up any hill almost. I carry my portmanteau with me, and carried my boy, aged 12, behind me for thirty-four miles once. If I were in a country place and wished to save a horse I should do so by keeping a tricycle. It wants no grooming, no corn, no tax, no gates. You can leave it at the door of a cottage and want no one to hold it; and, better than all, it has done my health (which was shattered abroad) more good than all the physic I hav swallowed, so I cordially recommend it to clergymen."

THE law which sends a man to the gibbet ought to adopt some means of preventing his making the show he plays so ghastly a part in more disgusting than it naturally is. A Texan butcher, on the scaffold spent an hour haranguing his audience and inviting them to share grace with him and meet him in heaven. When he made a point which particularly tickled his hearers' intellectual palates they saluted it with mild but pronounced applause. If a man demanded leave to execute a song and dance on the drop, or recite the "Heathen Chinee" with the halter at his throat, the request would be denied without hesitation. Neither of those performances would be more unreasonable nor nearly as sickening as the gallows cant is.

How, asks the Popular Science Monthly in an article on the "Future of the Universe," is the heat of the sun maintained? How long has it lasted already? Are there any signs of increase or diminution? After affirming that, in the present state of science, only somewhat vague and unsatisfactory results are possible, Prof. Young holds that, so far as observation goes, we can only say that the outpouring of the solar heat, amazing as it is, appears to hav gone on unchanged through all the centuries of human history. The author thinks that there is some truth in each of the two theories which hav been proposed to account for the sun's fire. As to the first, the impact of meteoric matter, it is quite certain that solar heat is thus produced; but the question is whether the supply of meteoric matter is sufficient to account for any great proportion of the whole. After giving Sir William Thompson's calculation of the amount of heat which would be produced by each of the planets falling into the sun from its present orbit, by which it appears that Jupiter would maintain the sun's present expenditure of energy for 33,254 years, and Mercury for six years and 219 days, and that the collapse of all the planets upon the sun would generate sufficient heat to maintain its supply for nearly 46,000 years; and after estimating that matter equal to only about one-hundredth part of the mass of the earth, falling annually upon the solar surface, would maintain its radiation indefinitly, Prof. Young thinks it improbable, from astronomical reasons, that any such quantity of matter can be supposed to reach the sun. So large a quantity of matter would necessitate a vastly greater quantity circulating around the sun, between it and the planet Mercury. But if there were near the sun meteoric matter equaling, for example, the mass of the earth, it ought to produce an observable effect on the motions of Mercury, and no such effect has yet been detected. Astronomers, therefore, failing to find a full explanation of the cause of solar energy in this hypothesis, hav adopted a second one, which is that the sun's diameter is slowly contracting, and that the gaseous mass is gradually liquefying and becoming solid. The conclusion is drawn that if this theory be correct there must come a time when there will be no solar heat, as there has also been a time when it began. How far forward is the end? how far backward the beginning? Newcomb is authority for the statement that with its present radiation the sun will shrink to half its present diameter in about five million years. Reduced to this size, and eight times as dense as now, it would cease to be mainly gaseous, and its temperature would begin to fall. Hence Newcomb assigns as the term during which the sun can supply heat enough to support life on the earth, as we know life, a period of ten million years. The writer somewhat more confidently casts his eye backward, and concludes that the sun cannot hav been emitting heat at the present rate for more than eighteen million years if its heat has been generated in the manner described. If the sun has contracted from a diameter even many times larger than that of Neptune's orbit to its present dimensions, as is probably true in the main, "we are inexorably shut up to the conclusion that the total life of the solar system, from its birth to its death, is included in some such space of time as thirty millions of years; no reasonable allowance for the fall of meteoric matter," etc. "could raise it to sixty millions." The possibility of collision with wandering stars, and the suggestion of ways as yet unconceived of for restoring wasted energy, are followed by the statement that "the present order of things appears to be limited in either direction by terminal catastrophes which are veiled in clouds as yet impenetrable."

Letter from Europe.—No. 14.

THE CHURCHES OF ROME.

ROME, Oct. 1, 1880.

MY DEAR FRIENDS: There is so much to be told you about this city that I hardly know where to begin. Here are many palaces filled with works of art of the highest merit; many villas most worthy of mention; many galleries and museums overflowing with paintings, statuary, antiquities, and curiosities; many features of the city interesting to know about; but I cannot do justice to all of them in one letter. As places of worship attract me lately, I will in this letter talk about the churches of this city.

Last Sunday morning, feeling more religious than usual, I resolved I would go to church and mingle with the godly in this very godly city. But where should I go? It required but a very short time to decide. It should be St. Peter's, at the Vatican, the largest and richest church in all Christendom. So I started out with a sober countenance and with as many saintly airs as could be expected of an American Infidel so far from home.

I was somewhat surprised to find so many stores open and such a great number of Christian people acting as though they considered Sunday just as good as any other day. Hundreds of stores were not only open, but pedlers and hawkers were lustily crying their wares on the streets. I marveled that in the eternal city where Jahveh has a vicegerent to attend to his business such desecration should be allowed.

St. Peter's is on the west side of the muddy Tiber, and near the border of the city. It is fronted by a rather poor class of buildings. The Piazza San Pietro, the largest in the city, is nearly surrounded by an imposing circular colonnade, and in the center are a large Egyptian obelisk and two fine fountains, which were playing away that pleasant morning as though it is not wicked for water to run on Sunday. The two halves of the colonnade which flank the piazza, which must be some four hundred feet in diameter, have 284 columns and 88 square buttresses. On the cornices are the statues, larger than life size, of 126 saints. On the façade of the church are the statues of Jesus and the twelve apostles. At one corner of a flight of stone steps, perhaps 150 feet in length, leading up to the sacred edifice is a colossal statue of St. Peter holding the key of heaven in his hand and wearing a serious expression on his countenance. At the opposite corner is a similar marble statue meant for St. Paul, but it is much larger and finer-looking than Paul is represented to have been. I passed close beside St. Peter and said "Good morning" to him, but he paid no attention to it. I was neither disappointed nor offended.

The obelisk is eighty-three feet high and weighs 500 tons. It once stood in the circus of Nero, which occupied the site where the church now stands. It was brought from Heliopolis in Egypt. There are six or eight obelisks in the city, and this is the only one that has not been overthrown. Of course it is surmounted by the cross, and that makes it a good Christian institution.

The piazza, with all its surroundings, presents a most magnificent appearance, and it ought to, for the colonnades, the statues, the fountains, and the pavement cost a sum of money equal to $1,000,000.

On this ground, it is said, Nero showed cruelty to Christians, and St. Peter here suffered martyrdom. It is claimed that the original edifice on this ground was founded by Constantine, and was erected in the form of a basilica, with nave, double aisles, and transept. It is also claimed that in the year 800, at Christmas, Charlemagne there received the Roman imperial crown from the hands of Pope Leo III., and numerous emperors and popes were subsequently crowned there. In the course of time, however, the edifice became so much damaged that Pope Nicholas V. determined to rebuild it, and in 1450 made some beginning. Half a century later Julius II. resumed the tardy operation. The original design of the architect Bramante was a Greek cross, surmounted by a dome in the center. Under Leo X. Raphael deviated from this design by substituting a Latin for a Greek cross. Raphael had charge of the work till his death in 1520. Different designs were afterward made, and in 1564 Michael Angelo took charge of the work, and returned to the Greek cross of Bramante. Numerous changes were made, and many difficulties encountered, but about the beginning of the seventeenth century it was so far completed as to be pronounced a marvel of architectural skill. The façade only was wanting, and this under pope Paul V. was supplied by Fontana in 1629. The nave was extended to the front, and thus the Latin cross was completed. Under Alexander VII. Bernini added the great colonnades at the sides of the façade in order to enhance its effects. It was consecrated by Pope Urban VIII., November 18, 1656, on the thirteen hundredth anniversary of the day on which St. Silvester is claimed to have consecrated the original edifice. The church, with the sacristy, which was built under Pius VI., cost over $50,000,000. Its area is 212,321 square feet, while the cathedral at Milan is 117,678; St. Paul's at London, 108,982; St. Sophia at Constantinople, 96,497; and the cathedral at Cologne, 73,903 square feet. Its interior length is 615 feet, or including the walls, 640 feet. Inside breadth, 448 feet. Hight to the top of the cross on the dome, 448 feet. Its principal front is 380 feet wide, and 148 feet high. There are three principal doors, and two lesser ones, all of bronze, covered with bas-reliefs. These open into the vestibule, and corresponding with them are the same number opening into the church proper. One of them, the Porta Santa, is opened only on the jubilee, every twenty-five years. It will next be opened in 1890. The vestibule is 470 feet long, by 50 deep, and has equestrian statues of Constantine and Charlemagne. Upon entering it one is overwhelmed with its magnitude and magnificence.

The mind enlarges as the eye becomes familiar with the details, when, as Byron said:

> "The mind,
> Expanded by the genius of the spot,
> Hath grown colossal."

Its immensity and its richness are most impressive features. The interior is wholly lined with the finest polished marbles of a great number of varieties, the gloss of which has a wonderful effect. The floor is also polished marble, and composed of thousands of pieces fitted together in figures with the greatest skill. Everything is large and in proportion to the house. The two not large looking cherubs which hold the holy water basin are six feet high, and other figures are in proportion. The angels and other statues on the corners of the arches and the capitals of the pillars sit very carelessly, with their legs hanging over, as though they did not care how much they showed them.

The pen of St. Mark in the great dome is five feet long, yet it only looks to be about the right size for a quill pen. This dome and the ten smaller cupolas in the aisles and transept afford sufficient light. There are no stained glass windows.

There are three aisles; the middle one being eighty feet broad and one hundred and forty-three feet high to the top of the vault, which is enriched by sunken paneling, gilding, and figures, copied from the pagan Temple of Peace. Four arches, forty feet wide, run down each side of the aisles, with piers faced by pilasters and niches, medallions, and arms of the different popes. Two statues representing Virtues over the round of each arch are fifteen feet high.

Mendelssohn thus speaks of this edifice: "The building surpasses all power of description. It appears to me like some great work of nature—a forest, a mass of rocks, or something similar, for I never can realize the idea that it is the work of man. You strive to distinguish the ceiling as little as the canopy of heaven. You lose your way in St. Peter's; you take a walk in it and ramble till you are quite tired. When divine service is performed and chanted there you are not aware of it till you come quite close. The angels in the baptistry are monstrous giants; the doves colossal birds of prey. You lose all idea of measurement with the eye, or proportion; and yet who does not feel his heart expand when standing under the dome and looking up at it? I went to the very farthest end, whence there was indeed a wonderful coup d'œil. When the music commences, the sounds do not reach you for a long time, and echo and float in the vast space so that the most singular and vague harmonies are borne toward you."

The great cupola is double, with a staircase between the inner and outer shell, for ascending it. The diameter of this "vast and wondrous dome" is 138 feet, the hight 195 feet. From the marble pavement to the top of the round inside is 333 feet or 412 clear to the highest point. Around it is the text, "Te es Petrus, et super hanc Petram," etc., each letter being the hight of a man. It is adorned with saints in mosaic and is lighted from above and from the altar below. In the sanctum is the mosaic of God himself, the veritable Jahveh of whom we have heard so much, but of whom nothing is known. Says Furgusson, "There is a simplicity and grandeur about the roof of the nave which goes far to redeem the bad taste of the arches which support it; and the four great vaults of the nave, transepts, and choir, opening into a dome of the dimensions and beauty of proportion of that of St. Peter's, form together one of the most sublime architectural conceptions that the world has ever seen, and one worthy of the principal temple of the Christian religion."

Seven steps lead to the high altar, which is eighty-six feet high, under a bronze canopy, or baldacchino, on spiral columns one hundred feet high, made from metal taken from the Pantheon, the gilding of which alone cost $40,000. Under the high altar is the tomb of St. Peter, a wide staircase descending to it. Here the bones of the saint are said to be buried, as well as those of St. Paul. Nine lamps are always burning around the tomb. I counted one hundred and twenty-four burning lamps. It cannot be said that the bones of the saints are not sufficiently provided with lamp oil. On Good Friday the church is darkened and but a few of the lamps around the tomb are allowed to burn. The effect is said to be unique. Near the last pier of the aisle on the right is a statue of St. Peter, said to be the work of the fifth century, but it is most likely to be nearer the fifth century before Christ, for it is stoutly claimed that it is a statue of Jupiter, re-christened Peter. At all events, his foot has been kissed so much that it is nearly worn away. The Pope kisses it every Friday in Lent.

It is claimed that 135 popes are buried in St. Peter's, and the ornaments in mosaic, marble, and bronze in the chapels of this great temple are almost endless. Many of the mosaics, which are so well done as to look like paintings, are copied from the originals in the Vatican, the cost of each being $30,000. Inscriptions of the names of the popes, their age, time of death, etc., are in large marble tablets over their tombs, or on the wall above.

Beginning at the right of the entrance, the chapels, altars, and objects of notice may be briefly stated as follows:

First chapel. M. Angelo's celebrated marble group of the Virgin holding the dead Christ on her knees, called a Pieta.

Crucifix chapel. A fine fresco called the triumph of the cross. Also monuments of Leo XII. and Queen Christina of Sweden.

Sebastian chapel. A fine mosaic of the martyrdom of St. Sebastian. Also tombs of Innocent XII. and the famous Countess Matilda.

Sacrament chapel. A fresco of the Trinity and of the descent from the cross, tomb of Sixtus IV., Julius II., monuments of Popes Gregory XIII and XIV.

Madonna, or Gregory chapel. Tomb of Gregory XVI., with a rich altar.

St. Jerome chapel. Mosaic of the communion of St. Jerome.

St. Basil chapel. The tomb of Benedict XIV.

St. Wenceslau's chapel in the north transept.

St. Proceesus chapel. A mosaic of the martyrdom of Sts. Processus and Martiniano.

St. Erasmus chapel. The martyrdom of St. Erasmus.

Navicella chapel. Bark of St. Peter; tomb of Clement XIII., with allegorical figures of Religion and Genius; also two lions, the sculpture of which occupied Canova eight years.

St. Michael's chapel. Guido's St. Michael the archangel.

St. Petronella chapel. A very fine mosaic of St. Petronella and the tomb of Clement X.

Sts. Peter and Tabitha chapel. A fine mosaic by Costanzi.

Upper end of the church. Angelo's Tribune of St. Peter; the gilt bronze chair of St. Peter, enclosing a more ancient wooden chair supported by four doctors of the church. The tomb of Paul III., with a bronze of the Pope and marble figures of Justice and Prudence. The former was naked at first, and was so much admired that Bernini was employed to furnish her with a decent robe; tomb of Urban VIII., with figures of Justice and Charity.

Sts. Peter and John's chapel. A mosaic of the cure of the cripple, and tomb of Alexander VII., with a gilt copper statue, Vanni's Simon Magus, on slate.

St. Thomas' chapel. A mosaic of the unbelief of Thomas, Ananias, and Sapphira.

St. Peter's chapel. Crucifixion of St. Peter.

St. Leo chapel. Bas-reliefs of Attila.

The Virgin chapel. The blessed Virgin.

St. Francis' chapel. St. Francis.

Sts. Peter and Andrew chapel. Opposite the Sacristy.

Transfiguration chapel. A mosaic copy of Raphael's transfiguration.

Gregory the Great chapel. A mosaic of the miracle of St. Gregory; tombs of Pius VII., Innocent IX., and Leo XI.; figures of Strength and Wisdom.

Choir chapel, close by Della Porta's gilt bronze gate. A mosaic of the conception, tombs of Pius VIII. and Innocent VIII.

Presentation chapel. Several mosaics.

Stuart tombs. Erected at the cost of George IV., of England, including the Pretender, styled James III., and his two sons, the chevalier, Charles III. and Cardinal York, Henry XI. Executed by Canova. They were naked figures at first, but were covered in 1850. Tomb of the chevalier's widow, Maria Sobieski, countess of Albany.

Baptistry. Three mosaics. A porphyry vase font. Here are several very remarkable relics, among which may be named the column claimed to be from the temple in Jerusalem against which Jesus leaned when he was teaching. This is kept locked behind a railing. A part of the true cross; the spear which pierced Jesus' side; the head of St. Andrew. His ribs are in one of the churches of St. Mary; his leg is at the church of the saints and apostles. Thus poor Andrew is pretty extensively scattered. In the baptistry is also that celebrated handkerchief of St. Veronica, on which the likeness of Jesus was photographed when he wiped his face with it. This is only shown to the faithful once a year, in Holy Week, and then it is held at such a distance that nothing more can be discovered than though it were a piece of a shirt. But it answers all purposes. The faithful look upon it with great veneration.

The Sacristy was built under Pius VI., in 1776, and is in three parts, and a rich passage leads to it from the church. At the entrance are statues of St. Andrew, St. Peter, and St. Paul. In the middle room are paintings of the Virgin and numerous saints; in the chapter room are old frescoes and three paintings by Giotto. The richly-carved wooden presses are full of rich robes, vestments, altar-cloths, plate, etc., among which are Charlemagne's coronation robe, crucifixes, salvers, and cups, given by the Stuarts; and the seal ring of the last pope, a new one being made for each.

The crypt comprises the Grotte Vecchie and Nuove (under the dome), in a space of eleven feet high between the pavements of the old and new church; the Grotte Vaticane, to which women are not admitted, and four chapels corresponding with the four great piers of the dome, adorned with mosaics. Here are tombs of Otho II., Charlotte II. of Jerusalem and Cyprus, Christina of Sweden, Adrian IV., Boniface VIII., Nicholas V., Urban VI., Pius II., and an ancient carved sarcophagus of Bassus, prefect of Rome, who died in 359.

The tombs of the popes and others are very elaborate in artistic work, and must have cost thousands of dollars each. Most of the altars have heavy marble railings in front, carved with great skill, and all highly polished, nave, banisters, ornamentations and all.

Something should also be said of the exterior of this edifice. The west end is 162 feet high, composed of a gigantic order of Corinthian pilasters 108 feet high on a base of 15 feet, with an attic of 39 feet. The acanthus leaves of the capitals are seven feet high. This order is repeated all around the building. There are 748 columns and pilasters inside and outside, and the edifice contains 390 statues. It is asserted that the stone and masonry of the foundation below the surface of the earth equals what is above.

The ascent of the dome is made by three galleries of 142 steps inside the cupola, between the outer and inner walls, twenty feet apart. The bronze ball at the top holds six persons at a time, being seven and a half feet in diameter. The cross is thirteen feet high. In 1750 two Spanish monks were up there during the shock of an earthquake, and one of them died from sheer fright.

At the west end, on the north side of the altar, are slabs in the wall commemorating the decree of December 8, 1854, when the new dogma of the immaculate conception was proclaimed to satisfy the superstitions and longings of the Catholic world, with the names of the prelates who were present. Father Passaglia, a learned Jesuit, who was delegated to write in defense of the new dogma, is the same who, having since written against the temporal power of the pope, had his papers seized by the Inquisition, but fortunately made his escape from Rome in time, by the help of some English friends, and afterward took up his residence at Turin, where he published a paper which circulated among some ten or twelve thousand priests opposed to the temporal power. But one or two hundred years ago, for the same offense, he would have been hunted down and his life taken.

Here also the ceremony of the canonization of the twenty-seven martyrs who were put to death in Japan in 1597 was attended by nearly three hundred cardinals and prelates, and three thousand clergy, in 1862, on Whit-Sunday. The expense of the ceremony, which amounted to nearly $50,000, was borne by the Franciscans, to which order the murdered belonged; it included 57,000 lbs of wax candles for illuminating the church. Medals were struck on which Religion, with the cross, palm, tiara, and keys, looks to twenty-seven stars in the heavens, with the motto, Sanctorum mater quos dat nova sidera cœlo. The church was decorated in tawdry style, having the pilasters covered with paper of different colors, and the arches with silk and velvet, and heavy with extemporized frescoes of the sufferings of the martyrs. Pasquin said of this display of upholstery that the pope was to leave and had already packed up St. Peter's.

At the time of the canonization the procurator kneeled before the pope, entreating him earnestly—instantly—to comply with the wishes of the church and canonize the martyrs, but the intimation from above—the revelation from the Holy Ghost—had not yet been received. Dr. Wordsworth describes the event in this way: "They must pray again for it. The procurator must again kneel before the pope and reiterate his entreaty, earnestly and more earnestly—instanter et instantius. But still the petition is not granted; he must wait longer and must pray again. Then the pontiff himself invokes the Holy Spirit; he intones, Veni Creator Spiritus. The procurator repeated his petition for the third time, earnestly, more earnestly, and most earnestly—instanter, instantius, et instantessime—that the martyrs may be enrolled by the pope in the catalogue of the saints, and venerated as such by all the faithful of Christ. Then at length the Roman pontiff, having his mitre on his head and sitting on his throne at the west end of the church, with long lines of cardinals, archbishops, and bishops ranged on his right hand and on his left, pronounced in Latin the memorable words which constituted those twenty-seven murdered Franciscan monks as real and true saints of the canon. He then struck up the Te Deum, and after it was completed he, without scruple, prayed to those he had just made saints, Orate pro nobis."

Many singular performances have taken place in St. Peter's in the name of the religion of Jesus which, to your irreligious minds, would seem supremely ridiculous. Many times has the edifice been illuminated at night, outside and in, in the most elaborate manner, and at an expense of large sums of money. This has taken place more particularly on Easter Sunday and the festival of Corpus Christi (body of Christ), but I will not detain you to listen to a recital of them.

But perhaps I ought to finish what I set out to tell you of my attending divine worship there last Sunday. I was very busy looking at the magnificence of the structure, and thinking how much it surpassed anything I had seen in all the cathedrals and churches I have visited, when the peals of the organ and the singing of the choir broke pleasantly upon my ears, coming from the grand chapel of the Sacred Heart. I immediately made steps in that direction and perceived at once that worship was being performed. Some dozen candles, eight or ten feet tall, including the candlesticks, were burning on the altar, and six venerable priests were officiating before the altar and going through more ceremonies and queer performances than you can imagine, and eight and forty more priests were sitting in seats on either side of the chapel, a room large enough to hold eight hundred people. The priests all had a white thin garment over their black gowns, which may be called an overshirt with short flaps and a fringe on the lower edge. Three or four of those before the altar, in addition to the overshirts, wore a white blanket coming down before and behind nearly to their feet, with figures in gold, and a cross, also of gold, on the back. These blankets, the technical name of which perhaps is stole, were of a light color. The priests were nearly all gray-headed men, and one older than the rest seemed to be master of ceremonies. Another often would take a turn and let the first one rest. A good share of the performance consisted in chanting Latin out of a very large book, called a missal, I think; and after the most officious priest had chanted a few sentences, the choir, up by the organ, consisting of some fifteen men, would come in with a rousing chorus, or repetition, and in most splendid style; and so they took turns, first the old priest, and then the choir, just as though they were trying to see which could excel. I must say I liked the choir music much the best. Their singing was excellent, and the organ was sonorous and powerful. I believe, however, I should have esteemed the music higher had I not detected the leader and the soprano, between pieces, crowding snuff up their noses at a fearful rate. Yes, I said soprano, for you must understand that though the choir was all masculine individuals, they had very good soprano singing, and the voices seemed to reach the highest notes.

I cannot understand why our Roman brethren allow no female singers in their choirs. Christians who have generously placed a woman among their gods ought surely to let women help do the singing. But they don't do it. The women are permitted to confess to the priests, to give them all the money they can raise, and to cross themselves with holy water, burn blessed candles, and once in a while have a taste of the consecrated wafers—which by the process of transubstantiation become actually the body of Christ. Yes, they may do all these things, but they must take very little other part in conducting the ceremonies of worship. I think I have seen no women singing in the choirs since I have been in Europe, but I believe I have seen hundreds of thousands standing on their knees on the stone pavement, half an hour together, while the priests chanted the Latin. I do not like that sort of religion. The women ought to have an equal share with the men in the honors as well as in the menial parts. I think women sing in Catholic churches in America, but I have not seen it in Italy, though the Italian women surpass the world at singing.

The priests kept up these senseless ceremonies for an hour or more. Sometimes they would stand in single file before the altar, one directly behind the other, and then they would spread around, dropping on one knee every time they passed before the center of the altar. Often one of them would face about and hold up his hands and look extremely solemn. Then one of the supernumeraries would take the big book from one side of the altar and place it on the other side. After a while a book rack was brought out and placed some ten feet in front of the altar; the book was placed upon it, and then another priest read and chanted out of it for a few minutes, when, as though it was not light enough with the bright sun pouring right into the room, six more priests came from a private door, each bringing a tall lighted candle, and marched around like soldiers in certain military evolutions. Next, as though one of the old priests that had the blankets on was not warm enough, an extra blanket was brought forth and placed over the one already worn. This additional blanket had a large golden sun sending out rays, big enough to cover his whole back. This seemed to impart new courage to the priest, and he chanted more vigorously than ever. When he appeared to tire, another took it up and chanted for awhile. And then three of the priests that had the white blankets on seemed to need rest, so they sat down in three pontifical-looking chairs with tall backs, and behind each chair stood an attendant, who dexterously caught the ends of the long white blankets and placed them over the back of the chair so that they hung smoothly. Soon the choir came in again, with a fine burst of music, the basso and male soprano especially distinguishing themselves. After the three priests had rested ten minutes or so they all got up and resumed their chanting.

A little flagon of wine was brought out, and some poured into a tall glass or goblet; then the priest with two blankets made motions over the wine, said some Latin words to it, held it up before the Virgin nearly as high as he could reach, and then turned around toward the audience. I watched closely to see if it was going to be passed around, but it was not; the priest drank it himself, and none of the rest of us got any.

Soon after this the smoke-pot, I mean the censer, was brought forth, and it was in good condition for service. One of the priests took it and swung it around as though he enjoyed the exercise, and let the holy smoke go over the altar, over the image of the dead Jesus, and over the picture of the Virgin, and over the tall candles, and then he went to the seats where the eight and forty priests were quietly sitting and smoked them, a row at a time, and they bowed very gracefully as a token of acknowledgment for the smoke. This of course took some little time, and I think the choir were doing some good singing. Next, another priest who had before taken but little share in the exercises stood before the altar, and the priest who had been ministering went to him and seemed to impart something to him. It might have been blessing, or unction, or a little bit of the Holy Ghost, but I could not help thinking of the play of "button, button, who's got the button," which I used to play half a century ago. One priest imparted what seemed to be something to the other, whereupon the second went to the end of one of the long benches on which the eight and forty priests were seated, and imparted to the one at the end what he had received, and the last turned and gave it to his next neighbor, and he to the next, and so on till all the rows and all the individuals were served; the giving and receiving was performed until all had been served with the mysterious something or nothing, whatever it was, but probably the latter.

At this juncture the choir took off their overshirts and filed out, and all the priests about the altar betook themselves to their private apartments. But the eight and forty priests sitting on the seats, who had hitherto taken but small share in the worship, began by singing and chanting short sentences in Latin. Four and twenty priests, sitting on one side, would sing a sentence of a dozen or more syllables, when the four and twenty priests sitting on the other side would repeat what seemed to be the same, but in a somewhat modified tone. This went on for some fifteen minutes, and began to grow a little monotonous, when the chanting was changed, and they seemed to hold a sort of dialogue, one side chanting something and the other replying. They had good voices, and they sang loudly. One old priest, over six feet tall, had a most powerful base voice, and he let it out very freely. In fact, he was so tremendous with his deep, heavy tones that I watched him rather intently, and it seemed to annoy him, for I saw him whispering to his next neighbor as though he did not like it. At length they finished, and the last amen was sounded (the a in amen sounded ah), and they left the chapel, and soon the metal doors were closed and locked. I was again

The New Liberal League

RICHMOND, IND.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I can indorse and co-operate with any new movement calculated to advance the Liberal cause, but whether the recent enterprise set on foot by Ingersoll, Green & Co is likely to hav that effect may be a matter of some doubt unless it shall occupy new ground necessary to advance the call or adjust the sphere of the old one. But the call does not seem to indicate such results, but rather makes the platform so narrow that it seems to be restricted to one idea, "the secularization of the state."

It seems to me that Liberalism should embrace a broader field, and that we should labor in every channel accessible to enlighten the public mind on the evils and immoral tendencies of the great theological juggernaut which now curses the world and expose its machinations and hideous meanness. I do not think we should be restricted in our discussions simply to the separation of church and state, or refrain from writing and talking on questions which legitimately belong to the Liberal movement, or which properly grew out of it and as evidenly constitute a part of it.

As for the repeal of the Comstock laws, I never could see that it is a question which Liberals should quarrel about. It seems to be admited by all parties that laws imposing legal penalties on obscene literature are not improper or unnecessary. Then why should not the question be simply discussed and settled, "What kind of laws and penalties do we need?" That being determined, the next question would be, "Shall we modify the Comstock laws, or shall we supersede them with others?" and that point should be settled by an examination of those laws. Thus the thing could be easily disposed of. Col. Ingersoll seems to be the leader of the new party, but I do not fancy him much for a leader; he is too arbitrary and aristocratic.

KERSEY GRAVES.

REMARKS.—Like Mr. Graves, we entertain a friendly feeling toward every Liberal movement and organization, and wish not to oppose them, even if in some respects they seem narrow and fail to grasp all the great questions before the country, or which are impressed more especially upon Liberals. May we never become so illiberal as not to bear a friendly feeling toward every movement that advances the cause of Liberalism. Every effort that tends in the right direction helps on the cause of truth.

It is not clear that Col. Ingersoll is the leader of what Mr. Graves terms "the new party," which assembled at Chicago on the 15th inst., nor is there grounds for deciding that he would not make a very efficient leader. He certainly possesses the requisit ability and popularity. From the report, however, re-published on page 763, from the Chicago Times, it does not appear that Col. Ingersoll was in attendance. He is not among the forty-four persons whose names are announced as being present, and no mention is made of a word said by him. Possibly other business prevented his attendance.

In reading the report of what was said and done at the meeting of this new Liberal party, it seems their leading wish is to co-operate with clergymen and the churches, or, at all events, to do nothing in opposition to their wishes and interests. If this is the ultimate object and effect of Liberalism, many of us hav been mistaken in its character. To many it will seem like a decided softening down and modification of old-fashioned Liberalism to desert such men as Elzur Wright, Parker Pillsbury, J. P. Mendum, Horace Seaver, James Parton, T. B. Wakeman, and thousands of others pulling in the same direction, and show a special desire to affiliate with the Rev. Mr. Spear of an orthodox church, Henry C. Bowen's Independent, an outspoken orthodox paper, and to be sure to say and do nothing that may offend the churches and their clergymen. Many will regret to learn that this movement is a natural evolution of Liberalism or Freethought. It may be a matter of moral economy to trade off old friends for new ones, but it may also be well to be sure that the new friends are really the best, and that they are ready to rush into the arms of their new Liberal brothers and that they are disposed to co-operate with unbelievers and Freethinkers. If certain Liberals are more anxious to co-operate with the churches than with Liberals, and do not want to say a word in opposition to the churches, it is suggested that it would simplify matters very much for those feeling that way to join the churches and become in full accord with them.

As to the Comstock postal laws, perhaps enough has heretofore been said in these columns to indicate the light in which they are held. Thousands of the Liberals of the country regard those laws as the most positiv instance of the co-operation of church and state that has taken place in this country since the foundation of the government. Those laws were devised in the Young Men's Christian Association of this city; their agents went to Washington, and by foul means secured their passage; an ecclesiastical society has taken upon itself the manipulation and execution of those laws, influencing and controling the highest courts of the government and seeking the destruction of several Liberal editors and publishers who held doctrins and uttered convictions not approved by this ecclesiastical society. To carry out this sectarian warfare against unbelievers and Freethinkers, the postal department, which belongs to the entire people of the country, has been degraded into an instrument of espionage and decoy; and a censorship of the press has been set up in this free land as subversiv of the principles of liberty and as repugnant to the true lovers of mental freedom as anything that exists in Russia to-day.

The agent of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the prime mover in the decoying ecclesiastical society alluded to, did say before a meeting of an auxiliary society in Rochester that Infidel publications and Infidel tracts would soon be suppressed. He did say before another auxiliary society in Boston that the publishers of the Investigator and the Banner of Light would soon be taken in hand and disposed of. He did make threatening denunciations against Freethought literature before another auxiliary society in St. Louis; and in this city, Samuel Colgate, the president of the society, before an annual meeting of the members, expressly said that attention was being paid to Freethought publications and that they would soon be stamped out. The secretary of the same ecclesiastical and persecuting society incorporated the same language into his annual report, which was printed and circulated in pamphlet form. Nothing is more true than that it was the settled purpose of this ecclesiastical society, and by the aid of the unconstitutional laws alluded to, with the powerful force of the United States courts, to crush out Freethought publications and publishers. Five Freethought publishers were under these laws arrested, convicted, and sentenced to fines and imprisonment, save Dr. Foote, who was fined $3,500 and the imprisonment waved. A sixth Liberal editor is now under arrest in Iowa. His trial is set for January, and his enemies of the church are determined to thrust the poor man into prison. His only offense has been to publish in his paper a harmless radical story exposing some of the wrongs of society. Is it strange in view of all this that thousands of our liberty-loving Liberals east and west strongly protested against those laws and asked for repeal? Is it not to be regretted that in consequence of such expression of honest purpose good Liberals like Col Ingersoll, H. L. Green, and a few more should get in high dudgeon and forsake the friends of a lifetime to make a union with reverends and the church? If they find better friends among the clergy we shall surely hav no grounds to mourn.

This cry of "obscenity" is the most dishonest one ever raised. There is not a good Liberal in the United States in favor of obscenity or who wishes to see it spread broadcast. It is certainly to be regretted that the cry of obscenity should frighten lifelong Libersls and cause them to cringe before Mrs. Grundy and to advocate a species of legislation absolutely subversiv of the highest principles of American liberty. It is to he regretted that respectability should, with some Liberals, outweigh principle and right.

Col. Ingersoll had the fairness to admit that the Liberal League does not advocate obscenity, and in this was more fair than some of his compeers. The League passed the strongest resolutions in favor of punishing real obscenity, but objected to the general government and the postal department being made tools of for the purpose in the hands of an ecclesiastical society, the same as they are in favor of murder, arson, and other crimes against society being punished by the proper authorities, but not by the interference of an ecclesiastical society, to manipulate the courts in its sectarian and intolerant spirit. The League is in favor of all crimes of the country being duly punished by the state authorities, and is opposed to the general government and the postal department—by the intrigues of this ecclesiastical society—being converted into a detectiv police force to hunt down heretical offenders and to authorize one part of the community to examin, condemn, and throw out the mail matter of other portions of the community.

This question is a much more important one than many affect to think it; and it is not a cheerful omen to see Liberals willing to shout in favor of these Comstock laws expressing their willingness to co-operate with ecclesiastical bodies in enforcing them. It is most sure that in taking this course they take very different ground from that occupied by the leading earnest and intelligent Freethinkers of England, who are fully in sympathy with the position taken by the National Liberal League.

We trust that peace and harmony may prevail in the ranks of American Liberals. We regret the division that occurred, and hope that a union may again take place, when all true lovers of mental liberty may work in harmony in opposing ecclesiastical intolerance and superstition, and strive to advance mental liberty and human happiness.

A Few Plain Words.

DEAR PATRONS: Please take no offense at the following. They are simply words of truth, and the plain truth ought not to giv offense to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Over four thousand of you are in arrears for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and many for a year or more. This neglect on your part to pay promptly has embarrassed me very much. I am owing over $2,500 for paper alone, with corresponding amounts for printing, stereotyping, book-binding, etc. These debts are overdue, but I hav not been able to pay up because you hav not paid me. Will you not be kind enough to square up to the end of the year at least, so I can pay my debts and hav a little in hand to meet my heavy weekly expenses?

I hav followed the rule to continue the paper after the time paid for has expired; this I hav done because I wished to retain your patronage, and because I believed all true Liberals would be honorable enough to pay for the paper for the time it was sent to them. Hundreds hav thanked me for doing this, while some hav seen fit to make me lose by the confidence thus reposed in them. Every person is morally and legally bound to pay for the paper as long as he takes it from his post-office, whether he has ordered it to be sent or not. If he does not wish the paper, and does not intend to pay for it, he should not take it from the post-office, but request his postmaster to return it.

Yes, dear friends, those of you who are in arrears, please remit, and thus make me happy.

It is to be desired that you all wish to see THE TRUTH SEEKER liv and flourish. Its Christian enemies hav wished to crush it, and for this reason I was cast into prison. You kindly prevented this sad fate, but do not now let it die at the hands of its friends. Will not every patron and friend resolve that it shall liv? A little help from each of you will accomplish this end. Three dollars per year is not a heavy tax, and it is to be hoped you each feel that you obtain your money's worth. In no way are the principles of Liberalism more thoroughly and more economically spread over the country than by Radical papers. There is no paper more Radical than THE TRUTH SEEKER, and none that givs so much reading matter for the same money. It does not seek to co-operate with the church nor to gain the friendship of the priesthood. It is strongly opposed to ecclesiasticism, to supernaturalism, and to the dogmas of theology. These it will vigorously oppose in the future as it has in the past. It will advocate the truths of science and the measures best calculated to promote the welfare of the human family. It will serve as a medium of exchange between the Liberals of the entire country, and as a bond of union to join them in one harmonious whole. Let every lover of Liberalism resolve that THE TRUTH SEEKER shall be a living, permanent institution.

Those who hav been dunned for what they do not owe will please regard it as an error. Clerks do not always keep accounts correctly; they are kept on the mailing list, and errors sometimes occur. An account once paid is all that is asked for. When it is remembered that out of the last eighteen months I hav been home but three, it can easily be understood that things will get entangled. Wishing to spend no more time in prison, and not expecting to make other long journeys, it may be hoped that affairs here will be properly attended to. This may be looked for.

To those who will renew for the eighth volume (1881) before the expiration of the present year will be sent an engraved copy of the illuminated testimonial from the National Secular Society of England (Charles Bradlaugh, President) to the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. B.

New Subscribers.

From deaths, removals, poverty, and indifference there is bound to ever he a lessening of the list of subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER; to make up for these losses, and to extend its field of usefulness, new subscribers are necessary. It is desired to double the number of TRUTH SEEKER subscribers within the next three months. This can be done if its friends will make the necessary effort. Certainly every patron can secure one more if he tries, or at least this can be averaged. To induce the necessary effort in this direction the following inducements are offered:

To every new subscriber for three months at 75 cents, Paine's "Age of Reason," or any other 25 cent book published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office will be sent.

For every new subscriber for six months, Paine's "Age of Reason," bound in cloth, or fifty cents' worth of other books or pamphlets, will be sent.

For each new subscriber for a year will be sent "The Truth Seeker Collection," or "The Humphrey–Bennett Discussion," or "From Behind the Bars" (700 pages), or one dollar's worth of other TRUTH SEEKER publications.

For a new subscriber for one year and another for six months will be mailed a copy of the Editor's "Letters from Europe" (800 pages).

For three new subscribers will be sent a copy of either of the following: "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "The Champions of the Church," "Paine's Great Works," Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief," or Dr. Simms' great work on physiognomy.

For five new subscribers will be sent the two volumes of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times."

For ten new subscribers will be sent the two volumes last named and two volumes of the other large works named.

The cash for the subscription must accompany the orders, and all subscriptions must be for a year save under the first two propositions. The subscribers are to be new, not those who hav been taking the paper before. The premiums may be changed as desired, so they are of the same value and are selected from the books published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. To all new subscribers for 1881 six numbers of 1880 will be sent extra.

Here, friends, are a set of very liberal offers. With a reasonable effort you can double the number of TRUTH SEEKER patrons and be well paid for your labor. Will you not do it then? Those who want sample copies should send for them. Giv plain directions to whom the papers and books are to be sent.

Old subscribers who renew for a year will be entitled to any three dollar book by sending two dollars extra. Friends, let us hear from you.

THE account of the banquet given us by the National Secular Society of England, assisted by the Malthusian League, was reported by friends in London, and is taken from the National Reformer of that city. It will undoubtedly attract the attention of every reader.

Book Notices.

THE HEALTH MANUAL: Devoted to healing by means of Nature's Higher Forces, including the "Health Guide," revised and improved; together with brief treatises on the fine forces, vital magnetism, in answer to Dr. Browne-Sequard on Nerve Force and Chromopothy, the new science of healing by light and color. By Edwin D Babbitt, D M., author of "Principles of Light and Color" and "Worders of Light and Color." 316 pp. In nice cloth binding, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

As indicated on the title-page, this book is an improved reproduction of Babbitt's "Health Guide," which had an extensiv sale for many years, with valuable additions on the subject of chromopathy, or the curativ effects of colors, and a treatis on vital magnetism, the life-fountain, in contradistinction to the theories of eminent physicians. Few volumes of the same size contain so much valuable information pertaining to the health and happiness of human beings. It teaches people how to secure health by means of the vital forces of the human organization, and the appliance of serviceable auxiliaries, without the use of drugs. Instructions for the treatment of the various diseases are separately given. In addition to the value of the main work the appended treatises are worth the price of all.

O. P. Rayner, M.D., of Chicago, speaks thus of the volume: "No person who desires to keep pace with the progress of science, or to know more of the hidden mystery of his own being and the working of the fine forces of nature, can afford to be without this book. It should be in the public and private libraries, and read by every youth in the land. The knowledge it imparts is worth more than gold, for it strikes the key-note of true living, which leads to health, harmony, and happiness along the grand highway of knowledge."

SUMMARY OF SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By Jean Story. With additional illustrations. J. S. Thompson Frehock, 22 Broadway, Cambridge, Mass. 25 cents.

This is an ably-written pamphlet of 113 pages, and dives deeply into ideal and metaphysical subjects, among which are the parental principles of nature; life substance, its intrinsic elasticity; the earth and its atmosphere; the maternal and paternal progenitors of offspring; male and female qualities of mind; counter-sexual principles; affinities and combinabilities between the essences of different elements, and between the fruital essences of the two sexes of a species. The author insists upon a strictly scientific basis for all philosophical examination and discussion. It is deeply profound and cannot prove uninteresting to those fond of elaborate thought and intricate disquisitions on far-reaching problems. It will bear reading repeatedly, as its arguments are too deep to be fully grasped at a single reading. It contains much food for thought.

A significant article by the Hon. George S. Boutwell in the North American Review for December, entitled "The Future of the Republican Party," is sure to arrest public attention. Written after the result of the recent elections had been ascertained, this article defines the position which the Republican party is, in logic and in policy, bound to assume toward the Southern states. Concession, compromise, conciliation, the author says in substance, will no longer be tolerated. No person is to be admitted to a seat in the Senate unless the record of his election is clear. New laws are to be passed for the supervision and protection of the ballots in the elections of members of the House of Representatives and Presidential electors. The civil magistrates must hav the means within call (the army) of protecting the ballot and keeping the peace. The United States must insure to the people of each state a truly republican form of government. No grants will be made for internal improvements in any southern state where the equality of all men before the law is not a living, practical fact. The other articles in the December number of the Review are: "The Discoveries at Olympia," by Prof. Ernst Curtius; "Rational Sunday Observance," by the Rev. James Freeman Clarke; "Southern Statesmen and their Policy," by the Hon. John Jay; "The Ruins of Central America," by Desire Charnay; "The Distribution of Time," by Dr. Leonard Waldo; "The Public School Failure," by Richard Grant White; "The Validity of the Emancipation Edict," by Aaron A. Ferris. For sale by booksellers and newsdealers generally.

THE December number of the International Review contains the first part of an article upon "State Support of Denominational Schools in England," by Rev. R. W. Dale, D.D, of Birmingham, England. Dr. Dale has recently been in this country and examined our school system, and he rightly says, that "a knowledge of some of the difficulties and troubles incident to the English denominational system may save some American educationist from disastrous and ruinous mistakes." The author places the English educational system before the reader in a clear light and in a most entertaining way. The article is a valuable one, and thoroughly deserves a careful reading by all who hav been or are interested in the relations of church and schools, either in England or America.

Arrival of D. M. Bennett.

We learn by the last TRUTH SEEKER that its editor, Mr. D. M. Bennett, who has been traveling in Europe for several months (whither he went as a delegate to the Freethinkers' Congress at Brussels), and writing interesting letters home to his paper, arrived in New York on the 8th inst., in good health. Before leaving London he was complimented by the National Secular Society with a banquet, at which Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, Mrs. Annie Besant, and other prominent Liberals, were present and commended Mr. Bennett for his maintenance of a free press and free speech. We congratulate our New York friend and contemporary on his safe arrival, and cordially welcome him back to his labors in a cause in which there is always a plenty of hard work to be done.—Boston Investigator.

Northern Wisconsin Spiritual Conference.

James K. Applebee, of Chicago, will be the principal speaker at our quarterly meeting, Dec. 10th, 11th, and 12th, 1880, in Omro, Wis. The C. M. & St. Paul railway will giv those paying full fare to the meeting, return tickets for one-fifth fare. Friends, bear the above in mind.

Prof. Lockwood will giv an illustrated lecture on the structure of the brain, during the meeting. Let all be present the first day of the meeting. Please notify the Secretary of your intention of attending.

Also on page 747, in fifth paragraph from top, sixth line, reads, "Factor controling all intelligent," should read, all unintelligent matter, etc.

I also find another unfortunate error in my paper, page 747, first paragraph from top, fourth line, the word me'aphysical instead of metaphorical, as in my manuscript.

Paine's Conduct as an Exciseman.

As a supplement to my vindication of Thomas Paine against the charge of having been twice dismissed from the excise for smuggling, I now submit an extract from a letter written by him in London, dated June 30, 1792, to be read to the people of Lewes, at a meeting called to protest against a recent proclamation for the suppression of writings, books, etc., having particular reference to Paine's publication entitled "Rights of Man."

"Gentlemen: It is now upwards of eighteen years since I was a resident inhabitant of the town of Lewes. My situation among you, as an officer of the revenue, for more than six years enabled me to see into the numerous and various distresses which the weight of taxes even at that time of day occasioned, and feeling as others did, and as it is natural for me to do, for the hard condition of others, it is with pleasure I can declare, and every person there under my survey, and now living, can witness the exceeding candor, and even tenderness, with which that part of the duty that fell to my share was executed. The name of Thomas Paine is not found in the records of the Lewes justices in any one act of contention with, or severity of any kind whatever towards the persons whom he surveyed, either in the town, or in the country; of this Mr. Fuller and Mr. Shelley, who will probably attend the meeting can, if they please, giv full testimony. It is, however, not in their power to contradict it. . . . Many of you will recollect that whilst I resided among you, there was not a man more firm and open in supporting the principles of liberty than myself, and I still pursue, and ever will, the same path."

Who can believe that an exciseman who had been dismissed for smuggling would hav had the temerity thus to appeal to his former neighbors for the uprightness of his conduct? And yet upon the bare, unsupported assertion of the lying Oldys, the literary editor of the Chicago Times repeats the calumny that Paine was twice dismissed for smuggling. Van Buren Denslow, L.L.D., may be a profound doctor of laws, but he is unfit for a juryman.

And now, Bro. Bennett, you may announce for next week, "Junius Rediscovered. He reappears in 1775 in England and America." WM. HENRY BURR.

Against the Passion Play.

OVER-ZEALOUS CHRISTIANS PROTEST TO THE MAYOR AND COUNCIL.

Some over-zealous Christians of this city hav written out a protest to the Mayor and members of the Common Council against the production of the "Passion Play," which is to be brought out at Booth's theater at the close of the Bernhardt engagement. The originators of this protest hav left it at several religious institutions for signatures, and a strong effort is reported as being made to influence the city government against Mr. Abbey's enterprise. The grounds for this protest are that such a representation as the "Passion Play" is immoral, sacrilegious, and tending to undermine the Christian religion and insult all Christian people.

A reporter of Truth called upon Mr. Salmi Morse, the author of the "Passion Play" and the superintendent of the arrangements for its production, to ascertain his views concerning this action. Mr. Morse is apparently about 60 years of age, tall, spare, white-haired, and especially intelligent in appearance, and interesting in conversation. He speaks with an air of erudition, and impresses one with the idea that he knows what he is talking about. He is wholly wrapt up in his work, and is never so contented as when talking "The Passion," as he universally terms the piece. Mr. Morse wrote the "Passion Play" merely for his own gratification, without any idea of ever placing it upon the stage, and he was only led to do this at the suggestion of the archbishop of California, before whom he read the poem. This dignitary regarded it of such worth, both in its clear representation of the life of Christ and the instruction that it contained, that he declared it a great loss to the public unless it was publicly produced. He went so far as even to revise the play, and then Mr. Morse brought it out in San Francisco.

Concerning the people who are opposing the play in this city, Mr. Morse said: "They know not what they do. If they would only wait and see The Passion, and then judge it, I would not object; but such action as this is simple bigotry. Here they are condemning a thing which they hav not seen, and concerning which they know nothing whatever. Of such eminently unjust people I would only ask that they come to the theater and see for themselvs, and then I would be content to leave the question even to them, whether any harm has been done or not. As a matter of pure historical and biblical instruction, the piece is worthy of the most cordial support and earnest study.

"I hav devoted the better part of my life to this Passion, and hav become wholly absorbed in it. I spent five years in the country where Christ spent his life, doing nothing whatever but studying this subject. I hav slept in every monastery in Judea, and hav read every particle of manuscript that I could find there. I hav visited every country connected with the career of Jesus upon earth, and hav studied, them most carefully. Indeed, my whole aim since the idea first struck me some thirty years ago has been to garner materials for just such a work as I hav produced. With this view I viewed the Passion Play at Oberammergau, the one at Madrid, and a number of others that I found in the East.

"And I will present a scene to the people of New York such as they never saw before. Everything will be as near like the true life of Jesus upon earth as I hav been able to discover it in these twenty-five years of constant research. Even my measurements are made by the cubit, and I hav been able to place upon the stage at Booth's a temple scene which has almost the identical measurements of the temple in Jerusalem. Everything else will be proportionally accurate. I hav been in this city for three months, and I hav perfected everything, even to the coloring in the garments which are to be worn.

"These people talk of its hurting religion. Absurd! The theme is too noble, the representation too grand, to breed in any mind a thought save that of reverence and awe. It is the idea of the theaters that these people cannot overcome. If it were in a church they would not grumble. But ministers preach in theatres. The Christian religion must indeed be built upon an infirm base if the representation in a theatre of the grandest subject in all the world can undermine it. So far as I am personally concerned, I do not care a straw whether it is stopped or not. But for Mr. Abbey's sake, who has expended a great amount of money in preparing the representation, I should be very loth to see such a thing done. There is in the Passion absolutely nothing that can offend the most sensitiv Christian who will look upon it as it is intended—a true representation of the life and death of Jesus Christ upon earth. If there had been, do you suppose that Archbishop Allemany, of California, would hav given it such unqualified sanction? I hav no doubt of the success of the piece if it is not interfered with, and I cannot see by what law it can be interfered with."

Mr. Henry E. Abbey, the manager of Booth's Theater said that he could not see by what legal process the Passion Play could be prohibited, but in such matters pulpit opinion could do anything. He, nevertheless, should go ahead and produce the piece. He said that he had carefully canvassed the opposition to the production and he had found that it was entirely with the people who had never seen the Passion Play at all. On the other hand, he had seen a thousand people who had seen the piece in California, and the unanimous verdict of these people was not only favorable to the production, but an eulogy of its grandeur, reverence, and morality. He had carefully studied the work himself, and it had made such an impression upon him.

In the presentation of the Passion Play the theater would be concealed as much as possible. All the gilt about the stage and boxes will be hidden, and there will be no cast of the performers. Everything will be made to conform with the solemn spirit of the production. Mr. Abbey regrets that other business will deprive him of personally superintending the Passion Play. All preparations are now completed, and as soon as Bernhardt has completed her engagement the great question as to whether the Passion Play is to be produced or not will be solved.

[From the same paper.]

The excessivly religious portion of the Protestant community is hard at work endeavoring to induce the aldermen to pass an ordinance which will prevent any exhibitions of the Passion Play. It is a matter of very little moment to the public generally, perhaps, whether the Passion Play is performed or not. But it is a matter of great importance whether or not a religious sect, a minority in the community, shall be permitted to regulate business and amusements according to their standard.

There is no pretense that this play is immoral or indecent except from a purely religious and sectarian standpoint, and any interference with it is therefore necessarily religious interference with the rights of citizens.

This movement of the clergy and churchmen is another step toward the annexation of church with state But a few days ago an organized opposition was made to the election to the mayorality of a gentleman and business man, solely upon the ground of his religious faith and associations. The opposition was from the Protestants, whose prejudices were encouraged by the Republican party and press for political purposes. Now the same influences are combining to prevent the performance of a play because it does not meet with Protestant approval.

Neither Jew, Infidel, nor Catholic was opposed to the election of Mr Grace upon religious grounds. These are the only classes of people in this country who know no religion in politics, and who oppose its introduction, as an element, into our elections and into the establishment and administration of our laws. Here the Protestants are the aggressiv religionists. Their ambition is to make our governments, national, state, and municipal, Protestant governments.

The movement to interfere with the performance of the Passion Play is only another step in the grand intention of making, as they express it, this country a Christian country.

Whatever is obnoxious to Protestants is to be denounced as indecent and immoral, and prohibited by law. The rights of all other religious and non-religious classes are to be made subservient to the prejudices of the Halls, Crosbys, and Comstocks.

If the church is permitted, as it is attempting, to procure the passage of any such ordinance as was adopted in San Francisco, to interfere with the production of the Passion Play, the mere interference will be of little moment, but it will be one more nail in the coffin of secular government and religious liberty.

A MIRACLE is a violation of the laws of nature; and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined.—Hume's Essay on Miracles left to query with myself whether performances of that kind constituted such worship as a sensible God could take pleasure in. The decision was in the negative. Still, that is the way God is worshiped, as near as I can relate it, in St. Peter's in Rome, the first Christian church in the world.

ONE head which thinks is worth a hundred

These large, venerable, fine-looking priests did not seem like a class of men who had denied themselves the good things of this world, or led the life of anchorites, subjecting themselves to a system of semi-starvation. It occurred to me that St. Peter had a very good-looking set of men to attend to the worshipful business in his temple. Perhaps he has his pick of all the priests in the city. They average much better than the usual run. But it all seems like consummate folly. It takes one hundred priests to attend to the business of St. Peter's alone, and costs about $100,000 a year to meet all expenses, and who is benefited by it? The priests only. They are well paid and well fed.

It was a pleasant morning, and St. Peter's might have been half full of people to attend to the exercises described, but not more than four dozen listeners were present, and they were chiefly a poor, ill-clad lot. It would seem the services must be very expensive in proportion to the benefit conferred.

One bad feature in the business is that there are only two short seats, holding four persons each, for the audience to sit on. They are permitted to stand or kneel as they please.

I hear no preaching in these cathedrals and churches. I presume the Catholics sometimes have sermons, but I have not heard them. I have visited many cathedrals and churches at all hours of the day, and on all days of the week. I generally find the mill running, in the way of chanting, reading Latin, celebrating mass, burning candles, continuous kneelings, and all that, but not yet one sermon have I heard, nor any speaking save the Latin service out of the book. Perhaps, after all, that is just as sensible a way to worship as for one man to talk an hour and the rest listen or go to sleep. The Catholic system is a daily and almost hourly religion, while the Protestant is one, two, or three hours in the week. The Catholic priest has to be on duty ten times as much time as the Protestant, and probably comes much nearer earning his money. Perhaps both might be quite as usefully employed were they hoeing beans or mending shoes.

After the service was over I completed my survey of St. Peter's, and took in, as far as possible, all the grandeur and magnificence there displayed. I saw a dozen carved confessionals, and some for all the languages spoken in Europe, so that a sinner, whatever language he may speak, can have a priest to listen to his recital and understand him, and be able to tell God all about it.

As I passed from the church into the hallway leading to the sacristy I met another marble St. Peter, standing very quietly by himself, and as I felt rather sociable I ventured to say confidentially: "Well, Simon Bar-jonas, you have a pretty good thing of it here. You keep a magnificent establishment. Times have changed a good deal with you since you followed the fishing business over in Galilee, and had a hard time to make a living. I presume you and Leo are making it pay extremely well." He made no reply, and I was about to pass on, but seeing he still held up the big key said to be the key to heaven, I sort o' turned around and spoke in a low voice: "Look here, St. Peter, if there is the slightest gleam of truth in all this huge hoax, and if that key you hold really unlocks the door of paradise, don't be too hard on me. I have not been so very bad; I have not killed anybody; I have not run away with anything I was unable to carry, and probably I am as honest as the majority of Christians, if they do call me 'an old Infidel.' You know yourself that there was no harm in that pamphlet, and even those letters were not very bad, if they did come near causing the death of three or four very cultured and excellent Pharisees. So, if I should happen to pass along your way one of these times, after I have hung up the fiddle and the bow, don't be hard on me and turn the key against me. You know how it is yourself, and that, at the worst you can make it, I have not done anything so wrong as to get mad and cut off a man's ear when I meant to split his head open, or to lie three times before the rooster could crow for daybreak. So, good Peter, let me in if I knock at your door in the good time that is coming." I don't think that I offended him by my familiarity and allusions, for I turned my eye toward him as I passed on and he did not look at all offended, and didn't say No. So I am encouraged to think I am all right with St. Peter. At all events, I am perfectly willing to take all the risks. When I saw him last he was still holding on firmly to that key.

I have been three times to St. Peter's, and I am settled in my convictions that it is "a big thing" in the way of a church, and that a big game is being played by Leo & Co. I cannot approve of their policy or their measures, but they seem to be getting along swimmingly, and will so long as the money comes in abundantly. When the people take a notion to cut off the supplies, as they may do some day, there will be likely to be a trembling of the weak knees and a rattling of the dry bones. Chanting will be at a discount. Then priests may be forced to lead useful and truthful lives.

I hope, dear friends, you will not think I treat this subject with too much levity, for I wish to give it all the consideration and seriousness it is worthy of, but every day I live I am more and more convinced that there is an immense great fraud in the world and that it is conducted in the name of religion.

There are 375 churches in Rome, not counting private chapels, monasteries, convents, and pious schools. You cannot expect me to visit all these, however strong my inclination, and however much I am delighted to look upon unhappy saints, holy virgins, and dead and dying gods. I have visited a score or two of these places, and find them munificently rich in works of art, polished marbles, mosaics in the walls and on the floors, and as full and complete an assortment of saints, virgins, and crucified saviors as any reasonable man could ask for. I will not even ask you to listen to a detail of the contents of all the churches I have visited, but I must briefly tell you of some that I have called upon, so that you may entertain a tolerably correct opinion of them. Every church in Rome belongs to some saint. St. Mary has over eighty for her use, St. Peter has thirteen, St. Paul has four or five, St. John has seven, and the remainder are divided around among the large family of saints according to their deserts.

Next in importance to St. Peter's is perhaps St. John's, at the Lateran. (The Italians have a singular way of writing John, Giovanni; Joseph they write Giuseppe; Jesus they write Gesu, which seems the most sacrilegious of all. I can put up with their writing Jerusalem with a G, but to see Jesus begin with a G, and drop the final s, looks very odd, but they persist here in doing it.

The church of San Giovanni in Laterano stands on the Piazza di San Giovanni, and is one of the four chief basilicas within the city walls. It is in a marked degree the seat of the Pope, of which he takes possession on his election. He is here Bishop of Rome, Metropolitan of the suburban churches, Primate of Italy, and Patriarch of the West. At St. Peter's he is Sovereign Pontiff. St. John's stands on the site of the house of Plautus, one of the conspirators against Nero. It is said Constantine gave the site to the Bishop of Rome and founded a church, which lasted down to 1621. In point of sanctity it takes precedence of St. Peter's. The Pope is the only one who celebrates high mass at its high altar. The five general councils known as the Lateran Councils were held here. The present large church was begun by Pius IV., and finished by Clement XII. An inscription ending with Omnium urbis et orbis eclesiarum mater et caput—the mother and head of all the churches of the city and the world—runs round the principal façade, which is of the Corinthian order, and which is pierced by five doors leading into a portico resting on twenty-four marble pilasters. Over the front are ten statues of saints and a statue of Christ. It contains a colossal statue of Constantine, found in his baths. Over the middle door are the ancient bronze panels supposed to have belonged to the Æmilian Basilica in the Forum, now St. Adrian's church—a little more of the appropriating of pagan property for Christian uses. The elegant double portico on the north consists of five arcades of the Doric order below, and five of the Corinthian above. One of the doors is opened but once in twenty-five years, the year of jubilee. In 1890 it will be opened. Fergusson says: "The balustrade on the top is too high, and the (standing) figures it supports are too large, but it is on the whole a picturesque and imposing piece of architectural decoration, with more ingenuity and more feeling than almost any other Italian design of its age; and, considering that it was essential that there should be an upper gallery, from which the Pope might deliver his blessing, some of its defects could have with difficulty been avoided."

The magnificent interior is divided into five aisles, resting on lateral arches and pilasters. From a balcony over a picture by Giotto, on the second pillar to the right, Boniface VIII. proclaimed the jubilee of 1300, Dante being present. Here the Pope gives blessing on Ascension Day. In the niches (flanked by columns of verd-antique) are twelve colossal statues of the apostles, above which are medallions of twelve prophets. The great arch rests on two pillars of red granite forty-four feet high. The abscis at the end of the chancel has a mosaic of the fifth century, with saints on an azure and gold ground. An annual ordination is held in this church on the Saturday before Trinity Sunday.

The Corsini Chapel, built for Clement XII., and dedicated to St. Andrea Corsini, is said to be the richest in Rome. It cost $2,000,000. It has a mosaic by Guido, at the altar, and the tomb of Clement XII., in a porphyry sarcophagus, taken from the pagan Pantheon.

Under the high altar are said to be the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul. Near by is the bronze tomb of Martin V. The magnificent altar of the St. Sacrament is supported by bronze pillars positively said to have been taken from the temple of Jupiter Capotolinus. More stealing from pagans. Numerous tombs of distinguished persons are also there. The ceiling of the church is not arched, but high, paneled, and richly gilt. The pavement is richly inlaid, and dates from the time of Martin V. Before the high altar is a wooden table, said to have been used as an altar by St. Peter. The tribune is embellished with rich mosaics; the "Savior" on the cross in one place, and in the clouds in another. The mosaics, paintings, and statues in this church and its chapels are too numerous to mention in detail, though exceedingly rich and expensive; so just imagine that no money was spared in decorating and embellishing this church of St. John's, and that all the funds for doing the same were filched, directly or indirectly, from the pockets of the dear people.

The Baptistry of Constantine is an octagon sixty-five feet in diameter, the roof of which is supported internally by eight columns of red porphyry, standing on the heads of eight others below. The fonts are also of porphyry. Converted Jews—who are probably not extremely numerous—are baptized in the old baptistry. Forsyth, an English writer, says of the baptistry: "Like all Constantine's works, this is but a compilation of classical spoils—a mere thief of antiquity. Built in an age when converts went down in a crowd to be baptized, this edifice blends the temple with the bath. Hence its grand and central object is the font; hence, too, the font is sunk below the pavement, and large enough for the total immersion of adults."

Forsyth is right. Constantine was a "thief of antiquity," and a murderer as well. His successors have also been thieves of antiquity. They have not only stolen the statues and temples and valuables of the ancient pagans, but they have, still more, stolen their religion, appropriated it to their own use, and then tried their best to obliterate all traces of their robbery and the property they have stolen.

The font was also meant for a tomb; an inscription on a large tablet states that Constantine was baptized there by Pope Sylvester, in 324; but it is an absolute falsehood, for Constantine was not baptised till 337, shortly before his death: and about all the saintly character that has been attributed to him by the church, which readily converts the most bloody villains into saints, had no existence till after his death. Here it is pretended to show many remarkable relics, among which are more pillars from the temple of Jerusalem, the top of the well in Samaria where Jesus held a conversation with the Samarian woman and obtained a drink of water; they also pretend to show the identical table on which the Last Supper was eaten by Jesus and his disciples on the night of his arrest. Justly, though perhaps too moderately, does Dr. Wordsworth say of all this: "If the congregation of the Inquisition were to apply some of their industry and zeal to the task of compiling an Index Expurgatorius of the falsehoods which disfigure the columns, churches, and altars of Rome they would confer a great benefit on church history and the cause of religion."

In another building near St. John's, used for a church or chapel, is the Scala Santa, or "Holy Stairase," composed of twenty-eight black marble steps claimed to have been in the palace of Pontius Pilate at Jerusalem, and which Jesus is said to have ascended. At the top of the staircase in the Sancta Sanctorum is a likeness of Jesus, which is pretended to have been painted by St. Luke when twelve years of age. This staircase is so holy that no foot is allowed to be placed upon it, but penitents are permitted to ascend it slowly on their knees, praying as they go, and when they arrive at the top they are favored with a view of what is said to be St. Luke's painting of Jesus. But the joke of it is—if there ever was any St. Luke and if there ever was any Jesus—there is no reason to suppose they ever saw each other; and if Luke at the age of twelve was able to paint a correct likeness of a person he never saw he surpassed all the portrait painters that have ever lived, and should have stuck to the business, instead of writing about what he had no possible means of knowing—what was said and done between the Virgin and Gabriel, or between the Virgin and the Holy Ghost. But all that makes no difference with those of great faith; they can swallow a mountain as easily as a molehill or a grain of mustard seed. I absolutely saw twelve persons slowly climbing that staircase on their knees, and muttering their prayers at the same time, while a priest in black was stationed at the foot to see that all was done properly. It took about half an hour to make the ascent and say the prayers. Thousands every year thus pass through that foolish performance, when it is wholly improbable that the stairs were ever within a thousand miles of Jerusalem, and if they were it would not make them a particle better. I felt no ambition to climb that staircase on my knees, even if by so doing I could see a picture said to be St. Luke's, but contented myself by looking up at my deluded fellow-beings, when I walked away, sorrowful that at near the close of the nineteenth century intelligent men and women should make such consummate fools of themselves.

The Palace of the Lateran stands between St. John's church and the building just alluded to. Here is where the popes made their home until they were driven from Rome and went to Avignon. Here also the Borgias, including Alexander VI., his daughter Lucretia, and his hopeful son Cæsar, and many more like them, held high carnival, and performed deeds which disgraced humanity. The palace was burned once or twice, but was rebuilt on a smaller scale. I was not permitted to go into the palace proper, though I entered the court, some hundred feet square, and looked up into the arched and frescoed corridors overhead which surround the court of the palace. I also visited the Lateran Museums of antiquities, etc., which I will mention in my next letter.

Around the Piazza di San Giovanni stands the Lateran Palace, St. John's church, the building containing the holy staircase, and a hospital for women capable of accommodating six hundred persons. The street then diverges to the left to the church of Santa Maria Maggiore. In the center of the piazza stands an obelisk of red granite, originally erected by King Thotmosis III., in Egypt, about sixteen hundred years before Christ, which used to stand before the temple of the sun at Thebes. It was brought by Constantine to the Circus Maximus. In 1587 it was discovered there in three pieces, and in 1588 was erected by Sixtus V. on its present site. This is the largest obelisk in existence, being 104 feet in hight, or, with the pedestal, 153 feet, and weighing six hundred tons. In my humble opinion, the obelisk was doing just as sensible and valuable service standing before the temple of the sun at Thebes as it is at present before that holy staircase, the Palace of the Borgias, and the church of St. John, including the heads of St. Peter, St. Paul, and all the other named improbable holy relics. On June 24th, John Baptist's Day, a great festival is held here, and is attended by the pope and cardinals in state.

I must say a little about the church of St. Maria Maggiore, situated on the Esquiline, also named Basilica Liberiana, or S. Maria ad nives, or S. Maria ad praesepe, from the manger, which it contains. It derives its ordinary name from its being the largest of the eighty churches dedicated to the Virgin at Rome. It is also one of the oldest churches in Rome, and perhaps the oldest in the whole of Christendom. This is one of the five patriarchial churches, and has a special jubilee entrance. The principal festival is on Christmas day, the festival day, too, borrowed from the pagans, the 5th of August, and the Assumption, on the 15th of August, the occasion of the papal benediction. According to the church legend, which, however, cannot be traced any further back than the thirteenth century, but still just as readily accepted, the Virgin appeared simultaneously to the devout Roman patrician Johannes, and to Pope Liberius (352–66) in their dreams, commanding them to erect a church to her on the spot where they should find a deposit of snow on the following morning, the 5th of August; and the legend goes on to state that they found snow on the date named, when the church was built. Although there are no grounds for the legend older than the thirteenth century, and no reason why any importance should be attached to anybody's dreams, and no probability that it ever snowed in Rome on the 5th of August—it rarely snowing there in the winter—it is believed implicitly; it is just as probable and is sustained just as much by facts as that other dream story, which Matthew relates of Joseph, in connection with the same wonderful Virgin.

It is claimed that in obedience to those dreams and the snow in August the church was erected, and rebuilt by Sixtus II. (432–40.) It was changed and improved several times in the sixteenth century under Sixtus V. and Paul V. The interior is 250 feet long and 100 wide; it is rich and gorgeous, and well stocked with rich old mosaics, paintings, statues, etc. Among the other distinguished paintings is one of the Virgin, almost black, said also to have been painted by St. Luke. I was not aware till recently that St. Luke was claimed to be so much of an artist. I thought he could draw the long bow a trifle, but did not know that he made any pretensions with the brush. This painting of the Virgin is richly adorned with precious stones; in fact jasper, emeralds, agate, and other precious gems abound in this church. There are among its works of art thirty-six bas-reliefs, representing the remarkable events in Bible story. But I need not dwell longer.

I will speak briefly of the church of St. Paul, or rather the principal of his churches, which is called by distinction San Paolo fuori le Mura. It suits me the best of any of the churches I have visited because, perhaps, it is more in the pagan style than any of the others, being well filled with splendid round columns of polished granite from the Simplon. It is outside the city about a mile, in a southwest direction, and stands nearly alone. The original church which stood on the same site, said to have been erected over the grave of St. Paul, was built in the fourth century, and has undergone frequent restorations and improvements at different dates. It was considered a very fine church when it was built in 1823. And though there appears to be no earthly use for a church in that locality, another magnificent one has been erected which must have cost several million dollars.

I will not attempt to describe the many rich works of art which it contains in the way of mosaics, paintings, statues, and all that, but will say that its gorgeous grandeur is rarely equaled. The nave presents a most magnificent appearance, about one hundred feet in hight, with two aisles on each side, with the highly polished columns separating them; the pavement, or floor, with its thousands upon thousands of pieces of rare marbles worked into figures like a rich carpet, and so smooth and highly polished that it is almost difficult to stand upon it, the whole shining and glistening like new glare ice; and above the columns in the nave are rich mosaic portraits, medallions, five feet in diameter, of the 234 popes that have reigned, being copies from those in the Vatican, with similar mosaics of saints in the aisles, making nearly five hundred of those rich mosaic medallions in the entire church—all raises one's admiration to the highest pitch as to what the art of man is capable of accomplishing.

The two yellowish columns of oriental alabaster at the entrance, as well as the four sustaining the canopy of the high altar, were presented by the pagan viceroy of Egypt, and the malachite pedestals were given by the heretic Emperor Nicholas of Russia. Between the windows in the upper part of the nave are representations from the life of St. Paul. The windows of the external aisles are filled with stained glass, representing the apostles and fathers of the church, with their names surrounded by glories; and so on to the end of the chapter, which is a long one.

I left this church with the sense that there was at least a semblance of propriety about it all. As Paul was undoubtedly the real author and founder of Christianity, so far as it was not borrowed from the pagans of India, Egypt, and Greece, it is quite fitting that those who believe in the religion should erect a splendid temple to his memory; so I said, as I left, "Paul, go it while you can."

The place where the legend says Paul was martyred, by being beheaded, and where his head after being severed made three bounds, and at each place where it touched the earth a living spring of water arose, was not here, but at another place—the abbey of the Three Fountains, where a church is also erected to his memory. What a good thing such a head would be in Arabia, the Desert of Sahara, and many other countries where it is so hard to find water. The place, moreover, is pointed out where Peter and Paul held their last conversation before they were martyred. This is a pretty good "yarn," when it is borne in mind that there is no proof that Peter ever was in Rome, and that he and Paul were even on speaking terms. Their ideas of running the new religion did not harmonize at all.

I next visited the church of St. Sebastian, which is two miles south of the city. It is not so pretentious as many of the other churches, having a single nave and being of comparatively moderate size. It is thought to have been built in the time of Gregory I. and altered over in the seventeenth century. It is somewhat remarkable for containing a stone on which are claimed to be the footprints of Jesus' feet made at the time when Peter made his escape from prison in Rome and thought to elude the martyrdom which he knew awaited him. The tale says Jesus appeared to him, and Peter said, "Master, why art thou here?" and Jesus replied, "I have come to Rome to be crucified again." At that Peter began to feel ashamed that he had thought to escape his fate, and returning, gave himself up again to the jailer, and on the stone where Jesus stood were left the prints of his feet. I saw the stone and the prints of feet, but did not see Jesus nor Peter, nor did I see anybody who has seen them save in the thousands of images and paintings which are pretended to represent them.

In one of the chapels of this church is the tomb of St. Sebastian, and the very arrow which killed him, and also a marble statue over the tomb of the saint, with numerous arrows sticking into it. Still he did not seem to mind it much, and looked as placid as though he had just eaten a good dinner. Do you know, as I have looked at the many representations of this deeply wronged man, that I have thought there is a trifling resemblance between St. Sebastian and myself? A good many arrows have been shot at me, and some of them hurt pretty badly, but they did not take my life, and I am worth half a dozen dead men yet. I shall try and imitate Sebastian in not minding the arrows, and go right on attending to my legitimate business. When the malicious archers get tired of the sport of shooting poisoned arrows perhaps they will take a rest.

Let me see, I have visited a good many other churches where all was glitter, gilt, and guilt. I have seen fine paintings there by Raphael, by Angelo, Giotto, Tintoretto, and lots more of those talented Italians who made paintings and statues for the churches, but I cannot longer weary you with an account of them. Suffice it to say that every church belongs to some saint, and is a storehouse of that which cost immense sums of money and is of no earthly value save for idlers like myself to visit and admire as works of human skill. Rome is full of churches and the churches are full of the treasures I have alluded to. I could write a dozen letters as long as this and not exhaust the subject of the churches of this city, but what would be the use? It would only tire you, and me too, and very little would be gained. I hope many of you will be able to come and see them for yourselves.

You must understand that in addition to the endless works of art which these churches contain, they also possess an almost exhaustless number of the works of fiction. Nearly every church has some very remarkable relics, which are enough to make a person's head swim, if he would believe only the half that is told him. I have alluded to several of these wonderful relics, but not to twenty per cent of them, and neither can I in this letter; but I will trouble you with a few more.

In the church of St. Gavali is shown the very stone on which Abraham undertook to sacrifice his son Isaac. If a few thousand dollars could be realized by it I think they could produce some of the wool of the ram which the angel brought to Abraham to put to death in the place of his own son. In the same place is also shown the stone on which the Virgin Mary rested when she took Jesus to Jerusalem to be circumcised. If you should chance to get the two stones confounded it would probably make no particular difference. They are alike holy, and Abraham's stone will answer for the Virgin just as well as her own.

In St. John's is the column from the temple of Jerusalem which split in twain when Jesus gave up the ghost, when all the other rocks were rent, and when the graves opened and the dead therein walked forth, all of which remarkable occurrences nobody ever knew anything about save Matthew.

They have also the stone which was under the cross when Jesus was crucified. And if all the wood which is said to be of the "true cross," which is presented as relics for the various churches in Christendom, could be gathered together, I am very sure the pieces would make a larger wood pile than many a poor man has at his door in February.

Under the high altar in St. John's church is a stone claimed to be from Solomon's temple, and the very one, by the by, or a part of it, on which God engraved the Ten Commandments and gave to Moses while Aaron and company were getting up the golden calf, and God and Moses knew nothing of it.

This Church of the Cross, in addition to a goodly share of the wood of the "true cross" on which Jesus was crucified, has considerable of the wood of the cross on which the good thief was crucified. That of the bad thief was not preserved. They should be very careful not to let the wood of the cross of Jesus and that of the thief get mixed. It might be very unfortunate, you know, if they could not tell which from t'other. The same church has also one of the nails of the cross and two thorns from the crown that Jesus wore. And, quite as remarkable, they have a piece of the veil which belonged to the Virgin.

At St. Paul's, as I forgot to mention, in addition to the many other wonders, there is the very lance with which Longuinero, the Roman soldier, stabbed the son of God when he was dying. It may be thought wonderful that this particular spear was obtained. I cannot myself explain how it was done nor how the soldier's name was learned. St. Peter's has eight columns in the tomb that are said to have been in the temple at Jerusalem, besides the one that Jesus leaned against, which makes nine.

In the church of St. Clement is the body of the saint himself. The story told is that his body was by a Roman soldier thrown into the sea with an anchor tied to the neck. His body, however, was preserved by coral insects building a house over it, which kept him safe from all harm. Some centuries afterward the water, by some strange means, receded, and the saint's body was found in a state of perfect preservation, and was deposited in his own church.

In the church of St. Aericle is an image of Jesus when he was a babe, the Italian name of which is the Bambino. This image is said to be made of wood, but resembles a fat, chubby infant. The pious church people, however, think very highly of the virtues possessed by this Bambino. On Christmas day it is taken around to visit those who are sick with incurable diseases which the doctors are unable to help, and some most remarkable cases are reported as having been performed by this little wooden Jesus. They have a very convenient way of accounting for any result that may take place with the patients; if they recover it is because of the great virtue possessed by the Bambino, and if they die it is because the Bambino has use for them up in the other world. In either event a round price has to be paid the priest for the services of the little wooden deity.

In the church of St. Augustine is the image of the Virgin richly decorated with diamonds, pearls, and other precious stones, said to be worth four million francs. She is dressed up like a rich doll, as I have seen her in many other places. This particular statue of the Virgin is credited with having performed some most remarkable cures, and it would be tedious to mention one-half of them. In the same church is also to be had, for a fair equivalent, some of St. Augustine's oil, which is a wonderful curative. Deafness, blindness, inflammation of the brain, palsy, and nearly all other diseases, vanish before it. I think it must surpass the "Wizard Oil," the "Magic Oil," and "Eleetric Oil," which patent-medicine men of America extol so highly. There is one most excellent quality about this oil of St. Augustine; it is like the oil that was in the cruse of the widow woman with whom the prophet Elijah boarded during that dry spell, which lasted three years—it never gives out. It is indeed a blessing to poor humanity in this quarter of the world that holy water and St. Augustine's oil are never exhausted. Drouths may come, crops may fail, malaria may abound, but those two holy articles never cease to dispense their beneficence.

In St. Peter's in Viccoli is shown the chain with which St. Peter was secured while in the Marmatine prison awaiting his martyrdom. This can only be seen by special permission from the Pope. When the chain is exhibited eight candles are lighted, and all parties present are required to kneel for a quarter of an hour. The story about Peter's imprisonment in the Marmatine prison is, that he one day had some difference with the custodian, who had the temerity to strike St. Peter on the side of his head, knocking his face against the wall, at which instant Peter's face made an impression on the stone, which is still to be seen. This is the greatest illustration of "hard cheek" I ever heard of.

At St. Prassed's church they have the column to which Jesus was tied when he was scourged by order of Pontius Pilate.

At St. Gregory's church is a Virgin from the fourth century. In the sixth century this Virgin spoke to Gregory, but what she said to him I cannot tell you. Probably he knew, but he died without telling. This was Gregory the Great. A man ought to be great to hear words from an image like that. The same great Gregory is said to have raised the Roman Emperor Trajan from his grave, and after baptizing him sent him back to his grave again. He was indeed a great man; there are only a few that have been able to raise people from the dead. In the same church they have a table on which an angel once sat, and the very table from which Jesus fed the poor. I will not be sure that it was on the occasion when he fed the five thousand with five loaves and two fishes, for there is no account that he took a table with him to that picnic.

These marvelous accounts of relics and miracles might be continued to a great length, but it is not worth while to take up your time with them now. It is sufficient to say that the parent, original, Christian church teaches as truth these and many more similar things, and the people are required to believe them the same as they do the dogmas which make up its creed. Those who will not believe what the church teaches are assured they must burn in hell forever. What a doctrine! What a church!

Before I leave the subject of what I have seen and what exists in the churches here, I must tell you of what I saw in the church of the Capuchin monks in the eastern part of the city. I have visited that church twice. By giving one of the numerous monks in attendance the sum of a franc I was admitted into the basement of the church, where are arranged in several rooms or series of arches the bones of 6,000 dead monks, who once belonged to the order. In some respects the sight surpasses the bones of the 11,000 virgins I saw at Cologne, for here they were upon the whole more artistically arranged. Some twenty skeletons were fastened together, and a monk's garment thrown over them, except the face part, which was grinning with all imaginable horror; and some were lying, and some standing in niches or under canopies of human bones. All the bones except the figures named were sorted out; for instance, the thigh bones were piled up like cord wood in arches and walls, while the skulls formed other grotesque conceptions, the clavicles or shoulder blades others, while the vertebræ or the joints of back bones, the rib bones, the arm bones, and the small bones of the hands and feet, as well as all the others, were worked in separately in figures on the arches overhead, on the walls, and all about in a very artistic manner, and with great ingenuity. It was indeed a bona fide affair. No imagination I assure you. But what taste to thus spend weeks and months in placing human bones in all conceivable figures and positions! But the poor idle monks have nothing to do but to beg, and chant, and pray, and perhaps they had just as well be working among dead men's bones as to be begging, or preying, or praying. I have seen these Capuchins scores of times poking about in the narrow streets from house to house with their buckets and baskets, begging for food for their order. In return they promise prayers and their good influence with heaven. How much better it would be for them to follow an honest means of livelihood, and leave God and his business to take care of themselves. And it is so with the nearly 7,000 priests in this priest-ridden city; they are thicker on the streets at all hours of the day than toads after a shower. They are stealthily moving around among men, pretending to be helping God carry on his business, but I cannot respect them. I cannot like them when I think what they and their kind have cost, and are still costing, this priest-ridden country, and in fact all Christendom. I am appalled with horror, and I cry out in mental agony: "Oh, is it ever to be thus? Will not men some day learn to be men, and to depend upon themselves and not look to unknown gods and their idle, pretending, dishonest mediators and go-betweens?" The churches of this one city have cost hundreds of millions of dollars, which have been wrung from the poor people, drop by drop, like their very heart's blood, and by this class of false-hearted priests they have been kept in constant fear and misgiving about the torments of a perpetual burning lake in the world to come. Oh, what eternities of mental agony, in the aggregate, have these priests thus produced! And it is still being continued! They are now yearly drawing from the ignorant, superstitious people of this city hundreds of thousands of dollars by the falsehood which they continue to preach. Oh that there may some time be a change; the prospects are not flattering. There is not a man here who dares to raise his voice against this gigantic wrong and to teach the people to be free and self-dependent. A good time may be coming, but I fear for poor priest-cursed Italy it is a long way off.

About those bones of the Capuchins, let me add that after they had remained in the earth four or five years they were taken up and cleaned, if necessary, and arranged as described. But that business has now been stopped. The Pope, deeming it improper, or at least useless, ordered a discontinuance. But the bones of the defunct six thousand monks will remain on exhibition to those who will hand over the francs.

I have mentioned to you something about the great numbers of statues, images, bas-reliefs, mosaics, paintings, stainings, etc., that I have seen of dying gods, blessed virgins, melancholy saints, holy angels, etc., but I really fear I have not, after all, done the subject full justice, for it is immense, or the numbers of them are, at all events. I have visited in this city many palaces, galleries, and museums literally overflowing with saints of which I have not told you, but will in my next. I have virtually traveled from "galleree to gallerii," and everywhere I find baby-gods, dying gods, dead gods, risen gods, ascending gods, gods in heaven, virgins before the visit of the Holy Ghost, virgins after the visit of the Holy Ghost, virgins before the baby-god was born, virgins immediately after the baby-god was born, virgins when the god was being put to death, virgins holding the dead god after crucifixion, virgins now in heaven and trying to run the affairs of both that world and this, angels of all sizes, colors, shapes, and sexes; and saints! O holy Moses! yes, saints enough to make any reasonable man wish in his very heart that a saint had never existed. Yes, I have seen all these till my eyes ached, till my brain tired, and till my very heart yearned for relief.

I remember that when Mark Twain wrote up an account of a visit he made to this country he complained of the great number of the saints, etc., to be looked at, and if I am not mistaken in stating the number he had seen, his schedule was 13,000 St. Jeromes, 22,000 St. Marks, 16,000 St. Matthews, 60,000 St. Sebastians, and 4,000,000 assorted monks, When I first read that statement I thought it was barely possible that Mark had overstated the number a dozen or two, but since I have been over the ground myself and made extensive examinations, I am inclined to give him credit for moderation and accuracy. There are, perhaps, few people in America who will have the temerity to question Mark Twain's carefulness of statement. On the basis, then, that he is correct, and from my own impressions, with the memoranda I have made, I feel myself prepared to also make out a schedule of what I have seen up to the present writing. I have seen nearly all that he saw, with Rouen, Dieppe, St. Quentin, Brussels, Antwerp, Cologne, Mayence, Freiburg, and Switzerland to be added. Upon this basis, then, let me give you the list of saints, etc., I have seen:

St. Matthews, 21,500; St. Marks, 25,000; St. Lukes, 5,000; St. Johns, 11,320; St. Peters, 17,109; St. Pauls, 13,920; St. Andrews, 2,718; St. Philips, 1,015; St. James, 1,076; St. Bartholemew, 2,009; St. Josephs, 9,863; St. Sebastians, 62,115; St. Jeromes, 14,200; St. Christophers, 9,300; St. Polycarps, 130; St. Ignatius, 97; St. Augustine, 223; St. Constantine, 137; St. Gregory, 208; male saints, assorted, 129,000; female saints, assorted, 19,999; the visit of Gabriel to the Virgin, or the annunciation, 27,000; the assumption of the Virgin, 26,720; the Virgin when Jesus was first born, 113,500; the Virgin and child together, 372,000; the Virgin, Joseph, and child, 118,000; the Virgin and child being adored by the wise men, 98,000; the Virgin at the cross, 69,000; the Virgin with the dead Christ on her knees, 14,000; the Virgin glorified, 47,000; the Virgin dressed as a doll, 1,472; the Virgin in heaven, 18,600; the Virgin in all other ways, 407,000; Jesus as a baby-god, 381,000; Jesus and parents going to Egypt, 21,229; Jesus in the temple with the doctors, 19,080; Jesus being baptized by John the Baptist, 23,900; Jesus at the wedding in Cana, 13,110; Jesus on the Mount preaching his first sermon, 7,172; Jesus feeding the five thousand, 9,300; Jesus and his disciples fishing, 6,018; Jesus walking on the water, 4,080; Jesus stilling the tempest, 2,300; Jesus raising Lazarus, 7,500; Jesus riding an ass, 4,800; Jesus in the temple, 5,109; Jesus at the Last Supper, 29,813; Jesus in the garden of Gethsemane, 18,300; Jesus before Pilate, 64,219; Jesus being scourged, 1,721; Jesus with the cross on his back, 22,734; Jesus when he fell the first time, 5,020; Jesus when he fell the second time, 5,031; Jesus when he fell the other ten times, 46,800; Jesus being fastened to the cross, 123,675; Jesus when the Roman soldiers pierced him, 9,900; Jesus dead on the cross, 3,786,192; Jesus being taken down from the cross, 1,917,000; Jesus being put in the sepulcher, 17,800; Jesus rising from the dead, 19,300; Jesus appearing to Mary Magdalene, 17,600; Jesus appearing to his disciples, 18,100; Jesus talking to Thomas, 14,000; Jesus ascending to heaven, 420,000; Jesus at the right hand of his Father, 99,900; Jesus in the clouds of heaven, 87,000; Jesus in other presentations, 3,800,000; angels of the male sex, 708,000; angels of the female sex, 950,000; angels, sex unknown, 1,344,000; holy pontiffs, 71,000; archbishops and bishops, 64,000; holy altars, 17,000; blessed candles, 181,000; gallons of holy water, 79,000.

Now some of you may think this schedule slightly exaggerated. Possibly it is a trifle; I will throw off two or three dozen if you insist upon it, but my advice to those of you who think I have exaggerated is to make the trip yourselves, look at what I have seen, count them all up carefully, and set them all down, and if you do not make the numbers as large as I have, it will possibly be because you are more accurate than I am.

You may possibly wish to know what I think of all this redundancy of holiness in art. I do not mind telling you, though I do not wish to unduly shock your tender feelings: I regard it as a great waste of human time, talent, and skill. I consider it all as an immense effort to perpetuate a stupendous mass of error and falsehood.

I have seen here in this city a statue of stone representing a large she-wolf nursing two little boys, Romulus and Remus. This is one way of presenting a popular fable to the ordinary comprehension. Do you ask me if I believe that, because I have seen a wolf so represented, I believe a she-wolf ever did nurse human babies? Then I must tell you I do not believe it. I have no idea that a wolf did anything of the kind; I regard that fable, however, as just as true, just as beautiful, and just as worthy of credence as the fables on which our current religion is based. A million of statues would not make the wolf fable true, and a thousand million statues, paintings, and images will not make the Christian fables any the more true.

I will, now that I am here at the fountain-head of the Christian system, speak still more plainly. I think it alike devoid of truth and beauty. I do not rogard the old Jewish fables upon which the system is founded as being true or entitled to any intelligent person's belief.

It is untrue that this earth and all the suns, worlds, and stars were brought into existence six thousand years ago.

It is untrue that Adam and Eve were the first human beings that existed upon this globe.

It is untrue that by the machinations of a snake the whole nature and tendency of the universe, or of this world, were thwarted and changed.

It is untrue that for the eating of an apple or two, countless trillions of the human race have been inevitably doomed to eternal suffering.

It is untrue that the God of the universe ever hated the human race or determined upon its eternal torture.

It is untrue that humanity is lost or alienated from the Supreme Power which rules the entire universe.

It is untrue that this Supreme Power, whatever it is, ever undertook to drown this world and all its inhabitants by sending a body of water five miles deep all over the earth.

It is untrue that this Supreme, Immortal Power ever needed a being to act as a mediator or proxy for any part of the universe.

It is untrue that a savior or a redeemer was ever needed to save the human race from hell, except it is the savior of true knowledge, which is the only savior that can save any being from the hell of ignorance.

It is untrue that the real God, the real Supreme

Power, was ever under the necessity of begetting a son on the person of a Jewish maiden to help make amends for the blunders of his own making.

It is untrue that this true God ever was under the necessity of putting a beloved son to death to enable him to forgive the human race.

It is untrue that the universe or even this little globe is governed by a supernatural power, or that any power save that which is perfectly natural ever existed.

It is untrue that God requires any pope, prelate, bishop, or priest of any kind, to speak for him, or in his name and behalf. He makes his will known just as much to one man as another.

It is untrue that God reveals something to one man and commissions that man to tell all other men, and sends to hell all who will not accept what the first man asserts. He speaks to all alike.

It is untrue that man needs or requires any priest or go-between to mediate between him and any god, or to intercede in his behalf. Every man should be his own priest. Men will always need teachers of that which is useful, beautiful, and true, but never of theology—the science of God. There is no such science. No man knows anything of God or gods, and whoever pretends that he does is a self-convicted, positive, unmitigated falsifier.

Thus I pronounce the fables, inventions, dogmas, or whatever they may be termed, upon which the Christian religion is founded, one and all, to be untrue, false, nothing but lies.

It makes no difference who promulgates these dogmas, whether Augustine, Gregory, Leo, Luther, Calvin, McClosky, Crosby, Talmage, Hall, or Brigham Young, they are equally false.

Protestantism is just as false as Catholicism; Calvin uttered a falsehood when he said the human family was totally depraved, and lost from God.

He uttered a falsehood when he said that millions of the human race were predestined from all eternity to never-ending torture.

He uttered a falsehood when he said that but for the atonement made by one person, whose sufferings lasted but a very few hours, the whole human race must be damned to all eternity.

When he uttered these things he uttered lies, and every person who repeats them only repeats lies.

The hell and the devil which curse the world is ignorance; the savior that is needed to save mankind from this devil and this hell is knowledge, which science, investigation, and reason afford. The immense corruptions of the church of Rome in the 15th century, when Leo X. sent out his agents to sell indulgences for the commission of all sorts of crimes, for the purpose of raising money to build this sumptuous church of St. Peter which I have described were the natural effects. A strong remonstrance was made; and the result was good. Luther and others, with a commendable degree of bravery and independence, revolted at the atrocities of the church. They protested. But they took only one small step. They still retained the gross falsehoods which the church upholds. More and braver Luthers are needed. Much more protesting is still vitally necessary. Christendom is full of errors and falsehoods. The church is most powerful. Thousands of millions of dollars are invested in the false system, and hundreds of thousands of priests are interested in keeping up the delusion. The outlook is not as cheering as it ought to be. But the truth is gradually gaining ground. Every true and brave heart will struggle for the right even though the gains be slow. My own days are probably largely spent; the lamp of life with me is almost beginning to flicker, but while it does burn, while life still lasts, I will to the extent of my ability oppose fables, falsehoods, lies. I will seek for truth. I will endeavor to speak it.

Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

Wealthy Liberals.

There are scattered all through this country men of pronounced Liberal opinions who are at the same time men of means. The wealth of the world is vastly increasing, and no doubt Liberals, Freethinkers, and Infidels are getting, if not their fair share, at least some share; and those who are above want should delight to contribute some portion of their wealth to the propagation of Liberal principles.

The Board of Managers of the League would like to obtain the names and addresses of all Liberals who are able and willing to devote some portion of their revenues annually to such objects as this League may hav in view. These forehanded men and women may, in many cases, send their own names with contributions and pledges, but not all of them will do so. We wish, then, that the secretary or president of every auxiliary League, or some activ Liberal in every town or county in the United States would make a list of all the names, with post-office addresses, he can think of in his region or elsewhere, of men or women who are able to do something for the promotion of Liberal principles, and send the list to the undersigned Secretary.

There are cases where Liberals and Infidels, on account of their families or business relations or other influences, are paying as much for the support of the churches as the most activ, devoted, church-member in them, and are not doing anything for Liberalism, partly because they know of no organized effort or movement worthy of receiving their contributions, and partly because they would not like to hav such contributions known. The Board would like to hear of all such cases, and we ask some Liberal to send us their names wherever they exist.

If the correspondent who will do us this favor is himself poor, we will at least return him his postage and make other suitable compensation if he requires it. This is very important, and every reader, if he will think a moment, will recollect names that he can report to us.

Banquet and Reception to D. M. Bennett

ON FRIDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 29, 1880, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, IN THE CITY OF LONDON.

Supper was ready at half-past eight, and precisely at that hour Mr. Bradlaugh, Mr. Bennett, and Mrs. Besant, Dr. Alice Vickery, Dr. Charles Drysdale, Dr. Edward B. Aveling, the Misses Bradlaugh, Mr. George Anderson, and Mr. Truelove entered the hall. The tables were soon surrounded by the London friends, among whom were Mr. Le Lubez and Mr. Swaagman, Vice-Presidents of the N. S. S., and many of the active workers. Mr. Reynolds, Vice-President of the N. S. S., and Mr. Forder, Secretary, looked well after the arrangements; and Mr. Standring, editor of the Republican, was also busily engaged.

Mr. Bradlaugh presided, with Mr. Bennett on his right and Mrs. Besant on his left, the others named above all finding seats at the upper table. Dr. Drysdale and Dr. Vickery represented the Malthusian League, which thus joined in paying honor to the guest of the evening. About a hundred members of the National Secular Society took seats at the four large tables, and a respectable number were in the gallery who did not join in the repast.

Supper being over, the London Secular Choral Union rendered "Jack Frost" very brightly, and this was followed by an admirably-executed solo on the piano by Herr Trousselle, an excellent German musician.

then rose and said: "Those of us present, a mere handful of friends, have met here to-night in private meeting, members of the National Secular Society and the Malthusian League, to say a parting word of goodwill to Mr. Bennett ere he starts to-night for his American home. I am personally very glad to meet any citizen of the United States, because I have there received warmer greeting, greater kindness, than in any country. Landing there in 1873 an utter stranger, I was welcomed with most generous kindliness, and I rejoice when I am able to offer the smallest coin of repayment to any coming thence. When I remember, too, how, when I lay there almost dying, and found nursing, attendance, care, I would indeed be ungrateful if any one came here who might be cheered by kindly word and I neglected to offer it. But we have met for more than this; we have met not only to say good-bye to one of our own tongue, though his home is divided from ours by many an ocean mile, but to show respect to a man who has fought bravely; sympathy to a man who has been defeated in the fight, but who has won by strengthening the tendency to liberty. I felt pleased when Mr. Standring proposed to the Executive of the National Secular Society that they should seize the opportunity of greeting Mr. Bennett before he left England. Mr. Bennett must not measure the welcome or the sympathy felt for him by the comparatively few gathered here, for those who now greet him have the right to speak for thousands, and I give greeting this night in the name of those thousands by right of the trust they placed in my hands.

"The Truth Seeker has always been a plucky paper; and when Ezra Heywood was sent to jail for publishing an essay displeasing to the American Vice Society, Mr. Bennett, editor of The Truth Seeker, sold the pamphlet because he deemed it his duty to assert the right of free press. For that, after a very able defense, he was sentenced to thirteen months' imprisonment and three hundred dollars fine. Eleven months Mr. Bennett served in jail, two months being by right remitted for good conduct. New York spoke to him when he came out, as this hall spoke to friend Truelove on a similar occasion. Some of the wisest, some of the truest, some of the bravest and most honest of the American people gathered at Chickering Hall to welcome Mr. Bennett and to show how his worth was measured there. To-night we say our word. The formal greeting is entrusted to Mrs. Besant, and Mr. Bennett will receive it from a woman who stood unflinchingly before judge and jury in the hour of peril. We have been more fortunate. Our judges have been more just. They were hard, but England's judges listen and judge by the law; they do not, perhaps, find a point for a weak prisoner, but they do not shut their ears by prejudice. But having read Mr. Bennett's case carefully, I think that both on the trial and on the later motion but scant justice was done. I may claim not to be an all unworthy mouthpiece for the good wishes offered this night, as all my life I have been battling for liberty, and I greet Mr. Bennett as a co-fighter. Each in this hall, and thousands outside, wish him well. I misrepresent none when I say, Go on board to-night, your heart warmed with the knowledge that our hope and desire is that you may hear Freedom's voice ring across the Atlantic to you." [Great cheering.]

After the Choral Union had sung "Farewell to the Forest," the President called on

who said: "Mr. Bradlaugh has spoken of the duty that calls us here to-night. It is pleasant to think that in our work that duty is one to which we are not unaccustomed. In our army there are more true soldiers than traitors, more that are faithful to the trust of keeping the truth than those who shrink when the hour of danger comes. And I would ask Mr. Bennett to-night not to measure English feeling toward him by the mere number of those present. They that are here are representatives of many thousands of our fellow-countrymen. Glance down this middle table, and you will see that it is not without some right that we claim to welcome you in the name of multitudes of the citizens of England. There are those who taunt us with want of loyalty, and with the name of Infidels. In what church will they find men and women more loyal to truth and conscience? The name Infidel is not for us so long as we are faithful to the truth we know. If I speak as I have done of national representation in this hall this evening, tell me, you that know those who sit here, who have watched some of them for years, others of them but a brief time, do I speak the truth? Take them one by one. Your President [Mr. Bradlaugh] but a little while ago in circumstances similar to those wherein our guest himself was placed, with that true lover's keenness that recognizes the mistress under all disguise, beholding his mistress, Liberty, in danger, under circumstances that would have blinded less sure eyes, leapt to her rescue. He risked the ambition of his life rather than be disloyal to liberty. And next is seated a woman [Dr. Alice Vickery] who, student of a noble profession, thought that liberty had greater claim upon her than even her work. When we [Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant] stood in worse peril than loss of liberty, she risked her own good name for the truth's sake. [Dr. Alice Vickery appeared boldly upon the witness stand and gave testimony for Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant.—D. M. B.] One also is here who, eminent in his own profession, came with the weight of his position and his right to speak, and gave a kindred testimony [Dr. Charles Drysdale]. One step further, and you see one who, soldier to liberty [Mr. Edward Truelove], throughout a long and spotless life, when the task was far harder than it is to-day, when there were no greetings, no welcomes, when to serve was to peril life as well as liberty, never flinched from the first even until now. He is crowned with the glory of the jail, that was his for no crime, but for claiming the right to publish that wherein the noblest thought is uttered in the bravest words. And next him is another who speaks for liberty [Dr. Edward B. Aveling], who has brought culture, university degree, position in men's sight, and many friends, and cast them all at her beloved feet. Sir, not alone the past and present greet you to-night. The future also greets you with us. We have here also those who are training themselves to walk in the footsteps of the one most dear to them, who shall carry on, when we have passed away, our work which shall have dropped from our hands. But he whom we delight to honor at this hour in truth honors us in that he allows us to offer him the welcome that it is our glory and our pleasure to give. He has fought bravely. The Christian creed had in its beginning more traitors and less true hearts than the creed of to-day. We are happy to-day not only in the thought of what manner of men we have for leaders, but in the thought of what manner of men we have as soldiers in our army. Jesus had twelve apostles. One betrayed him for thirty pieces of silver. A second denied him. They all forsook him and fled. We can scarcely point to one who has thus deserted our sacred cause. The traditions of our party tell us of many who went to prison because they claimed for all that right of free speech which is the heritage of all. One of the most famous members of our body in England, Richard Carlile, turned book-seller to sell books that were prosecuted. This man became Freethinker, driven thereto by the bigotry and wickedness of the churches. He sold the books of Hone, not because he agreed with them, but because Hone was prosecuted. He saw that the book in whose prosecution freedom was attacked was the book for the free man to sell. And the story of our guest shows that in all this England and America are one. Those who gave Milton to the world can yet bring forth men of the same stamp in continents leagues asunder. Because our friend was loyal and true, prison had to him no dread. It was far, far less of dishonor to wear the garb of the convict than to wear that of the hypocrite. The society we represent [illegible] his society in America, pleads for free

[REPORTED FOR THE TRUTH SEEKER.]

A brilliant and successful course of geological lectures was given by Prof. Denton in the second week of November at Republican Hall, with two Sunday lectures at Cartier Hall on "Death and the Future of our Planet."

These lectures were well attended by highly appreciativ audiences, and displayed a rare combination of scientific ability, originality of thought, elcquence, and humor, in a style that captivated all his hearers. Few extemporaneous speakers hav so copious a command of expression or so graceful and luminous a style. His compact thought and finished sentences flow in an uninterrupted stream, without a moment's hesitation or the least inaccuracy of expression, absorbing the listener in profound thought, elevating his mind into the sphere of sublimity and then bringing forth irresistible bursts of merriment, so that the interest never flags, and his auditors feel, as the hour closes, that the lecture has been too short.

In presenting the history of our earth and the leading features of its structure and changes, the subject was invested with fresh interest to all by its masterly handling and the picturesque grouping of facts, showing how the original fire mist condensed, making first a fiery ocean surrounded by stormy vapors, then the cooling crust of the globe, imprisoning its interior fires, which burst out in volcanoes and earthquakes; next the rains and the oceans filling the deep beds formed by the contracting crust of the earth bending into mountains and valleys.

All this was but the natural result of laws which we can ascertain and understand, for the great spirit of the universe acts only by law. These laws develop next in the ocean, the lowest forms of life, and from these animalculæ and simple forms of jelly or protozoa, by the operation of law, comes the evolution of animal life through all the divisions of the animal kingdom, the radiata, mollusca, articulata, and vertebrata.

The vertebrates advance from fishes to reptiles, birds, and mammals. The mammalia advance up to anthropoid apes and man, who is the final product of evolution, the summit and fruit of the great tree of life, without which tree he could not hav come into being.

All this was the result of law, and there was nowhere any interruption or violation of law called miracle. The unknown millions of years during which our planet was preparing to be a globe, with continents and oceans, were succeeded by the unknown millions during which zoophytes advanced to little fishes, and these developed into the large forms that filled the ocean. Then came the forms of small reptils, which gradually increased to the gigantic Ichthyosauri and the other monsters which ruled the world in the reptil age, and which hav passed away. Then came birds, rising into huge forms, which hav also passed away, leaving only their bones. Then came huge mammals, of which we now hav only the bones.

In all these ages man did not appear when the world was not yet ready for him; but he came in as a low-browed, thick-skulled savage before the mastodon had disappeared, and for millions of years has been advancing to his present position.

The antecedent ages of evolution indicate a similar incalculable range of time for the future growth and perfection of man and the planet, when humanity shall be perfected, when all volcanoes shall be extinct, all earth quakes ended, the continents enlarged by natural growth, noxious animals, insects, and weeds destroyed; agriculture perfected, the climate regulated by man, and vice, ignorance, and misery conquered; carnivorous habits overcome, alcohol and tobacco discarded, and a hundred human beings enjoying life where now one only struggles through its difficulties.

While thus coinciding with Darwin in the general doctrin of evolution, and speaking of him in terms of the highest praise, he did not at all agree with the exclusively physical ideas of the Darwinian doctrin, which ignored the potency of the divine spirit of the universe ever operating in matter, to which it givs inherent tendencies to advance to higher forms of organization, as when an embryonic cell with no visible appearance of superior organization becomes developed into a man, while a similar cell may be developed into a fish.

The divine spirit acts by law and evolves life or modifies it as the necessary conditions may be present. Life originates in liquids, where no prior life or life germs existed. Liquids, with vegetable infusions, after being exposed to a heat far above the boiling point, all air being absolutely excluded, hav originated animalculæ. In these cases there must hav been an organizing power present to develop dead into living matter.

This organizing power filling the universe carries on our planet in its destined course of progress, though there may be interruptions and temporary recession as in the glacial period, in which a sudden development of coldness interrupted the animal and vegetable tropical life which extended to the arctic regions, and covered the greater part of the temperate zone with great masses of ice, which moving southward hav left their footprints on the hills and the rocks.

This he believed to be due to a concussion with another planetary body, which struck the earth and changed its magnetic poles. These magnetic poles were the centers of the greatest cold, irrespectiv of latitude, and it was owing to this cause that the ground at a certain place in Siberia was frozen hard, five hundred feet deep.

We understand that Prof. Denton's views on evolution and Darwinism will soon appear in a volume, and that another volume will embody his astronomical researches in reference to an extinct planet, which he calls Sideros, the fragments of which hav been falling to the earth as meteoric stones.

At the conclusion of his lecture on the Darwinian doctrin of evolution he remarked, "I see Prof. Buchanan in the audience, and as there is no man on this planet whose views on this subject I would more highly appreciate, I should be pleased to hear from him on this occasion if he will come forward."

Prof. Buchanan rose and remarked that although he had more faith in special creation than had been expressed in the lecture, he was pleased to express his general concurrence in the able and eloquent expositions of Prof. Denton. He believed that the great oversoul, the divine power ever immanent in the universe, inspired and developed its life in the forms of law as the general vitality or nervous force diffused in the human body evolved each organ and even gave a vitality like the protozoa and movements like the amœba to the minute white particles in the blood. Evolution cannot be denied. It is the creativ process; and the words evolution and creation, instead of standing in antagonism, must advance together in future science, and finally be married into one. He felt it his duty, and the duty of all, when philosophy and science had been presented with such distinguished ability, to eulogize and honor the scientific teacher to whom we were indebted, especially since Prof. Denton was one of the few cultivators of physical science whose mind was not cramped or limited to physical facts, the mere shell of being, and whose broad comprehension embraced the invisible forces and causes as well as their visible effects. He had, therefore, united with others in a letter to Prof. Denton expressing their high appreciation and their hope to hear from him again before his leaving this country on a distant tour. He then read the letter and handed it to Prof. Denton, with the remark that he would find in it the names of many of his friends, and that thousands would hav been glad to sign it if they had had the opportunity.

The letter expressed in a terse and forcible manner the sentiments of the audience, who received it with enthusiastic applause.

NEW YORK, Nov. 15, 1880.

PROF. WM. DENTON, Dear Sir: In behalf of the enlightened audiences who hav listened with unflagging interest and pleasure to your very able, elcquent, and instructiv course of lectures on geology just terminated, we wish to tender our thanks for your services to mankind in the cultivation and advancement of science, and to express the hope that before you leave our country we may again hav the pleasure of listening to your brilliant expositions of science and philosophy.

We wish to assure you, also, that although the profound original teacher seldom basks in the sunshine of general popularity, you are already justly appreciated and recognized by many as entitled to an eminent rank among the most distinguished philosophers and scientists of the present century, and as such we would commend you to the kind regard of the enlightened of other nations, and shall watch with friendly interest your progress to a world-wide fame.

State Secularization.

In answer to Mr. Green's call, a conference of persons from various parts of the country was held at the Grand Pacific hotel on the 15th to discuss the question as to whether it is well to organize a movement looking toward the complete secularization of the state. With the purpose of discussing this question the conference met in the ladies' parlor at 3 P.M. It was called to order by Mr H. L. Green. Rev. Chas. Craven, pastor of a Unitarian church in Toledo, was elected chairman, and a call of the roll showed the following ladies and gentlemen to be present:

F A Wickelman, J B Beale, John Zellweger, A G Humphrey, Louis Wilhelm, Samuel Brook, Rev. G E Gordon, John C Bundy, Lucien Prince, Rev. George Chainey, Rev. Jenk L Jones, B F Underwood, E C Fisher, Z E Shedd, Samuel Perkey, G B Fleming, Mrs. A Coulter, Mrs. Amelia W Bate, Mrs. P A Schermerhorn, Arthur Bate, B O C Campbell, G H Walser, Reuben Daily, F A Kerns, P H Philbrick, Alonzo Lucky, Thomas B Jeffrey, A J Grover, J B Young, J H Strong, E Colby, Jr, J C Lutz, Prof. V B Denslow, LL D, H L Green, Rev. Chas. Craven, R C Spencer, R Peterson, J A Freeman, John A Miller, Mrs. John A Miller, Cole W Waterman, G A Guymar, J Packard, Mrs. G H Walser.

When order was fully obtained, Prof. Denslow was called to the floor, and he proceeded to explain the purpose of the gathering. He said that an informal conference had been held in the forenoon, and a policy was decided upon as being better than the one first agreed upon. It was agreed that this should be the first recognized conference, and the end to be attained was the best method of secularizing the state. The first question would naturally be, "Is this meeting in favor of secularizing the state?" By that phrase was meant substantially the same thing, but more minutely, as was meant by "secularization of the state" one hundred years ago. It meant the discontinuance of all purely religious ceremonies or observances in legislatures or other public bodies; of the use of all purely religious or theological books in schools; of the exemption from taxation of church property, and the legal observance of any particular day as sacred. If the society was in favor of such secularization of the state, how was it to be best promoted? Was it to be by organization? And if so, should the organization be national, state, local, or all three? If the time had come for organization, were there enough persons present to inaugurate the movement? It involved changes in the legislation of thirty-seven states, and in a national Congress. The end aimed at was legislativ, judicial, and national. It was a great question, and it must hav the assent of nearly thirty millions of people. To obtain that, the friends of the movement must be not only sincere, but calculating and politic. They must count their forces before they enter the battle. To go in with too few would be to show simply the weakness of the effort. Many people supposed that the principle of the secularization of the state was adopted when the government was established. It was the undoubted intention of the founders to establish such a government, and the object of this movement was to complete that idea. If all the intelligent people of the country could be enlisted in the movement its friends would hav a vast army to call upon. There were many in the orthodox and evangelical churches who would assist to accomplish the result if the platform were broad enough to admit them, and if the movement was understood to be independent of any theological bias, and was not aimed at the life or welfare of the church. Rev. Dr. Spear was such a gentleman; the New York Independent was such a paper. Ten or a dozen such could be counted among clergymen, journalists, lawyers, and other professional men. The speaker offered the following for discussion:

Resolved, That this meeting favors the complete secularization of the state.

Resolved, That while much organized work may be necessary to this end, the elements which may be brought to cooperate in such work are so diverse and widely diffused, and many of them of such divergent religious and political views, that we deem it important at present to form such a provisional organization for correspondence and initiatory work as shall lead to the ultimate crystallization and union of all the elements in the most effectiv manner. To this end we therefore recommend the appointment by this meeting of a committee on correspondence, a committee on national address, and a committee on finance.

The first resolution was adopted.

On the second, Mr. Spencer, of Milwaukee, spoke at some length, explaining what the organization sought to accomplish. It did not wish to overturn anything good in society, and there was nothing in the movement to frighten any conservativ church member. It was possible for immigration, with its strong religious ideas, to become so strong ultimately as to enforce on the American people its ideas, taking advantage of the liberty of action here to accomplish that end. The thorough elementary education of every child should be attended to, and the church should be thoroughly separated from the state; then there would be tolerance, and the rights of all in their religious views secured. The movement should be national, and he thought it one of the most important in which the American people could engage.

Mr. Reuben Daily, of Jeffersonville, Ind., wanted an organization; he wanted some action taken which should giv the Liberals some impulse to work in their homes. But he did not want the movement to fall into the hands of men whose names were associated with Freelovism and obscenity in the mails. And further, he saw the power of the church, and the bigotry—

Mr. Spencer arose to a point of order. The meeting was not called to attack the church, but to devise some means of secularizing the state.

The chair ruled the point well taken.

Mr. Daily conceded the objection, and said what he wanted was some kind of a tangible organization, to meet in some other place at some other time, so that Liberals might hav some objectiv point to work forward to.

Mr. Coulter wanted the object to be secularization, and that alone, and he wanted that point well defined.

Rev. G. E Gordon, of Milwaukee, took the same view, and he hoped the addresses and public utterances would make that plain. It was not a question for Liberals; it was for everybody, orthodox as well as Liberal. He knew an elegant Episcopal gentleman, a doctor of divinity connected with a theological seminary, who had almost a mania on the subject of the separation of church and state. Rev. Dr. Spear, the eminent Congregational minister of Brooklyn, was working earnestly in the same cause. The speaker knew, and he supposed that all those present knew, of instances where magistrates in assigning children deprived of their natural protectors, to a school, sent them to a purely sectarian school to receive a sectarian education. This ought not to be. But a reform could not be accomplished without the aid of orthodox people, and they ought to be invited and gladly received.

Mr. Daily returned to the charge, and began to go for the church and the Bible again, when Mr. Spencer called him to order. The chair decided that the speaker was going outside the call in his remarks.

Mr. Green spoke of Mr. Daily's high standing among Liberals, but he thought Mr. Daily was going beyond the subject under discussion.

Mr. Daily saw the point, and restrained his pugnacious temperament within the prescribed bounds.

Mr. B. F. Underwood thought the plan should be to ask all to join in the secularization of the state, and it should be understood that the orthodox people in aiding in that were not doing anything to weaken their churches. All should be treated courteously, and there should be nothing said which would offend them. He thought a national organization might sound pompous at present, and he did not know but that for the first three months there should be correspondence and the issue of addresses, and then a large organization. He believed this would be better. He wanted the orthodox people to be invited to join, and to be treated courteously, and he would work cordially with them.

After some further discussion the resolution was adopted.

The chair appointed as a committee on correspondence and provisional organization, B. F. Underwood, R. C. Spencer, and Prof. Van Buren Denslow.

The committee on correspondence was asked to prepare an address also.

The meeting took a recess for supper and reassembled at 8 o'clock, when Prof. Denslow read the following report:-

The committee on correspondence and organization respectfully report that more time than is afforded by the duration of this conference will be necessary for the preparation of a satisfactory and effectiv address to the people of the United States upon the subjects which hav here been under discussion, and we therefore ask the authority of this conference to prepare and issue in its name, at the earliest convenient opportunity, an address to the people, embodying the following points:

1. A succinct statement of the history of the principle of secularization of the state, of the effort of the founders of our institutions to incorporate the principle in our federal and state governments, and of its various claims as a principle upon the assent and co-operation of all the people of the United States regardless of creed or theological bias.

2. A statement of the principle of secularization of the state as one promotiv of the welfare, progress, and happiness of each and every class of our people, in harmony with sound morals, and as affording special relief to each and every class of thinkers whose views may not be largely assented to by others.

3. A clear exposure of the injustice and impolicy of connecting religious officers and functions with either legislation, the administration of justice, the punishment of crime, the education of youth in our public schools, or with any other state function, and the like impolicy and injustice of exempting religious property or persons from any of the duties or burdens of the state.

4. A clear exposition of the political, social, moral, and religious advantages which will ensue in this country from perfecting and completing that principle of state secularization which formed a leading motiv on the part of the founders of our republic, and which they sought to embody in all our constitutions, and did include in them to the extent to which the principle was then understood.

5. This address shall be so drawn as to commend the principle of state secularization to all persons who rightly apprehend the nature of our institutions, regardless of nationality, party affiliation, and religious or theological views.

Concerning organization, this Committee reports the chief objects toward which its correspondence shall be directed, to be:

1. To call out and publish through the public press, and such other channels as shall offer, the views of all classes of persons concerning state secularization.

2 To stimulate the formation and co-operation of local organizations in every town and neighborhood in the United States where possible, which, whatever may be their other objects, shall, as one of their objects, co-operate with this committee in promoting state secularization either by circulating documents, collecting audiences for lecturers, or contributing to its funds.

3. To draw out from leading minds—whose opinions concerning ways and means of organizing are entitled to respect—their best views as to the proper mode to be pursued in effecting permanent organizations, whether national, state, or local, and the relation in which the national should stand to the state and local organizations, if such relation should be deemed expedient.

4. When it shall appear to this committee that the further work aimed at by this conference requires a more consummate plan of organization, and that the materials for a sufficiently comprehensiv organization will be at the disposal of this conference when convened, this committee ask power to convene this conference, and, in convening the same, to invite also such other suitable persons and organizations as may hav evinced a desire to co-operate in its purposes with the view of extending or perfecting such organization as will best promote the object.

Inasmuch as the finance committee to be appointed by this conference will probably hav no time to report during the present session, therefore we respectfully suggest that this conference instruct the chair to appoint a finance committee of seven persons, whose chairman and treasurer shall be chosen by the committee, and whose treasurer shall be treasurer of this provisional organization. Said committee on organization shall incur no expenses without the sanction of the finance committee through its chairman, nor unless there are funds in the treasury for their payment; and the secretary of the provisional organization shall receive such compensation out of the funds to be raised by the finance committee, and when the same shall be raised, as said finance committee may deem proper, and shall work under the instruction of the committee on correspondence.

The report was discussed at considerable length.

Mr. Daly did not like it because there was nothing in it. He did not think it was radical enough; he feared the movement would fail on that account, and he wanted to see more Liberalism expressed in it.

Mr. Underwood and others opposed his view strongly. The aim was to secure the co-operation of orthodox people. The movement never could win without it; and unbelievers had no more right to force their hetorodox views on believers in this issue than the believers had to force their orthodox views on unbelievers. It was a question of the secularization of the state, purely and simply, and not of orthodoxy or heterodoxy, or belief and unbelief.

After some further discussion the report was adopted.

Mr. A. J. Grover presented the following, which, after discussion, was adopted. It is a definition of what is meant by state secularization:

By state secularization we mean:

1. That acts of religious worship, including Bible reading, enforced as an act of worship, shall cease in legislatures, prisons, and public schools, and institutions sustained by taxation.

2. That no property shall be exempted from taxation and no persons from contributing their just share to the burdens of the state on account of their being used or engaged in religious efforts.

3. That all laws enforcing the observance of one day above another upon religious grounds shall be repealed.

4. That all laws requiring judicial oaths to be in any religious form or limiting the admissability of persons to testify, hold office, sit on a jury, or perform any other civil function because of any lack of religious belief, be repealed.

The chair announced as the Finance Committee, Robert G. Ingersoll, Washington; John C Bundy, Chicago; Lucien Prince, Worcester, Mass.; Prof. P. H. Philbrick, Iowa City, Iowa; J. C. Lutes, Gardner, Ill; Z Shedd, Fremont, Neb.; G. H. Walser, Lamar, Mo.; G. B. Fleming, Angola, Ind. The Committee organized by electing Mr. Ingersoll President, and Mr. Bundy Treasurer.

The Secretary announced that he had received a number of letters from gentlemen in the country in sympathy with the movement, and suggested that they be printed.

Mr. Grover moved that when the Committee call the next conference they announce the place of meeting as Chicago, but after some discussion it was thought best to leave that to the Committee.

After some further discussion the Conference adjourned sine die.

A Visit to Tennessee.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Being on a business visit to the South and thinking that your readers would probably hav no objection to hearing somewhat of some towns in that section of the country, I write you my impression of this town of Knoxville, Tenn. It is a much larger place than I had supposed. It is built over a number of hills, I think more than Rome had; and yet it is by no means a romantic place; the antics one cuts up roaming about it to the contrary notwithstanding. Indeed it is not always easy to stand in jumping the ditches of Knoxville. (The idea of one standing while he is jumping is not very bad either.) But I must not let my wit go too far. The thin mountain air and the excellent breakfast of rich milk, fried ham and eggs, and delicious chicken; the corn bread and the buckwheat cakes and coffee to top off with hav possibly exhilarated my simple nature beyond its wont; it does not take much to intoxicate a person who is not used to excitement of that kind. Coffee always has a decided effect upon me—much, I think, as wine has on those who habitually use it.

If there is one thing more than another which struck me this morning, in wandering about the place, it is the utter lack of appreciation of the value of fresh paint as a decorativ effect. I think I saw but one house in a walk of an hour and a half that had been painted, within the memory of most school children. Both brick houses and wood, the houses of the poor and of the well-to-do business houses and residences, all seem to exist in a sort of conservatism as to color. May not that be in one sense a characteristic idiosyncrasy of the South.

On my way about I went into the rolling mill here, which is quite a large one, having, I should judge, at a rough guess, something like seventy-five or one hundred men employed in or about it, but I was struck with the fact that the majority of the workmen who sustained the higher sorts of labor, seemed to be English and Welshmen; one negro was working the iron under a steam hammer, but the nativ whites and negroes seems mostly to be employed in the grosser labor, such as carting and wheeling and the like. I may hav been mistaken in judging by the faces of the men, but this seemed to me to be the case.

The air here is delightful and bracing and when the mists hav cleared from the surrounding hills the views from the high points must be very fine indeed. I hav no doubts that the dry air of the mountains is at the bottom of the lack of paint everywhere visible; the houses probably last about as well without paint as with; indeed, many houses seem to hav lasted since the first settlement, from their present appearances, at least they hav lasted from the time the first sawmill came to town, for I believe I hav seen but one of those log houses which I suppose were the first order of architecture.

Last evening, on the railroad, we were just beginning to climb down on this side of the Blue Ridge Mountains at sunset, and the sky in the west was a beautiful sea of gold, and that with the purple range of hills between us and it, made a picture that fixed my gaze for a long time in admiration that is nearest adoration to anything I know of.

Every true lover of nature must, it seems to me, feel deep sympathy with the early religionists who saw in these grand phenomena the works of gods. They were so grand, and not being understood, and each thing done, seeming to them, in their thorough individuality, to be necessarily the work of a distinct will and special effort, they hav good reason to place the God behind every glory. How grand is our conception of the one ever-working, never-ending life, with its eternities of times and its eternal eternity; with its infinity of individualities and its omnipotent unism, all so inextricably woven and dependent that neither one is thinkable without the other.

We hav a very nice hotel to stop at—the Hattie House. My room is on the first floor; that is, on the second of the building, but the first of the hotel, since the lower stories are used as large stores. It is sunny, large, and very clean, and I am happy to say it is innocent of paint, the woodwork being simply varnished yellow pine, which is very much to my taste, being simple and natural. The townpeople's aversion for paint is, I think, of modern origin, for most of the houses in the town appear to hav been painted a sort of muddy color once upon a time—"down the ages long departed."

The people seem to be a very sturdy, honest, well-meaning set of folks. By honest, of course, I mean as honest as they can be, and at the same time get all they can gorge, which is the limit, I believe, generally intended when we speak of a man being honest; any one more honest than this most folks would call a fool. These people, I hav no doubt, are, generally speaking, good Christians; that is, they do not swear too much; do not drink much more than they can carry generally; are charitable, when the notion takes them, and are not quarrelsome, except in disputes. Take it altogether, that is very much the sort of man we admire in novels when painted so as to contrast with some one worse. Pictures, plays, and novels are very poor educators in this regard—almost as bad as Sunday school tales. They all show the world as being composed of two sets of people—the good and the bad; or perhaps I should say four sets—the innocent and the virtuous, the weak and the fallen. But in natural life these special sorts don't occur once in a hundred times. The good and the bad qualities are so intermingled that—well, I hav never yet met a man I could not honor somewhere, nor one who was not poisonous in some particular spot of his moral character.

I saw one woman in my morning walk who had the true poetical soul. I do not suppose she would admire Robert Browning, even if the book were bound in red muslin covers; but she stood in the door of a meat shop, with yellow hair in delightful disorder over her shoulders, and as she held her baby child up in the sunlight she said of a big sow in the street, "Oh, see the piggy; pretty piggy!" Now, any one, man or woman, without regard to religion or previous servitude, who can stand in a meat shop door, and, seeing an old sow rooting in the road, call it, for the pleasure of another, "Pretty piggy," is a poet, whether willingly or not.

Gatheran O'Moss.

Merciful for Once.

[The persistency of Comstock's hatred toward his victims, his fondness for getting people into prison, and how Judge Benedict in one instance yielded to the noble instinct of mercy, is thus well told by Truth of the 18th inst.:]

In 1874 Anthony Comstock caused the arrest of a man, whose name we suppress, for sending through the mails a number of pictures of a very vile character. The officer who made the arrest lost his prisoner before he got him to the court house, and the latter was not heard of for several years.

Subsequently it appeared that the fugitiv, abandoning his criminal associations, sought and obtained menial employment in a gas company at low wages.

He worked hard in this position for several months, when, from no fault of his own, he was discharged.

After working at other honest labor a short time he was aided by his friends to start a small cigar store in Newark. Having got the business well under way, so that he was making an honorable living for himself and family, a wife and children, he was standing one day in the doorway of his store, when Comstock, passing by and recognizing him, caused his arrest and extradition to New York upon the old charge.

His counsel, after examining into the case and learning the foregoing facts, and that he had borne an excellent character and pursued an honest course of life ever since his first arrest and escape, conferred with B. B. Foster, then Assistant United States Attorney, laying the evidence of the defendant's good character before him and notifying him that a plea of guilty would be entered.

At the proper time that plea was made.

When Judge Benedict's sentencing day came round General Foster appeared in Judge Benedict's chambers as usual to confer respecting the prisoners to be sentenced. When the name of this particular prisoner was taken up, Judge Benedict said to Foster:

"Well, how many years ought I to giv this man?"

"Years!" exclaimed Foster. "Years! Why, I think this is a case for mercy."

"Hardly, hardly," said the Judge, wiping his moustache violently. "Mr. Comstock was here this morning, and exhibited to me some of the vilest pictures I ever saw, which this prisoner has pleaded guilty to having mailed."

"Didn't he tell you that that was four years ago?" inquired Foster.

"No," said the Judge, indifferently, "and, if he had, I can't exactly see its bearing on the question of mercy."

"Perhaps not," pursued Foster, "but this man has been an honest man ever since; he has earned an honest living at hard and menial work; he has shown a disposition under trying circumstances to become a good citizen; he presents a good character, proved by citizens of high standing, which he has earned since he committed his crime. All this is known to Mr. Comstock. It would be an outrage, under these circumstances, to punish this man severely."

While Foster was saying this Judge Benedict's eyes flashed with indignation, and, as Foster concluded, he expressed an opinion of Comstock, the publication of which would make that individual's brazen cheeks burn. He passed the case without further comment, and conferred upon others, merely taking from Foster the proofs of this prisoner's character and habits since his first arrest.

Coming into court a few minutes after, and ascending the bench with a judicial thunder cloud upon his brow, he gave one look at Comstock—a look that spoke eloquently of his contempt—and turned his attention to the business before him.

When Comstock's victim was brought forward, Judge Benedict glanced once more at Comstock for an instant, and then directing his eye at the prisoner, said:

"I hav examined into the facts of your case with care. You stand convicted of a vile crime, but it was committed years ago, and since that time you hav endeavored to liv an upright life. The sentence of the Court is that you be imprisoned in Ludlow-Street Jail for one month."

Comstock looked about for the nearest keyhole and vanished.

We like "John's Way" very much. Ella Benham.

thought, speaks for free speech, claims for every one, however antagonistic, the right to speak the thought he feels. It is better that this should be, even though the thought be wrong, for thus the sooner will its error be discovered; better if the thought be right, for then the sooner does the gladness of a new truth find place in the heart of man. As the mouthpiece, sir, of our National Society, and of its many thousands of members, I speak to you now.

[The eloquent speaker then read from the illuminated address set in a large gilt frame, as follows:]

"WE SEEK FOR TRUTH,

"TO D. M. BENNETT.

"In asking you to accept at the hands of the National Secular Society of England this symbol of cordial sympathy and brotherly welcome, we are but putting into act the motto of our society. 'We Seek for Truth' is our badge, and it is as truth seeker that we do homage to you to-night. Without free speech no search for truth is possible; without free speech no discovery of truth is useful; without free speech progress is checked and the nations no longer march forward toward the nobler life which the future holds for man. Better a thousandfold abuse of free speech than denial of free speech. The abuse dies in a day; the denial slays the life of the people and entombs the hope of the race.

"In your own country you have pleaded for free speech, and when under a wicked and an odious law one of your fellow-citizens was imprisoned for the publication of his opinions, you, not sharing the opinions, but faithful to liberty, sprang forward to defend in him the principle of free speech which you claimed for yourself, and sold his book while he lay in prison. For this act you were in turn arrested and sent to jail, and the country which won its freedom by the aid of Paine in the eighteenth century, disgraced itself in the nineteenth by the imprisonment of a heretic. The republic of the United States dishonored herself and not you in Albany Penitentiary. 200,000 of your countrymen pleaded for your release, but bigotry was too strong. We sent you greeting in your captivity. We rejoiced when the time came for your release. We offer you to-night our thanks and our hope. Thanks for the heroism which never flinched in the hour of battle; hope for a more peaceful future, in which the memory of the past pain may be a sacred heritage and not a regret.

"CHARLES BRADLAUGH, President."

"Soldier of liberty, we give you this. Do in the future the same good service that you have done in the past, and your reward shall be in the love that true men shall bear to you." (Loud cheers.)

MR. BENNETT,

Nearly overcome with a deep sense of gratitude, expressed his thanks in a few words: "Language is hardly adequate to express the feelings of my heart. I am overwhelmed with a feeling of gratitude for your gracious words of cheer and encouragement as to what I have tried to do. When I came over to Europe I did not suppose for a moment that anything of this kind was in store for me. I came to attend the Brussels Congress, and my stay was prolonged for a few weeks on the Continent and here. This meeting was altogether unexpected by me, and I am very grateful for it. I shall prize what you have said and this address [placing his hand upon the beautiful testimonial which had been presented him and was then before him] more than solid gold. I shall keep it to the last day of my life and show it with pride to my friends. I am grateful to you that you sustain me thus, and that you appreciate my efforts. I shall return home full of energy, and shall not forget what good companions I have here in England in the work of bringing liberty to our fellows. It is not alone theology we fight. Our whole work is trying to take steps toward a larger freedom. You have found us in America working with you. I shall carry home tidings of what you are doing here, and the earnestness you show in every way. I am not used to speaking, but I say very earnestly that I thank you. I take the word of you all that you all feel as this address speaks. I shall remember what has passed this night as long as memory holds her seat. I sincerely thank you." (Great cheering.)

The Choral Union sang in admirable style, "How Lovely are the Messengers," and then

DR. ALICE VICKERY

Was called on, and loudly cheered, who said: "Mr. CHAIRMAN AND FRIENDS: We are met to do honor to one of the truest benefactors of our time, a man who has bravely carried on the never-ending and ever-beginning struggle between tyranny and freedom. He belongs to the party of all good citizens, the party that insists that the individual has the right to utter all thoughts that he may deem true and beneficial to mankind without fear of censorship of police or mob. [illegible] the book that he sold was carrying forward the traditions of Socrates, Bruno, Spinoza, Paine, and many English-speaking Freethinkers and Radicals. At this moment it is the works that deal with the relations between the sexes that lead to the prison cell. A few years ago honest citizens could be imprisoned for Atheism. Bigots will never relax their efforts whilst there is one atom of freedom still to be won. And in this connection it is impossible not to note the resemblance between the case of our veteran English Freethinker, Edward Truelove, and that of Mr. Bennett. One would think that the laws determining the relationship between the sexes were so perfect as to merit the appellation of sacred. The clergy and the lawyers appear satisfied with the existing condition of things, and yet every year in Parliament we find questions affecting these relationships coming forward. Divorce, marriage with a deceased wife's sister, the custody of children, married woman's property, all are subjects of discussion. At the Social Science Congress papers on kindred subjects were read. One was entitled, 'To what is our marriage system drifting?' John Stuart Mill has written that "there are no slaves in England save married women." These are matters that we should discuss fearlessly and openly, these matters that refer to the happiness of those already in the world, and to the bringing into the world of children whom we would have more happy than their fathers. Our guest to-night in his defense of the right of dealing openly with these intricate questions has earned the gratitude of all. In better days he will be remembered among those who dared to suffer in the cause of humanity." (Cheers.)

DR. CHARLES DRYSDALE

Editor of the Malthusian was next called on, and was warmly welcomed. He said: "It is, I think, the general belief of civilized mankind at the present time that so much progress has been made in civilized states in the direction of toleration of heterodox opinions that heroism is no longer necessary; but that the whole duty of the individual at present is to fill his purse and enjoy the many comforts poured into the lap of that class of fortunate citizens that inherits the earth. How entire a delusion this belief is, is proved by our presence here this evening. In the midst of the great English-speaking republic of the West, in the land of Franklin, Washington, and Lincoln, after the greatest contest for liberty that has been waged in modern times, that of the slave-power against the toilers of the North—at the very time when we might have expected that liberty of speech would never again be assailed, we were startled in London by hearing of the prosecution of one of the ablest citizens of the United States of America, for maintaining the right to publish and sell a rather advanced speculative essay on morals and society. Fresh as we were from the dismal struggle for free utterance of opinions, so nobly maintained by Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, the worthy heirs of the traditions of Paine, Carlile, Hetherington, and the brave Freethinkers of old England, and which culminated in the prosecution, by a secret and interested body of clergymen and aristocrats, styling itself the 'Society for the Suppression of Vice,' of as honest and fearless an Englishman as has ever lived, Mr. Edward Truelove—depressed by the horrors of his and that of Mrs. Annie Besant's cruel treatment in this very city, it was with a feeling almost of despair in the future of our race that we heard of the trial and imprisonment of Mr. D. M. Bennett. The work he undertook to sell contained nothing new, nothing that had not been said over and over again by poets such as Shelley, and earnest moralists in all countries, and yet, so ignorant are the masses that they gave up their rights to a free press to please the bigots and purists of society (men who have in past time deluged the earth with innocent blood), and cried out once again, 'Crucify him! Crucify him!' Every new truth, it appears, must have its martyrs. Had Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Annie Besant known less of law, they, too, must have worn in a prison the crown of martyrdom. In the future, as in the past, heroism will never be unneeded. So long as abject superstition destroys all the most innocent joys of life, so long as poverty so greatly abounds, men and women must fight for new truths and consent to suffer as Mr. D. M. Bennett has done. All honor and glory, then, to those who suffer in this our time for the good of the race." [Loud applause.]

The Choral Union again interposed with a graceful "Spring Song."

DR. E. B. AVELING

Was then called on, and said that the guest of the evening, the Chairman, and the lady on his left, could not fail to remind all of the parallelism between the cases in which they were engaged. There seemed to be sometimes epidemics of thought passing over wide areas; in these two cases there was a likeness of time, of circumstances; in both, people not originally responsible for a book sold it, not because they agreed with all in it, but because they saw one fact as the bed-rock on which each rested, that in the defense of the book something far larger than the book was concerned—the great question of the liberty of the press. He wished he could add that the parallelism extended to the conclusion of the cases. The whole position in America much resembled the question here. THE TRUTH SEEKER and the National Reformer were really synonymous terms, for how could a truth seeker be aught but a national reformer, and what does a national reformer seek save the truth? The truth seeker met lies, and must try to reform them; and so the reformer must be a truth seeker and a truth liver, for he or she who was false to principle could never be a real reformer. We English have rather a habit of patronizing America, thinking that our ancestors went over and made America what she is; she has a habit of distinguishing herself, so we claim the credit. We recognize in Mr. Bennett's trial the family resemblance both in good and ill; we recognize in those who prosecuted him the spirit of the Puritans in its narrowness and bigotry, and on the other side, also, the true descendant of the Puritans, the courage, the strength of principle, the perseverance which made Oliver Cromwell Oliver Cromwell, and England the England of this day. Many in America go with us in thinking that a certain book is not quite inspired, that it contains some things that are excellent and some that are the reverse; that book contains the advice, "Agree with thine adversary quickly, whilst thou art in the way with him." Not so! but when fighting is to be done do not yield; rather fight, foot to foot, hand to hand, face to face; it is not then time to yield, but time to fight, for you fight not for yourself, but for one greater than yourself. In the old Greek stories we read of men and of women who threw themselves between the weapon and the friend at whom it was aimed, in sublime devotion laying down life for friend and even for king. Remembering such stories, shield with even your own bodies that which is greater than you. A man throws himself between his mistress and a blow, and would sacrifice his life ere a hair of her head should be harmed, and in the hour of danger you stood [turning to Mr. Bennett] in front of your mistress, Liberty; the blow aimed at her fell upon your person, but she remained unscathed. (Loud cheers.)

MR. U. N. DAS,

a learned Hindoo, next addressed the meeting. He said: "In the name of that land which under its own rulers had toleration of the most pronounced type, a philosophy absolutely Atheistic, a religion purely secular, in the name of that land which under foreign rulers to-day spends thousands in building palaces and churches for a religion we do not accept, I also greet you. I should be inclined to wonder at the bigotry and intolerance shown here and in America were it not that they are not new to me. Since I have been in England I have seen a man on the brink of the grave imprisoned for publishing a book, a woman notable for her wisdom and modesty, under a bad law worse administered, bereft of her children, and heard her maligned by an English baronet and in an English House of Commons. But that you, sir, coming from America, that has been beacon light to all nations, should thus suffer came with a shock to me. I should like, very much, a definition of the quantity of religion acceptable to society. In the political world we have the Marquis of Ripon, who, according to some people, has too much religion, and Charles Bradlaugh, who, according to some people, has too little religion. Your countrymen are very handy at inventing instruments. If only some of them would invent a credometer, what benefactors they would be!

"In conclusion, let me tell you a little story. Once on a time there was a king who had two wives. And the homelier and plainer of these was banished at the bidding of the younger. And later the king went upon a hunting expedition, met the discarded wife, and a son was born. And the son grew up, and came to the throne. And, behold, he was rejected as not being of birth sufficiently lofty. And he, retiring into solitude and fading out of the life of the gay, frivolous court, melted into the infinite azure of heaven, and became a fixed star and a beacon and a gladness to the eyes of man. Thus does man banish science at the bidding of superstition. But though she be banished times and again, her destiny is to be a beacon and gladness to the eyes of man when kings and palaces, priests and cathedrals are become as nothing. Sir, we cannot all be great, but all of us, when we find men of your stamp amongst us, can join in hearty welcome, and show that we appreciate and are thankful for your greatness and goodness." [Cheers.]

The Choral Union then sang "Men of England," and the meeting broke up, many pressing forward to shake hands with Mr. Bennett as he left the hall, and even after he took a carriage for the railway station for Liverpool, bearing with him the illuminated testimonial he had received, and with his heart filled with gratitude.

MOSES HULL is speaking every Sunday at 10:45 a. m. and 7:45 before the Second Society of Spiritualists in this city. His discourses are on Spiritualism and Liberalism, and are very interesting. While in the city Mr. Hull would like an opportunity to deliver week-day evening lectures in the vicinity of New York. Here is an opportunity for Liberals and Spiritualists to get good lectures during the balance of 1880 at a small expense. Address Mr. Hull at this office.

Letters from Friends.

LOCUST VALLEY, N. Y., Nov. 22 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Seeing your modest "Appeal" on page 740 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and appreciating your most laudable efforts and sacrifices to overthrow existing superstitions among Christians—the greatest stumbling block to the advance of our race—and in fostering a spirit of Liberal inquiry in searching for the most noble truths of nature which hav already elicited, through the columns of your TRUTH SEEKER, a mass of most valuable reflections, criticisms, and facts from thoughtful minds and earnest literary students; besides your own able efforts and valuable contributions to generous, intelligent progress. Thus I feel it to be incumbent on all Liberal minds to fully aid your noble efforts in the furtherance of this good cause in the future by continuing to sustain, in money contributions, your invaluable TRUTH SEEKER. There can be no happier title or purpose in life than a truth seeker.

To the above end I inclose my mite in check to your order for $13, of which please accept $10 for the above purpose, and $3 for renewal of my subscription, which expires July 9, 1881, and now continued to July 9, 1883. With my earnest wishes for your health and prosperity, I am,

Yours most truly and fraternally,
CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.

[We are deeply grateful to our kind friend for this renewed exhibition of his generosity. If THE TRUTH SEEKER is fortunate enough to secure many such friends its success will be fully guaranteed. Will friend Townsend accept our sincere thanks?—ED. T. S.]

GOSHEN, N. Y., Nov. 20. 1880.

D. M BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav read your foreign letters with a great deal of interest, but cannot understand why you should devote so much time to cathedrals, etc., when there must hav been magnificent galleries of art, and libraries, factories, machinery, and all the splendid inventions of science and art, a million times more interesting than church and Bible bosh. Very truly,

A. J. JESSUP.

REPLY.—I visited the cathedrals for several reasons: 1. Because they are the storehouses and treasure-deposits of the church, with which I wished to become familiar, and of which I wished to giv information to my readers; 2. Because in the cathedrals are to be seen the highest works of art, as such, which the greatest masters of the past centuries hav produced. The picture galleries, when they are to be found, containing large collections of similar works of art, were also visited. The cathedrals were always open and easy of access. The galleries and museums are only open on certain days of the week and certain hours of the day. I endeavored to see both galleries and cathedrals; 3. In the cathedrals and churches are to be seen many of the supremely ridiculous features of Christianity, including the very numerous and ever-present priesthood, the absurd forms and ceremonies almost hourly urged and impressed upon the people, the almost endless representation of saints, martyrs, and impossible fabulous events, the false relics and curiosities which are held up before the ignorant masses for their acceptance and adoration. I wished to inform myself of all these things and to mention them at some length in my letters. I deemed them legitimate subjects of mention and ridicule, and hope my descriptions hav not been wholly uninteresting.—D. M. B.

LYONS, N. Y., Nov. 15, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There has existed in my mind for a time a doubt as to the existence of a personal deity, a God. And a still greater doubt as to the existence of Jehovah and his incarnate son.

The Christian idea that an omnipotent, omnipresent, and omniscient being created this vast universe, with all its innumerable worlds and planets, and everything comprehensible and incomprehensible to man, and designated a certain race as his chosen people, and instituting a theocracy as detestable as the one supposed to hav been founded by Moses more than five thousand years ago, is too absurd for refutation, and can possibly be believed by those only who think themselvs objects of his adoration. In my estimation, the Bible is simply an imperfect history of an imperfect people living in a very imperfect age, and, if read by an unprejudiced mind, will scarcely gain credence. It is said every human being will be judged by a higher court for deeds done in the body, and it has been carefully estimated that there is a death in the human family every second of time, necessarily souls are putting in appearances at said court at the same ratio for impartial trial. I will not attempt to state how much justification will be displayed by such rapid manipulation—there certainly will be very little opportunity to enter a plea or to bribe the jury. Suffice it to say the Christian scheme of redemption is too inconsistent, and I can but exclaim, "O God, on what a slender thread hangs everlasting things." Respectfully, L. J. WHITLOCK.

REMARKS.—Our friend has evidently dared to do some thinking for himself, and as a consequence it is not strange that doubts hav arisen in his mind as to the fables that hav been taught us from our infancy. It is not at all singular that he should question the real existence of the Jewish Jahveh or Jehovah, of which the Jewish scriptures hav so much to say. They speak of Jahveh much as the Hindoo scriptures speak of Brahma, the Persian scriptures of Ormuzd, the Egyptian scriptures of Osiris, the Chaldean scriptures of Bali, the Greecian and Roman scriptures and poets of Jupiter; and there is just as much proof that Brahma, Ormuzd, Osiris, Bali, Jupiter, and Odin hav an existence as Jahveh. They are all, undoubtedly, the conceptions of human and ignorant minds. The idea of a personal god was undoubtedly the result in primitiv man of the forces of nature. He saw the constant struggle between heat and cold, light and darkness. In his ignorance he gave personality to these, and they hav been the models for the gods and devils that hav since had an imaginary existence.

The forces of nature are not personalities, and it is only the ignorance of man that has ascribed personality to them. The universe contains all the material and all the forces that exist, and these are eternal. They were never devised and created by any personality conceived by the mind of man, nor can they be destroyed or come to an end. Every atom of matter always existed and will forever exist, and force or motion is a concomitant and an inherent quality of matter. The gods may come and go, they may change according to the whims of man, but the universe remains and ever will.

As to the books ascribed to Moses containing a fanciful account of the creation, nothing is more certain than that they contain numerous errors and absurdities, and that they were not written by the person to whom they are attributed. The day is gradually passing away when they will form the basis of the world's religion. The truths of the universe are infinitly superior to such idle tales, and will ultimately be accepted as such. Then the groundless vagaries which hav come down to us from the days of man's primitiv ignorance will receive far less veneration than the world still accords them.—ED. T. S.

EUDORA, KAN., Nov. 13, 1880.

T. C. LELAND, ESQ., My Dear Friend: The bigots arrested a poor man—Mr. F. Conger—here last summer for cutting his wheat on Sunday and had him fined $80. The case has been appealed, and the Liberals here desire to raise a fund to assist this poor man in prosecuting the appeal. The Liberals here hav nearly all subscribed to this defense fund, but the amount thus raised falls far short of what will be necessary; and, at the suggestion of Prof. O. A. Phelps, we hav made a personal appeal by letter to prominent Liberals throughout the state and the borders of Missouri to raise by small subscriptions the amount of $300 and forward the same to G. S. Hicks of Eudora, Douglass county, Kan., who will acknowledge the receipt of the same by postal card.

This is an aggravated case, and should be rebuked. If you can send us a small amount from the Defense Fund it would be thankfully received.

O. A. Phelps is lecturing in this county now, and I think we shall be able to organize a Liberal League or two in his track of the anti-Comstock-law caliber.

I think I can answer Mr. Babcock's question, "Why Don't God Kill the Devil?" It is because O. A. Phelps has the contract to do it for him. He makes new Liberals wherever he goes, and puts enthusiasm into the old ones.

Yours fraternally, ENOS REED.

The above communication was laid before the National Defense Association at its weekly meeting, Thursday evening, November 18th. They agreed with the writer that "this is an aggravated case, and should be rebuked." They accordingly voted an appropriation of ten dollars from the Defense Fund to aid in paying the expense of the appeal that has been taken. They voted also to lay this statement before the Liberals of the country, with the recommendation that those who feel able should send further contributions to our Treasurer, H. B. Brown, 141 Eighth street. All such sums will be forwarded as far as needed, and if any amount is left over it will be appropriated to the defense of Mr. H. L. Barter, or any other victim of Christian bigotry whom we may hav on our hands.

NOTES FROM ILLINOIS.

CLINTON, ILL., Nov. 9, 1880.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER AND LIBERAL FRIENDS: It is some time since I hav spoken to you through the columns of our dear TRUTH SEEKER, and perhaps some of you begin to think that I hav abandoned the undertaking I commenced on my breaking up my home in Rockford (which occurred on the 9th of August), and starting out to make a canvass of the state of Illinois in the interest of Liberalism, and to see what I could do toward establishing the Liberal League movement in this rich prairie state. But let me say to you that I "counted the cost" before deciding to make the undertaking. If pecuniary gain or popular applause had been my aim, I should hav abandoned the undertaking long ere this. But it was not either of these things; it was and is my firm faith in the principles advocated by the National Liberal League, and by "this sign we will conquer."

I hav not written to you as often as I would like to have done, from the fact that it has been inconvenient for me to find time and place to write. When stopping with friends we always had too many things to talk about, and I did not want to expose my health by sitting up nights in a cold sleeping room to write; and when staying at hotels I was anxious to accomplish my business and move on in order to save unnecessary expense. But now I find myself here in the center of the state, delayed for a few days by snow and rain, making muddy roads, and a sick horse, my ponies being sick with the prevailing distemper (the epizootic), but I hope to be able to continue my tour toward the southern part of the state soon. I am now quartered in the Magill House, which, by the by, is the best kept hotel I hav met with thus far on my trip, and its proprietors, B. and F. M. Burroughs, are good, intelligent, and courteous Liberals, and if any of my readers hav occasion to visit Clinton, De Witt county, Ill., they cannot do better than to stop at the Magill House.

On account of the shortness and leanness of my purse, I hav to avoid as much as possible stopping at hotels, yet I feel myself to be no loser by this, for wherever I find readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER I find good friends. Had I time and space, I would like to mention some of those I hav stopped with by name, and some time in the future I hope to be permitted to write up for THE TRUTH SEEKER a short sketch of my trip over Illinois, but you are now too much interested in reading the account of its honored editor's tour over Europe to be interested in the humble productions of my untutored quill.

I hav now been on this trip over thirteen weeks, and hav been in eighteen counties lying between here and the northeastern corner of the state, and I hope to make a tour of the entire state of Illinois before the next annual session of the N. L. L. Congress.

I hav met many warm friends and received many generous words of encouragement, but financially I am to-day poorer than I was the day I left Rockford, three months ago, yet I am neither discouraged nor disheartened. The three months that hav just passed hav been three months of the most intense political excitement that this country has ever seen, and even our best Freethinkers hav had but little time to giv thought to the Liberal cause or the Liberal League movement. So, under the circumstances, I hav been fully as successful thus far as I could hav expected. I hav been instrumental in securing applications for three new Leagues, and hav placed applications in the hands of several good stanch Liberal workers, from whom I confidently expect to hear a good report, and that good, live auxiliary Liberal Leagues are organized. I hav sold a good many Liberal pamphlets, and a few books, and distributed some tracts. If I receive the aid and encouragement I should, I hope before another year rolls round to see the League movement as firmly established in the state of Illinois as it is in some of the adjoining states. I hope to be able to hold a convention somewhere in the central part of the state, and one or two rousing camp-meetings, and organize a good strong state League. And this I promis to make my best efforts to effect if the friends of the Liberal cause will only giv me a little help and assistance. I hav only received as donations to aid me in the work, since I made my report for September about six weeks ago, as follows: John V. Steimle, 50 cents; Wm. Martin Bronson, $1. Now, my Liberal friends, what say you? Shall the complete organization of the Liberal League movement in the prairie state be accomplished? If you feel like saying Yes, then let me hear from you. Your letters will reach me quicker for the next thirty days by directing them to Pana, Christian Co., Ill., than they will if sent to Rockford. Yet, all letters, postal, or other mail matter sent to Rockford will reach me in time, though they may, as some hav already done, hav to pass through half a dozen or more post-offices before catching me. And let me say in closing that I think our U. S. postal service is about as complete as it is possible to make it, if the sneaking spies of the Y. M. C. A. and the Comstock smelling society can be made to keep their filthy fingers off our mails. Believe me yours for universal mental freedom, free speech, free press, free mails, free men, and free women,

F. F. FOLLETT,

LOWELL, MICH., Nov. 14, 1880.

D. M BENNETT, Dear Brother: Back again, for which, as well as for your fortune and experiences, let us congratulate each other all around. You cannot in justice monopolize all such this time. I like to feel that you are at the helm of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your startling blows, ripe experience, mature judgment, and broad Liberalism please me. Your Liberalism, unlike that of others, does not strike at this phase to-day and that to morrow. I like the boom of guns that reverberate from afar again and again, therefore am I glad to know you are in the editorial sanctum of the brave old TRUTH SEEKER, which to-day leads the grand army of truth and progression.

Yours fraternally E. A. CHAPMAN.

LYNN, MASS., Nov. 19, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I beg to congratulate you that you are safely home again and that in improved health, hope, and heart. I hav been greatly delighted with your letters from Europe. Having traveled a good part of the way, I can vouch for their truth. I am glad some of my old friends in London crowned your worthy head with glory, honor, and immortality, and also filled your mouth with good things.

And now (when it comes) I must wish you and Mrs. Bennett a very happy Christmas and a very prosperous New Year, a cup running over, filling also the saucer, so that you may hav a little over to lay up for future years.

I am yours truly, W. D. CORKEN, M.D.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 19, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In reply to your note of the 15th, received to-day, I hav great pleasure in making the best possible apology for being in arrears for THE TRUTH SEEKER by remitting the subscription for another year from termination of the last. Inclosed please find three dollars therefor. Yours, W. H. SHELDON.

TOMS RIVER, N. J., Nov. 18, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am glad to learn of your safe arrival at home again, and feel that you must hav gained much in the way of rest while away from your desk, among new scenes and strange faces. But the rest comes not from idleness of pen or brain, but from change of view rather, for your pen has been activ.

Fraternally, O. N. BANCROFT.

BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH., Nov., 1880.

D. M. BENNETT:

From the lands of religion, the lands of gore,
Welcome, thrice welcome, to thy own nativ shore.

WORTHY PUTNAM.

KEWANEE, Nov. 17, 1880.

BRO. BENNETT: I feel pleased that you are safely home. I cannot help admiring your power for work, both mental and physical; your digging such vast quantities of ore from the mines, cutting, trimming, and bringing into use the products of all sources, in fact, delving into the vegetable, mineral, and animal kingdoms; through mountains, seas, and earth for your material, and making it up, then comparing it with that already done by our race from remote to present times, to say nothing about your getting us to look around the universe among the suns and stars, then adding physical labor enough in writing it to kill six government clerks, is to me remarkable, is what you should bless your natal star for.

All men are not Bennetts, Ingersolls, Wrights, Underwoods, Gregs, or Bradlaughs, nor are all women Besants, Slenkers, Wixons, or Colmans; nor can they approach more men and women as intellect is apportioned than thousands of others, so each one can hav a finger in the pie. In fact I question whether it is not the state of inequality in the power of giving ideas to others in which such persons excel that makes them in some sense appear what they are, and the appreciation of others is certainly what shows them superior in their department.

There are great inequalities of mind, no one anything but finite, and if each could find its forte and hav opportunity for development, and the balance of average capability were struck in all departments comparativly, the book would not show badly for the many who are now sadly and wrongfully neglected.

I regard humanity as being in general on very nearly the same plane. There will always be exceptions of genius and mental dwarfs, but there is a brighter, happier day for humanity near at hand, if it does not reach the millennium, or THE TRUTH SEEKER and the many wonderful works it advertises could never hav found existence. They are called for and drunk in as the thirsty desert devours the dew, which shows at least an ability to appreciate if not to produce. So take courage and go ahead, knowing that future generations will rise up and call your memory blessed, while Anthony and Benedict will be forgotten or remembered with pitying scorn. Your friend,

A. W. WOOD.

A Still Day in Autumn.

I love to wander through the woodlands hoary
In the soft gleam of an autumnal day.
When summer gathers up her robes of glory
And, like a dream of beauty, glides away.

How through each loved, familiar path she lingers,
Serenely smiling through the golden mist,
Tinting the wild grape with her dewy fingers,
Till the cool emerald turns to amethyst.

Kindling the faint stars of the hazel, shining
To light the gloom of autumn's moldering halls,
With hoary plumes the clematis entwining,
Where, o'er the rock, her withered garland falls.

Warm lights are on the sleepy uplands waning,
Beneath, dark clouds along the horizon rolled,
Till the slant sunbeams through their fringes raining
Bathe all the hills in melancholy gold.

The moist winds breathe of crisped leaves and flowers
In the damp hollows of the woodland sown,
Mingling the freshness of autumnal showers
With spicy airs from cedar alleys blown.

Beside the brook, and on the ambered meadow,
Where yellow fern tufts fleck the faded ground,
With folded lids beneath their palmy shadow,
The gentian nods, in dewy slumber bound.

Upon these soft-fringed lids the bee sits brooding
Like a fond lover loth to say farewell,
Or, with shut wings, through silken folds intruding,
Creeps near her heart his drowsy tale to tell.

The little birds upon the hillside lonely
Flit noiselessly along from spray to spray,
Still as a sweet and wandering thought that only
Shows its bright wings and softly glides away.

The scentless flowers in the warm sunlight dreaming
Forget to breathe their fullness of delight,
And through the tranced woods soft airs are streaming
Still as the dewfall of the summer night.

So, in my heart a sweet, unwonted feeling
Stirs, like the wind in ocean's hollow shell,
Through all its secret chambers softly stealing,
Yet finds no words its mystic charm to tell.

—Sarah Helen Whitman.

To a Praying Friend.

BY THE INFIDEL QUAKER.

The logic of facts it were vain to deny,
For facts are like figures that never can lie,
'Tis truth I am seeking, with earnest concern,
The fables of old superstition I spurn.

Christianity rests not on facts but on faith,
On a mythical savior, a phantom, a wraith;
On a God who is jealous, deceitful, austere,
Revengeful, and cruel, exciting our fear.

Thou prayest to God, whom thou callest thy maker,
To save, for Christ's sake, "the Infidel Quaker."
I judge not thy motives, nor censure the act,
But here comes a question of logic, of fact:

Can'st thou by thy prayers hope to change nature's laws?
Or alter God's purpose, or forward his cause?
If I have not faith because evidence fails,
Will God make me credit old fables and tales?

So, dear, anxious friend, please heed what I say,
And never for me to thy deity pray.
Don't waste precious time in asking thy maker
To save for Christ's sake "the Infidel Quaker."

CLERGYMAN'S VICTIMS.
A Radical Romance.
—BY—
MRS. J. E. BALL.

This pamphlet of over 100 pages is a pleasing animated, domestic story, presenting Liberal thought in an agreeable manner, and will be read by thousands where heavier, drier, and more philosophical and metaphysical works are not preferred. It is a good story to lend Christian neighbors to read. Price, 25 cents.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1880.
I wish to notify the public that a Mr. Baldwin, of Chicago, also Rhodes & McClure, of the same place, are publishing pamphlet editions of my lectures. All the lectures published by them are grossly inaccurate—filled with mistakes, horribly printed, and outrageously unjust to me. These men are simple literary thieves and pirates, and are obtaining money from the public under false pretenses. I take this course to warn the public that these publications are fraudulent. The only correct copies of my lectures are published by C. P. Farrell. All others are published by people who are willing to steal from me and defraud the public under. These wretches have published one lecture under four titles, and several others under two or three.

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY.
BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,
Graduate of the Hygeio Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.
The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Superstition in all Ages.
By JOHN MESLIER.
A Roman Catholic Priest,
Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."
This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:
NEWBURYPORT MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.
To Miss Anna Knoop, Dear Madam:
The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You have done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

BY
ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that have been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

DOCTOR FELLOWS

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

[From the Western Reformer.]

"DR. R. P. FELLOWS
is a highly educated and scientific physician. He has an original system of practice, and is perfectly reliable and trustworthy. We hav heard many flattering reports of his successful cures of diseases incident to humanity."

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind.

Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

THE

JAMIESON-DITZLER DEBATE

BETWEEN

PROF. W. F. JAMIESON,

Of Chicago, Ill., and Minnesota, and the

REV. JACOB DITZLER, D.D.,

Of Kentucky.

Held in Kirksville, Mo., during nine evenings —May 20-29, 1879. Synopsis report—official. This book of 220 pages gives an interesting presentation of the theological questions which divide Christians and Liberals. The Rev. Ditzler is regarded as an able defender of his favorit Christian doctrine, but it will undoubtedly be admitted by the reader that Prof. W. F. Jamieson fully met all he had to offer. Christian readers will take more kindly to a work of this kind, giving both sides an equally fair chance, than to books on our side only.

Price, in paper covers 50 cents; well bound, 75 cents.

WORKINGMEN, READ!

ALLEGORY.

UNCLE SAM AND AMERICUS.

A DIALOG ON

LAND, LABOR, AND REFORM

By F. E. BOYD.

Outlines of a plan for a new American national land and labor co-operativ system, by which land and comfortable homes may be secured to the poorest classes of every race, without money or price, with the educational and social advantages of modern civilization. Designed to ameliorate the condition of the struggling masses; to equalize population; to prevent vice, crime, and pauperism; to prevent the recurrence of industrial crises and feuds, labor riots, and popular insurrections; to terminate Indian wars; to avoid or do away with an oligarchy of landlords and capitalists; and to preserve or restore the liberties of the people and the rights of self-government by bringing immediately together the two great elements of universal progress, land and labor.

"The land shall not be sold forever; for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. xxv. 23).

"Moreover, the profit of the earth is for all" (Ecclesiastes v. 9).

Price 10 cents. Sold at this office.

AN OUTLINE

OF THE

FRENCH REVOLUTION, ITS CAUSES AND RESULTS.

BY W. S. BELL.

There is probably no period of history in the world more interesting or more important than the French Revolution in the last century, and Mr. Bell has traced it ably and in an interesting manner. Every one who reads it will be pleased with it. Price, 25 cents. Send to this office.

SAMSON:

A Myth-Story of the Sun.

The Gospel of the Kingdom According to the Holy Men of Old.

The author of these works finds the Bible largely mythical in its character. He presents us a number of copies to be disposed of in the interest of THE TRUTH SEEKER. All who purchase will therefore aid THE TRUTH SEEKER to the amount of their purchase, or add to the Bennett fund as they may choose.

Samson, 20 cents; Gospel of the Kingdom 2 vols., each, 20 cents.

Gems of Thought.

SOLITUDE sometimes is best society,
And short retirement urges sweet return.
—Milton.

ALL true work of a man, hang the author of it on what gibbet you like, must and will accomplish itself.—Carlyle.

To make society
The sweeter welcome, we will keep ourself,
Till supper-time, alone. —Shakspere.

GIV me the liberty to know, to think, to believe, and to utter freely, according to conscience, above all liberties.—Milton.

I TAKE possession of man's mind and deed.
care not what the sects may brawl.
I sit as God, holding no form of creed,
But contemplating all. —Tennyson.

"DOCTOR, my daughter had a terrible fit; she continued half an hour without knowledge or understanding." "Oh, never mind that," said the doctor, "many people continue so all their lives."

THE sun will run his orbit, and the moon
Her circle. Wait, and love himself will bring
The drooping flower, changed to fruit
Of wisdom. Wait, my faith is larger in time,
And that which shapes it to some perfect end.
—Tennyson.

O WAD some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!
It wad from many a blunder free us
And foolish notion;
What airs in dress an' gait wad leave us,
And e'en devotion. —Burns.

A VERY charitable man and nobody's fool was he who used to say when he heard anything being loudly condemned for some fault, "Ah, well! yes! it seems very hard to me because that's not my way of sinning."—Christian Register.

As that man cannot set a right value upon health who has never known sickness, nor feel the blessing of ease, who has been through life a stranger to pain, so there can be no confirmed and passionate love of truth for him who has not experienced the hollowness of error.—Coleridge.

PRAY, tell me of what school you are?
Both of the old and of the new.
The school of Hermes Trismegisbus,
Who uttered his oracles sublime
Before the olympiads, in the dew
Of the early dawn and dusk of time.
—Longfellow's Spanish Student.

THERE are two sorts of agitation—one partial and slow, the other sudden and universal; one the work of the few, the thinking classes, who slowly elaborate public opinion by dint of pertinacious restoratives of reason; the other the act of the millions who feel a want which is suddenly aggravated, or of which the means for gratification are suddenly exposed to view and instinctively recognized.—Spectator (Lon., Eng.).

COWPER writes perpetually on the two-fold assumption that a life of retirement is more favorable to virtue than a life of action, and that "God made the country, while man made the town." Both parts of the assumption are untrue. A life of action is more favorable to virtue, as a rule, than a life of retirement, and the development of humanity is higher and richer, as a rule, in the town than in the country.—Goldwin Smith's "Cowper."

THE sweet words
Of Christian promis, words that even yet
Might stem destruction, were they wisely preached,
Are muttered o'er by men whose tones proclaim
How flat and wearisome they feel their trade;
Rank scoffers seem, but most too indolent
To deem them falsehood or to know their truth. —Coleridge.

NO MAN, at bottom, means injustice; it is always for some obscure, distorted image of a right that he contends, an obscure image diffracted, exaggerated in the wonderfullest way, by natural dimness and selfishness, getting tenfold more diffracted by exasperation of contest, till, at length, it became all but irrecognizable, yet still an image of a right. Could a man own to himself that the thing he fought for was wrong, contrary to fairness and the law of reason, he would own also that it thereby stood condemned and hopeless; he could fight for it no longer.—Carlyle.

THE assertion that the capacity inherent in every human soul is infinit and inexhaustible, and only to be completely realized in eternity—such an assertion is obviously incapable of proof. It is a mere vaunt which is confronted by the consciousness of every candid, modest mind. He who does not inflate himself is well aware of the humble meaning of his capacities, and while grateful for the time allowed him for their development makes no claim for its prolongation beyond the duration of that earthly life: nay, its eternal persistence would fill him with dismay.—Strauss.

FIVE centuries before the Christian era Buddhism had already inculcated gentleness and compassion not only toward men but toward all living creatures. Among the Jews themselves, the Rabbi Hillel had already taught a generation before Christ that the commandment "to love one's neighbors as one's self" constituted the very essence of the law. To assist even our enemies was a maxim of the Stoics in Jesus's time. And but one generation later, although without doubt independently of him, and strictly in keeping with the principles of the Stoic school, Epictetus called all men brothers, inasmuch as all were the children of God.—Strauss.

Odds and Ends.

A NIGHTMARE is the only animal that has a dreamy eye.

A BRIDE may not like fish, but she will not go back on her ring.

A MAN must be a hardened sinner when he "lies" at the point of death.

THEY say it is only the female bee that stings. Oh, pins! thy name is woman.

IN America the idea of a free press is so prevalent that very few ever think of paying the printer.

"LET'S salve the best thing you've got for a cut," said the boy to the doctor. And the doctor gave him one with his whip.

WHEN you see two dogs growling and getting ready to fight, remember that it is only a joint debate, and the liveliest dog will get away with the joint.

ALL I know about good or bad luk iz this, our good luk we attribut to our shrewdness, our bad luk we charge over to somebody else's account.—Josh Billings.

AT a London bazar recently a lady handed round her baby to be kissed at sixpence each. If it were a girl baby we would hav paid the price and taken a due bill due in sixteen years.

AMONG the newest hats for ladies is one called "Sunrise," so called probably because a man has to get up before sunrise every day for a week to earn enough money to pay for one.

A GIRL just returned to Hannibal from a Boston high school said, upon seeing a fire engine at work, "Who would evah hav dweamed such a vewy diminutiv-looking apawatus would hold so much wattah?"

HE was a ragged orphan boy—
He did not own a cent—
But still whene'er he tore his clothes,
He'd gather in his rent.
—Salem Sunbeam.

POP CORN.

Pip, pop,
Hip, hop,
Tip, top,
Pop corn!

Out of the pan,
Into the fire,
Bursting and bouncing
Higher and higher.

White as new snow,
Yellow as gold,
You'd better be patient
Until it is cold.

A SONG OF TEN.

[The recent incidents of "clerical error" may be briefly summarized:

Ten little parsons, preaching love divine,
One kissed his servant girl, then there were 9.

Nine little parsons, preaching sinner's fate,
One kissed his neighbor's wife, then there were 8.

Eight little parsons, smoothing paths to heaven,
One kissed his boarding-mistress then there were 7.

Seven little parsons, exposing Satan's tricks,
One starved the children, then there were 6.

Six little parsons, preaching Christ alive,
One got slinging arsenic, then there were 5.

Five little parsons, preaching sin no more,
One shot his sexton, then there were 4.

Four little parsons, preaching Calvary,
One got horsewhipped, then there were 3.

Three little parsons, preaching Christ as true,
One cut his baby's throat, then there were 2.

Two little parsons, following the Son,
One beat his child to death, then there was 1.

One little parson, just for pious fun,
Eloped with a deacon's wife, then there was none.

GETTING AT THE POINT.

Of course it was a sin
For him to stick a pin
In the chair,
Where his parents often sat,
But he didn't think of that—
Didn't care.

On the cushion soft and fat
Lay his father's Sunday hat;
And he knew
That he'd never stop to look
For the tiny pointed hook
Sticking through.

So behind the lounge he got,
For he thought he'd rather not
Be around
When the parent raised the hat
And upon the pin-point sat—
Judgment sound.

Then he heard his father's step,
And another, but he kept
Like a mouse,
The new parson, sure as fate,
Moved into the place of late,
Souls to rouse.

Host from chair removed his hat,
Bade him seat himself on that,
Which he did.
From inspired lips there fell
Earnest words and a curdling yell
All unbid.

Now that boy has lost his vim,
And a seat that just suits him
Must be soft,
And he wears a weary frown,
But you'll note he don't sit down
Very oft.

Notes and Clippings.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON has a statue in New York. Thomas Jefferson has not.

A NICELY dug grave on his premises was a hint given to Mr. Lambert of Galway by his tenants.

A SEXTON of a church in Paterson, N. J., has been sent to prison for seven years for barn-burning.

THE Rev. Dr. Newman says that Evangelist Harrison, the so-called "Boy Preacher," is "the Lord's ram's horn, at whose blasts the walls of Jericho topple to their fall."

"SPIRITUAL Corns and Bunions" was the subject of a sermon recently announced at Kenosha, Wis. It is thought that the Kenosha pastor must hav been wearing tight boots that week.

MOODY and Sankey are battling with sin in San Francisco, and, although they are drawing great crowds, they find the sinners of that wicked city quite as obdurate as they had expected.

BRO. BENNETT has arrived home from Europe in safety. His letters to his excellent paper greatly interested and pleased us. . . . THE TRUTH SEEKER weekly grows in our favor.—The Infidel.

ANNA SWANGER, belonging to the wealthiest family in Butlerville, Ind., was known to hav rejected three white suitors; yet she eloped with a middle-aged negro widower, and refuses to part from him.

A PENNSYLVANIA law provides that all money put into a stakeholder's hands as a wager may be seized and devoted to the support of the poor. The statute is sixty years old, and has long been a dead letter. The Poor Board of Scranton, however, hav undertaken to enforce it in that city.

AN Illinois tramp, desiring to commit suicide, tried in vain to beg a dose of laudanum, to borrow a knife, and to steal a pistol. Then he hanged himself with a halter in a stable, but was cut down and kicked out. His final and successful resort was to lay his head on a railroad track in front of a locomotiv.

JOHN L. STODDARD is delivering a course of lectures at Lynn, Mass. Mrs. Whitcomb labors under the hallucination that he loves her, and, until excluded from the hall, she invariably sat in the front seat and ogled the embarrassed speaker. She holds a season ticket, and has brought a suit to secure admission.

THE principle of treating lunatics long since in vogue at Gheel, in Belgium, has been extensivly adopted in Scotland. They are boarded out among sane people in the village, treated with great gentleness, and subjected to as little restraint as possible. The plan should be tried here. Had it been in practice at St. Peter's, Minn., the unfortunate victims of the fire would not hav been locked up and consequently burned.

WHEN the Rev. James Freeman Clarke said at the great temperance meeting in Boston that in order to promote temperance he "would even hav saloons where there is lager beer,' some of the audience hissed. And when he said further that lager beer was better than whisky, the hisses were renewed. And yet these remarks showed him to be a wise temperance reformer. The usual trouble with the temperance people is that they defeat their object by going to extremes against which human nature rebels.—Sun.

"THE time has come when there is an immense amount of thinking done quietly and unostentatiously about this great question of religion, and it is no longer set led by ministers on Sunday, but is considered and pondered over by layman every day in the week." So said the Rev. Dr. Bellows at Boston. But so far as the church is concerned, the trouble about this quiet lay thought is that it is leading the thinkers to reject vital religious doctrins or to reject the church itself because it fails to liv up to its own teachings. It is a very serious and earnest Infidelity, but it is Infidelity, all the same, to which this immense amount of thinking is bringing men.—Sun.

SOME of the English Ritualists are becoming violent. The Rev. H. Marriot, speaking at an indignation meeting at West Broomwich, after condemning the decision in Mr. Pelham Dale's case as "idotic, fanatical, and foolish," and the lawyers and judges as a "regular set of fools," said that the abominable Public Worship Regulation bill had come out of hell, and he could prove it. "Those Low Church people wanted to teach the public that they (the clergy) were not priests—that they had no power to giv absolution after confession of sins, and that the real presence was not in the sacrament, and this teaching that bill was intended to support. It was therefore plain that it was the devil's work to destroy the prayer book."

BY the departure of the Carthusians, France will lose some $250,000 a year in the shape of license duties, which the Fathers paid on their celebrated liqueur manufactured in large quantities at La Grande Chartreuse, near Grenoble. The order at one time owned a vast amount of property in Paris, in the neighborhood of the Luxembourgh—a property which, it is said, was obtained by a pious fraud not uncommon in the middle ages. The monks having set their hearts on the chateau of Vauvert, that habitation at once became the abode of goblins and demons, who so alarmed the proprietor that he disposed of his residence for a mere trifle. The property was puchased by the Carthusians, who had little difficulty in getting rid of the evil spirits.

THE Rev. Stephen H. Ting, Jr., rector of the Protestant Episcopal church of the Holy Trinity, of this city, has been startling his Protestant brethren by a recent sermon in which he pronounced as miracles the appearance over twenty years ago of the Virgin Mary to a peasant girl at Lourdes, in the southern part of France, and the numerous cures that hav since been performed there by means of prayer to the Virgin; and also similar ones that hav been performed in a similar way at Knock, in Ireland. His Protestant friends are alarmed to see him thus giving the credit of miracles to what has been accomplished in the Catholic church. It is perhaps pitiful in this intelligent age of the world to consider any event as the result of a miracle.

THE new volume of poems of M. Victor Hugo bearing the curious title of "L'Ane" ("The Ass.") appeared on Oct. 26. The public's curiosity was aroused by its title when first announced, and some ingenious people insisted that the real title was "L'Ame" ("The Soul,") and that "L'Ane" was a misprint. It was nothing of the kind. The ass is supposed to be engaged in an expedition to explore humanity from a philosophic and æsthetic point of view, and is so disgusted at the narrow-mindedness, egotism, selfishness, and cowardice he encounters, that he returns to his thistles in sheer disgust. The poet then adds a concluding chapter, in which he expresses his belief in improvement, progress, purer faith, better laws, and universal love and brotherhood.

ARTIFICIAL eyes hav been used from the remotest times, and it is said that they hav been found among the mummies of ancient Egypt. The artificial eye is not a globe, but a mere shell. Some are so well made and so carefully adapted that they escape detection not only by casual observers but also by doctors conversant with the strides made of late years in this department. It is essential that the eye should not be too thick, on account of its weight, and it must not be too thin, or it will be brittle. There are many advantages in wearing a false eye after the true one is lost. It keeps the eyelids in their proper position, it prevents the lashes from turning inward and producing irritation, and it prevents foreign bodies from entering the eye. Many a servant wears an artificial eye without his employer being aware of it.

A LIVELY discussion has arisen concerning the ministers of the Reformed church and their stated preaching on the Heidelberg Catechism. There is a rule of the church requiring that this solid old compendium of orthodox faith shall be regularly preached about by each and every minister. A religious paper recently said that most of the ministers regard this as such a bore that they disregard the rule, and omit to preach on the Catechism. The Christian Intelligencer takes up the cudgels in behalf of the accused ministers, and sends for definit information on the subject. It is a rule of each classis that the ministers shall report once a year as to whether they hav obeyed the law as to the Catechism or not. The reports are all accessible, and the Christian Intelligencer hopes after gathering them to convince the world of the falsity of the charges that hav been made.

IN a Tennessee Baptist church tableaux were given as a means of filling an exhausted treasury. In one of these the pastor appeared, holding a married lady in something like an apparently affectionate embrace. The position these good people assumed was that which was required by the scene represented. They both declared that they did not mean to be affectionate to each other, but only to seem so. The lady's husband took offense at what he considered undue familiarity and affection on the part of the parson, and held that the latter gentleman had not merely seemed to be affectionate. A lively quarrel resulted. No blood was shed, nor blows exchanged, but there was a great deal of threatening. The upshot of the matter was the resignation of the pastor and his leaving the place. The church is now in want of a minister, and none but aged and wrinkled ones are recommended to apply.

IT appears that, despite the many reductions in his household expenditure effected by Leo XIII., the outlay of the Holy See still amounts to nearly five millions of lire annually, toward which total papal investments in foreign stocks only contribute about a million and a half. Thus it becomes desirable that the Peter's pence should be made to yield as much as will balance the pontifical budget and even a trifle more, wherewith, by degrees, to augment the capital invested abroad. The pope still declines to accept the income—three and a quarter millions of lire—offered to him by the Italian government, although it has been lately proposed that this subvention should take the form of a personal contribution to the Peter's pence fund on the part of the king and queen. A committee of cardinals and prelates has been formed to giv impetus to the collection, which has fallen off yearly since the death of Pius IX.

THE English Church Union has a number of branches, one of which is in Bristol. This branch recently held a soiree and fair, at which fancy goods were exhibited and speeches were made. Some of these speeches gave utterance to radical views on the matter of church reform and management. Prominent among these was that of the Rev. Mr. Compton, who spoke on "Discipline in the church." He lamented the almost total absence of spiritual discipline, and said that through its acknowledged want every one in England is reckoned as belonging to the church, whatever his opinions may be. Mr. Compton was particularly severe on the bishops, accusing them of being too big for their work. He advocated a less consequential class of men for bishops, with considerably less pay than is now customary. A British bishop now receives not less than $5,000, our money, for his salary. Mr. Compton says that the demand is for men who will be glad to do the work for one-fourth of that amount. The intimation is that the latter sum is about what the work is worth, the remainder being for the style the bishop puts on.

ELMINA D. SLENKER has been writing a series of articles on sexual topics which hav called forth the criticisms of many of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in the columns of which those articles hav appeared. Some take the ground that such subjects should not be discussed in a family paper; others that she is wrong in some of her theories. For our part we are always glad to see these subjects brought out at almost any time and place. To those who hav given fair attention to them the ignorance which exists is appalling. About a hundred years ago the writings of a great botanist were attempted to be suppressed because they treated upon the sexes of plants! A hundred years hence the existing opposition to the investigation of the sex question as appertaining to the human family will be looked upon with no less surprise. We certainly do not agree with Mrs. Slenker in some of her views, believing rather in those of one of her critics, Mrs. Ruth W. Scott Briggs. But we are sure that whatever erroneous views may possibly find publication by those who fearlessly enter upon the discussion of the subject, the world will be made wiser and better by such discussion.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Events of the Week.

WE had quite a fall of snow in this city on Thanksgiving Day.

THE official returns show that Garfield had a popular majority of 3,471.

A MAIL car with fifty sacks of mail was burnt at Sulphur, Tex., on the 26th ult.

FOUR railway accidents—two collision and two derailments—occurred in Buffalo on Saturday last.

A CLERGYMAN has been arrested at Birmingham, England, and imprisoned for ritualistic practices.

IN a recent engagement at Dulcigno four hundred Albanians and three hundred Turks were killed.

THE propeller Simcoe was lost, with all hands—twenty-one persons—on Lake Huron during a recent storm.

A STEAMER and several warehouses were destroyed by fire at West Point, Va., on Sunday last. Loss, $220,000.

BY a boiler explosion at Charlotte, Mich., on last Monday, two men were blown to atoms and several others badly hurt.

In a miners' riot at Robinson's Camp, Col., on the 27th ult., Lieutenant-Governor Robinson was shot and fatally wounded.

A MOVEMENT is on foot in Pennsylvania to elect General Grant to the United States Senate as the successor of Senator Wallace.

Two freight trains and a passenger train crashed together at Macon, Ga., on the 28th ult. One person killed and a few injured.

OWING to the opposition of the press and pulpit the theatrical manager who was about to produce the Passion play in this city has given up the project.

THE French steamer Oncle Joseph was recently run into and sunk by an Italian steamer on the Mediterranean. Two hundred and fifty lives were lost.

THE Moors of Morocco hav commenced a crusade against the Jews; and Bismarck is making it as uncomfortable as possible for the Jews in Germany.

THE Russian Nihilists are appealing to Europe and this country for pecuniary assistance to enable them to carry on their fight for the sovereignty of the people.

IN an artesian well being bored at Paterson, New Jersey, salt water was struck at a depth of 2,100 feet. As the well was sunk to obtain fresh water, it will hav to be abandoned.

A DESPERATE race fight between Irish and German laborers took place at Tottsville Station, Ind., a few days ago. All were more or less injured, but none were killed.

MANY persons were dangerously injured by being trampled upon during a panic in a church at Clifford, Ont., on last Sunday. The panic was caused by a slide of snow from the roof.

SIXTY laborers were buried in a snow slide near Chalk Creek, Col., on the 27th ult. One man was killed, and nineteen badly and eleven slightly injured. The others escaped with a fright.

GAVAZZI, an Italian, who was first a monk, then a soldier under Garibaldi, fighting against the Pope, and now is a Protestant preacher, has come to this country to raise funds for the Protestant missions in Italy. This is his third visit to this country.

WHILE Irishmen in this country are sending money to help their brothers in the land agitation, the English government is dispatching large bodies of troops across the Irish Channel to quell the agitation, taking care to pick the soldiers so that no Irishmen are in the ranks.

A TRAMP who died of hunger and cold in an outhouse at Burnt Hills, Saratoga county, New York, had nearly twenty thousand dollars in government bonds and money concealed in his clothing. Several alleged widows and swarms of cousins, brothers, and children hav already put in an appearance to claim the money. As there is litigation ahead, the lawyers will doubtless get the bonanza.

THE PALACES, MUSEUMS, AND GALLERIES OF ROME.

ROME, Oct. 3, 1880.

DEAR READERS: I have reasons to fear that I have already wearied you in what I have had to say of this city, but you must remember that much is here to be spoken of, and that it takes me a good while to tell a story. I must tell you something about the palaces, the museums, and the picture galleries of Rome, because they are the most distinguishing features which the city possesses. To undertake to give you a description of what Rome is and possesses and say nothing about its palaces and works of art would be the hight of absurdity. So you will have to submit to the boring process on these subjects.

THE CATACOMBS.

First, however, I will tell you about the Catacombs. Baedeker says: "Ancient and Christian Rome seem to be separated by a wide chasm, if the modern appearance of the city alone be regarded. The most ancient churches having disappeared, or being concealed under a modern garb, the earliest Christian monuments of any importance are several centuries later than the last Roman structures. This interval is filled up in a satisfactory manner by means of the Catacombs or burial-places of the early Christians, which have recently been rendered specially interesting by a series of important investigations."

He then goes on to give a history of other burial-places. It seems that the term Catacomb is a modern one. The early Christians gave their burial places the Greek name, Cœmenteria, meaning resting or sleeping places, possibly with the hope of a resurrection. The Roman law, frequently re-enacted during the empire, prohibited the interment of the dead, or even their ashes, within the precincts of the city, and was binding upon the Christians as upon all others. Accordingly, their burial-places are found situated beyond the Aurelian Wall, or what was considered the limits of the city. While most of the nations of Europe had disposed of their dead by cremation, the Egyptians and the Jews, perhaps from some notions they entertained of a resurrection and a future life, adhered to their practice of interment. Christians, imbibing their views of a future life from those sources, very naturally adhered to the practice of interring their dead, and they made excavations in the earth, consisting of subterranean passages, in the lateral walls of which were apertures or horizontal niches for the reception of the corpses. Burial-places of this kind are found to exist at Naples, Syracuse, Chiusi, Venosa, and in Africa, as well as here.

The subterranean excavations in this vicinity are in the soft strata of tufa stone (tufo granolare) of which most of the hills in the neighborhood of Rome are chiefly composed, and which is rather too soft to be used for building purposes. The hard tuff-stone used for building, and what is termed the puzzolana, which, when incorporated with lime, constitutes the celebrated Roman cement, were seldom penetrated in making the excavations for the dead.

The Romans used burying places of two kinds, to wit, the family tombs and those of collegia, or societies, of which there were several. In either mode the purchase of a definite area was necessary, within which every tomb was sacred and inviolable both above and below the surface. So, also, the Catacombs were considered as family tombs, as it were, and were often named after the person who made the original purchase of the ground. Such were those of Domitilla, Balbina, Novella. Prætextatus, Pontius, Maximus, and to some extent those of collegia which began to be formed by the Christians for places of common burial in the third century. The approaches to those vaults were wide and conspicuous, with no attempt at concealment or secrecy. The oldest of them are thought to date from the first century, while the most recent are probably of the fourth century. The practice of the priests taking supervision of the last rites over the dead and of the burial-places is referred to for the first time at the close of the second century, and this custom seems to have gradually embraced all Christian burial places, the different districts of which were distributed among the deacons, and as the numbers of Christians increased, some arrangement of this kind became the more necessary.

It was not till the third century that the safety of the Catacombs was occasionally endangered during the persecution which the Christians, like the adherents of all new and heretical systems of religion, have been compelled to submit to. When the devout among the Christians assembled at the tombs of those of their own numbers who had been martyred they were sometimes followed by their enemies even into these subterranean passages, and instances probably occurred where they were slain in those retreats. From this period, it is said, date those precautionary measures which are sometimes observable, such as narrow staircases and concealed entrances. When Constantine allied himself with the Christians they had a friend who possessed power, and he issued an edict at Milan extending security to the burial-places of the Christians. Throughout the fourth century interments in the Catacombs were very frequent, but toward the beginning of the fifth century they became far less frequent and were soon discontinued altogether, the practice instead being adopted of burying the dead near the churches. The last three catacombs were founded by Pope Julius in 336–347.

The Catacombs, however, as well as the tombs of the martyrs, still enjoyed the veneration of pilgrims and devout visitors. As early as 370 Pope Damasus caused numerous restorations to be made, and the more important tombs to be furnished with metrical inscriptions; apertures for light were constructed, to facilitate the access of visitors, and the walls of a comparatively late period decorated with paintings, which differ materially from those of the earliest Christians in subject and treatment. It is true, however, that during the frequent devastation undergone by the city the Catacombs were often pillaged and injured, the first being on the occasion of the siege by the Goths in 537, and afterward by the Lombards in 755, when they suffered still more seriously. The invaders ransacked the burial-places of the martys with pious zeal, searching for the bones of the saints, which they deemed more precious than gold, and, giving them arbitrary names according to their whims and fancies, carried them home in the hopes of selling them to those who were greater fools than themselves. They prosecuted this species of Christian robbery with pious vigor. That a skeleton was found on Roman soil was sufficient warrant for the thieves to attribute supernatural powers to it, and thus it doubtless happened that the greatest criminals and sinners who had been buried in the Catacombs were palmed off upon the credulous devotees of the Christian system as the greatest saints, and the bones of those sinners performed as great cures and as marvelous miracles as though they had been the bones of the Virgin herself. This is a very good indication as to how the relic business was prosecuted in the earlier centuries. It was conducted in nearly all cases by robbers, thieves, and liars.

After these repeated plunderings the Catacombs were restored by John III., in the latter part of the sixth century, and by Paul I. in the eighth century; but the transference of the remains of the martys to the altars of the city had already taken place in the most wholesale manner. In 609, when Boniface IV. consecrated the Pantheon as a church, he caused twenty-eight wagon-loads of the bones of "saints" to be deposited beneath the altar and there is an inscription still extant to the effect that no less than 2,300 corpses of saints or "martyrs" were buried in the church of St. Prassede on July 20, 817. Hadrian I. (722–95) and Leo III. (795–816), made some further efforts to save the Catacombs from ruin, but the task was abandoned by Pascholis I. (817–24), after which time the Catacombs gradually fell into oblivion. Thus, if the Catacombs were originally designed to protect the bones of the dead from the depredation of the pagans, they actually fell a prey to the far greater rapacity of their own ghoul-like Christian brethren.

Toward the close of the fifteenth century the Catacombs began to be occasionally visited by pilgrims and curiosity seekers, but it was a century later that the Roman academy of the humanists began to make regular explorations of those subterranean burial-places. In 1578 some workmen accidentally discovered an ancient cœmetarium near the Via Salara, and from that period the subject began to excite general and permanent interest; and the Roman church has since then regarded the supervision of Roma Sotterranea as a point of honor. The pioneer of the scientific examination of the Catacombs was Antonio Bosio, of Malta, who devoted thirty-five years of his life to the task, but his "Roma Sotterranea" was not published till 1632, thirty years after his death. His researches, although afterward prosecuted by other scholars, were at length threatened with oblivion, but within the last thirty years he has been worthily succeeded by the Jesuit P. Marchi and the able brothers De Rossi, Michele, the geologist, and Giovanni Battista, the archæologist, and the results of their investigations have been published.

The arrangement of the Catacombs was originally extremely simple. Narrow passages thirty inches in width, and sometimes even less, were excavated and furnished with loculi, or recesses in the sides, of the length of the body to be interred. These recesses were placed one above the other to the number of five, six, or seven, and when the body was there laid away without any coffin or enclosure save a cloth, the recess was closed by a slab of marble or occasionally terra cotta, which were either left plain or merely recorded the name of the deceased, with the additional words, "In pace," and sometimes the word "martyr." The older inscriptions were sometimes in Greek, but the later always in Latin. This perhaps may be regarded as a proof that the Christians were at first aliens, but eventually became a portion of the naturalized and permanent community. These inscriptions are now largely in the Museum of the Lateran, and the recesses in the Catacombs are empty in consequence of the mania for relic-hunting spoken of, and which even now has not become extinct.

There is nothing in the Catacombs that may be regarded as distinctively Christian, because they were used as well by the Jews and the ordinary heathen. It is quite possible, however, that the Christians introduced the custom of occasionally excavating enlarged places of the size of a bedroom for a chapel, and where they sometimes resorted in times of danger from enemies of any kind. The little ornaments and valuables of the deceased were often placed in the recesses with them, and an earthen lamp was sometimes placed outside the marble slab. The meetings of the Christians to celebrate the anniversary of the death of distinguished martyrs were in keeping with similar rites earlier practiced by the heathen, who have never been excelled for the respect and devotion which they extend to their dead heroes and sages. That Christians finally established the habit of meeting with more or less regularity at the resting-places of their distinguished saints and martyrs, and that enlarged excavations were made for this purpose, is not at all strange.

The decorations of the Catacombs are among the most interesting features. Christian art, in its origin, could of course be only an adoption of what they found existing at their time, and the precepts and epitaphs used on these occasions were more often borrowed from their heathen neighbors.

The paintings and sculptures of the Catacombs are therefore in no respect different in style from contemporaneous works, and with them shared in the precipitate, and almost total degradation of art after Christianity became permanently established. The best frescoes belong to the end of the first century and the beginning of the second. With the general decline of the Roman empire in the third and fourth centuries, artistic forms, like the morals of the people, became distorted and unpleasing, and in the case of the decorative works there is no difference or advantage in Christian over heathen art. Comparatively few historical paintings are met with which have no other object in view than the illustration of some simple fact from Jewish or Christian story. Occasionally a madonna and child are observed, generally with the magi or wise men from the east, and they varying in number, who present their offering. There are also a few cases of martyrdom portrayed.

The great majority of the paintings, however, represent scenes symbolical of the doctrines and hopes of Christianity. That of most frequent occurrence is the resurrection, typified in the raising of Lazarus, who appears at a door, wrapped in his grave clothes, while Christ, beardless, stands before it with a wand, in the style of the ancient magicians, and also by the fable of Jonah sitting under his gourd, as well as being swallowed by the whale, and his final escape. The Good Shepherd also frequently appears, with the sheep which he has recovered on his shoulders, sometimes surrounded by lambs. Abraham's purposed sacrifice of Isaac, Noah in his ark, and the three young men in the fiery furnace, are very favorite subjects of representation. The same may be said of Daniel in the lion's den, ceremonies of the Last Supper, and baptism. In the representations of the communion is usually a table with seven persons around it, on which beside the bread also lies a fish, which was held to be a symbol of Christ, thus making him a fishy subject.

The Catacombs extend round the city in a wide circle. Upwards of sixty different Catacombs, varying greatly in extent, and only partially accessible, have been discovered. According to Rossi's careful calculation they cover 615 acres. In order, however, to form a tolerably correct idea of their extent it must be borne in mind that the passages run one above another, as many as five different passages being thus disposed. The highest of the passages are 22 to 25 feet below the surface, while the lowest are 40 to 50 feet and sometimes deeper.

I visited the one called the Catacombs of St. Calixtus, a mile and a half south of the city limits. I met there Mr. Oscar Tobias, a banker of the city of Vienna, we having arrived there in different carriages, but for the same purpose. He can speak English some, having studied it at home, and I found this very convenient for me, as the guide in charge cannot speak a word of English, and I have not got so yet that I can speak the Italian fluently. I found Mr. Tobias a very amiable gentleman, and we remained together several days, visiting many palaces, galleries, and villas, as well as taking the trip to Tivoli and the Villa Hadrian, described in a previous letter. He speaks Italian about as well as English, and by his aid I was enabled to understand much that I would have been in doubt with reference to. We of course descended into the Catacombs in company, and with the guide, each bearing a lighted candle. We found them in accordance with the foregoing description, the passages, recesses, chapels, frescoes, etc., etc. In one large room were two sarcophaguses, with glass covers, in one of which we saw what was left of one body, which probably has lain there some fifteen hundred years, and they were the only bones to be seen, the others all having been taken away for relics with which to cure diseases, perform miracles, and drive away devils. It is extremely silent and monotonous in those underground passages, with the side excavations, five or six over each other and on both sides, where dead men and women once reposed. The passages seem to run in various directions, like the streets in these European cities, sometimes rising and sometimes descending, and I have no doubt that those we traversed were some under the others. It seemed a little like going about in the narrow streets of a city in the dark. It was well we had a guide, for when a person once is in the Catacombs there is such a simiarity in all the passages that it could be the merest chance in the world if he ever found his way out, even if his candle continued to burn. In some respects it seemed there a little like the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky, especially as to the stillness, intricacy of the passages, and the darkness; but as to the capaciousness and grandeur, the cave far excels. The Catacombs seem dry for subterranean abodes, with no appearance of water or moldiness. The air also seemed natural and pleasant.

As there are said to be five hundred and fifty miles of the Catacombs in all, it is needless to say we did not deem it necessary to traverse the entire distance. After a person has traveled five or six miles in those narrow, dark, monotonous passages, I apprehend that he is quite as well satisfied as though he felt compelled to explore the entire distance. We were not averse to ascending to the surface and sunlight.

The Jewish catacombs are separate from the Christians,' as it is supposed their heaven will also be. They are said to be more spacious than the Christians', and different in other respects. Their tombs bear Jewish symbols, such as the seven-branched candelabrum. Some two hundred Greek and Latin inscriptions and a sarcophagus or two have been found in their Catacombs. I am not aware whether their bones contain the same efficacy and would perform miracles and incurable cures as well as the bones of Christian saints or not, but probably they would answer just the same if the faith could only be established that they were Christian bones and had been treated with holy water and the essential ceremonies of the priest.

The catacombs of Mithras, not very far from those of St. Calixtus, it is stated, owe their origin to the mysteries of Mithras, an oriental worship of the sun, introduced into Rome in the century before Christ, which afterward became more prevalent, and was officially organized by Alexander Severus. Fantastic ceremonies and mysterious doctrines invested it with considerable attraction. Christians claim that the worshipers of Mithras incorporated into their system many of the symbols and rites belonging to the Christian system; but the reverse is the truth. The worship of Mithras is a thousand years older than the worship of Jesus, and its rites and ceremonies were fully established many centuries before Christ was thought of. All the stealing, borrowing, or appropriating that was done between the two systems was assuredly on the part of the Christians. And if Constantine had happened to embrace the worship of Mithras with the same zeal and bloodthirstiness that he did Christianity, it is by no means improbable that the religion of Mithras would now be the prevailing one in Europe and America; and who can say that in that case the people would not have been just as happy and virtuous, and that many millions less in number would have been put to the most cruel and agonizing deaths.

PALACES OF ROME.

What are called palazzo (palaces) in this city number about seventy. The larger share of them were doubtless built for the residences of princes, nobles, and wealthy persons, and some of them are still so occupied, while others are mainly noted as galleries for paintings and works of art. Some are occupied by their owners still, who have accumulated large numbers of paintings and statues, and allow the public to visit them on certain days of the week. These palaces are usually built around courts from one to two hundred feet square, thus giving ample light to the rooms opening on the court, and allowing, by the different rooms communicating with one another, a continuous walk from room to room around the entire square. All, however, are not so extensive as this arrangement would indicate, nor are all so arranged, though all contain many rooms, one after another, filled with the choicest works of art, in which the Italian people in the few past centuries have certainly excelled. These rooms for the exhibition of paintings are in nearly all cases fitted up in the richest style; the ceilings overhead are finely frescoed, some of them are vaulted or arched, and the floors are either of marble, with intricate blending of colors, or of fine mosaics, where, in the floor of a room twenty feet square, are probably hundreds of thousands of pieces of marble, or a composition of glass, etc., expressly for the purpose, and all fitted together with exquisite skill in figures and designs, and the whole polished to a smooth, shining surface. Where this is not the case a curious and complicated concrete is used, called, I think, Venetian concrete, in which pieces of glass and marble are intermixed with concrete, the whole being as smooth and hard as glass. Plain designs are also followed in this description of floor. I have seen but few floors of wood, and they usually very intricate and made of oak, etc., of different colors and fitted together most artistically, like a mosaic. I have also seen a few plain brick floors, or of flat tile, and of large size. The rule usually seems to be to put just as much labor as possible on the floors as well as other parts of these rich buildings. So in mentioning the different galleries, it will not be necessary to again allude to the fine floors or to the frescoes overhead. It may be understood these are always present.

In marble floors and marble staircases and steps Italy undoubtedly beats the world. Nearly all the stairs in Rome, whether in public buildings or private residences, are marble or other stone. The more usual way is for each step to be a solid block of marble, with a shelving place cut out under the top part, which projects. These steps are ten feet or more in length, though six or eight feet is the more usual width of staircases.

THE VATICAN.

I will first call your attention to this most noted palace. It stands close to St. Peter's, on the north, and among its many treasures, it is, as is well known, the Pope's residence, for here it is that he lives in royal splendor. I paid two visits to the Vatican, but did not see Leo at either visit. The entrance to the court which communicates with the Pope's palace is well guarded by Swiss soldiers, and no one is allowed to enter who cannot show the proper vouchers. Very likely if I had applied to the American minister for a note to the Pope, and had arranged myself in court dress, I might have been allowed to pass the guards, but I did not care enough to see the old man to put myself to any such trouble. I saw several carriages containing church dignitaries on a mission to the Pope, and these were readily allowed to pass by the Swiss guards in yellow-striped uniform. One I judged to be a cardinal by the amount of red about him. This carriage commanded unusual respect from the guards. They formed themselves in two straight lines, one on each side, and gave the military salute as the carriage passed them. It is about the worst fault I have to find with the Swiss—that they will hire themselves out for such purposes. Another cardinal was pointed out to me on another occasion, so I think I may be sure that I have seen two live cardinals, and they were not very remarkable looking men at that.

The immense range of somewhat illy-devised buildings composing the Vatican looks on the exterior much like a huge barracks for soldiers, but is perhaps the most extraordinary palace in the world. It was built at different periods, being first designed only as a residence for the popes, and additions were made to it from time to time to afford room for the vast collection of antiquities, statuary, and paintings which it now contains. It is held that Charlemagne resided here while in Rome, after which time the building fell somewhat into decay, and that Eugene III. erected the older part of the present palace, which was greatly enlarged under Nicholas III. It, however, did not become the regular residence of the popes until after their return from Avignon, when the Lateran was no longer used for that purpose. After the death of Gregory XI., the first conclave of cardinals to elect a new pope was held in the Vatican in 1378, and that resulted in a schism. In 1450 Nicholas V., with a view of making it the most imposing palace in the world, determined to unite in it all the government offices and the residence of the cardinals. The small portion completed by him was afterward occupied, and perhaps it will not be too much to say, most fittingly consecrated by that vile monster, his Holiness Pope Alexander VI., and his equally vile daughter, Lucretia Borgia, and his son Cæsar. They planted there in the Vatican the system of morals for which they were notorious. For this reason that portion of the Vatican was termed Tor di Borgia, and was enlarged by subsequent popes. In 1473 that portion called the Sixtine Chapel was erected by Sixtus IV. Innocent VIII. in 1490 added what is called the Belvedere, or Garden House, a portion surrounding a beautiful court cultivated as a most lovely ornamental garden. Other additions, not necessary to enumerate, were made by popes Julius II., Sixtus V., Clement VIII., Urban VIII., Pius VI., IGregory XVI., and lastly by the late Pius IX. As now existing, the palace contains twenty courts, and is said to comprise eleven thousand halls, chapels, saloons, and private apartments. By far the greater number of these halls and rooms contain the works of art alluded to, and it is with these we have most to do at present.

The galleries of the Vatican are open from 10 A.M. to 3 P.M., except on Sundays and certain holidays. Permission for entrance is obtained of the major-domo or his representative, who is reached by ascending a long staircase, at the entrance from the colonnade surrounding the piazza of St. Peter, and passing through a long arched corridor or hallway, between imposing columns, then diverging into another hallway, and ascending another long staircase and passing around—quite a journey—into the office for the purpose. The Swiss soldiers are at the entrance and direct the applicant where to go. This all seemed like an unnecessary piece of red-tapism. Admission might as well be granted by the doorkeepers; or if an office must be kept for the purpose of granting permission, let it be more convenient of access and not necessitate so much climbing of stairs. Perhaps, though, as long as a person has only to write his name in the book kept for the purpose to obtain free admission he ought not to complain. Though the admission is free, it however costs the visitor not a very small sum by the time he gets around. There are some ten persons in charge in different parts of the galleries and halls who expect a franc each from visitors.

The number of paintings in the Vatican collection is not so great as I expected to see, but they are by the first masters and are considered the very best in the world. These form what may be termed the first part of the exhibition. The entrance is by the Scala Regia, a magnificent flight of steps, covered with tunneled vaulting resting on Roman columns. This may be termed the vestibule of the Sixtine chapel, originally designed for the reception of foreign embassadors. It is a most brilliant room, 133 feet long, 45 feet wide, with six windows on each side above. Beautifully decorated marble screens inclose the place set apart for religious services. The upper part is replete with interesting frescoes by Florentine masters of the fifteenth century. They represent parallel scenes in the lives of Moses and Christ: Moses and his wife Zipporah are represented journeying to Egypt; Zipporah circumcises her son; Moses kills the Egyptian; drives the shepherds from the well; kneels before the burning bush; Pharaoh's destruction in the Red sea, with his entire army; adoration of Aaron' golden calf; destruction of Korah and his company; the same of the sons of Aaron; the death of Moses. Adjoining the latter on the entrance wall is the contest of the archangel Michael for the body of Moses! Opposite to these on the right side are, the baptism of Christ; Christ's temptation; the calling of Peter and Andrew; the Sermon on the Mount; cure of the lepers; the resurrection of Christ. On the pillars between the windows are the portraits of twenty-eight popes.

The ceiling is decorated with what is called the most magnificent example of patriarchal art, and was painted by Michael Angelo in a little less than two years. The fundamental idea is the preparation of the world for the advent of Christ. In the center are seen the creation, the fall, the deluge, with the sacrifice of Noah and the mockery of him by his sons. Around are the figures of prophets and sibyls, who are claimed to have predicted Christ; also his ancestors, or who are supposed to be such, the whole accompanied by numerous accessory figures, relief-medallions, children as bearers of entablatures, etc. These are combined by skilful architectural arrangements so as to form an exquisite whole, and worthy of minute and repeated examination. The execution of the work is more to be admired than the old fable which is so artistically and extensively portrayed. In the center, as viewed from the altar, are the following nine sections: 1. God separating light from darkness; 2. Creation of the sun and moon; 3. Separation of the land from the sea; 4. The creation of Adam; 5. The creation of Eve; 6. The eating of the apple and the banishment from Paradise; 7. The deluge; 8. Noah's thank-offering after the flood; 9. Again Noah's intoxication and the ridicule of his sons.

On the lower part of the vaulting are the prophets and sibyls in earnest contemplation, surrounded by angels and genii. To the left, 1. Jeremiah in a profound reverie; 2. A Persian sibyl reading; 3. Ezekiel with half-opened scroll; 4. Erythræan sibyl

Memorial.

On Sunday, October 31, 1880, Mr. Thomas Watson, aged seventy-one years, passed from this earthly plane of existence to try the mysteries of eternity. He was ill but a short time, for his feeble frame could not withstand the strain of sickness.

His funeral services were conducted by the Monmouth, Ill., Liberal Society, of which he was an honored member, without the aid of a minister or church cant.

William Knox's beautiful poem, "Why Should the Spirit of Mortal be Proud?" was read by Ella Birge Wilson, a funeral service from "The Truth Seeker Collection," by S. W. Smith, and a short, but elequent, address was delivered by a daughter of Mr. Watson, Mrs. Annie Wilson, which, with appropriate and beautiful music, made a very fitting ceremony for the sad occasion.

On Sunday, November 14th, a memorial meeting was held at Liberal Hall in deference to the departed, which was participated in by most of the members. No one wished to neglect an opportunity to bear testimony to the worth of one so respected. The following essay was read by the writer of this article, and, by vote of the society, was ordered to be sent for publication:

WORDS OF RESPECT.

Two weeks ago to-day was the last time the sun ever rose for the physical vision of one revered and esteemed member of our society, and to-night we meet to express our feelings of respect for the departed and sympathy for the bereaved.

We realize how futil are words to soothe or comfort in hours of such heart-breaking grief; but when calmer moments come, and the poignant agony givs place to quieter sorrow, it is a blessed privilege to review the true words of sincere sympathy uttered by fond friends.

We all know that the family of our brother do not look upon death with any of that shrinking fear that fills the hearts of many, for they realize that death is a natural and inevitable condition; and although that realization helps them to bear their loss with a philosophical demeanor, it does not take away that feeling of something gone out of their lives—of a void that only the kind, gray-haired old man could fill. We do not wish to know of a heart that does not hav enough of the love of humanity in it to mourn when parting with a fellow-mortal for the last time. "The last time!" How fraught with sad meaning are those three words! The last time we clasp the hand, warm with life, of a friend; the last time the lips are moved in articulate speech; the last time we see the form moved by the action of the will; the last time we met around the social board or in the friendly circle; the last expression of opinion on favorit subjects; the last exhibition of the peculiarities of one's individual nature, and the last fond kiss given by the lips of love, are all cherished and remembered with exact and painful distinctness and gone over in memory many, many times after a dear one has left this earthly plane of being.

It seems a sweet, yet painful privilege, to be able to retain the memory of the lives and deaths of those that are dear to us; sweet, because in dwelling on the scenes in which they played a part, they appear to our minds to be still among us; painful, because we again and again see the last great throe of agony, the closed eyes, the blanched cheeks, and rigid lips which mark the seal set by the remorseless hand of death.

But we should not look upon death as an enemy if it does bring sorrow and the pains of parting, for it is as essential in the economy of nature as life.

It is by death that the material for life is formed throughout all physical existences.

Without the death of plants, animals, and human beings our world would soon be an unfit abode for all of organized life. Then death brings that for which so many sigh—quiet, blissful, peaceful rest.

Eliza Cook expresses that thought grandly in her "Slumber of Death:"

"Peaceful and fair is the smiling repose
That the breast-cradled slumber of infancy knows.
Sound is the rest of the weary and worn.
Whose feet hav been galled with the dust and the thorn.
Sweet is the sleep on the eyelids of youth
When they dream of the world as all pleasure and truth.
Yet child, pilgrim, and youth shall awaken again
To the journeys of toil and the trials of pain.
But oh, there's a fast and a visionless sleep,
The calm and the stirless, the long and the deep.
'Tis the sleep that is soundest and sweetest of all
When our couch is the bier and our white shroud the pall.
No voice of the foe or the friend shall impart
The proud flush to the cheek or warm throb to the heart.
The lips of the dearest may seek for the breath,
But their kiss cannot rouse the cold stillness of death.
'Tis a long, 'tis a last, 'tis a beautiful rest
When all sorrow is passed from the brow and the breast.
And the lone spirit truly and wisely may crave
The sleep that is dreamless, the sleep of the grave."

Our lamented brother often craved rest, not that he did not enjoy and love life, nor that he shrank from facing the battles and responsibilities of an intelligent existence, but he had lived many years, had done his share in the struggle for the principles he indorsed, and it was time that he should rest.

His mental faculties were far more vigorous than those of most men of his age, and he has spent his whole life in advocating what he thought to be right and the truth.

We cannot tell how much we miss him in our meetings, where he was ever a valued counselor and a most worthy member.

His noble intellect and sound judgment were ones that we could ever rely upon.

He is gone from our midst, and we mourn our loss, but we know 'tis useless to try to change the inevitable; therefore we bid him adieu; but we shall keep the remembrance of our friend and brother alive and green in our hearts, and his immortality shall be in the memory of his friends, even if it should be denied him as a part of a human life.

Mr. Watson may hav had his faults (who has not?), but they were so covered up by his virtues that to a friend they were not apparent. He was a firm opponent of all that tended to enslave the human family, either mentally or physically. A believer in the principles of Liberalism, which he has defended many years, and he hoped that the distinguishing feature of Spiritualism—immortality demonstrated—was a fact. He was generous, charitable, kind, and social to all.

He leaves a loving wife far advanced in years, and she feels that it will not be long ere she shall join the mate of her youth. Also a large and intelligent family, all grown to manhood and womanhood, who mourn him as a guide and a friend as well as a father.

We would say to those, we sympathize and mourn with you in your loss, but rejoice with him in his freedom.

ELLA BIRGE WILSON.

TESTIMONIAL OF RESPECT.

At a meeting of the Monmouth Liberal League, held at Liberal Hall, Sunday evening, November 7, 1880, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, We hav been called to lay away in the silent tomb one of our noblest workers and defenders of the great and true principles that make all mankind akin; and

WHEREAS, In the death of Thomas Watson do we realize that we hav lost a friend whose life was spent in doing good; a man who lived through many long years so uprightly that in his death we need no divine mantle of charity to cover his faults. He died as he had lived, a noble type of true manhood; pure in heart, noble in deeds, and always ready to assist his fellow-beings on the road to a purer, higher, and better life; and

WHEREAS, While we recognize that his voice has been silenced by death, we feel that his memory will ever be cherished in the hearts of all who knew him; therefore,

Resolved, That we extend to the bereaved wife, sons, and daughters, who mourn the loss of a kind husband and an affectionate father, our sincere and heartfelt sympathies.

Resolved, That while the near ones shed tears of sorrow over the grave of their dear departed, we deeply feel the loss of a true and kind friend, but with the poet can truly say:

"Go, gentle spirit, to your destined rest,
While we, reserved by nature's kindlier doom,
Pour forth our tears of sorrow on your tomb."

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the bereaved family, also to the Monmouth Atlas and Review, the Boston Investigator, TRUTH SEEKER, and R-P. Journal, requesting publication.

Michigan State Meeting.

The Michigan State Association and the Van Buren Co. Society of Spiritualists and Liberalists held a union quarterly meeting at Paw Paw, Van Buren county, November 12th to 14th, inclusiv. Longwell's Opera House was engaged for the occasion, and every arrangement made for the comfort and entertainment of friends coming from abroad. L. S. Burdick, of Kalamazoo, President of the State Association, being also President of what is known as the Van Buren and Adjoining Counties Association, was present, and presided through the entire meeting. The weather had been very unpropitious for several days, but on Friday afternoon, as the first session was called to order, the mists had rolled away, and, like the sunshine of truth, which shall shine upon us in the coming days, shone the sun from a clear sky, and with true and earnest zeal seemed to inspire all present for the work before them.

The speakers present at the first session were Mr. A. B. French, Clyde, Ohio; Mrs. M. C. Gale and M. Babcock of Michigan. Short speeches from each one of the speakers occupied the afternoon, and at five o'clock the meeting adjourned until seven o'clock P. M.

The Friday evening session was opened by the reading of a poem by A. B. French, entitled, "Whistling in Heaven." Mrs. Mary A. Gale was the first speaker for the evening, taking for her subject, "The Future Life, or Life After Death." Mrs. Gale spoke for one hour, and was followed by Bro. A. B. French, on the same subject. Both were listened to with deep interest and marked attention.

Saturday morning session was opened with conference for one hour, after which M. Babcock occupied the forenoon, taking for his subject, "Superstition." Mr. Babcock has the happy faculty of amusing while he instructs his hearers, and all are well pleased to listen to him.

Saturday afternoon. Session called to order at two P. M. Exercises opened with a song by a troupe of professionals known as Donavin's Tennesseeans—"Hark! Apollo Strikes the Lyre." After an essay by Mrs. M. Babcock on Intellectual Progression, another song, "Come where the Lilies Bloom," was sung by the Tennesseeans, and A. B. French gave the afternoon address, taking for his subject the Power and Permanency of Ideas. He was listened to with the deepest interest, holding his audience from first to last with a power which few speakers possess. I would like to giv the points of his lecture, which he makes very clear, but time and space will not permit. I understand the address in full will soon appear in some one of the leading Spiritualistic papers.

The afternoon session closed with the singing of "Home, Sweet Home."

Saturday evening session was called to order at 6:30. Mrs. R. A. Shaffer, Chairman of the Finance Committee, being the only one of the Committee present, E. L. Warner and Mrs. Fisher were appointed to act in their places during this meeting. Mr. Babcock, by request, related the quail story found in the Bible. A. B. French read a poem entitled "The Stylish Church," which was well received. Mrs. E. C. Woodruff, of South Haven, gave the evening address, subject, Is there a Balm in Gilead? Her address was short, all too short, for she never fails to interest her hearers. At the close of her remarks the meeting adjourned to 9:30 Sunday morning.

The sky on Saturday evening showed indications of a storm, and on Sunday morning the snow was falling thick and fast. The attendance was not as large as on the previous day when the meeting was called to order, but the snow ceased to fall about ten o'clock, and the number increased. Mr. A. B. French gave the only address in the morning. His subject was Theism against Atheism—Spiritualism against Materialism. He gave his reasons why he inclined to Theism against Atheism, and said that the human mind has no power or capability to comprehend the Infinit Being. Man apprehends that which he has no faculty to comprehend. His discourse was replete with interest, and his hearers heeded not the lapse of one hour and a quarter which he occupied.

The afternoon was occupied by M. Babcock, of St. Johns, who spoke for one hour on the subject, "What Shall We Do to be Saved?" and was followed by E. C. Woodruff, who said she should not ask "what shall we do to be saved?" but what shall a man seek to save? Her words were deeply interesting and instructiv.

Sunday evening was occupied by fifteen minutes' speeches by each of the four speakers. Mrs. M. E. Gale was the first speaker, followed by M. Babcock. Mrs. Woodruff was the next speaker, and commenced by saying, "He who obstinately refuses to investigate any subject impoverishes himself." Mrs. Woodruff was followed by A. B. French, who gave the closing address of the meeting. He said Bro. Babcock came there to tell us what he did not believe, while he came to tell us what he did believe, and he had not yet told us half of what he believed. The evening proved a very interesting one indeed; in truth, the entire three days were made unusually interesting and enjoyable. Every one seemed determined to do his part toward making it pleasant for everyone else.

The exercises were varied. Music and singing were furnished by Miss Happin, of Paw Paw; Mr. Bigelow, of Kalamazoo; Mrs. Babcock, of St. Johns; Mrs. Spinney, of Detroit, with occasional congregational singing. The singing by the "Tennesseeans" was also a very pleasant feature and added not a little to the harmony of the occasion. Every one felt free to speak his own ideas and sentiments, and was at the same time willing to accord the same privileges to others, and the most perfect harmony prevailed throughout the entire meeting.

It was resolved that a vote of thanks be tendered to the citizens of Paw Paw and the friends who had contributed so generously to the entertainment of the friends from abroad for their kindness, sympathy, and hospitality extended to all. A feast of good things was spread out, and all were welcome. Spiritualists, Liberalists, and Materialists stood side by side on the same rostrum. All spoke their own sentiments and in their way filled their mission and did their own work without one breath of discord or inharmony, proving themselvs Liberals in sentiment as well as in name. Yours for freedom, MISS J. R. LANE,
Sec'y Mich. State Ass'n. Spiritualists and Liberalists.

A Suggestion for Temperance Reformers.

BLOOD VERSUS WINE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In this age of great innovations a new suggestion is taken in better spirit than in those days when it was dangerous to yield for fear that iconoclasts might carry everything before them. Conservatism in those times was the check to Radicalism.

It is a well known fact that a man who has a taste for alcoholic drinks, either inherited or acquired, has to break off absolutely from stimulants if he wishes to kill his habit of drinking. The slightest taste—one drop, a nip once a year, may hav the power to awaken long dormant desires and utterly rout any resolution made for the best by such a person. It will, then, be conceded by all parties that it is best to refuse absolutely any alcoholic stimulant, no matter in what shape or vessel. This cannot be done as long as the holy ordinances of the churches require members to sip wine at the sacrament. This is a solemn rite, and it would be supposed that none would dare to transgress its holiness and giv way to their desires. It has been done. Drunkards hav been recaptured from an honest, righteous life and carried back into the paths of sin by merely taking the sacrament.

To remedy this, we propose to use real blood instead of wine. In sugar refineries dried blood of all kinds of animals is mixed with the syrups to clarify them. It becomes very valuable in connection with this industry. Now why could not the blood of young calves or little lambs—the very best—be collected by butchers, dried, and canned for religious purposes? A small portion of this, mixed with water, would serve far better than the deceitful stuff now used.

Then, moreover, the transubstantialist would be the better able to argue that the fluid partaken of at the sacrament was real blood, the blood of the lamb. A little additional argument would plainly show that it differed in no wise from the life giving currents of him who was hung on a cross eighteen hundred years ago. The logic might be thus: The blood of Christ was composed of the same chemical elements as the blood of an ordinary man. But the blood of an ordinary man differs in no constituent from that of lamb; ergo, the blood of the lamb is the same as the blood of Christ; in other words, it is transubstantiated.

We shall always regret that this idea was not advanced in the thirteenth century. What wasted words—how much bloodshed and how many lives would hav been saved Nor would we read in history that two dissenting priest would meet on the Roman streets, or under the shady trees of the Bosporus, from a quarrel of words as to whether the wine was changed into the blood of Christ proceed to blows, under which one only succumbed when life had left his mortal clay. If this suggestion now offered to all sects and religionists had been adopted in the thirteenth century our holy clergy of the Catholic church would never hav labored under the imputation that they drank the sacramental wine because they liked it, and gave the communicants only the bread.

In addition to this the change would open up a new business and place a new commodity on the market. Nice canned blood would be at a premium, and connoisseurs in dried blood would make a living by sampling and grading for sale a commodity that now wets the sod upon which the poor beast is slaughtered. We hope to see the suggestion adopted. TOXOT.

Liberal League Libraries.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: I am wondering if you realize how easily Liberals can get up a library association, and the necessity that every Liberal League has of one, if it would do the greatest possible amount of work.

When I came South and found no public library, and even bookstores in all this portion of the country, I felt as if one of the vital necessities of life were missing. But I set right about trying to create a public sentiment that would demand one, and we at last made a commencement.

We formed an association agreeing to each pay three dollars annually in quarterly installments, and each member to choose books to that amount (such as he wanted) subject to the vote of the majority as to the acceptance of the choice made. A simple constitution and by-laws for the safety of the books and management of the library was formed. A beginning was made by donations of such books as the members chose to giv from their private collections, and now we hav formed in only a few years a fine library of choice literature, which is growing larger and better with each year, and is working great good in many ways, and doing much toward making Snowville the most literary place in all the country around. A ladies' reading club has also grown up out of the association, and all in a little town of 175 inhabitants, every one of whom belongs to the laboring class. Now, each Liberal League should at once begin to form some association of this sort, every member who is able contributing a certain yearly sum, and those who are too impecunious, and yet wish to read can rent the books at a small percentage of the value, depositing as security some book or other thing of equal worth, if necessary. Outsiders could also rent the books, thus helping the association, and having an opportunity to read many volumes they would never otherwise get to see.

One great value of the library association is the power of buying valuable works that single members are rarely able to purchase. Each library would soon not only own a copy of every Liberal book published, but also all valuable scientific books, works of romance, poetry, and art, and some one of the great encyclopedias. I hope each League will begin at once, and I am sure that not one out of the whole number will regret the outlay, which may be very small at first, but yet in the end do great and good work. Books reach minds that no other influence can. And only think what an encouragement this movement will be to our Liberal publishers and Liberal writers!

I hope our friend Bennett will receive so many orders that ere the year is out he will be compelled to hire additional hands in his office to fill them.

"Stern duty's voice demands your help,
Arouse ye for the strife,
Be up and doing—for the world
With mighty change is rife."

Snowville, Va. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Book Notice.

THE GODS AND RELIGIONS OF ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES. D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, N. Y.

The above-named work, which was forwarded me some time since by the author, has been perused with both profit and pleasure, and I cannot forbear offering my sincere congratulations to the writer, and at the same time my cordial indorsement of the able construction of his brave and noble undertaking. When we remember all the cicumstances connected with the writing of these 1 981 pages, a tenfold interest and value accrue to the reader thereof; and while the work fulfils admirably the intention of the author, the faithfulness with which he has grouped so much relevant matter around the great central, objectiv thought which incited the work commends the plan of construction to all who appreciate the efforts of our activ workers to Liberalize the public mind.

In all Mr. Bennett's writings one characteristic is particularly noticeable; unheeding fast the poisoned shafts of savage opposition, he unhesitatingly braves the stormy waters, and always finding antidote against the venomed arrows of the enemy, he passes in safety the "bojador" of unexplored regions, appearing to suffer no inconvenience in consequence of his hardihood.

The work in question being necessarily a "rapid transit" which brings from out the vague and shadowy past the beginnings of religious thought and practice along the highway of chance and change, continually keeps in view the one dominant and seemingly irrepressible tendency of the human mind to create and systematize a hierarchy of potent gods into whose hands all the most sacred interests of the race hav been committed at cost of fearful suffering and enormous sacrifice of human rights, human progress, and human happiness.

After having finished the perusal of this book one can but feel convinced that Mr. Bennett could not hav done the cause of Liberalism better service anywhere or in any way than he has succeeded in doing while serving out an unjust sentence in prison by giving Liberal literature this last valuable acquisition, for it is certainly a matter in every way worthy congratulatory approval that in our own country at last Liberalism is making rapid strides in the direction of a pronounced literature of its own. Broad is the field and ripe unto harvest which now awaits the action of Liberal voice and pen. Mr. Bennett is doing his share of the work, and those who enjoy and profit by such books as the one in question will seldom find opportunity to secure so considerable a library in such small compass or at such a comparativly small cost. Truly, JENNIE B. BROWN.

"Superstition in All Ages."

"Glory follows in the train of great men, and increases after their death."—Plutarch.

"The first thing which is required of genius is the love of truth."—Goethe.

This in a philosophical point of view is unquestionably one of the most stupendously profound productions that the hand of man will ever write. The sleuth-hounds of hypocrisy hav bound the martyr to the stake, "and round the limbs of liberty has climbed the bigot's flame." John Meslier was aware of all this, and much more; and though he dared not publish his thoughts while living, he bequeathed the most trenchant, stirring, and thrilling sentences that ever individualized the writings of man, for posterity to peruse when his immortal spirit should take its flight among the spheres of space, and the lump of marble clay to turn to atoms of pathetic dust, to be wafted away into the unborn worlds of time. He has condescendingly demolished every idea that can be advanced in behalf of Godism, and stripped to the last thread the Christian scheme.

I unhesitatingly affirm that this work in many respects is unimprovable and unsurpassable, and will, when translated into all the civilized tongues of earth, work a reformation in the inertia of the brain. Mr. James Parton is a competent judge of literature, and he says of this work, "It is the most curious, the most powerful, thing of the kind which the last century produced." Voltaire said, "He wrote in the hour of death, when even liars tell the truth."

Meslier knew that the people looked upon the earth as being geocentric, and man as anthropocentric. Meslier's appropriatements and appropriateness are undoubtedly unsurpassed in the annals of philosophical literature. His emolument of reason has been the cause of leaving to posterity a punctilious effect.

The universe it always was,
For it exists without a cause.

The hellhounds of the past hav drenched and the barbarians of to-day want to drench the fair fields of earth in blood and tears, and the black, cursed structure of Christianity is as ever intensely hostil to the advancement of science and the promulgation of Liberal ideas. You that fail to read this work lose a feast. It is only a commendable act of justice for all future generations to hold the name of John Meslier in the most sacred of human admiration and tranquilized honor until the stars no longer shine, and the glittering, beaming, brilliant sun goes down behind the western hills forever. ## Needy Liberals.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER FRIENDS: I wish to call your attention once more to the Freethinkers' Badge Pin, solid gold, package registered, and the postage paid, the price of which is $1.50. It is sold by Lucy L. Churchill, West Richfield, Summit Co., Ohio.

I wish to say I am wearing one of sister Lucy's pins, and am proud of the honor of being marked as a believer in universal mental liberty. Miss Churchill has been confined to her bed for eight years with spinal complaint, and has great need of the little aid she ought to receive from the sale of her pretty badges, which should ornament the person of every Freethinker who honors his colors.

I highly approve of a badge. I used to wish, years and years ago, that Liberals would wear some token by which they could recognize each other, and no prettier one could be wished for than Miss Churchill's. Good Templars and Masons are displaying their badges all around Snowville, and now it will be honored, graced, and blessed by one badge for universal mental liberty, a better, grander, and nobler motto than is displayed by any other badge on earth.

And I would also remind you of the needs of the old pioneer of Liberal Freethought, Mr. Jeremiah Hacker, of Berlin, N. J. He and his aged wife are both sick, and if some few generous ones do not help them they may actually starve before the winter is over. I hav just sent him my mite of two dollars, and now call on others who are more able and probably just as willing to do as much if they know it is needed. They forbade my making any appeal for them. They said they were not afraid to die, but could not beg. But I consider it only a just debt due the once widely-known and well-beloved editor who was in yearly receipt of three thousand letters commencing "Dearest Friend," but now he is in his old age—like a worn-out horse left to starve and die on the commons, not purposely but thoughtlessly and by many ignorantly. Yours for real Liberalism, ELMINA.

Personal.

W. F. Jamieson will hold an eight-session debate with Rev. John Hughes, in Table Grove, Ill., Dec. 7th, 8 h, 9th, and 10th. He will not visit Nebraska until the middle of January, and will answer calls to lecture in central and southern Illinois. Address Table Grove, Ill.

Notice.

Mrs. Colby and Smith closed their second engagement in Rochester, N. Y., Nov. 14th, having a crowded house; attended a three days' convention at Binghamton the 19th, 20th, and 21st; will remain there during November, and return to Rochester for the month of December, notwithstanding Mrs. Colby has given over forty lectures in that city since last April to large and appreciativ audiences.

Persons desiring the services of Mrs. Colby and Smith for week evening lectures or funerals will address them accordingly.

Please Answer at Once!

I desire each member of the Executiv Committee of the National Liberal League to write me at once as to the status of Liberalism in his state or territory. If there should be any intention on the part of any member of the Committee to cease to act in his official capacity, for any cause whatever, he should hand in his resignation, so that his place may be filled and the work pushed on. Please write me at Kansas City, Mo. O. A. PHELPS,

Either a New Creed or No Creed.

What is Congregationalism? That is likely to be the question which will provoke the most difference of opinion at the National Congregational Council now in session at St. Louis.

The theory of the denomination is that each church is independent. The complete autonomy of the local church is something which is jealously guarded. We read of Congregationalism; but of the Congregational church, meaning the whole body, we do not hear as we do of the Episcopal church. It is of the Congregational churches, the individual societies of believers, that the denominational historians speak. These churches are bound together by a common ecclesiastical polity, and clusters of them unite in voluntary associations to secure the benefits of consolidation; but the Bible furnishes the only supreme law for them.

What Congregationalism is as a polity can be easily defined, but what it is as a religious belief is a question which cannot be so readily answered. In these days, especially, it is next to impossible to say what Congregationalists believe, for they either do not know themselvs, or differ widely as to their creed. A minister who might be rejected as totally unorthodox by one church would be at once accepted as sound enough in doctrin by another.

For instance, a young man was recently pronounced unsound by a New England installation council who would find no difficulty in getting a pastorate elsewhere. He was all at sea about hell, and had not yet reached settled convictions about inspiration and revelation; but there are many Congregational churches which would not mind that sort of Infidelity, provided he was an acceptable preacher; and councils could be got together which would let him slip through without too severe an examination as to the points where his belief was shaky.

On the other hand, there are Congregational ministers who would pass the gauntlet of the bluest sort of Presbyterian council. Such men go from the one denomination to the other without difficulty, not regarding the shell of ecclesiastical polity as of any essential account. The Rev. Dr. Storrs of Brooklyn, for example, was wanted for pastor by the Brick Presbyterian church of this city, though it is stalwart in its orthodoxy.

The Rev. Dr. Dexter of Boston, who has been elected Moderator of the National Congregational Council at St. Louis, contends that Congregationalism is not only a polity, but also a creed. If it is a creed, and the orthodox creed held by Dr. Dexter and most of the older theologians, then heresy prevails in the denomination to so great an extent that separation must take place.

But who will say what the creed is? According to the Congregational system, as interpreted by a large party in the denomination, each church must settle that matter for itself; and even if the National Council agrees upon articles of faith, it can't force them on the churches. They can take them or reject them, and still call themselvs by the name of Congregationalists. The Council, however, can recommend a creed which, probably, would be very generally adopted.

In an address before the Council on the "Expediency of Formulation of a New Symbol of Faith for Congregational Churches," Prof. Mead of Oberlin College reached the conclusion that either the old standards of belief commonly accepted must be modified so as to conform to the present age, or all statements of doctrin must be abolished. That is, there must be a new creed, or there must be no creed.

The new and liberal school of theologians refuse to be hampered by a creed, and therefore they will try to defeat any effort at St. Louis to lay down standards of belief for the acceptance of the churches. The old and orthodox school, on the other hand, demand a creed expressly for the purpose of driving these skeptics out of the denomination, or at least making them show their hands unmistakably. If they succeed in their purpose they will hold the great mass of Congregational churches together as the genuine exponents of Congregationalism, and the latitudinarian theologians will be forced into forming an association by themselvs. Thus the way will be prepared for a split in the denomination, and the breach will be likely to widen as years advance.

The orthodox party hav the Moderator of the Council, but it remains to be seen whether they will accomplish their purpose as to a creed. A spirit of compromise usually prevails in such gatherings, and it is not impossible that convictions may be sacrificed to expediency.

sitting by an book; 5. Joel reading an open scroll; 6. Zacharias turning the leaves of a book; 7. Delphian sibyl, with an open scroll; 8. Isaiah, his arm resting on the book, deeply absorbed in divine inspiration; 9. A common sibyl opening a book; 10. Daniel writing after having seen one of his remarkable visions; 11. Libyan sibyl grasping an open book; 12. Jonah sitting beneath his gourd after the fish, which upon three days' trial could not digest him, had cast him up. Thus Jewish fable and pagan myth are blended together by the most artistic hands the world can boast, and in support of a religion replete with mere fancies and unrealities.

In the pointed arches and lunettes of the vaulting are what are supposed to be the ancestors of Jesus, represented as calmly looking for his coming, precisely as if they understood exactly how it was to take place and what the result of his coming would be.

In the four corner arches on the altar wall, on the right, is represented the Israelites in the wilderness with the brazen serpent. On the left is the improbable tale of King Artaxerxes, Esther who sold herself to him, and Haman, who was hanged on the gallows he erected for Mordecai. On the entrance wall is the prize-fight of David and Goliath, and the brave Judith. On the altar wall is also painted by Michael Angelo his conception of the Last Judgment. It occupies a space 64 feet in width. On the right is represented Christ as judge. Over him hover the saints, drawn back by devils, and supported by angels. On his left the wicked are vainly trying to climb up into heaven. Above are two groups of angels with the cross, the pillar against which Jesus leaned when scourged, with other implements of his torture. In the center are Jesus and his mother, surrounded by the apostles and numerous saints. Beneath the wicked wretches who are struggling to keep out of it is hell itself, according to the conception of Dante, aided by the pagan notions of the ferryman Charon and the judge Minos, thus again blending pagan and Christian fable together to terrify the easy dupes who look upon the picture. The impropriety of presenting such monstrous and diseased conceptions to the view of credulous, superstitious, and illy-informed people, must be readily seen. But it is by such frightful pictures and by more frightful word-painting that the Christian system has been built up and sustained. This is that dreadful hell, which Jesus sits complacently by, manifesting no regret that millions of immortal, sensitive, but very ignorant and fallible beings brought into existence by his father or himself, are being thrust forever and ever, while he by a single effort might prevent it all. Futile, indeed, were the cross, and crown of thorns, if countless millions which he died to save are nevertheless to spend an endless eternity in such intense suffering that a single instant of it would be sufficient to extinguish life. Oh, what a God to create beings thus to suffer! Oh, what a redeemer to give his life to save the world and still allow ninety-nine hundredths of the human race to perpetually suffer indescribable agony! Oh, what a religion that teaches and enjoins such ineffable nonsense! It is not much to be regretted that the centuries which have passed have dimmed the painting, so that it requires close study to trace its horrible outlines and conceptions. I saw a similar painting in St. Mark's cathedral in Venice, and another in a church in Florence. The torments of hell have for centuries been the favorite picture with Christian propagandists, and thousands upon thousands of times has the false and horrible imagery been held up before unreasoning audiences to frighten them in subservience to priestly demands.

I have been somewhat minute in describing the frescoes in the Sixtine chapel, because it is one of the most noted rooms in the palace of the Vatican, and because those paintings have been looked upon, admired, and approved by thousands of people from many countries. In this room most of the solemnities at which the pope officiates in person are held. I shall pass over the other rooms more hurriedly. A door leads from the Scala Regia to the Pauline Chapel in which are other frescoes by Michael Angelo, when advanced in years. The subjects are the conversion of Paul and the crucifixion of Peter, either of which possesses about the same reliability as the pictures already described. Other paintings and some statues are also in this room. This chapel is used on the first Sunday in Advent for the exposition of The Host when the faithful believe that the body of Jesus is virtually and absolutely present. On that occasion, as well as on Holy Thursday, it is brilliantly illuminated.

It is the rooms styled Raphael's "Loggie," and "Stanze," that attract the principal attention of those who admire artistic paintings. They are on the next floor above. These comprise several large vaulted rooms, lighted from the top, decorated with beautiful frescoes, moldings, and bas-reliefs, designed by Raphael and other distinguised artists of the sixteenth century. I will not stop to describe the numerous subjects of the elaborate frescoes, but will only remark that they combine pagan and Christian allegory and myths in about equal proportion. The allegories and conceptions of the Greeks seem to serve a very good purpose in the decoration of the walls of this Christian palace. These rooms are rich in artistic merit, being large and high, and covered with the rich paintings which afford many subjects for study. Besides the frescoes, etc., there are in these rooms forty-five large and magnificent paintings by the best Italian artists, and richly framed, but as they are all religious subjects, embracing largely the different representations of the Virgin and her son, with many of the numerous saints, the confession and baptism of Constantine, I will not enumerate them. These are largely copied by the painters of the day, who by special permission are allowed to do so; but the regulations are strict and imperative. Some seventy rules are printed and hung up for the guidance of painters, photographers, and sculptors who go there to make copies, and if infringed, the offending party is excluded from the rooms for two years. The paintings are regarded as of the highest order in Rome and in the world. Volumes have been written in descriptive praise of them and the several galleries in which they are contained, but I will not enlarge upon them. They are rich and artistic, but the subjects did not interest me. I have seen so many Madonnas, so many little and big Jesuses, from the stable to the cross and in the clouds that the whole has become an old and exceedingly distasteful story.

The long corridors and porches next to some of courts through which visitors are permitted to pass are extremely rich with frescoes. In two or three I lingered some time studying these in the arches between the columns. Here again I saw the same old Jewish-Chaldean fable about the creation fully represented in a series of fine paintings; first God is personified as a winged being flying over chaos, without form, and void; then he is separating light and darkness, then creating the earth, the sun, and moon, separating the water and dry land, creating vegetation, the animal kingdom, and finally Adam, afterward Eve, and her presentation to Adam. God looks like a benignant old patriarch; and when he introduces Adam to his future wife he seems to be doing a very sensible thing, and Eve is so charming in appearance that Adam cannot be blamed for being pleased with his new companion; but when it is remembered that between this unsophisticated couple a race was to be begotten and brought into existence, countless trillions of whom are to be forever wretched, the extremely great blunder of their creation is most apparent. That infernal old snake is again brought forward, but this time he has a man's head, which is a departure from the snakes usually shown as having caused all the mischief which made it necessary for a God to be put to death. The snake, as usual, has climbed a tree, and is making himself very busy at wheedling the young, inexperienced woman. His having a man's head makes it seem more possible that he might talk, but the monstrosity of a snake's body and a man's head is too great to have the semblance of possibility. Of course the expulsion from Eden follows, with all the fabled incidents in Bible story, including the procession of animals marching into the ark, the waters covering the earth, the poor human and animal wretches drowning like rats, the egress from the ark on Mt. Ararat, the rainbow, Noah's sacrifice, the Tower of Babel, Abraham's attempt to slay his son, when the angel substitutes the ram, and so on down through the careers of Moses, Joshua, Samuel, Saul, David, Solomon, Elijah, Elisha, Daniel, etc., and after these the principal events mentioned in the New Testament—the same old, old improbable story told over and over again.

In passing along these rich and expensive porches, corridors, and colonnades are frequent doors leading into magnificent rooms, and which are not opened to the public. On these, in gold letters, are the names of the numerous popes who have occupied this palace, and the abbreviation, Pont. Max., for the title of Pontifex Maximus, is always met with; thus Pont. Max. Gregory XVI., Pont. Max. Pius VII., Pont. Max. Leo XII., Pont. Max. Pius IX., etc. This is an old Roman title for the emperors, and literally means the principal bridge builder, ponte being bridge, fex to make, maximus the greatest or chief. But simple though it be, and though of pagan origin, as is nearly all that Christianity possesses, one meets this abbreviation so often in passing through the Vatican, as well as many other places in Rome, that he becomes utterly tired and disgusted with it.

Far the larger portion of the galleries and museums of the Vatican are in the northern portion of the palace, entrance to which is only obtained by passing round bulky St. Peter's and making a long journey up to the entrance at the extreme northern gate. It seems like a half mile walk to make the distance round this great church; and as I walked it six different times, I had a pretty good chance to make a correct estimate of the distance.

The collection of statuary in the Vatican is the largest in the world. I was told that it comprises twenty thousand statues of all kinds. I was disposed to doubt the statement, but after I wandered through the many halls, corridors, saloons, galleries, and chambers containing them, I was disposed to regard the statement as not much exaggerated. These statues cover a wide range, including Egyptian, Grecian, Roman, Etruscan, ancient art as well as largely of modern work, including all the distinguished pagan gods and goddesses, emperors and rulers, heroes and warriors, statesmen and orators, poets and artists.

The Jupiters, Junos, Neptunes, Minervas, Marses, Venuses, Cupids, Apollos, Cereses, Mercuries, Bacchuses, Herculeses, the other gods, goddesses, graces, muses, satyrs, etc., etc., were almost without end, and the larger portion of them are the very highest productions of art. Many are colossal in proportions and of the finest polished marble, evincing the most exquisite workmanship. What a magnificent field for the study and contemplation of what the art of man has accomplished in marble and bronze!

Here are a large number of the statues found in the ruins of ancient Rome, many of which were executed in Greece twenty-five hundred years ago, and a much larger portion produced in ancient Italy, as well as in more modern times. Lions, horses, griffins, centaurs, wolves, dogs, and many other animals are also portrayed with great skill. It is not worth while for me to attempt to give you a list of the statuary contained in the Vatican, but be assured the collection contains about all that is valuable in the line in the world.

It seemed a little singular to see so many sculptures of the gods and fictions from pagan fables in this first palace in Christendom, but it is doubtless far more pleasing to the average mind than to be always looking upon Madonnas, crucified gods and agonized saints and martyrs.

The collection of antiquities is very large and pronounced the most extensive in the world. The antiquities of Egypt are a very conspicuous portion. Here are sarcophaguses, coffins of wood and papyrus, mummies, inscriptions on stone, terra cotta, and on papyrus, statues of the gods of Egypt, etc., etc.

The collection of these antiquities was begun by Pope Julius II., Leo X., Clement VII., and Paul III., and was probably among the best acts of their lives. Here were preserved the Torso of Hercules, the Apollo Belvidere, and the Laocoon. Subsequent popes very sensibly added to the collection, until it is one of which the world may well be proud. Besides the statuaries there are an almost endless number of vases, ancient works in terra cotta by various nations, highly ornamented in many cases, earthernware of many descriptions, lamps, bronzes, glassware, inscriptions, coins, jewelry, ornaments, tapistry, and ten thousand other things I cannot recall, which I am quite sure you are glad of. Among the Egyptian antiquities were great numbers of their gods, including perhaps hundreds of figures, little and big, of Isis and Horus, the Egyptian Virgin and child from which the Christian Virgin and child were undoubtedly borrowed, so here right in this chiefest of Christian palaces are the very proofs which indelibly stamp their system a borrowed one. Its choicest dogmas and conceptions were taken from the pagans whom they affect to despise. All these curiosities are distributed and stored through many long rooms and galleries, and I will leave you to imagine the greater share of their numbers, wonders, and beauties.

I was particularly interested in the Library. Its door was opened to me upon special application, and an attendant went with me through the entire apartments, though he spoke English so indifferently that I could not understand him well. I entered into a series of continuous magnificent rooms with large openings between, I should judge a thousand feet in length. This view, bounded by frescoes, gilt, and magnificence may be more easily imagined than described. Twenty-four thousand of the books are in manuscript, the collection of many centuries, and are in closed cases on the side of this long vista of one thousand feet. On one side are windows looking out upon a most beautiful ornamental garden filled with choicest flowers and rare plants, arranged with exquisite taste. In these, as in other grounds, were to be seen beautiful palm trees, orange and lemon trees in full bearing, accacias, and many rare plants. The attendant showed me many very costly presents in the way of books, rich vases, exquisitely executed articles of furniture which had been given by the different crowned heads of Europe who wished to secure the favor of the various popes. Among them was a large copy of the Missal, or book of Latin forms and ceremonies of Catholic worship, about twenty inches in length, twelve in width, and two and a half in thickness, and bound in the most expensive style with heavy gold clasps, corner pieces, and other ornamentation. The work was executed on parchment or vellum by hand and richly ornamented in the same way in the most exquisite manner. It is indeed a a marvel of neat and perfect workmanship. The letters, words, lines, pages, and the thousands of embellishments in various colors were as neatly executed with a pen as the most artistic engraver could perform. I never saw anything in its line equal to it. The book must have cost the labor worth thousands of dollars. One of the tables shown me is composed of thousands of pieces fitted together with remarkable skill, requiring the constant work of eight years to construct it. It is a wonder in its way. But I have seen so many prodigies of artistic workmanship that I have often and again been overwhelmed with wonder and admiration.

At the extreme end of the long hall, or series of halls, was a magnificent stained window exhibiting the late Pius IX. in the most brilliant manner as large as life and twice as natural. The light is so thrown upon the outside as to giv it a splendid appearance. At the same end of the room are many cases of what are called Christian antiquities, consisting of lamps, glasses, bottles, gems, statuettes, crucifixes, ornaments, trinkets, etc., taken from the Catacombs, which were deposited there with the dead in the early centuries. In the other end of the room are a great collection of pagan antiquities. The assortment of coins and medals are a museum in themselves.

In what is called the Apartment Borgia are fifty thousand volumes of printed books. This room is magnificently decorated with frescoes and allegorical paintings. But the finest room of all, and the richest, I think, I have seen anywhere, was a large room, connected with the library, some 200 feet in length, 100 in width, and 50 in hight, arched overhead, and literally covered with lively and beautiful frescoes, gilt, and adornments of many kinds. The effect, upon being ushered into it, was almost overwhelming. Here were stored many of the rich presents made to various popes by different kings and emperors, whose names I do not retain. I can only say the whole is grandly magnificent. The library of manuscripts contain many very rare productions in numerous languages, but I will not detain you with a recitation of them.

Perhaps I ought to mention the department in the Vatican for the manufacture of mosaics. Two long rooms are devoted to this species of art, which consists of making a species of earthenware containing some glass of all conceivable colors and shades. These are made into small pieces, and in making up a portrait the proper colors are selected and the pieces fitted together with neatness and skill, and set in a kind of cement. It is a slow process, but the effect when once produced is permanent and does not fade like a painting. The 234 portraits in St. Paul's church were executed in the Vatican. But I will leave it without further attempt to give you a description of it.

The palace of the Lateran will next claim a brief notice. The most that I saw of this edifice is the part which contains the museum—the lower front portion. It contains many ancient statues and bas-reliefs, antique marbles, and a pretty full collection of Egyptian and other antiquities, among which are over fifty sarcophaguses of various sizes and styles. The Grecian and Roman statuary are a feature in the museum.

This was once the residence of the popes, before their removal to Avignon, and several church councils were held there, but it is now comparatively unoccupied. It is far less extensive than the Vatican. I think I said something of it in a former letter.

THE QUIRINAL.

I will have more to say of the palace of the Quirinal, situated on the largest of the hills of Rome in the southeastern portion of the city. It was built for a summer residence of the popes from the healthiness of the location. It was begun in 1574 by Gregory XIII. The principal court is over six hundred feet long and surrounded by a portico on three of its sides. It contains choice paintings by the best artists, as well as frescoes, bas-reliefs, etc. The large garden in the rear was added by Urban VIII., and contains a kind of musical fountain made of jets of water. The name is derived from the Quirinus, or temple of Romulus, which once stood on the same grounds. Here the cardinals met in conclave on the death of a pope, or rather here they were locked up and kept so locked until they could come to an agreement as to which of them should be the next incumbent of the pontifical chair. The sacred college when full consists of six cardinal bishops, fifty cardinal priests, and fourteen cardinal deacons. The pope must be an Italian, which gives the impression that God must have a strong partiality for that race of men, even as he is said to have had for the Jews three thousand years ago. The candidate for pope must not be less than fifty-five years of age. It requires the votes of two-thirds of the cardinals to elect. France, Austria, and Spain, are entitled to one vote each, which, however, does not do them much good; the Italians have it all their own way.

When Gregory XVI. was elected, the cardinals had been sitting for fifty days without coming into the open air. This election was made known by a voice from one of the windows, by shouting the result in Latin. When this is done the new pope appears with the golden cross borne before him, and he blesses the people for the first time. On the next day a state service is held over the new pope in St. Peter's. He is borne on his papal throne, preceded by peacock's feathers, and he intones, Tu es sacerdos magnus, at the high altar. The cardinals kiss his feet and hands, and he embraces them with the osculum pacis, or kiss of peace. After this he is consecrated as bishop of Rome. Pius VII. expired in this palace.

On September 20, 1870, the palace was taken possession of by the united Italian government as a residence for the king and the crown prince; so the large series of sumptuous rooms are now occupied, except during the summer, by the dissipated Humbert and his charming wife. They being still at their summer residence not far from Milan, their palace is thrown open to the public. I will have to admit that they are the richest rooms I have yet seen. They are very large, and vaulted, and the most beautiful frescoes adorn the ceilings and magnificent paintings the walls. I was in what is called the throne room, and saw the throne on which Humbert sat when inaugurated king, and which he occupies on extra state occasions. It is most magnificent. A great amount of gilt is seen on the moldings, the trimmings, and ornamentation, etc. The chairs are also covered with gold, and upholstered in the richest style. The queen's reception room is equally rich, and many others fall but little short. When I realized that this extravagant palace was erected and fitted up as a residence for popes I mentally exclaimed: "How different this kind of accommodations from that which their accepted God had to put up with when he 'had not where to lay his head.' Verily the servants and followers fare a thousandfold better than the master who experienced the lowest form of poverty." The query inevitably arose in my mind, "If God was pleased that his dearly beloved son was compelled to endure the stinging wants of poverty, how can he who never changes at all so evolute as to delight in his Italian servants living in more grandeur and magnificence than half the kings and emperors of the earth?"

OTHER PALACES.

The Palazzo Borghese is one of the celebrated picture galleries of the city, and contains a large number of beautiful paintings and statuary. With the connoisseurs of art it makes a great difference who the artist was who painted a picture. With such the works of Raphael or Angelo, or some other distinguished artist, are about all they care to look at, and they will pass by unnoticed scores of paintings by ordinary artists. They will nearly go into raptures over the work of Raphael, and perceive in the touches of his brush what they cannot see in the efforts of others. It is not so with me. I think I know when a painting pleases me. I can tell whether its figures are in proportion, whether they occupy a natural position, and whether the lights and shadows are sufficiently marked; I think I can tell whether the painting is a work of ability or a "mere daub;" but it makes very little difference to me whether it is executed by Angelo, Raphael, Giotto, Gaetano, Rubens, Bobacti, Van Dyke, John Smith, Tom Jones, or any other man. I have noticed the productions of many male and female artists who had copied and were copying in the various galleries. I have visited the masterpieces of great artists, and I have generally thought the copy looked as well as the original, and many times far better, because fresher. I look far more to the pictures for my pleasure than to the artist who executed them.

Borghese is the family name of Pope Paul V., by whom this palace was erected. Its arcaded court is surrounded by ninety-six coupled granite columns. The stairs are wide and splendid. The galleries comprise twelve rooms, well-filled with the choicest paintings, many of them hy Raphael, Savonarola, Lippi, and others.

The Palazzo of Colonna is a Doric colonnade, and has an allusion to one of the ancient distinguished Roman families. It was built by Martin V. Here are five splendid rooms containing distinguished pictures by Muziano, Titian, Giorgione, and others. It is a very pleasant place to pass an hour or two.

The Palazzo Corsini is another rather grand edifice erected by one of the old aristocratic families around a court of good size. Here are ten rooms of very fine pictures by distinguished Italian artists, whose names I do not believe you care a straw to hear. It is a fine retreat for a lover of fine art.

The Capitol Museum I think I slightly mentioned in a former letter. It is on the Capitoline Hill, and contains a very interesting collection of Roman sculptures and antiquities, which date on an average from the beginning of the Christian era. It was planned and partly carved by M. Angelo, who took a most lively interest in statuary and paintings, and probably executed more first-class productions than any man who ever lived. Here are colossal statues of great size, and many artistic representations in marble of the old Grecian and Roman gods, with a large collection of the antiquities found in the ruins of that ancient city.

The Conservatory on the opposite side of the piazza contains a similar collection, with many paintings, statuary, tapestry, etc. But when one has seen so much of these things he almost ceases to be able to duly appreciate them.

The Palazzo Albani is a most beautiful place, on which a large amount of money has been lavished, and I must not fail to say something of it. It is situated northeast of the city and without its limits, but it is a very charming place, and perhaps it ought to be, for two millions of dollars are said to have been expended upon it. It was once the property of Cardinal Albani, and afterward of the queen of Spain. The grounds cover fifteen or twenty acres, laid out with great taste and skill. The carriage roads and main walks are bordered by large box trees, six feet high. The beds in the beautiful garden in front of the palace are laid out in all conceivable attractive forms; these are for small flowers, and are bordered by the dwarf box, both kinds being trimmed with the utmost neatness. I have hardly seen any grounds more exquisitely laid out and decorated.

The palace is fronted with long porticoes, all filled with beautiful statuary. In the continuation of the buildings are also more of the statuary and other rich works of art, largely modern, with considerable also of the ancient Roman production. Opposite the palace, and beyond the beautiful grounds mentioned, is another building, in which also are many statues. In the upper rooms of the palace are still other very beautiful statues and many fine paintings. But why weary you longer with a description of these fine things? Just imagine that everything is extremely rich, extremely artistic, and beautiful, and I will pass on. The palace is on high ground, and from the upper rooms splendid views are obtained of the surrounding country. I left the premises fully impressed that I had looked upon very beautiful works of art, equally in sculpture, painting, and landscape gardening.

It would not do for me to omit to mention my visit to the lovely place called the Villa Doria Pamfili. To reach it a carriage is taken, and we gradually arise in a circular roadway to Montorio, west of the city. On both sides the roadway is bordered with fine specimens of the aloe, or century plant, many of which blossomed this year. Some of them are ten or twelve inches through the crown. A monastery and church are on the top of Montorio, and the piazza in front commands one of the most beautiful prospects in Rome. The whole city is spread out below you like a panorama, and the entire surrounding country for nearly twenty miles in every direction is also equally well displayed. Here is what is called the Tempicotto, a small circular building with sixteen Doric columns, and it is claimed that it stands on the very spot where St. Peter was crucified, which probably is just about as true as many others of the false claims which the church sets up.

After feasting our eyes on the beauties spread out before us, ten or fifteen minutes' drive brought us to the entrance into the grounds of Villa Doria Pamfili. I will not say that these grounds are prettier than our Central Park in New York, for that would be saying a great deal; but they are indeed very beautiful, and the part laid out as a garden has had far more labor bestowed upon it than the same amount in any portion of Central Park. But the bulk of the three or four hundred acres is more of a natural park, and has less of art about it than our Central Park.

On entering and following the carriage road which passes under a triumphal arch, it leads in a few minutes to the entrance of the Casino. On the right is a terrace affording a beautiful view of the Campagna, and the mountains, north, east, and south. The sea can also be seen in the west. The Casino is a building in which are several fine female statues, and a billiard room on the ground floor, and some beautiful paintings and frescoes in the rooms above. A most beautiful flower garden is immediately south of the Casino. We next come to the Columbaria, among the trees to the right, discovered in 1838, and situated on the ancient Via Aurelia. One of them is well preserved, and contains some interesting paintings, such as Prometheus delivered by Hercules, Death of the children of Niobe, etc. The road by which the Casino is reached turns to the left, skirting a meadow richly carpeted with anemones. In the center is an area with representations of the gods, and Antonius and Pius sacrificing to the penates. In a few minutes more the road turns to the right, and a beautiful view is obtained of the Alban mountains and the Campagna. It then proceeds in numerous windings, at first skirting a very fine growth of pines, to a pond or little lake, with swans, geese, and ducks of several varieties. We pass along its banks to the fountain which supplies it with water. On the roadside as it returns toward the entrance is a fine marble monument erected by Prince Doria in 1851 to the memory of the French who fell and were interred there. The roadway is bordered by fine olive and other trees, and their branches meet over the roadway, forming beautiful bowers and groves. I think in these grounds by the side of the roadways and walks are fully one thousand century plants. They require little or no attention and grow as easily as burdocks do with us. They make a fine border for roads, and when they blossom, as several do every year, the odor is lovely and the appearance beautiful. Scores of carriages visit these grounds every pleasant day, and a pleasanter drive can hardly be found anywhere.

Among the interesting places visited is the little old monastery, cloister, and chapel where the poet Tasso spent his last days. I visited the library where he read, the room he occupied, saw the chairs he used, where he died, and the casket wherein he was deposited. The poor fellow, though possessed of one of the most brilliant minds, died insane, and I apprehend that religion was somewhat the cause of it.

A very life-like painting of the poet is on the wall of his private room. Some three busts of him are there also. His remains are deposited in the chapel, and a slab in the wall bears an inscription of his death and great qualities. I do not know much of Tasso's poetry, but my impression is that he was a genial, lovely man, and that he wrote poetry almost divine.

Many distinguished men have lived in Rome, but none more justly distinguished than Goethe, who resided here for some time. The house he occupied is pointed out.

I presume I have written you quite enough about the Eternal City, though I have not told you of every place I visited, nor did I tell you of all the places and palaces containing curiosities and objects worthy of attention; but I have seen enough, and I have wearied you enough. It has now got to be the eighth of the month. I have been here two weeks, and it is time for me to be off to Naples. Good-bye. D. M. B.

What is Thought?

This is a question which from time to time has not only been discussed in these columns, but has engaged the attention of great numbers of people. Our friend E. A. Chapman undertakes on another page of this issue to describe what thought is, in contradistinction to the views of others who hav written for these columns. The subject is a very thoughtful one, and with all the thought that has been given it, it seems difficult for all to arrive at the same conclusion. We agree with Mr. Chapman in many of the views he has advanced, but differ with him somewhat as to the nature of thought. Possibly it may not be amiss for us to ventilate our thoughts upon thought in the same issue with him.

We agree with him that thought is not substance, any further than a motion of the hand is substance. A certain amount of substance or matter is used or utilized in the production of thought, the same as with the motion of a muscle, but it is incorrect to say either is substance. It takes substance to produce them, still they are not substance. Mr. Chapman says thought is a condition or a manifestation of a condition. Function is a better term. Thought is the function of the brain just the same as seeing is the function of the eye. Some eyes see better than others, some brains think better than others; all is owing to the organization for the function, some being more perfect than others.

Mr. Chapman says the universe is divided into two great classes, the ponderable and imponderable, or "mind and matter," and from the tenor of his remarks it appears that he holds mind to be an original element in the universe, comprising, as it would seem, a domain distinct from that of matter. We conceive mind or thought to be a product, not a simple, original existence. There is no proof that any mind or thought exists save that which is produced by the intricate organizations adapted to its production. In inorganic matter there is no organic life, no sensation, no intellect. As we advance from the condition of "crude matter," from non-crystallization to crystallization, and then on to organization in the vegetable world and then the animal world, from the simplest monad to the most fully developed mammal, from the jelly-fish up to man, we find the capabilities—sensation, moving, feeling, tasting, seeing, hearing, thinking—increasing precisely with the organizations producing them. All animals hav sensation, but in keeping with their organizations; all hav thoughts, imperfect or perrect in proportion to the perfections of their organizations or apparatus for producing thought. The assertion may be repeated that there is not the slightest proof of the existence of thought save that which is produced by thought-engendering organs. As hearing can only be performed by the ear, seeing by the eye, so thinking can only be performed by the brain and nerve appendages. There is a grand original fountain of hearing, a vast reservoir of eyesight, just as much as there is of thought or mind. These are all produced by organizations, and hav no other existence. When the organizations cease to act, when life departs from them, these results are no longer produced, Friend Chapman again says, "No property of matter has ever been found to control matter itself." To us this seems an incorrect proposition. Force is a property of matter, and force is the only power or element in existence that can control matter. In other words, it may be said matter controls matter. for all the force that any one knows of is a concomitant or inherent property of matter. There is no force without matter, and no matter without force. They do not exist independently, and are not found widely separated. Matter is never dead, inert, or lifeless, but only relativly so. It always has within it latent and inherent force and life. When brought to the proper degree of organization, thought or mind is produced, and not before.

The statement that "the element controling must be superior to the element controled" is of a doubtful correctness. A train of cars may contain articles of intricate marufacture as well as hundreds of human beings. The fuel and water are the elements which control or impel that train, but is it true that they are superior to the freight with which the cars are loaded? Is it any more true that "the I within these bodies which reasons and thinks is the real organized and only individualized entity?" Is it not the body, including the brain and nerve system, sustained by the digestiv and circulatory system, that reasons and thinks? There is no "individualized entity" aside from the organization, or at least we hav no proof of any. The individuality depends wholly upon the organization, and always conforms to or keeps pace with the organization. There is no fact better proved than this. Individuals differ just as organizations differ, and no farther. It takes an organization to constitute an individual.

The assumption that the mind is the spirit is quite untenable. Mind proves not the existence of spirit. Mind is the result of the body or physical organization and nothing more. Every animal has some mind—some far more than others—but always in keeping with the physical organization. We may hav a dual existence. This may be our rudimental or primary state, after which the ultimate; but so long as we see, we must hav an apparatus to see with; so long as we think, we must hav an apparatus to think with. If we maintain our individuality after this crude body is lifeless and decomposed we must hav another organization, which among the organs for other purposes must hav a brain to do the thinking. Without it we cannot think nor maintain a conscious individuality. If spirits exist they hav real bodies, eyes, and brains, even as we hav here—inconceivably more subtil, perhaps, but still real, physical organizations. These finer organizations may be developed during our cruder life, and be ready to set up an independent individuality when the cruder becomes dead and worthless. If, however, this is so, it would be well had we more positiv proof of it. At all events this position may be stoutly maintained, that so long as we think, we will require an apparatus to think with.

As water, by the combustion of fuel, is correlated into a force to drive the engine, to turn heavy machinery, and haul heavy trains of cars, so the meat and bread taken into the stomach are by the digestiv and assimilativ organs, through the offices of the brain and nerve-system, made to produce thoughts; as steam cannot be generated without the combustion of fuel, so muscular action and brain action or thought cannot be generated without a due consumption of food. Something cannot come from nothing, and neither can motion or thought.

Our friend's theories and assumptions about "thought-waves," the electric batteries of the brain, talking without organs, etc., may be very correct, but unfortunately they are not sufficiently demonstrated to be universally accepted. There is, it is true, much in the universe that is subtil, ethereal, impalpable, and universal, but that does not prove all questionable theories to be realities. We can do no better than be willing to accept the facts as fast as they are proven, and to not allow old-standing prejudices to prevent the influx of demonstrated truth.

The Passion Play.

Mr. Henry Abbey, manager of two theaters in this city, had determined to place this drama upon the stage of Booth's theater. At the announcement of this determination, the clergy and adherents of the churches became greatly aroused, and strongly opposed the movement. As an indication of their remaining strength it is to be confessed that Mr. Abbey has yielded to their prejudices and decided to not place it upon the stage. For this he is denounced as lacking in courage and independence, and succumbing to ecclesiastical powers. After the play has for centuries been enacted in thousands of pulpits, and even torn in shreds and tatters, it would seem that an improved version might be allowed to be placed upon the stage, though like most other plays it is founded on an imaginary basis. The author, Mr. Morse, announces that he will giv a public reading of it and leave his audiences to judge of its merits and propriety. The opposition it has met with will probably increase its popularity.

Three Earnest Workers Passed Away.

Absence from home must be the excuse for timely mention not being made in these columns of the recent death of three distinguished and long-lived laborers in the cause of religious truth and human welfare, to wit., Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, Mrs Lucretia Mott, and Carl Heinzen, all of whom went to their rest within the past few weeks.

Few women of any age hav done more valuable service in the cause of truth and real progress than did Mrs. Child. None hav more effectually protrayed the errors and superstitions of past ages; none hav given a more truthful record of the struggles and advances of the human mind in its search after religious truth. Her "Progress of Religious Ideas" will stand as a lasting monument of her research and eminent ability. Her several other works also rank high in literary merit. She was born Feb. 11, 1802, and was consequently seventy-eight on her last birthday.

Mrs. Lucretia Mott, though not an authoress, was a woman of excellent mind, strong common sense, and great kindness of heart. Her long life was devoted to the work of improving the condition of her fellow-beings, and assisting the oppressed and down-trodden. She was a member of the Radical wing of the Friends, and had little or no belief in theological dogmas. She was for nearly half a century a preacher in her society, and her voice was again and again heard in defense of the enslaved of her race. She was unfaltering in her devotion to freedom, and spent more years in philanthropic work than one in many millions is able to perform. In qualities of both head and heart she was an honor to her sex and to her race. She reached the advanced age of nearly ninety years.

Karl Heinzen was an able German Freethinker, and for many years editor of the Pioneer in Boston. He labored faithfully to free his fellow-beings from the fetters of error and superstition, and maintained a persistent warfare against the fallacious dogmas of theology. He was a foe to conservatism and hypocrisy, and wished above all things, to see truth reign on the earth. He reached the age of seventy-one years, thirty of which were passed in the United States.

In The Truth Seeker of Nov. 20th appeared a short article of twenty-five lines, entitled, "Agnostic," written by Wm. H. Spencer, and which originally appeared in the Free Religious Index. We were not aware of this latter fact when we published it. It was sent in by a friend with other short selections, and it found place in our columns without our knowing it had graced a Boston contemporary. We do not mean to purposely use anything that has appeared in those columns without giving due credit.

Acknowledgments.

Many thanks to the kind friends who hav so promptly responded to our call for material aid. They hav thereby rendered us essential service and endeared themselvs in our esteem. Long may we jog along together in the pathway of truth and fraternal regard in which we all delight to walk. We hope other friends will also remember us and that urgent needs attend us. We hope those who are now readers of The Truth Seeker will continue to be so, and that each one will willingly and promptly pay up for the time it has been sent to him. Every number issued and sent out costs money, and it is only reasonable and honorable that each recipient should be willing to help to pay the bills. Let it be remembered there is no better way to disseminate the truths of Liberalism than by the wide circulation of Liberal papers, and every lover of the truths that Liberalism teaches should be willing to help support and extend the good work. Apathy and indifference to the growth of truth are mischievous elements which Liberals ought to shun. Millions of dollars hav been expended by our oppcnents in planting the seeds of superstition and error, and we must not expect them to be uprooted without its costing a little. As friends of truth and reason, we ought all be willing to make some sacrifices, some contributions, to that cause which we know will benefit the human race,

Another word relativ to obtaining new subscribers. This is the time of year for effecting this good work. If the friends of The Truth Seeker will act in unison in this effort great good will be accomplished. There is scarcely a reader of The Truth Seeker but what can obtain a new subscriber if he will only set himself about it. Some can obtain three, some five, and some ten. Will not every friend make the effort? The offers made in our last are sufficient to induce every earnest Liberal to make some exertion in that direction. Let those who hav been borrowing the paper and reading it without paying, resolve that for 1881 they will pay what it is worth and not "sponge" any longer; and let every reader resolve that he will send in the name of a new subscriber. If every Liberal would do his duty toward the dissemination of Radical publications, all the Liberal journals of the country would flourish, and the eyes of additional thousands might be opened. Remember that to every new subscriber for Vol. VIII. for 1881, six numbers of the present year will also be sent. We wish to do our part in spreading truth broadcast over the land if the lovers of truth will only aid us. Will you do it?

Liberal Libraries.

We trust every reader will notice sister Elmina's remarks upon this subject. It is of the first importance, and should not escape the attention of any one. We hav had the subject in mind with a view of placing it before the readers of The Truth Seeker for their consideration. The season of the year for long evenings has come again, and it is a good time to take the subject of libraries into consideration and to act with promptness.

Every town and village should hav a library; yes, a Liberal library. The great peculiarity that makes the Anglo-Saxon race superior to many others is its fondness for reading. Reading increases knowledge and the power of thinking correctly. A family or a community that spends its time in reading useful books will inevitably grow wiser and better. It will be far less liable to run into habits of idle gossip and scandal than those who read but little. The cultivation of a taste for reading greatly increases the enjoyments of life, and makes us better and more useful and happier men and women.

In every community where there are half a dozen or more Liberals, whether Materialists or Spiritualists, a Liberal library should be started this very winter. If not more than twenty dollars' worth of books are purchased the first year, let the beginning be made. They will serve as a nucleus around which more may gather from year to year; and the same will serve as a bond of union to unite kindred spirits together. Even where there are no Liberal Leagues there may be a Liberal library, and where there is a Liberal League there should assuredly be one. A small contribution from several persons will afford a fund sufficient to begin with, and which can be increased from time to time, just as Elmina says they did in Snowville. Her remarks are eminently practical, and there is hardly a little village in the country but what could do as well as Snowville has done if the same earnestness and good sense are exercised. All that is necessary is to make a good beginning and pursue the matter consistently.

Of course every library should contain Liberal books, but not exclusivly so. Scientific, philosophical, historical, and poetical works, with a good selection of works of romance, should be secured so far as funds will permit. "The Truth Seeker Library," and other TRUTH SEEKER publications, should not be omitted, and by having miscellaneous books miscellaneous readers may be secured, until ultimately a Liberal Library Association will be established.

In this connection it may be stated that we are prepared to furnish books of all kinds published in this country or in Europe at quite as reasonable prices as any house in the country. When in London we made arrangements with Trubner & Co., the Freethought Publishing Company, Watts & Co., and Edward Truelove to sell their works, and as we keep in stock J. P. Mendum's and Colby & Rich's publications, we can supply all the works libraries may want, and when bought in reasonable quantities for libraries we will sell at wholesale prices. We will at all times cheerfully correspond with those wishing to start libraries, and will giv the best possible prices. We will be glad at the end of the next three months to be able to report one hundred new Liberal libraries in existence. Shall we hav that pleasure?

Our Liberal Exchanges.

We notice that the Mirror of Progress, of Kansas City, has dropped the Mirror and become simply Progress. We perceive also that Dr. A J. Clark, of Indianapolis, an earnest worker, has become connected with Col. E. P. West in the conduct of it, and it would seem it really ought to progress.

Mr. A. J. McClure withdraws from the Infidel, published at Allegany in the western part of this state, and it is intimated that some change will be made in its name, etc.

The last named makes the announcement that the Liberal, of Lamar, Mo., has discontinued. We are sorry if this is so, as it is an indication that the support of the new Liberal candidates is not commensurate with the expense of issuing them. Though it costs far more to run a Liberal paper than many apprehend, it is desirable to see them successful where they hav the enterprise and energy to make the struggle against the forces of supernaturalism and falsehood. May the time never come when the Liberals of America will be indifferent to the success of their organs, and may the publishers of works exhibiting popular fallacies never be left to feel that the cold shoulder of the lovers of mental freedom is turned toward them. Let us all stand shoulder to shoulder, and valorously keep up the contest with the minions of darkness so long as life continues.

An English Jesuit in the Seat of Truth.

When the son of Napoleon the Lesser died, funeral sermons were preached in England in the churches of almost all existing religious denominations. Several of these were afterward printed, and among them the "Funeral Words Spoken in the Church of the Immaculate Conception, Farm Street, by Father Gallwey, S. J.," and dedicated "To the memory of H. I. H. Prince Louis Napoleon." I purpose to criticise these funeral words, not so much for their integral worth, which is small indeed, as for the fact that they show, first, to what length the ministers of a so-called prince of peace carry in our enlightened century the banner of unrighteous war on high; secondly, that theirs (the priests') is slavish flattery; and, thirdly, that to serve their purpose they belie their own accepted tenets.

To those who hav read the "Provinciales" of Pascal, and similar works; to those who hav followed the discussion raised lately in the French Chamber of Deputies; and even more so to those who hav received their primary and intermediary education in a college of Jesuits, my work may seem useless; for, in the eyes of the congregation to which our orator belongs, does not the end justify the means? And is this not a ready reply to all unanswerable or adverse comment? But we may dismiss the person of Father Gallwey from our mind in regard to the peculiar teachings of his society, and consider only the printed funeral words as once delivered by a Catholic, Apostolic, Roman priest.

The exposition is composed of the scriptural relation of the Nain resurrection (St. Luke vii, 12–15). Then comes a rhapsodical outpouring of the ordinary pulpit vagueness, where, among other things, it is asserted that God "had the marsh-field of Africa and the mourning chamber in Kent as much before his all-seing eye as the gates of that town in Galilee. And for the wounded body of the young prince, and the crushed spirit of his bereaved and august mother, the divine heart was planning as much as for the dead who lay upon the bier and the widowed mourner who followed it." From an ethical point of view, how beautiful is the conception of that God who, with his "all-seeing eye," beholds all the miseries to which the human race will be subjected; who is omnipotent; who can prevent these things from happening, and yet, although condescending sometimes (as in the case of Nain) to work a miracle for the mere sake of displaying his power, does not raise himself to the level of poor human kindness, which would prevent all evil if it had the power, but allows, and in allowing of course condemns, his creatures to suffer unutterable sufferings! How beautiful! if not, how horrid! Is it necessary for me to point out the scientific absurdity of the "divine heart planning?"

As a matter of fact, I am rather skeptical about quotations, and invariably verify them at their very source (in the present instance the Douay translation of the Vulgate for the Old Testament, and that of Rheims for the New Testament). In this process of verification we meet with the words, "bitter death," and are referred to 1 Kings xv, 32 (1 Samuel), where we read: "And Samuel said [to Saul], Bring hither to me Agag, the king of Amalec. And Agag was presented to him very fat, and trembling. And Agag said, Do the bitter death separate in this manner?" Read in juxtaposition the sentence where the two words appear in the print: "He, the innocent Son of God, in whom sin and death had no part, drank to the very dregs all the bitterness of bitter death." What terrible degradation for the Lord that his by anticipation spokesman should hav to be a moral wretch, fearing death—and fat! But lo! did not Father Gallwey know of the existence of the following verse of the 1 Kings xv? Can it by any possibility hav escaped his eyes? And if not, how has he dared to write one word more in praise of the prince and his august mother? Father Gallwey must hav known of the existence of these words (1 Kings xv, 33): "And Samuel said, As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women. And Samuel hewed him in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal." Did not Prince Napoleon go to Zululand in order to kill—to make women childless? Was his mother not the wife of his father, and was it not due to her influence that the Franco-German war—her war (ma guerre)—was so rashly provoked and undertaken? Finally, did that cruel bloodshed not also make numberless women childless?

Further on, speaking of "Prince Louis," Father Gallwey says: "But of him the holy spirit of God prononnces: 'They are at peace.' 'To the unwise they seem to die; but they are at peace. And though in the sight of men they suffered torments, their hope is full of immortality. Afflicted in few things, in many they shall be well rewarded, because God hath tried and found them worthy of himself. As gold in the furnace he hath proved them, and as a victim of a holocaust he hath received them' (Wisdom iii, 2–6)." And himself, astonished at and perhaps ashamed of the enormity of this unbidden prophecy, exclaims, "My brethren, perchance some one will chide my words as rash and presumptuous, and say I am forgetting the discretion and sincerity of a minister of Christ to speak the flattering phrases of a courtier." Yes, somebody does chide him now, and probably something did chide him then, for not unlikely he had just read the end of that very third chapter of the Book of Wisdom of which he had so rashly applied the beginning to the son of Napoleon the Little. This is what we read in Wisdom iii, 17–19: "And if they [the wicked] liv long, they shall be nothing regarded, and their last old age shall be without honor. And if they die quickly, they shall hav no hope nor speech of comfort in the day of trial. For dreadful are the ends of a wicked race."

In Mat. xxvi, 52, we read, "All that take the sword shall perish with the sword." The knowledge of this passage was most likely that which induced the prince to make his testament in such a "far-seeing way of coming evil." But this plain explanation does not suit father Gallwey. No, to him an angel has been sent, warning him that "he would be steward no longer" (St. Luke xvi, 2). And in his eagerness to sanctify the object of his laudation he unwittingly subjects the prince to the most bitter satire; for here are the two verses of Luke to which Father Gallwey refers—"And he said also unto his disciples, There was a certain rich man, which had a steward; and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods. And he called him, and said unto him, How is it that I hear this of thee? Giv an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward." I can scarcely believe that these words were in reality intended by the preacher to hav the meaning which their reference to the Bible undoubtedly givs them.

More astonishing still are the constructions put on the prayer discovered penned by his own hand, carefully studied, and apparently much used, which prayer is said to be edifying and beautiful, and to contain this sentence, "My God, teach me ever to understand which way my duties lie, and help me to fulfil them." According to our orator, God heard this prayer and granted the request. So the same God who through the mouth of Christ had said, "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you," taught the prince as a matter of duty to slaughter his less favored brethren of South Africa. Happily for his reputation, God seems to hav repented of his inconsequence, and did not help Prince Louis to fulfil his bloody "duty."

Pressed for space, I am compelled to restrict my concluding remarks. Yet one more brief quotation must be made. In the aforesaid prayer the young Louis Napoleon expresses a hope that he would not forget those who were gone by, because, he adds, "What a bitter thought it were to harbor that time had a right to wipe out the memory of those that were!" Read this in connection with the recent disclosures made by Granier de Cassagnac, and see what profound hypocrisy the priest who lauds him for thus writing must make use of. Why, it was the idea that all the crimes he was going to commit, for the sake of fame, might yet leave his name obscure that made him thus cry out in selfish (not generous, Father Gallwey) anguish. When his mother endeavored to dissuade him from going to the nefarious Zululand, the prince overruled her objections by saying that he was tired of worldly idleness, and craved "to be useful." So, when all the roads of knowledge and science offered him a noble field of usefulness, he chose human destruction as his work; and this was the hight of his conception—as much of usefulness as of duty—as I hav already shown.

I contend that my first two proposition hav been proved. As to the third one—i. e., that to serve their ends the priests belie their own accepted tenets—I hope that the biblical texts I hav, in the earlier part of this paper, placed in juxtaposition will convince every intelligent reader of the truth of my statement.

If Father Gallwey should think any portion of his sermon misinterpreted, I shall be glad to consider any correction or defense he may desire to make. ROGER DE GORY.

I AM heartily pleased with "John's Way."
T. L. THOMAS.

Final Reply to G. W. Chapman, M.D.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Under date of October 6th, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 6th, addressed to me, this writer continues what he seems to think a wonderful question, viz, "Can there be a first without a second, and can there be a second cause for the same thing?"

This mere quibbler, not being satisfied with my detailed explanation of a first cause, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 4th, perhaps will better understand this short reply:

That there must be, by necessity—as an axiom—a first, or starting, cause for everything, whether as a primal act of mental or physical force, as the excitation, to effect a result from the primal, inducing first cause. To such force succeeds, also, by necessity, any number of secondary causes, which are directly engaged in and make up the number and proportion of materials necessary for every heterogeneous compound, or other complicated phenomena, designed by the first cause.

Example. The first cause for every voluntary act of our bodies is an invention or purpose of our minds; then succeed many secondary causes through brain, nerves, and muscles, exclusively incited by the first cause, by which our bodily machines are forced into varied motions for manipulating other matter, which has to yield to such secondary forces to effect the desired result, or behests of our minds, as the first cause.

So you must see, now, the fallacy of your question, nolens volens, that there must be not only a first, but many secondary causes, for every result, the first being the primary cause always. Every cause has its effect, and that effect becomes a cause to a succeeding effect, etc. CHAS. E TOWNSEND.

Is Christianity on the Decline?

The Rev. Mr. Parkhurst, the pastor of the Madison Square Presbyterian church, rather surprised his wealthy and comfortable congregation last Sunday by declaring in the course of his sermon that the admission of new members to the whole body of Presbyterian churches in the country during the last twelve months amounted on the average to only one person to each church. Judging from statistics in his possession, he was of the opinion that the membership of the denomination had declined rather than increased within the year.

This prominent clergyman said he could not speak with as much certainty concerning denominations like the Methodist, Baptist, and Dutch Reformed, though he believed the facts on the point in question were about the same with them as with the Presbyterians. He knew such to be the case with the Congregational churches of New England, and he gave details in regard to the churches of that class in Hartford and New Haven, where Congregationalism is largely in the ascendant, and is commonly supposed to be in a highly flourishing state. He showed that in both those cities, where rise the glittering spires of many costly temples dedicated to the creed of Brewster and Davenport, the admissions of new members to the churches of that faith within the year hardly gave an average of one person to each congregation, while on account of deaths and removals the net total of members had diminished.

A couple of weeks since a Protestant clergyman from Belgium occupied the pulpit of the Rev. Dr. Crosby. He had crossed the ocean to attend the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Philadelphia. His address was upon the condition of Protestantism in Europe generally, and more particularly in Belgium. He seemed to be well informed upon the subject, and was evidently a learned, thoughtful, and candid man. He gave it as his opinion that Chrissianity on the continent, whether Catholic or Protestant, was honeycombed all the way through with rationalism and other forms of skepticism. He says that, as a general rule, it is only the uneducated classes that hold fast to those leading facts in Christianity which are accepted as truths by Catholics and Protestants alike, and that the more learned and cultivated portion of the people seem to be gradually swinging loose from the old doctrins. He made the significant statement that though in his judgment it was evident that the Liberal party in European politics is breaking away from the ancient church, its leaders and its rank and file do not stop at Protestantism, but go clear over to disbelief in any form of Christianity.

These utterances of prominent orthodox divines as to the present condition and apparent tendencies of Christianity in this country and on the continent of Europe are worthy of the grave consideration of the clergy of all denominations. —N. Y. Sun.

The Priest and the Devil

Are like opposit sides of the same coin, obverse and reverse, heads and tails. They are of the same partnership firm. The priest puts on vestments and plays the devil. The devil "gets religion" and, appearing as a priest, has great license to do as he pleases. Say but one word disrespectful of the devil and his indignant partner, the priest, frowns at you and defends his friend.

The church and penitentiary, like priest and devil, are near together. Church members fill the penitentiary and convicts get religion and help fill the church. As to character, comparisons may be odious, but I prefer the devil's. The priest exhorts, prays, sings, kneels, looks upward, etc., and in church is good; but he so often plays the devil out of church and lands in the penitentiary. (See official records). In the latter case he always lays the blame on his friend and says the devil misled him. The devil was never known to act so mean as to lay his own faults on his friend's shoulders.

Another Report of the Chicago Congress.

CHICAGO, Nov. 17, 1880.

FRIEND LELAND: I attended the Conference of Liberals at the Grand Pacific on Monday night. I do not know if you had a reporter present, and so I will send you a few notes of it, from which you can make up an article if you see fit.

I was not present during the afternoon session, supposing, of course, that I would not be admitted, and so cannot report that session from actual knowledge. I will, however, giv you what I heard.

A reverend clergyman was elected Chairman. Spencer (our pet) made a long-winded speech, opposed to the assertion of any radical ideas, and advocated leaving the platform in such a shape that all Christians could join hands with them in their work. After he was through he was taken to task and declared out of order by Mr. Underwood for making such a long speech.

Spencer was a Committee on Credentials. After his report, and all had been accepted, a Chicago man by the name of Reynolds arose to speak. He was sat down upon by the Chairman, and declared not entitled to take part, although he held a ticket which Spencer had passed upon.

Mr. Denslow and others were appointed a committee to report a platform.

I went there in the evening, and had no difficulty in gaining admission, as the room was open to all visitors. As soon as they came to order, Col. Bundy offered a resolution that all speakers be limited to five minutes, and only be allowed to speak once on any question.

Reuben Daily was totally opposed to the idea. He wanted no gag-law. They had met to discuss these questions, and they wanted time to do it. "What are you afraid of? I protest against the whole thing." Bundy, seeing that no one defended his motion, withdrew it. It was afterward made ten minutes.

Denslow then read his report. I am reporting from memory, and although the words may not be correct, you may rely on the facts. You will see the report, of course, in print, as amended. It speaks of drafting an address to the country, which shall recommend itself to all men regardless of race, color, condition, creed, etc. Nothing about woman or sex.

A. J. Grover wanted it amended so as to recognize woman. He was an out-and-out woman suffragist. Somebody said they did not want side issues. It was finally amended to read "all persons," though Grover still insisted they should mention women unequivocally.

The incident shows that the framers had not the slightest thought of including woman in the call. So far as I know, there were no women delegates. Three or four women came as spectators in the evening.

Then Reuben Daily took up the report and declared he could see nothing in it. It was barren of issues. He had left his business—urgent business—to come to this Conference, hoping to find something to fill his soul with joy, but now he would hav to go forth again an hungered. It would fall flat upon the country and be an abortion from the start. He would not oppose it, and would vote for it, because, while it would do no good, it could certainly do no harm. No one attempted to reply to him.

Somebody called on Denslow to explain how they intended to operate under this call. Denslow then went on to explain the points of his report. His remarks had so little of point in them that I cannot fasten upon any of them.

The principal idea in it, and one which he stated distinctly, was that the whole platform had been left open to be decided upon in the future, because they were not certain just what measures Mr. Ingersoll was in favor of. It had been left open so they might consult with him in the future.

Reuben Daily wanted this thing decided here and now. He was fighting this battle alone, and this attempt to overslaugh him with a great name was cowardly, and he protested against it. If Mr. Ingersoll was interested in this movement, why is he not here to-night to see to it? He had sent no reason for his absence, and it had not been explained. He wanted this matter settled now and here—wanted a broad platform sent out to the world with as much Liberalism in it as possible.

B. F. Underwood spoke next. He protested against Mr. Daily's idea of making Liberalism a feature of the platform. They wanted to unite everybody, and they had no more right to insist on making Liberalism a feature of the platform than would their Christian friends who might join them in insisting on having a plank to distinctly define hell-fire literally.

Mr. Daily, in reply, demanded to know where they got their idea of secularization if it was not from Liberalism. They never got it, and would never get it, from the church. The very idea of secularization in the platform was Liberalism.

And so the talk went on. Ingersoll, their head-center, being absent, they were all at sea. No one could account for his absence.

Green said he had been in frequent correspondence with him since the Chicago Convention, and he had spoken hopefully of this movement, but the last letter he had, just before leaving home, had said possibly he might not be present, but gave no reason.

Mr. Chainey said he had spent a week with Mr. Ingersoll since that convention, and on leaving him he had said, "I will be with you again at the Chicago Conference." He could giv no reason to account for his absence. It occurred to me that possibly Ingersoll has concluded that he may be appointed in Garfield's Cabinet, and therefore he must do as little as possible to embarrass his friend, Mr. Garfield. So he lets this Conference—of his own creation—go by the board. This thought received confirmation in the Evening Journal of Chicago. It is one of the stalwart Republican kind, and most religiously orthodox. In its editorial columns last night it made up a cabinet for Garfield, and at the end was R. G. Ingersoll for Attorney-General. I hav also (as no doubt you hav) seen it suggested by other papers.

Green stated the expense he had been at, and a collection was taken up to defray it.

In the course of his remarks he said the hall cost them nothing. It was a large parlor in the Grand Pacific.

The collection seemed to be a good one. I saw Spencer put in a "V." Bundy was Treasurer. From this fact (a free parlor in the Grand Pacific), I feel more than ever convinced that Ingersoll is guided in his movements by a desire to help the Republican party; and as he cannot lead the Liberals into it, he is trying to keep them from hurting it. The Grand Pacific is Republican headquarters, and the landlord, in the interest of that party, lets his friend Ingersoll hav a free parlor.

They were discussing the time when they will call the convention they are to hav in the future. Said Grover: "I suggest that it had better be put off until after the fourth of next March, at least, because you know Garfield will hav his cabinet to appoint, and then we may not hav to account for anybody's absence from the convention. In fact, we do not know how much somebody's absence from this meeting may be accounted for by that fact." Of course he meant Ingersoll and everybody understood him.

I should say there were not more than thirty delegates present; certainly less than fifty. Before closing Underwood tried to infuse a little courage into them. He felt confident it would succeed. He had been in conventions for twenty years, and he had never seen one that he felt more confidence in than this, where there was more earnestness and determination expressed than this, etc., etc.

he whole spirit of the movement seemed to be a man and not ideas—seemed to be Ingersoll, and he absent; and they were lost without him.

I was sitting next to Chainey, and I said, "You ought to hav been at the last convention and seen the earnestness, and determination, and unanimity with which we threw that man out," pointing to Spencer, who sat next to him. Chainey said nothing but smiled. H. J. WOODHOUSE.

Put Not Your Trust in Princes.

The followers of Col. Ingersoll can hardly be said to follow. He says, "I will meet you on the Rialto." They meet, but he don't, or he becomes behind time and only to bear the market and disturb the exchange. Again he fans a hope and says, "Dear friends, fit though few, at Phillippi I will meet you, without fail, to take sweet counsel against those poor Liberals who 'do not as the publicans the same.'" But neither on this mountain nor on that, after all their doublings, is the divine presence overtaken. There they sit twiddling their thumbs till by their pricking "something wicked this way comes," and they nerve themselvs up to the desperate resolve to see him—later!

Such is the upshot of a bolt that was blared in the public ear with trumpets and now terminates in the squeak of a penny whistle—that was blazed across the sky with rockets, and now comes down like their sticks. The difference on which the bolt was organized was one in favor of genuin, reasonable, defensible liberty of the press and against the first step of encroachment upon it. The bolters had no case to go before the country upon. Liberals generally did not respond. Ingersoll himself, so feebly supported, would not appear, and the whole organized opposition fell to the ground. Every principle and every demand that, in the absence of their leader, they did muster up courage to formulate at the conference, is in the platform of the old League, with the added determination of "eternal vigilance" and two hundred already organized Leagues to back it up. The Liberal public, all but a few amphibii, half churchmen and half Liberal, saw that the thing strained at was only a gnat, not a defensible difference, and they wouldn't touch it. Mr. Green announced in one of his calls that he wanted a basis broad enough to admit members regardless, and yet narrow enough to exclude all hobbies. Well, it seems greater attention was paid to the narrowness than the breadth, for they got the path so narrow that but few went in thereat; and not only no hobby, but not even the surest-footed mule among them could keep his way along it.

Mr. Underwood, next friend of Abbot, with no faith in organization, was there to organize, but would take no Liberalism in his because it might offend the church. That is the old, old Abbot lesson well learned and glibly recited. Since the fulminations of this aforetime war-horse of Liberalism at Chicago it will require nice estimates to decide whether the church is to be congratulated on the gain of a convert, or Liberalism condoled with on the loss of a pervert.

"I tell ye wut, my jedgment is you're pooty sure to fail Ez long's the head keeps turnin' back for counsel to the tail."

It is Luke, I think, who treats on lukewarmness; and there is something said about being neither hot nor cold, and such nauseates get spewed out of the mouth. People who are so unmindful of the laws of force as to get between two bodies in motion are hardly ever the fittest to survive. In fact they terminate in very fine powder.

How now, Bro. Chainey, about your "greatest man of the age?" Would the greatest man pipe you to a dance on the village green, and then stand aloof from the dance? Would the undoubted, all-honored chief of chieftains put bugle to lips and toot you to camp for a daring raid on the enemy and then wave you his adieus out of sight and hearing in the rear? If cabinet positions are in prospect and are the disturbing cause, as the Conference itself in its perplexity intimated, we can imagin Garfield and the Colonel playing this shabby trick upon their quondam comrades as Poins and Prince Henry did upon the Falstaff crew:

Henry: "But how shall we part with them in setting forth?"

Poins (Col.): "Why, we will set forth before or after them, and appoint them a place of meeting wherein it is at our pleasure to fail, and then will they adventure upon the exploit themselvs, which they shall hav no sooner achieved but we will set upon them."

Such are the sports in which princes, presidents, and "greatest men of the age" indulge without any respect for the feelings or rights of the rank and file.

Mr. Woodhouse tells me he saw R. C. Spencer plump a V in the contribution plate as it passed around. He did twice as well as that for the treasury of the National Liberal League Congress at Chicago. He probably in his heart of hearts esteems us to this day as plus X and them as minus V.

But this long awaited Pacific development has come and gone. The Liberal world held its breath to see what would happen, solely on account of the one great name attached to it. He, it seems, at the last moment had no word to say, and failed to appear. The minor actors in the play are of no sort of account, the curtain rings down on a disappointed audience, and the whole movement collapses. The National Liberal League is "broad enough to admit members regardless of their religious opinions, and narrow enough to exclude all hobbies not germane to the question of state secularization." There never hav been such hobbies in the League. The erring brothers are welcome to return and resume their relations and their loyalty to the League.

Meantime in its councils it passes to the order of the day, and the Liberal army resumes its march.

Is Thought Substance?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER. Sir: Not long since, in an article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I claimed that thought is not substance, and think I proved it. It seems I either failed or was misunderstood. One writer, a Mr. Sherman, from Adrian, Mich., speaks of my "profound ignorance," and then proceeds to giv a few brilliant thoughts from his own magnificent intellect, utterly devoid, so far as I could discover, of all reasoning, by way of contrast. It was quite apparent, however, that Mr. Sherman did not agree with me, and I can find no reason in his argument, or out of it, for his condescending to notice my humble effort but the fact that he foolishly imagins in some way it is compromising Spiritualism to admit that thought is not substance. Now, I never claimed to be so profoundly wise as to ask the public to receive my bare assertions, unsustained by reasoning; and seeing that Bro. Sherman in the profundity of his wisdom has written a book in which he declares there is a deep, deep hole at the North Pole, and that the center of the earth is inhabited, I ought to be profoundly grateful for his little complimentary notice.

Another, Mr. Charles Audley, the author of that inimitable and indescribably funny article, "Rant versus Criticism," which was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER some time ago, and in which he declares again and again that I am the greatest of living ranters, shows in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER that he utterly failed to discover my position in regard to thought being substance. In trying to answer Mr. Sherman's questions, he bestowed upon me the choice compliment of being a colleague or ally of Mr. Sherman's in arguing this question, to which I now earnestly protest and object. From some hight so lofty that all reasoning is superfluous he contemptuously sneers at the reasoning of Sherman and myself. Doubtless the fact that Mr. Sherman and I are both Spiritualists is so blinding to his faculties that he fails to see that even Spiritualists may differ. His reasoning is altogether too much like his wit. It fails to penetrate. I will briefly review what I did say, and then giv some additional thoughts which now occur to me. I said, "As I see it; thought is not substance, but condition." This certainly has no uncertain sound, and if Mr. Audley, or any one else, fails to comprehend it I shall consider it a hopeless task, on the ground that "there must be a means to an end." All things must be done in accordance with natural laws, and blind perversity is just as natural as "profound ignorance." Although a Spiritualist, I can and do believe that thought is simply a manifestation of and a condition of matter. I showed that qualities or properties of matter are not substances but modes of manifestation. I claimed and believe that everything in the universe is substance or matter, that the universe is divided into two great classes, the ponderable and imponderable, or mind and matter. I claimed that as mind, which we call spirit, is the activ or controling element, it must be substance, and not a property of substance, for, if mind or spirit is not substance, then thinking or thought must be a manifestation of a manifestation, or a manifestation of nothing, which is impossible. I regarded this as being proof positiv that we are spiritual beings, dwelling within "tabernacles of flesh." I do so still, else the idea that nature has a dual existence is a chimera, and mind must be regarded as a property of these bodies of flesh, etc. This again I say is impossible, for no property of matter has ever been found to control matter itself. Matter is activ only when some invisible but substantial agent is acting upon and is identified with it. It is plain that the element controling must be superior to the element controlled, therefore, the mind element or spirit must be superior to the body. There is no escaping the conclusion, then, that the I within these bodies which reasons and thinks, is the real organized and only individualized entity, that these bodies are used and controlled for a purpose that is only temporary, and that, as walking, talking, etc, are manifestations of the physical, so is thinking a manifestation of the spirit. Finally I claimed that thought is analogous to sound and light, that there are thought-waves similar to those of sound and light. As we hav a dual existence we must be surrounded by two atmospheres, each of which must be adapted respectivly to our spiritual or physical wants. We send out our thoughts either by the spirit acting independently upon or exciting the spiritual atmosphere which is en rapport with the spirit, or by means of the vocal organs acting upon the air, in both instances thought being transmitted by means of vibrations of the elements of the respectiv atmospheres.

Because the brain becomes exhausted or tired is no reason for supposing that brain-material is being transmitted. Really, there is no more substance transmitted over the waves of the air when we talk than when a cricket chirps or a cow-bell tinkles. No more does brain-substance flow from our pen to the paper when we write. The brain is an electric battery, or voltaic pile, made up of positiv and negativ elements; and whenever the battery is activ, a magnetic fluid is generated which enables the spirit to manifest itself by producing thought-waves or vibrations. Thought is a result, it is true, but it is no more substance than is walking or talking. These acts of the physical organism require a battery to generate the fluid which shall convey the order to the muscles to act, and an exhaustion or consumption occurs not only in the brain but muscles; but no more substance has been transmitted with these messages than accompanies messages over the telegraphic wires. The electric batteries generate a fluid that fills the wires, and by means of exciting or causing vibrations of this fluid are our thoughts sent from station to station. The telephone proves absolutely that this is true and that no substance is transmitted. The apparatus at either end only records the peculiar action or condition of the electric fluid, just as a person across a body of water would judge by the size of the waves whether a pebble, a rock, or a steamboat had disturbed the waters. Just so when we talk. We disturb the air, and our friends receive the vibrations and judge by them the nature of the message transmitted. In other words, we cause our friends to hav the same thoughts we hav had and their brains to act just as ours did. Before we can comprehend the uttered thoughts, or before our brains can be made to act in a manner exactly corresponding to that of our friends, we must first learn the significance of sound-waves or written characters.

No scientist will claim that substance is transmitted to our friends through the air or over the wires, nor do I think they, after earnest, honest thought, will claim it is substance, or can be anything but condition under any circumstances.

If thought is condition, and it can be transmitted by vibrations by and through the physical universe, the same rule must hold good in the transmission of it by and through the spiritual.

Our spiritual organisms need a spiritual atmosphere just the same as our physical bodies need the air; and if one atmosphere can be used to transmit a condition, then the other may also be so used.

This being true, we should be able to converse with each other in two ways—both by and through the spiritual and physical. Our spirits should be able to act and transmit thoughts independently to each other without being uttered or expressed in any way through the physical organism. I say independently, for I believe the brain is used by the spirit only to generate power to produce vibrations which shall convey messages to the muscles or through the air to our friends.

Many people are able to-day (and they are rated as weak-minded Spiritualists) to converse in a greater or less degree independently of their physical organisms, and the time will come when all will outgrow their blind skepticism; when all will develop and enjoy these beautiful gifts; when their spiritual natures will be more activ and en rapport with each other, and when, as spirits, they will be able to talk to each other independent of physical agencies. This explains spirit communion and inspiration; how people who are mediumistic, or whose spiritual natures are developed into the activ, are able to receive impressions from each other when remotely separated, or to converse with and be inspired by those already dwelling in spirit-life.

Lowell, Mich, Nov. 15, 1880. E. A. CHAPMAN.

Thanksgiving.

BY M. BABCOCK.

President Hayes, O Lord, once more has set a day for thanking thee. But being a Democrat I cannot consistently thank thee for the triumph of a party which we honestly believe to be wrong. And as for bread and potatoes we hav none except those for which we paid our money. We are told that thou, O Lord, art of the same shape of Adam, that man was made after thine own image. And if so, wilt thou, who art supposed to liv way up among the clouds, let us hav a sight of thy person. If thou dost not like to show thy face let us hav a view of thy back parts, or even one leg hanging down below the clouds would be some satisfaction. Anything to let us know that thou art a reality. As I cannot just at this time think of anything for which we wish to thank thee, not even to oblige Mr. Hayes, and as 'tis said that thou heareth and answereth prayer, we will ask thee to do us a favor. When we consider that of the millions of prayers that will be offered thee on this, the twenty-fifth day of November, and that not one of them will be in favor of the poor devil, I hav concluded to ask and pray that thou wilt hav mercy and in consideration of his long suffering forgiv and restore him again to thy favor and happiness. What good does it do you to torment him, anyhow? But if thou wilt not forgiv him for his sake, wilt thou not either kill or restore him for the sake of thy children. Almost daily he is leading holy men and even ministers of the gospel into devilish mean scrapes, and Lord, when thy new Bible is ready for the people, which one, the old or the new, must we believe in order that we may be saved? I will not ask thee, O Lord, to save me until first I can make up my mind as to which place I want to be saved from. There are no fools in hell, for being idiots they are not responsible, so they go to heaven. Hell, according to the Bible, is filled with good honest men, and the brightest intellects the world has ever produced, whilst most of our scoundrels and murderers who are hung go to heaven. I would not object to the society, but think I should not like the climate in hell; and if in heaven, a mother with a knowledge that her daughter is being tormented in hell can shout Glory to God, and go on with the tune without missing a note, or having a wave of trouble pass over her peaceful breast, heaven has made that mother a demon, and I don't want to go to such a place. A thousand times sooner would I prefer to remain unconscious dust forever rather than occupy such a heaven with a knowledge that one person was being tormented in the orthodox hell. And if I am saved I don't want to be saved for Christ's sake, but want to be saved for my sake. So, Lord, save me for my sake, by request of the President of the United States of America. Amen.

Junius Rediscovered.

HE REAPPEARS IN 1775 IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

The last words addressed by Junius to the people of England were these:

"You are roused at last to a sense of your danger. The remedy will soon be in your power. If Junius livs you shall be often reminded of it. If, when the opportunity presents itself, you neglect to do your duty to yourselvs and to posterity, to God and your country, I shall hav one consolation left, in common with the meanest and basest of mankind—civil liberty may still last the life of Junius."

This was published March 3, 1772, in the authorized edition of the "Letters of Junius" (dedication) But the revolution which he so sanguinly expected did not come, and Junius seemed to hav retired forever. At all events nobody but his publisher ever heard from him again, and then only on mere matters of business. In a private letter to Woodfall, March 5th, he acknowledges the receipt of two bound copies of the Letters, and directs where to send two other vellum-bound copies when ready. Again, May 4th, he answers in four lines what he supposes to be a sign thrown out for him in the Daily Advertiser, by Woodfall.

Let no one be deceived by two other private notes, May 31 and 10th, nor by a prior one, January 25th, nor by the public letters signed Veteran, Scotus, Tell-Truth, and Nemesis, from Jan. 28 to May 12, 1772. Not one of them was written by Junius, though the publisher may hav been deceived by the clever counterfeiter, whose evident purpose was, in part at least, to catch Junius at the coffee house where packages were sent him. (See private letter, March 3d.)

On the 19th of January, 1773, Woodfall received another and last private letter from Junius, as follows:

"I hav seen the signals thrown out for your old friend and correspondent. Be assured that I hav good reason for not complying with them. In the present state of things if I were to write again, I must be as silly as any of the horned cattle that run through the city, or as any of your wise aldermen. I meant the cause and the public. Both are given up. I feel for the honor of this country when I see that there are not ten men in it who will unite and stand together upon any one question. But it is all alike vile and contemptible."

The opportunity had not yet presented itself for Junius to fulfil his promis. Nor hav I heretofore been able to discover that he began to fulfil it till January, 1776, when "Common Sense" roused the people of America to throw off the British yoke. From that time till 1793 we all know how many reminders the people of England received from Thomas Paine, though they never suspected him to be Junius.

But within the past month I hav discovered a still earlier and more emphatic reminder than "Common Sense," or any other of Paine's numerous works. On the 14th of October last Mr. J. Francis Ruggles, the indefatigable bibliopole of Bronson, Mich, sent me this slip, cut from a catalog of rare books:

"283 "The Crisis." Vol. I. (all published), containing XXVIII. numbers. 12mo. pp. 236. London printed, New York, reprinted, 1776.

"The author of these essays and poems appears to hav been a kind of little Junius, having all his intense venom and somewhat coarser invectiv, but without his pungent abilities. The principal object of his attacks would appear to be Lords Bute, North, and Mansfield, not forgetting George III. He anathematizes that trio for their attempts at infringing upon the vested rights of Englishmen, and their unwarranted and tyrannical attempts to govern the British American colonies in violation of the law and the British Constitution, thereby causing the colonies to resort to arms in defense of their sacred rights. He calls upon and urges the Americans to resist these minions of power, with an earnestness and a bitterness that sounds like infuriated rage. The following passage may be taken as a specimen: 'Ye conspirators against the liberties of mankind at St. James's, in St. Stephen's Chapel, the House of Lords, or amongst the bench of satanical bishops, you must surely think there is no God to judge nor hell to receive you; or you could never be so far abandoned as to stain your hands and consent to dye the plains of America with the blood of her inhabitants.' The volume must be of great rarity, as this is the second copy that I hav fallen in with in my reseaches, and they hav been many and minute.

"WM. GOWANS."

Never having heard of a "Crisis" prior to Paine's, whose publication began Dec. 23, 1776, and ended Dec. 9, 1783, I went and asked Mr. Spofford, the librarian of Congress, if he knew anything about it. "Oh, yes," said he, "we hav it. It is prior to Paine's and rougher in style." He then got the book for me, and I soon discovered that the most of the essays were evidently from the pen, not of "a kind of little Junius," as the late Mr. Gowans has guessed, but of the big Junius himself.

Without letting Mr. Ruggles know any more than that the book was in the Congressional Library, I requested him to get the stray copy for me if he could, and I hav now the pleasure of owning it. But as it passed through Mr. Ruggles's hands, his critical eye detected what mine had—that in the "Crisis" of 1775 (1776 being the date of republication) Junius had reappeared, pursuant to promis.

The American reprint of 1776 contains twenty-eight numbers of a weekly series published in England and America in 1775. The publication began, as I hav since learned from another source, in January, 1775, and continued till after the middle of 1786, making ninety-one numbers in all, and ending with a republication of the American Declaration of Independence, when the publisher announced:

"We now lay down this paper with grateful thanks to the public; and as liberty and virtue have taken their flight to America, the only asylum for freemen, we are determined to follow, and not longer struggle in vain to animate our dastardly, degenerate countrymen with the noble spirit of their forefathers."

The American publisher intended to issue the second volume, but the following manuscript note in an English copy may account for the default:

"By order of the House of Commons burnt by the common hangman."

If a complete copy of Vol. II. can be found, containing Nos. XXIX. to XCI. inclusiv, I will pay twenty dollars for it.

Only three of the twenty-eight numbers are dated, and only fourteen of them signed. In the first number the writer announces that he has "fellow-laborers in this great work." That writer, I believe, is Junius. But the first essay with a signature, is No. VII, and that, strange to say, is signed "Junius," who also contributes No. X. Both of these are addressed to the Right Honorable Lord Apsley, Lord Chancellor of England, and the first, dated February 16, 1775, begins thus, "I was a bystander this day when your Lordship and the House of Lords decided the very important cause of Philip Thickness, appellant, and Peter Leigh and others, respondents." Of course that Junius was not Paine, who had been in America some two months or more, but one of his local "fellow-laborers in the great work."

He assails the Chancellor in the two numbers of the "Crisis" for an outrageous decision, and promises in his next to "lay before the public some further traits of his hardships in public and private life." But little Junius does not contribute another next. I suspect that he was not secretiv enough, and got caught and imprisoned. Falsely professing to be the real Junius, he foolishly exposed himself to detection.

With No. XIII. appears the signature "Casca," who stabbed Cæsar. This is certainly Junius redivivus. Casca signs also Nos. XV., XVI., XVII., XVIII., XXI., XXIII., XXIV., XXV., and XXVI. No. XXVII. is a poem by "Cato," a new contributor, and No. XXVIII., the last of Vol. I. is "a p by Thomas Shaw (doubtless a fictitious name), dated July 28, 1775, and appended thereto is an address headed, "God Save America," warning the British people against the lying report in the Royal Gazette of the battle of the 17th of June (Bunker Hill), and concluding with a lament of the degeneracy and insensibility of Englishmen.

Now, although some of these numbers were undoubtedly written in England, yet I claim that the ten signed Casca, and a few (perhaps as many more) without signature, were written in America by Thomas Paine. I claim this not only upon internal evidence of the most striking and positiv character, but upon external proof equally remarkable and conclusiv, which I will present in another article of the same length as this. WM. HENRY BURR.

Stuckupitivness.

If we consult history (history is not one of the exact sciences) we find that of the many tribes of crawling, creeping, walking, and flying inhabitants of this little planet, one biped tribe got a stuck up notion in their craniums that they had souls—were all that God cared anything about.

History further endeavors to demonstrate that Jews, a mere fraction of the biped tribe, got a double stuckupitivness—they alone were of any account.

Further along down we find among the elite a triple stuckupitivness—the canaille are of no account except as diggers and scrubbers.

Among another select or elect few—nothing personal intended—we find a notion of a lake of fire and brimstone, devils and pitchforks, and all who don't believe as we believe are pitched in, and pitched and pitched to all eternity.

Of the bipeds that hav been, are, and will be, on this planet, what figures can tell the number? What mathematician can giv the length, breadth, and depth of the lake, or the number of devils and pitchforks?

What for an idea would it be to subtitute the "survival of the fittest," let the mere scullions go to the compost heap to be reformed?

By and by when Elmina and other progressiv progressors get bipeds lifted up, in sexual relations, to the decency of animals in general, there'll not be, in the biped family, ragamuffins—all top blossoms—and what a nice little world this will be. We'll call it the new earth so long ago predicted. PRENTISS.

Letters from Friends.

LESLIE, MICH., Nov. 24, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am not a constant reader of your paper, though I am interested in it and its mission; but in glancing over its contents for Nov. 20th my eye fell on something which particularly held my attention and I felt that I must say something if you would giv me a hearing.

The matter which so called my attention was the letter of C. L. Morgan and your remarks thereon. I was surprised beyond measure at the temperance principles you advocate. If any one had told me that THE TRUTH SEEKER or its editor (all the same thing) held and advocated such principles, I should hav said, "I do not believe it." I was grieved as well as surprised to find that a Liberal, progressiv paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER, having for its object the advancement and improvement of the human race, should giv ever so little countenance to that which intoxicates and degrades. You say, "True temperance with regard to any article means its use in moderation." Then a man is not truly temperate in regard to intoxicating liquors unless he drinks them in moderation, nor in regard to tobacco unless he makes a moderate use of it, also in regard to opium, morphine, etc, He would not be a true temperance man if he totally abstained from the use of these, and the great majority must be intemperate, for "true temperance in regard to any article means its use in moderation."

"Among the rights and privileges of human beings is that of obtaining from existence all the happiness possible." Granted; but is there any real happiness to be obtained from the use of wine and other liquors? I did not suppose we ate and drank simply for pleasure, but to sustain and nourish our physical bodies, and it has been clearly demonstrated that fermented or distilled liquors will not add to, but will rather detract from, that nourishment.

You say, "We think we hav sufficient control of ourselvs to taste a glass of wine without endangering our present or future welfare." Probably you hav; but if there is one other person with the same capabilities of self-control, there are hundreds without, and it is certainly a fact that the majority of "moderate drinkers" (true temperance men) become drunkards, and I do not need to even mention the misery and degradation connected with the drunkard; it is too well known. Now are not you responsible for some of this misery? Will not some young man think that if a good, Liberal, progressiv man like the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER takes an occasional glass of wine, he may? But he does not possess the same strong mind and self-control that the editor does, and he fills a drunkard's grave. I believe we are each one our "brother's keeper," for THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 13th says: "If we hav a precept or principle which we would advocate to others as a rule of action, we must aim to liv in accordance with the theory we wish to hav accepted, and we must liv it so well, purely, thoroughly, and practically that no shadow of blame can by any means fall upon us which will reach upon those theories and ideas. What we do well impresses others far more than what we say. Our example is more effectiv as a convincing agency than our theories can possibly be. So let us, one and all, aim to liv out our views of the highest possibilities to which be believe humanity is attainable." And it seems to me this is especially incumbent on us who are trying to show to the world the truths and principles of such a grand but misunderstood and reviled philosophy. We should remember that any individual faults and inconsistencies will be used detrimentally to the principles we advocate and will retard the progress of truth.

I should like to see letters from other friends on this subject. Yours for the right, MARY L. BONNEL.

REMARKS.—We cannot, of course, but regret that our honest opinions should shock or surprise any good people. We must, however, entertain such views as seem right to us, whether we think as other people imagin we ought to or not. Notwithstanding what our fair friend says, we cannot help thinking that temperance in the use of any article means a rational and moderate enjoyment of it, and that temperance and total abstinence are two different things. We do not advocate the use of intoxicating liquors, nor do we use them ourselvs. We are fully aware that alcoholic beverages hav been a curse to thousands of people, and brought them to degradation and ruin; still we think a temperate use of wine, beer, and even something stronger may be made and no serious results arise from it. Within the last four months, while visiting countries where wine is almost a universal drink, and being brought in contact with thousands whe used it every day, we saw not one intoxicated person nor one who seemed in the slightest degree injured by it. We regard wine as one of the comforts of life, and that its moderate or temperate use does not injure any one. As much harm as has arisen from an intemperate use of alcoholic drinks, it does not near equal the injury caused by improper or intemperate eating. It is quite as proper to get up a crusade against over-eating as against over-drinking. Both are extremes which sensible people will avoid, as well as an intemperate denunciation of a temperate use of the comforts of life. Opium, morphine, arsenic, and drugs of all kinds are injurious in large or small quantities, except when used to correct a greater evil, and total abstinence with them is better than temperance. The same is often true with alcoholic drinks. Still there are numerous cases where a temperate use of them is beneficial. Mutton, beef, and pork are often evils, but that does not argue that it is wrong or sinful to make a moderate use of them. Some Liberals are liable to extremes—to be very ultra; to look upon a rational and temperate use of some articles as almost sinful, and a strict abstinence from it as a great virtue. We regard real temperance as commendable as being an illiberal, ultra extremist.

We are in favor of all sensible people being their own judges as to what is proper for them to eat and drink, and trust they will be temperate and reasonable in all articles they use. What they find to be an injury to them they should avoid, and what proves beneficial they should use in a temperate manner. They will remember that there are a thousand good things which become evils when indulged in to excess. True temperance is what all should practice, and not be unreasonable against a temperate use of such things as do no harm except when used intemperately. Those who cannot partake of beef steak or roast turkey without making gluttons of themselvs had better abstain from them and confine themselvs to potatoes and water gruel, and those who cannot take an occasional glass of wine or beer without making drunkards of themselvs had better confine themselvs to buttermilk and cold water.—ED. T. S.

ROCKVILLE, CONN., Nov. 22, 1880

FRIEND BENNETT: Please excuse me for addressing you in such familiar terms, but; although I never heard of you nor THE TRUTH SEEKER until within the year you seem to me like an old friend. I like your style of pitching into the Christian religion. I hav read several of your tracts and books, including "Deacon Joel Skidmore's Letters," and I like them. They hav helped to extinguish the last spark of my superstition, so that now I can gladly say in the language of the priests, that "the holy spirit has been grieved away," I hope never to return.

In answer to your "appeal," I inclose $2.00 to help THE TRUTH SEEKER along. Apply it where it will do the most good. Yours respectfully, E. J. MARTIN.

REPLY.—We do not object to familiar terms when friendly like the above. We wish to be regarded as a friend by all who are honestly seeking after truth. It is cheering to hear that good is derived from the efforts we are making in disseminating what to us seems to be reasonable and true. It encourages us to press on in the good work.—ED. T. S.

APPEAL TO DAKOTA LIBERALS.

SWAN LAKE, DAKOTA TER., Nov. 16, 1880.

BRO. LELAND, SEC. N. L. L.: The National Liberal League has placed me over the destinies of Liberalism for Dakota, about to be a state equal nearly in extent to many states combined, 153,000 square miles more, I believe, than all the New England and Middle states together. I am a small fellow, little in stature, and slender in purse; but I am more heartily in favor of the National Liberal League now than ever, and so especially since it has declared very unhesitatingly for the coming reformers. We begin to know our friends. I hav been working long in the Liberal field till I find myself financially a poor man. Having lost position after position in this and other states, as a professional teacher, on account of my Liberalism, I am at last reduced to the necessity of eking out a precarious existence on a farm. It is a noble calling and Madame Grundy can't hurt me here worth a cent, but it is not a calling that turns out the gold nuggets fast enough for me to take all the Liberal papers and books I want, and carry on the work of organizing Liberals here as I would like.

Now, what I want to say and what I want you, Bro. Leland, to help me emphasize, is, that the friends of Liberalism and reform in Dakota must let me know where they are, and open their hearts and purses to help carry on this great work. It is not fair that one or two persons should hav to carry on all this work or see the car of progress stand still. I want it understood that I will do all in my power and giv all the time and money I possibly can. I hav never received a mill for all the time, money, postage, and books I hav spent and distributed in the last ten years, here and elsewhere, and yet the same would amount to hundreds of dollars. I may not hav accomplished as much as others, but I know some good seed has been sown that will soon bear fruit.

I want to say to the Dakota Liberals that I want them, every one, to giv me their post-office address, send me postage stamps if they cannot money, and let me know where there are places with good prospects of Leagues, let me know who are the Labor-reform men, Greenbackers, Woman Suffragists, and Reformers of every stripe in Dakota. Let me hear from all stripes of religious reformers, Materialists, Spiritualists, Deists, Pantheists, Atheists (and orthodox may apply if they wish), and send me a word of cheer if you can't send the paltry gold. We mean to organize and begin now; but Bros. Walker, of Iowa, and Follett, of Illinois, and others as well as myself, cannot liv on air, neither can we pay expenses by selling Liberal books exclusivly. It is high time for Liberals to begin to feel that they hav some responsibilities, as the churches feel they hav.

Within the last year I hav made the beginnings of Leagues at about half a dozen points. During the next year, 1881, we must organize a territorial League and organize the territory in full too, with a Money and Labor-Reform party which shall take in the woman's rights movement and all the leading questions of reform—in short, a party that will carry secularization to its logical and legitimate consequences. Two years hence we must hav a nomination for Congress and both houses of the legislature, and a live and growing party by 1884. Now this means work and money. Let us hear from every Liberal and Reformer in Dakota, and at once. Yours for death to tyrants and despotism.

CHARLES H. GODDARD,
Dakota Mem. Ex. Com. N. L. L.

There are vim and courage and determination all in one "small fellow." The battle is not always to the strong, but to the wise, the dextrous, and the persistent as well. I hope the Liberals of Dakota will promptly second the efforts of Mr. Goddard. He hoists this brave flag. How many of you will rally to his standard and make him captain of an invincible force. The struggle is yours even more than it is his, and he can do nothing without you. What is Liberalism to him any more than to you? Why should he lose position after position for it. Take hold with him, put shoulder to his shoulder, and bring about a state of things wherein no Liberal teacher can lose his position because of his Liberalism.

The field is white to the harvest, but the laborers are few. Gradually, however, laborers are volunteering in the work of Liberalism. We hav now Walker in Iowa, Follett in Illinois, Phelps in Kansas, and our new friend Goddard in Dakota. We need such men in every state. Who is the next brave man to enlist? T. C. LELAND.

FRANKFORT, MICH., Nov. 22, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am taking, and hav been for some time, your valuable paper, and I want it continued. You may be assured that you and the cause of truth you seek to assert and hav the courage to maintain and uphold has many earnest supporters even in northern Michigan, and the number is constantly increasing here as everywhere else. We hav traced with pleasure your course from the foul prison to sunny Italy and home again, and now it is our prayer that you may be spared many years to assist in heralding the dawn of an era when no person shall be imprisoned for creed or opinion's sake. Inclosed please find two dollars to apply on subscription, as I think I must be in arrears. Yours most cordially, N. A. PARKER.

SINCLAIRVILLE, N. Y., Nov. 20, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You hav troops of sympathizing friends in this vicinage who unite with me in bidding you Godspeed in the work you hav in hand. Giv the cohorts of imperialism in government and sanctified error in theology a steady and well-directed fire from your batteries of free speech, free thought, personal liberty, and state rights is the desire of all save time-serving hypocrits in religion and self-seeking demagogs in politics. "'Tis the truth will make us free." DARIUS CLELAND.

SNOWVILLE, VA, Nov. 22, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I am almost surprised that thee has been necessitated to call for thy just dues from a single TRUTH SEEKER subscriber, not that I believe them all to be so much more prompt and honest than other folks, but from the earnest and continued enthusiasm that has been felt and expressed by all who hav been reading thy interesting, graphic, and unique European letters.

I supposed that on hearing of thy return home each one would hav felt—as I did myself—the immediate necessity of not only paying up back dues, but also an irrepressible desire to do a little more as a slight return for favors received.

I never felt so completely satisfied with the perusal of any book of travels as I hav in following thy steps from place to place during this famous Brussels trip. It is almost like going over the whole ground in spirit and seeing and experiencing all the pleasure with none of the accompanying wearisomeness of the actual journey.

I presume that long ere this reaches thee the responses to thy brief mention will come pouring in and thy depleted coffers be filled to overflowing.

I am sure none of thy numerous friends and admirers was more glad to hear that thee was safe home again than Elmina, nor can there be any who will more gladly do all they can toward defraying the expenses of thy well-deserved and—we are rejoiced to know—happily spent trip to Europe.

Warmly and truly thine, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

VICTORY, N. Y., Nov. 21, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I hav enjoyed your letters from Europe, and hope you hav returned better prepared for the fight of knowledge against superstition. Fight the encroachments of church and nation upon the rights of the people in violation of the Constitution, and the people will finally learn to see the right. The Constitution guarantees each citizen the right of free vote, free speech, and free press. In many of the Southern states the two first hav not been enjoyed for years, and the national government refuses to act, although hundreds hav been murdered and thousands deprived of their rights. But if one sends a postal card or pamphlet obnoxious to Mrs. Grundy or the church, not even the plain provisions of the Constitution is any safeguard to a citizen. Shame on such a government! I am aware you knew all this before, but keep it before the people. Prejudice is strong, but generations pass away.

My wife was a good Methodist when I married her seven years ago, but she says she cannot do without your paper.

Truly yours, NELSON PORTER.

CHURCHVILLE, N. Y., Nov. 20, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your paper I am well pleased with, and intend to continue it. Your letters while abroad are worth a year's subscription. There ought to be a fund raised to send you around the world, in fact, to keep you on the wing all the time. Wishing the T. S. success, and you a long life, I reman, Yours for truth, H. O. BIGELOW.

REW, PA., Nov. 24, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Many thanks to you and Mr. Robert Ingersoll for the education I received from you two gentlemen about Infidelity. I had been one of the most miserable creatures until my eyes began to be opened through the good work that you and Mr. Ingersoll hav done for me. I would not take a thousand dollars for the knowledge I hav received from you two gentlemen. I would be very proud to be personally acquainted with both of you. I want to try to educate myself, and help to push on the cause of humanity. This Christian superstition is worse than Southern slavery. I hav read but little of yours or Mr. Ingersoll's works. I want to try and make a new start in life. I am 28 years of age, and hav no one to take care of but my parents. My kindest regards to you and Mr. Ingersoll. GEO. R. SINNING.

---

BUFFALO, N. Y, Nov. 16, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Most cheerfully do I at once respond to the call for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I realize paper is cash and it costs to do business. Myself and dear wife beg to congratulate you on a pleasant journey and safe return. Inclosed please find two dollars to be used as directed. Liberals do not hav enough music and attractions for the young. Ministers figure on making shows to make money and marrriages. The reverend brother gets $6,000 a year, and his marriages count $3,000, and funerals nearly as much. Oh, the religious business pays more for the least investment of any hobby going. We will again do as we did when we saw you had got home again safe, rejoice, and we rejoice this was so much pleasanter return from Europe than from Albany. Many times our hearts trembled for fear you might not come out. Now, with your trip, etc., we hope for a happy future for you in your labors for the right. With kindest wishes,

Yours, S. B. BANCROFT.

TRUXTON, N. Y., Nov. 22, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: I, for one, welcome you home, and am glad that you returned to THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and hope you will long liv and enjoy yourself. Inclosed you will find two dollars, to be used as per directions. It is not much, but every little helps in time of need. I am going to take THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I like it and am able to pay for it. JOHN DEAN.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Nov. 23, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I hav followed you to Brussels, and been with you on your journey as far as my circumstances would permit. I hav been very much interested in your descriptions of those old cathedrals, and hav repeatedly asked myself this question, Now, with all these reminders on every hand, will those religious rites and ceremonies ever cease? It seems to me nothing short of destroying them and putting them out of sight of the people will ever do so. These objects constantly before them lull them into quiet repose, and they will not seek out the corner-stone on which this stupendous fraud rests. I am often led to say "that this Christian religion is one of the most gigantic humbugs ever foisted upon poor, weak humanity," and I sincerely believe it. Nothing, it seems, could hav the same effect upon the mind and to so successfully bind it down as this very thing. I am very glad that I read Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." That was my first step toward becoming a Freethinker and a free man. I must express my gratitude to him by saying that I think there is none better or greater than he. Now we are liberalized and can think for ourselvs, and Liberalism individualizes us, and we feel quite content although alive and no society to attend, but I wish we had one.

Yours truly, JAMES S. BEDEL.

GRANBY, CAN., Nov. 25, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT. Dear Sir: I hope you will not make an appeal in vain. Your friends must stand by you. I only wish I could giv you more help. Count me one of them, as I hav been working hard in this section for your paper and principles I distribute every paper I get to those whom I think will take it, but these rascally ministers hav spies amongst the womankind, and when they find any one with a copy they take it on pretense of reading it and substitute S.V. Leech, D.D.'s "magnificent" "Reply to Ingersoll." It vexed me so much that I determined to go for them. I silenced the Rev. Mr. Brand, of Shefford, Vt, a Baptist, and also broke up his congregation. Last week his effects were sold at auction, and he has gone to pastures new. I hav been preaching for almost ten years here, hence the support I got from the people. Then I had a controversy in our local paper, the editor being a Freethinker. This was also stopped by the ministers of every denomination combined, and old bigots mostly from the Methodist school. I am now putting through the press a pamphlet answering a Rev. gentleman, Thomas Renes, of West Stefford, also the Rev. Mr. Hazelain, Mansonville, and Leech, D.D., LL.D., as his "magnificent reply" has been distributed to all the faithful, purchased at the shepherd's expense. I put in a small paragraph advising all friends of Freethought to subscribe to THE TRUTH SEEKER. When it comes out I will forward you a copy.

I am glad you hav returned safe and sound, and hope you enjoyed your trip looking on our antiquated brethren across the waters. Yours truly, DR. A. A. GILMOUR.

BERLIN, N. J., Nov. 24, 1880

FRIEND BENNETT: You hav returned to your family and friends safe and sound, but your letters, like Gilpin's hat and wig, are following you, and by the time we get through with them I think we shall all get our fill of information about churches, cathedrals, altars, gods, images, idols, stained glass, priests, hypocrits, and all the rest of the pious mockery, and sick of thinking of the immense sum spent for such nonsense that might be devoted to ameliorating the condition of suffering humanity, and we shall feel more earnest than ever for you to hurry up a law for the taxing of church property. If all the churches were taxed like other property there would not be so many of the useless pagodas built. Every little village in the land must hav two or more churches, when if the people had half as much humanity as they pretend they could all worship together in one and save the expense of the other for useful purposes.

Then again in the large cities the rage for costly churches is increasing. It is now becoming common to build churches costing one hundred thousand dollars. A tax on them would check this extravagance, and there would be something left to aid the poor; so I hope you will work in earnest to hav the churches taxed. Though they call them God's holy temples, they expect men to protect them. If they are destroyed by mobs they expect tax-payers to pay for them. Then let them be taxed, in return for this protection, like other property.

Success to you in every good work!

Yours, J. HACKER.

BELLEVUE, IOWA, Nov. 23, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER. Dear Sir: Guttenburgh, situate on the west bank of the Mississippi, in the state of Iowa, contains about one thousand inhabitants, one Lutheran church, one Catholic church, one Catholic priest, five sisters of charity and a tenpin alley—all belonging to the Catholic church—all exempt from taxation, as church property. There are in the town twenty-seven saloons. Whether any of those are church property is not publicly known, but most of their patrons, as well as their managers, are members in good standing. There is not a newspaper, fire engine, bank, nor advocate of the platform of the National Greenback-Labor principle. A more blissful community can scarcely be found in any town of such size in the territory designated as the Solid North. OBSERVER.

WAPAKONETA, OHIO.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find one dollar, for which please giv me credit on your books. I like your paper very much, and am fond of reading it. I agree with its sentiments on orthodoxy. I will admit that one year ago I was as orthodox as any man in the United States. I did not know that there was such a publication in the world as a radical paper till last winter, when I met Dr. C. E. Beardsley of Ottawa. He gave me a copy of your paper, and I hav been a subscriber since last March. I must say that since I hav been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav become a full-grown Liberal. The Liberal cause is very unpopular, I find, in this part of the country, on account of the ignorance of the people on the subject. They hav never thought the matter over. They never study the matter contained in the old Jewish book, or think what a gross fraud has been palmed off on ignorant people and humanity in general by priests and religious teachers, in the name of Jesus. W. H. H. WILLIAMS.

MOLINE, MICH., Nov. 15, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Allow me, one of your readers, to congratulate you on your safe return to a happy home and circle of friends. I would like to say just here that your letters from Europe hav been, and continue to be, a rich intellectual repast worth more than the cost of the paper in forming just views of what man now is, and what he has been in the gloomy past, forgotten ages. Though I do not claim to be a paying subscriber, I inclose one dollar as a token of appreciation of the labor, intellectual and physical, required to publish so valuable and literary a paper.

In the T. S. of October 23d appears an article entitled "Superstition," signed by David Bruce. Diffidence leads me to hope that some abler pen may do more ample justice to what appears as errors in the above article. The writer sets out by saying that superstition is boldly denounced by the wholesale by our most astute sticklers for science without pausing to understand its true basis. Then follows a dissertation or sort of apology for superstition, which, without assenting to or disproving, he would seemingly use as a soft plaster or sugar teat, to tempt poor, afflicted mortals to try to prolong a miserable existence.

He says that the "expectation of immortality is innate," and that the idea of annihilation arises from "disgust" of priestcraft. I confess my view is very different. Locke's essays on human understanding teaches that an innate idea can stand of itself—self evident—as, "I exist." This phase of knowledge is taught to be of the highest grade; far above the debatable theme of immortality. I do not controvert David's train of thought, wherein he shows how the savage is led to adopt superstition, but dissent as to his most cultured civilian, and would offer himself as a live specimen of brains and benefits of mental cultivation—and allow "educated" to take the place of "innate."

In his eloquent paragraph upon humanity occurs the words, "Suffocate itself in the fumes of the scientist's crucible." Do such fumes hav a suffocating effect? A very queer proposition when the splendid prizes gained by science are the glory of succeeding years.

As for friend David's speaking for "logical minds having an outgrowth of annihilation," I acknowledge that the idea of annihilation is utterly illogical and unphilosophical to my view. What are mortals but a complement of atoms—a quota of physical (solid and muscular), intellectual, voluntary and involuntary (brains), mechanical, involuntary (vital) forces? These form a human body. Do we not see it begin in weakness, culminate in strength, and then decline till in helpless dotage? Has not the intellectual light been so completely obliterated that a human may not only forget friends, but even its name? The animal machine still running in order? How is that for immortal? Assuming to himself to speak for the philanthropist and philosopher, he rejoices at the "onward march of Liberalism," but cannot hold that "Liberal" a humanitarian who teaches eternal sleep after death. Is it philosophy to teach a baseless dream of future happiness to grown-up mortals to help them to endure grief—as we giv candy to children to stop their crying? For one I hold it to be a free privilege and option for every competent mind to consider and balance for themselves, whether life's joys and benefits are worth the cost or not. Let the unknowable take care of itself.

Most righteous maxim to obey—
Plan well, think right, and reap
Success and pleasure. Life is play.
And death a dreamless sleep.

FRANKLIN PECK.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: I trust you may reach a point ere long where the storm and tempest will not rage about you with the fury of past years, but liv and work where the sunshine of peace and prosperity may enable you to pursue the even tenor of your chosen way to the setting sun of life's eventful journey, and pass you on to the sweet summer land of our spirit home "over there." PALMYRA, N. Y., Nov. 22, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed I send four dollars, three due on the paper and one to apply on the next year.

The mammonites hav got us, which is the reason of my seeming neglect, as is probably the case with hundreds of your subscribers. I congratulate you on your deserved vacation and safe return. Your letters are very instructiv, and seem to make us almost present with you. I hope they will bear good fruit. I hope your life may last to see it. I am sure your courage will not fail. I believe that we will not let the brave, fair-dealing, earnest TRUTH SEEKER weaken for lack of its just dues. HENRY M. NORTH.

BELVIDERE, ILL., Nov. 13, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

Should a seeker for truth endeavor to find
A cause for the ills that are cursing mankind,
And seek for the cause of the first cause of evil,
Or why God made a hell or created a devil;
If his questions by all are laid on the shelf,
He had better then go to the devil himself.
Yes, if from all sources he get no reply,
Let him go to the devil and ask him why.

But in seeking for truth it is nothing but civil
To apply to the Lord as well as the devil.
Go to him, ye seeker; let truth make you brave,
But you'll find that the Lord is as mute as the grave.
Then inquire of his priests and see if they can
Giv a cause for the ills that fall upon man.
They will roll up their eyes and dodge it most sly,
So then go to the devil and ask him why.

Now some may say it is very uncivil
To tell anybody to go to the devil;
Yet 'tis honest to giv to the devil his due,
And nothing but right his case to review;
And that man is but a coward, forsooth,
Who'd be scared by the devil from seeking the truth.
So you must, if you wish those things to untie,
Go straight to the devil and ask him why.

The scriptures inform us that after the fall
The devil was doomed on his belly to crawl.
But as further we read in that book, we find out
He was up on his legs and walking about.
And John, among others, writes wonderful things
How the devil was once ornamented with wings.
How he improved so you better apply
To the devil himself and ask him why.

So the devil may not be as black as he's painted.
And men may be worse who in church hav been sainted.
By his power no martyrs in bonfires hav glowed,
While for God and his cause blood in rivers has flowed.
So hear him ere judging which side to believe,
Nor heed those who say he will only deceive.
For the Bible shows plainly he ne'er told a lie,
So go to the devil and question him why.

What, go to the devil? Then where does he dwell?
His present headquarters priests tell us, is hell.
Where in hell is the devil? You're in the same plight,
For science has wafted them both out of sight.
With hell-fire extinguished and old Satan dead.
Our only resort for an answer is fled,
And into first causes 'tis useless to pry,
Or to go to the devil to question him why.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1880.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Please accept my congratulations for your safe return to home, friends, and my best wishes for your future prosperity. In your absence you must hav enjoyed yourself very much, and you hav also given your readers much pleasure, as well as instruction, by your letters, full of interest concerning people and things over the sea. We also hav had things of interest on this side of the water, among which may be mentioned the Freethinkers' Annual Convention, held at Hornellsville, and the Fourth Congress of the National Liberal League, held at Chicago two weeks later, and now the morning paper brings the notice of a meeting yesterday for the secularization of the government, held in the same city.

I suppose we, the members of the old National Liberal League, ought to congratulate ourselvs upon the fact that so much of our work will now be done in a wise and judicious manner.

We were told in Chicago by Col. Ingersoll and H. L. Green that a society divested of the objectionable isms of which some of us are accused would bring to its aid thousands of church-members and other respectables that would soon complete the work. Of course this new society, in its formation, must hav been exceptionably respectable, as not a woman's name was on the call. I hav such a respect for Mother Nature that I am apt to think her ways respectable, and she quite often does her work by combining the male and female, but the scriptural saying, "By their fruits ye shall know them," is a good criterion. I will try to wait in patience, and hope that this new departure shall do all it promises. Surely none of our Liberal Leagues will take pattern by Mr. H. L. Green and accuse our old and tried friends of "licentious and obscene teaching" because they shall not be able to vote against conscience.

I hav not been home since the Hornellsville meeting, but hav been visiting my friend Amy Post in Rochester; and, added to that pleasure, hav listened to Mrs. Colby and Smith, who hav been speaking and singing for the Spiritualists in this city.

I hav no hesitation in pronouncing Mrs. Colby the ablest speaker on that platform. She is certainly a most wonderful woman in every respect, and the New York Liberalists would, I am sure, be benefited by hearing her a time. Mrs. Smith is also in every respect, I think, a charming woman.

Mrs. Post, who is President of the League here, wishes me to say the copies of Man came duly to hand, and we hope the circulation of them may be a benefit to all.

When I go home I hope to resuscitate into action our League in Syracuse. We are weak there. Some of our members hav left the city, and others hav gone into the Republican party.

With kind love to Mrs Bennett, I am truly yours for the mental and physical freedom of all people,

LUCY N. COLMAN.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Permit me to say that your trip through Germany was very interesting reading.

LADOGA, IND., Nov 17, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Old Infidel: Allow me to tender my congratulations on your return home from an extensiv and arduous European trip. I only regret that one so devoted to the inspection of fine God-houses as you seem to hav been while on the continent should not hav gone on when so near and made a survey of the neighborhood and farm where God was born and raised—the Holy Land—where, according to all accounts, sacred (so to speak) and profane, there has been more unholiness than in any other spot on earth, not excepting the wilderness of sin. But I hope we can soon compete with it successfully for the belt; at least since we hav stolen a President not elected, so as to inshrine Methodism in the White House, and elected a bribe-taker as President of this devout Christian Nation (with a capital N), I think we are making rapid strides toward it. As soon as the Campbellite preacher gets his cherished Alex. Hamilton government established on the ruins of this United States government, there is no doubt in my mind that we can see plenty of immense cathedrals and saints without going to Europe for them. But enough of that while I tell you something that you would sooner hear, viz, that inclosed you will find six dollars—three for my paper and three for that of a neighbor.

I am yours in the cause of truth, M M. HENRY.

OREGON, MO., Nov. 16, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Glad you are back. I hope you will carry out your idea of publishing some one or two of the most lively, sarcastic works of Voltaire on theology. It is so delightful to read the thoughts of a really great, progressiv mind—there is so much stuff printed nowadays it is a relief.

By the way, the remarks of a correspondent in a recent TRUTH SEEKER on Taylor and his "Diegesis" are very just. I hav long thought we do not giv to that man's memory the veneration it deserves. He struck out a path quite new. No educated man who believes in Christianity can read his Diegesis without being convinced of the falseness of religion. I am glad some one has called attention so publicly to Diegesis.

Do giv us something from Voltaire. The difficulty is to get a good translator. I believe women excel as translators, being more receptiv they seem to get right into the author's shoes, as it were. Some woman practiced in translation could giv us Voltaire in English. I think I know one who could do it for you if you hav any difficulty. At least a few pages might be tried. If you are not careful in this you will giv us Voltaire's ideas minus his spirit; his thoughts in another's garb.

The statement that it has taken five hundred years to build the Cathedral of Milan—not yet completed—reminds me to propose a question that, if answered correctly, may giv us proof positiv that man was a builder of temples over six thousand years ago. If it has taken five hundred years to complete a temple on the surface of the earth, where thousands of workmen can be employed simultaneously, how long would it take to carve a temple 60x180 feet, three stories high, out of the solid granit rock, with aisles, galleries, stairs, balconies, windows, columns, statuary; every square inch of the walls elaborately carved and ornamented by the graver's tool? Entrance by a carved doorway is first made and then an area twenty feet wide, three stories high, leaving a solid block of crystallized rock, say 60x180 and three stories high, out of which the temple is to be carved. It is evident that but two or three men can begin to work, and until the area is finished but few more. Also that at no time can very many be employed. Very well. Now, these temples at Ellora, India, would make several temples of the size spoken of. How long will it take to do the work. Let us hav some carver of granit to make an estimate. Lately I saw a good workman a whole day on two or three letters on a granit monument, and the idea occurred to me to inquire sometime who will figure it out. HOLT.

I AM delighted with the sound, practical common sense in "John's Way." E. A. KNIFFIN.

Now.

Arise! for the day is passing,
While you lie dreaming on;
Your brothers are cased in armor,
And forth in the fight hav gone;
Your place in the ranks awaits you;
Each man has a part to play;
The past and the future are nothing
In the face of the stern to-day.

Arise from your dreams of the future—
Of gaining a hard-fought field;
Of storming the airy fortress;
Of bidding the giant yield;
Your future has deeds of glory,
Of honor (God grant it may)!
But your arm will never be stronger,
Or needed as now—to-day.

Arise! if the past detain you,
Her sunshine and storms forget;
No chains so unworthy to hold you
As those of a vain regret.
Sad or bright, she is lifeless as ever;
Cast her phantom arms away,
Nor look back save to learn the lesson
Of a nobler strife to-day.

Arise! for the hour is passing;
The sound that you dimly hear,
Is your enemy marching to battle,
Rise! rise! for the foe is here!
Stay not to brighten your weapons,
Or the hour will strike at last;
Or from dreams of a coming battle,
You will waken and find it past.

Man.

BY CHARLES BRADLEY.

Os homini sublime didit; cœlum tueri
Jussit, et erectos ad sidera tollere vultus.
—Ovid.

To man sublime, to face the sky
And read the stars was given command;
Therefore let superstition die
And no more heaven withstand.

He was old,
He was bold,
I was told,
And lived by the sea,
And the rolling of the waves,
And the stars,
And the graves,
Made him free.

Where'er, in earth or sky,
His steadfast soul could fly.
Well learned had he this lore,
Which, in his heart, he took
As the channel takes the brook,
Man is ever man.
Never more.

In name of every star
Which from heaven so far
Proclaims the changeless law that rules the sky,
He left these words to tell
To man—whom he wished well—
Of him when he should die:

"I awoke, and through my cabin's open roof,
True to his watch, great Aldebaran shone.
I slept, secure in this eternal proof.
The Almighty Father leaves me not alone."

Church and State; or the Rector's Creed.

The following song was written by the Rev. Mr. Porter, of Greyabbey, who was convicted on a charge of treason, and executed in front of his manse, in the year 1798. The clergyman referred to was the Rev. John Cleeland, who made himself conspicuous in prosecuting all persons suspected of holding advanced political opinions. He admitted in cross-examination in Downpatrick Courthouse when giving evidence against some political prisoners, that he had packed the jury panel, and for this service was complimented by the crown prosecutor.

A rector am I, do you mind what I say?
In the church every Sunday I preach and I pray,
With my black coat and cravat so white.
Ye men of my parish, I pray you take heed.
Till I giv you a sketch of my time-serving creed—
My creed it is—cash; and my stipend, salvation,
For which I'd destroy all the swine in the nation.
With my black coat, etc.

I believe in my church, I believe in my manse,
I believe that religion is all a romance.
With my black coat, etc.
I believe that the only two comforts of life
Are counting my stipend and kissing my wife;
I believe that the people were born to be slaves,
To be pilfered and plundered by us artful knaves.
With our black coats, etc.

I believe that my head is the storehouse of sense,
From which the pure gospel I freely dispense,
With my black coat, etc.
As it was forbid by an ancient divine
To throw precious pearls to ignorant swine,
Complying with this, my ambition should be
To keep them still bond slaves, ourselves being free,
With our black coats, etc.

I believe that our brethren all think me sincere,
For at church every Sunday I read a long prayer.
In my black coat, etc.
And if they want grunting, I'll make the house ring,
For at grunting they know me to be just the thing;
I'll sigh and I'll groan, turn my eyes up to heaven,
For no other reason than the tythe that is given—
To buy black coats, etc.

And now my dear friends, for the sake of connection,
I'll end my discourse with a word of reflection;
With my black coat, etc.
To believe as the great folks, for better, for worse,
Is the only true method of filling the purse;
Which method I'll follow in spite of detraction;
I'm sure of my pay while the court has protection
From the black coats, etc.

I'm resolved my opinion shall be the same still
With the court, whilst in power, let them be what they will—
With my black coat, etc.
Should they become Jews, I would join them in that,
My faith in religion I'd throw to the cat;
For my creed it is—cash: and my stipend, salvation,
For which I'd destroy all the swine in the nation.
With my black coat, etc.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

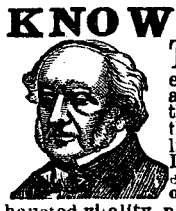
A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.



The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To Miss Anna Knoop, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Everything that we now deem of antiquity was at one time new; and what we now defend by examples will at a future period stand as precedents.—Tacitus.

An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.

He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.
BY L. FEUERBACH,
Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc
Translated from the German.
Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract

THE POCASSET TRAGEDY THE LEGITIMATE FRUITS OF CHRISTIANITY.
A Discourse by
WILLIAM DENTON.

This is the masterly lecture reprinted in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the best on the subject, and shows in the clearest manner that that sad tragedy was but the to-be-looked-for outcome of the teaching of the Bible.

JUST OUT!
Another Extraordinary Book:
Sixteen Saviors or None;
OR,
The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.
By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind.
Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.
Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Of Kentucky.

Held in Kirksville, Mo., during nine evenings—May 20-29, 1879. Synopsis report—official. This book of 220 pages gives an interesting presentation of the theological questions which divide Christians and Liberals. The Rev. Ditzler is regarded as an able defender of his favorit Christian doctrins, but it will undoubtedly be admitted by the reader that Prof. W. F Jamieson fully met all he had to offer. Christian readers will take more kindly to a work of this kind, giving both sides an equally fair chance, than to books on our side only

A DIALOG ON
LAND, LABOR, AND REFORM
By F. E. BOYD.

Outlines of a plan for a new American national land and labor co-operativ system, by which land and comfortable homes may be secured to the poorest classes of every race, without money or price, with the educational and social advantages of modern civilization. Designed to ameliorate the condition of the struggling masses; to equalize population; to prevent vice, crime, and pauperism; to prevent the recurrence of industrial crises and feuds, labor riots, and popular insurrections; to terminate Indian wars; to avoid or do away with an oligarchy of landlords and capitalists; and to preserve or restore the liberties of the people and the rights of self-government by bringing immediately together the two great elements of universal progress, land and labor.

Gems of Thought.

AUTHORITY is taken for truth, and not truth for authority.—Theodore Parker. [The Free Religious Index has taken as its motto, "Truth for authority, and not authority for truth," and gives Lucretia Mott as its author. Is this fair to Parker? We protest that it is not.]

HAPPY ye sons of busy life
Who, equal to the bustling strife,
No other view regard!
E'en when the wished end's denied,
Yet while the busy means are plied
They bring their own reward.
—Burns.

SUCH is the well-known story of the birth of Jesus, one of the sweetest and most deeply significant of all the legends in the Bible. That it is a legend, without the smallest historical foundation we must, of course, admit; or, if we hav any doubt on the subject, a moment's consideration will remove it.—The Bible for Learners.

THOU of an independent mind,
With soul resolved, with soul resigned;
Prepared power's proudest frown to brave,
Who wilt not be nor hav a slave;
Virtue alone dost thou revere,
Thy own reproach alone dost fear.
Approach this shrine and worship here.
—Burns.

THE crude opinions which prevailed twenty years ago on the subject of inspiration hav been so completely abandoned as to be hardly anywhere maintained by scholars. Of the 11 000 English clergymen who set their hands to a declaration in favor of these crude notions fifteen years ago, probably there are not fifty who would do it again.—Dean Stanley.

PEOPLE are year by year becoming more alive to the fact that reason and authority are radically opposed; that the conflict between them is a life and death struggle; that an absolute choice must be made of one or the other, and that all attempts at compromise, such as that sought by evangelical Protestantism, which, in one breath, proclaims the thoroughly rationalistic doctrin of the right of private judgment, in the next seeks to fetter the free action of the human mind by confining it within the shackles of iron-bound creeds and confessions of faith, made three or four hundred years ago by fallible mortals like ourselvs, are essentially irrational and doomed to inevitable failure.—Modern Symposium.

THE lover of moral beauty, struggling through a world full of sorrow and sin, is surely as much the stronger for believing that sooner or later a vision of perfect peace and goodness will burst upon him, as the toiler up a mountain for the belief that beyond crag and snow lie home and rest. For the other side of the picture, who shall exaggerate the deadly influence on personal morality of those theologies which hav represented the deity as vainglorious, irritable, and revengeful, as a sort of pedantic drill-sergeant of mankind, to whom no valor, no long-tried loyalty could atone for the displacement of a button of the uniform or the misunderstanding of a paragraph of the "regulations and instructions."—Huxley.

As spiritual things are commonly less attended to than material, the belief in miraculous inspiration remains longer in religion than in secular affairs. A man would be looked on as mad who should claim miraculous inspiration for nature, as they hav been who denied it in the case of Moses. But no candid man will doubt that, humanly speaking, it was a more difficult thing to write the "Principia" than the "Decalogue." Man must hav a nature most sadly anomalous if, unassisted, he is able to accomplish all the triumphs of modern science, and yet cannot discover the plainest and most important principles of religion and morality without a miraculous revelation; and still more so if, being able to discover, by God's natural aid, these chief and most important principles, he needs a miraculous revelation to disclose minor details.—Theodore Parker.

THE best way to secure a pleasant and happy old age is to begin to be happy, useful, and good now. Begin to learn much of many things. Begin at once to treasure up pleasant thoughts, happy memories, and stores of information on a variety of subjects. Begin to build a strong mind in a healthy body. Begin to sow good seed of noble deeds, so that the harvest will be ripening for the autumn time of life. Cast the bread of kind and generous action upon the waters, that it may return in the far off future and gladden the quiet serenity of thy golden days, when deeds will be few and thoughts only will be thine. Cultivate the graces, the beauties, and sweetnesses all along as thou goest, and keep on building day by day as strength will allow, and no fear but the harvest of old age will be full and complete, sure and satisfactory. —E. D. Slenker.

MATTHEW x, 28-31 and Luke xii, 4-7 Let us pause a moment and think over what we hav heard. Will this kind of reasoning hold good? Can we really banish human cares by thinking of flowers and birds? Do we think it a lofty virtue to be so careless of material wants, so indifferent as to worldly goods? Far from it. Indeed, such confidence is often put to shame. This view of human life is altogether one-sided. It takes no account of the great and certain facts that work, at once a duty and a blessing, is holy in the highest sense; that forethought, not to be confounded with vain anxiety, is not a sin but the dictate of a healthy conscience; that the faithful performance of the daily duties of our occupation is a great part of religion; that we are not only permitted but positivly bound to do our best to make our way in the world by honest work, and so contribute to the material well-being of society.—The Bible for Learners.

PREFERRING RAGGLES.

A well known lady artist, resident in Rome, relates that while standing one day near the statue of Apollo Belvedere, she suddenly became aware of the presence of a countrywoman. The new-comer, a well to-do looking American woman, introduced herself as Mrs. Raggles of St. Louis, Mo., and then asked the question:

"Is this the Apollo Belvedere?"

Miss H— testified to the identity of the work, and the tourist then said:

"Considered a great statue?"

The interrogated lady replied that it was generally thought to be one of the masterpieces of the world.

"Manly beauty and all that sort of thing?" asked the lady from the land of the setting sun

"Yes," responded the now amazed artist. "It is said to be one of the noblest representations of the human frame."

"Well," exclaimed Mrs. Raggles closing her Baedeker, and with arms akimbo, taking a last and earnest look at the marble, "I've seen the Apollo Belvedere and I've seen Raggles, and giv me Raggles."

AN ODE TO A LOT OF STOVI PIPE.

Infernal stuff, your nature well I know,
So when I took you down six months ago,
Each piece I numbered so that I might tell
Exactly how you'd go together well,
And now the time for chilly days draws nigh,
To put you up again I madly try.
Now do not come within an inch of it,
I get you two-thirds put in place and then
Crash you go tumbling to the floor again,
Once more I try. You're rather full of soot,
And I am getting daubed from head to foot.
I jam my thumb, but still I persevere,
One piece goes down and rakes my ear.
I grab to catch the piece, another goes,
And falling scrapes the hide from off my nose.
And then another piece falls with a slam,
And then the rest goes down and I say "Damn."
And then my blood gets boiling and I say,
By all that's blue I'll fix you anyway.
Once more I go to work. By patience great,
I get all but a single section straight,
And I am about to place, when oh!
The chair I stand on tips. Down flat I go,
While on and around me with a horrid crash,
The whole comes down again in one grand smash.
And then my wife remarks, "I never saw
A man so clumsy!" I say, "Hold your jaw!"
And for a tinman send, while I retire
To wash myself and swear to vent my ire.

MODERN THINKERS:

What They Think and Why.

By V. B. Denslow, LL.D.

With an Introduction by

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The work contains critical essays upon Emanuel Swedenborg, and the origin of the Christian ideas of heaven, hell, and virtue; Adam Smith, founder of the school of Economists; Jeremy Bentham, the apostle of law reform and of utilitarianism in morals; Thomas Paine and his relations to the Declaration of Independence and democracy in America; Charles Fourier, the philosopher of passional harmony and co-operativ association; Herbert Spencer, a review of his theories of evolution and of morals; Earnst Haeckel, the demonstrator of the doctrin of evolution; Auguste Comte, founder of the Positive philosophy and pontiff of the "Religion of Humanity;" and an essay on the authorship of Junius as a sequel to the critique on Thomas Paine.

This volume consists of 384 pp., 12 mo, and is illustrated by portraits of each of the eight great thinkers, and opens with an introduction from the pen of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

Notes and Clippings.

THERE are 600,000 more acres under wheat in England than in 1874.

IT was calculated in England some time ago that not one book in 1,840 goes through a second edition, and not one in many thousands a third.

AN Oregon preacher had one of his horses stolen, and he went to his study and prayed that a quickened conscience might oblige the thief to return it. That very night the fellow returned and—stole the other.

MR. AND MRS. SMITH HAYDEN, of Marshall Texas, quarreled about the doctrin of baptism on getting home from church, where they had heard it preached about, and the wife, in her passion, struck the husband a fatal blow with an axe.

A LARGE number of foreign tourists hav been attracted to Naples to witness the eruption of Vesuvius, which is a very fair one, incandescent materials being launched to quite a hight from the top of the crater. The railway up the mountain enables sightseers to get a better view of an eruption than they ever had before.

THE Rev. Mr. Brigham, Unitarian, ascended the platform to participate in union Thanksgiving services at La Crosse, Wisconsin, and thereupon the Rev. Mr. Hayhurst, Baptist, pointedly retired. If those pious Christians cannot worship in the same church, how will they manage to sing psalms together in the same heaven?

THE Rev. Mr. Shokey was preaching at Carson, Nevada, on the swallowing of Jonah by a whale. There were some sporting men in the congregation, and their faces expressed doubt of the story. Seeing this, the minister said: "I'll bet $100, coin up, that I can prove every word of it. Does anybody respond?" Nobody answered, and he went on with his discourse.

No accident ever occurs in a theater but a moral is drawn from it to establish the justice of the visitation. The Brooklyn Theater fire was neither awful nor sad enough with all its vastness to be saved from serving as a pulpit theme for general denunciation of the playhouses. A man has died in a Brooklyn church now. Is there any lesson to be drawn from that save that all men are mortal alike in pew and parquet chair? Death is a deadhead ticket-taker.

UPON the Passion play being withdrawn from Booth's theater, after some fifteen thousand dollars are said to hav been expended in preparing for its presentation, the author of the drama, Mr Salmi Morse, read it before a limited audience in Cooper Institute. It is reported as being a careful, solemn rendition in blank verse of the story of the life and death of Jesus as given in what is called the four gospels. As the features of the story are so familiar to all, it is doubtful, if the play had been put upon the stage, whether it would hav drawn largely.

WHICH one tells the falsehood? The Rev. Mr. Mackie, of the Gilbert Library and Prisoners' Aid Society asserted, verbally and in print that the Rev. Dr. Deems, with other eminent clergymen, had promised to attend, and if opportunity were afforded, to address his meeting at Cooper Institute. Now the Rev. Dr. Deems affirms that he never gave such a promise to the Rev. Mr. Mackie or to any one else, but on the contrary said twice, "most distinctly," that he would not be there. This leaves the Rev. Mr. Mackie in an awkward position.

THE Dutch Central Committee formed for the erection of a monument to Spinoza passed a resolution, when dissolving itself, that the balance remaining to the credit of the undertaking after all expenses had been defrayed should be devoted to the publication of a new and thoroughly complete edition of Spinoza's works. M. Van Bloten and Prof. Land were entrusted with the task, and a communication is being addressed to all libraries throughout the world asking information about manuscripts or autographs which they may hav in charge, in order to make the new edition as perfect as possible.

PUT the Bible" into the hands of an intelligent heathen, who had never been instructed in the Christian doctrin of God, and what would his conclusion be?"—why, he would believe that the world was made in 144 hours; that ages ago water covered the entire world to the hight of several miles, so that there was plenty of room for vessels of the deepest draught on the tops of Chimborazo; that the world was a flat disk supported by columns; that the sun revolved around the earth, but that once it stood perfectly still; that the wicked are rushing down to an eternal punishment consisting of a lake of burning brimstone—and more of the same sort.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Sun, signing himself "Enlightened Self-Interest," writes as follows: "There is nothing true in the Christian system of morals or benevolence that cannot be defended from the standpoint of self-interest, without the necessity for any supernatural belief. As a matter of fact, Christians do not even pretend to carry out the doctrin of self-sacrifice. Witness the pew system of the churches and the big salaries of Christian workers. The greatest benefactors of the race hav been men who were governed by so-called selfish motivs. Witness the spread of the printing press, telegraph, and, in fact, all the engins of modern civilization. Human sympathy exists without religion, and would not be destroyed if what is called religion were extirpated."

THE excitement in religious circles in Scotland in regard to the coming trial of Prof. Robertson Smith for heresy is at boiling point. The Professor, who has over two hundred of his fellow ministers with him, is bravely fighting his battle, and is not in a mood to giv up. He declares that his accusers hav shown not only bitter enmity but lack of scholarship and ignorance of things with which every clergyman ought to be acquainted. He sometimes loses his temper in debate, and calls his accusers hard names, which is not to be wondered at considering the provocation he has had. He insists that he is a believer in divine revelation as given in the Bible, and that some of his accusers are condemned out of their own mouths as being guilty of heterodoxy. Take it altogether, the controversy has become as tangled a thing as any which has ever agitated any of the Scotch churches. A recent Presbyterial meeting discussing the subject sat for seven hours.

IN 1765 Legoz calculated that there were in France 79,000 monks and 80,000 nuns. The number of monks is now far behind what it was a century ago, but the number of nuns is considerably above it. Eighty-six different orders of monks are represented in France, and they hav 2,026 establishments; 281 different orders of nuns are represented, and they hav 12,004 establishments. Seventy-two per cent of the monks and sixty-five per cent of the nuns are engaged in attending on the sick, and twenty-two per cent of the monks and eight per cent of the nuns are devoted to a purely contemplativ life. The Barnabites, who hav just been expelled, are one of the smallest of the religious orders in France; they hav only three establishments, with twenty-five members between them. The largest order is that of the Christian Brothers, who number 9,900, and hav even increased since 1861, when they were only 6,898.

A MEETING of clergymen and others, members of the National Reform Association, was recently held to consider questions, as stated in the call, "relating to the encroachments of Secularism and to maintain existing Christian features of the American government, such as the Bible in the schools, the Christian law of marriage, our Sabbath laws, the oath, national and state thanksgivings and fasts, etc." As a means to this end, such an amendment to the national Constitution is desired as will indicate that this is a Christian nation, and provide a legal basis for the Christian institutions referred to. It is said for the movement that it does not look in the direction of a union of church and state. Its promoters all emphatically condemn the relations between those two divine institutions which hav wrought such unhappy results in the Old World. They claim that the amendment which they seek would bring the national Constitution into harmony with the constitutions of the several states, in thirty of which acknowledgments, more or less explicit, of God and the Christian religion is to be found. This meeting did not propose to join the new Secular Association recently organized at Chicago.

AT a church fair in Jamestown, Pa., there was a difficulty about a watch. It was a fifty-dollar timekeeper, and was drawn by something like a lottery. At the first drawing all the tickets were not in, and the one which drew the watch was found under the hat-band. A subsequent drawing was made, which resulted in the award of the watch to a different lady from the one who had first drawn it. This provoked a quarrel between the two ladies, which soon spread among all the ticket holders. One of the gentlemen of the church settled the difficulty in a very handsome way. He took up a subscription for a new watch for the disappointed lady. This amounted to seventy-five dollars, which procured a better watch than the one which had been drawn. This tended toward a peaceful solution, and might hav resulted entirely that way, only that the holder of the fifty-dollar watch thinks she ought to hav quite as good a one as the other lady, whose watch is valued at seventy-five dollars. The probability is that the difficulty will never be altogether satisfactorily adjusted. Some of the people concerned in the transaction begin to think that church fairs are nuisances.

DEACON PETER ADAMS of the First African Methodist church of St. Louis had an elaborate wedding, but Mrs. Morrison, the priestess of the Absalom Aid Association of the same church, and a former intimate friend of the bride, was not invited. Late at night Mrs. Morrison provided her four sons with a cow's horn, a gridiron, a bell, and a tin pan, and led them out to serenade the happy pair. The uproar was tremendous, and the Deacon clubbed his visitors away. The parties were in a police court next day, and one of the features of the examination was contradictory testimony as to the verse that the priestess sang under the window. She swore it was as follows:

"Peter Adams and his wife—
May they lead a joyful life;
Never hav no fights or spats,
And keep clear of all black cats.
Joyful greetings, joyful greetings!

The Deacon gave this as the true version:

"Old Pete Adams has married a wife,
Who will debil him out of his life.
She and Pete are mighty well paired;
If they'd die they could be spared."

DR. JOHN BUCHANAN, over whose flight from Philadelphia such a fuss was made, has been tried and acquitted. The affair has all ended in smoke. Dr. Buchanan made a business of mailing fraudulent medical diplomas to men who were ambitious to practice the healing art without the usual preliminary studies. He was indicted by the United States Grand Jury in eastern Pennsylvania, under one of Anthony Comstock's mail laws, making it a crime to use the mails in pursuance of any scheme to defraud. At his trial, when the prosecution had exhausted their evidence, the judge directed a verdict of acquittal on the ground that Buchanan did not impose upon his correspondents, for they knew as much of the fraud as he did—that the man who purchased the diplomas was not defrauded, but only bought the means of defrauding others. Therefore he held that there was no evidence to sustain the indictment. The law is a vicious one in principle, as tending to centralize power in the general government, and it is gratifying to note any decision, the effect of which is to nullify it. But it is not gratifying when such a subterfuge is resorted to as in this case. The law prohibits the use of the mails to consummate any scheme to defraud. Taking Judge Butler's view, this was a scheme to defraud the public, in which not only Buchanan but his correspondents were fellow conspirators, and the mail was the principal medium through which it was to be consummated. Therefore if the law were valid it is difficult to concede that Buchanan did not violate it. All th se laws are pernicious. Fraud ought to be punished, but the state is the proper authority to punish them. There is more danger in exercising a censorship over the mails or making a discrimination in such mail matter as letters and papers than in carrying through that channel all the filth and fraud that was ever traced upon paper. All such laws are only initial steps to an established censorship over the mails which will confine their usefulness to the class in power. They lead directly to eventual political and religious proscription, and that is where their authors intended they should lead.—Truth.

Events of the Week.

THE volcano of Mauna Loa, in the Sandwich Islands, is now in a violent state of eruption.

FIFTEEN of the collieries of the Philadelphia and Reading Company hav suspended operations.

THE Kearsarge Mills, at Portsmouth, N. H., were destroyed by fire on the 4th. Loss, about $400,000.

DIPTHERIA is prevalent in this city at present, and an unusually large number of the cases prove fatal.

IRISH Land Leagues, to aid the land reform agitators in Ireland, are being formed all through this country and Canada.

A WOMAN on trial for bigamy in this city is discovered to hav no less than fourteen husbands, all living, and the returns are not all in yet.

A LADY of Yonkers, N. Y., was burned to death, her clothing having taken fire while she was kneeling at prayer beside the hearth.

A GANG of robbers that has long infested the counties of Chester, Lancaster, and Berks, Pa., was recently broken up and thirteen of the desperadoes were captured.

THE records of the life-saving service on our coasts for the last year show that there were three hundred disasters and nearly two thousand persons rescued from wrecks.

IT is reported from Paris that the Panama canal subscription is more than covered already, and that De Lesseps is sanguin of the early completion of his great project.

THE British forces in South Africa hav their hands full. Late advices from that section report several engagements with the natives, in which many were killed on both sides.

DR. SWING, the unbelieving preacher of Chicago, has had his salary raised from seven to ten thousand dollars per year. Limited unbelief sometimes pays as well as orthodoxy.

ON the 4th a collision occurred between a passenger and a freight train near Janesville, Wis., killing eight persons, and wounding several. The accident took place during a dense fog.

THE twenty-four Socialist exiles, driven from home by the German government, who recently arrived here, were tendered a grand public reception by the Socialists of this city on Sunday last.

SEVEN of the crew of an English vessel were recently killed by the Solomon Islanders, in return for which the civilized Christians destroyed an entire village, killing the inhabitants.

IT is said by those supposed to know that unless the English Parliament takes immediate favorable action on the land question in Ireland a general insurrection in that country is inevitable.

THE anti-Jewish question is growing exciting in Germany. Newspapers are debating it pamphlets are pouring forth, tumults are taking place among the students, and an occasional fracas occurs in the street.

THE city of Chimbote in Peru has surrendered to the Chilian army. One Chilian general, in a recent raid through northern Peru, destroyed five million dollars worth of property, and captured $250,000 in money.

THE annual report of the Director of the Mint shows that there was nearly a hundred million dollars' worth of gold and upwards of thirty-four million dollars' worth of silver bullion deposited at the mints and assay offices during the year. The coinage for the year was $84,370,144. The total amount of coin in the country at present is $527,601,425.

LAST year the President's Message was stolen and printed in advance by a New York paper. This year the same feat was accomplished by an enterprising Chicago journal. The Message was read to Congress on the 6th. The President urges Congress to use its influence to abolish Mormonism in Utah, and recommends that the remainder of the public lands of the country be set aside for the education of illiterate persons.

Letter from Europe.—No. 16.

NAPLES AND ITS ENVIRONS.

NAPLES, Oct. 12, 1880.

DEAR FRIENDS: After remaining in Rome fifteen days, and visiting its most noted places, though not all of them by any means, and bidding good-bye to my genial landlady, her husband, and daughters, and what few other acquaintances I had formed there, I took leave of the Eternal City, and at 4:30 of the afternoon of Saturday, the 9th, took the train for Naples, somewhat over 150 miles to the southeast. We passed rather slowly over that portion of the Campagna which is south of the city, having a good view again of the ruins which line the Appian Way, as well as the still standing arches of the old Claudian aqueduct, near which the railroad runs, almost to the Alban mountains. The day was lovely, and I enjoyed the view of the country through which we passed. After rounding the Alban mountains we had constantly a range of hills on our left, but for a while the Campagna on the right continued an irregular plain to the Mediterranean, but before it was dark we left that all behind, and had hills, not very far away, on both sides. The country over which the road courses is considerably broken, passing through many deep cuts and an occasional tunnel. The towns and villages passed were frequent, and some of them were stuck well up on the mountain sides. They do not by any means look as cheerful as American towns. The houses being all of stone, with the everlasting clumsy tile roofs, they have a somber, gloomy appearance; and when one remembers that everything about those houses is cold, cheerless stone, floors, staircases, and all, it is not hard to shudder at the thought of what they must be as homes on a cold wintry day, with little or no fuel to keep the occupants warm. I feel a strong preference for our flat metallic roofs of New York over the steep tile roofs of Europe. In New York the house tops are favorite places of resort on warm summer evenings, away from the dust and noise of the streets, and many pleasant hours are passed there under the wide canopy of heaven, with twinkling stars for witnesses. But nothing of that kind can be enjoyed on these steep tile roofs. Even if the steepness were no objection the tiles are tender earthen affairs, and stepping on them would break them. I do not wish to see tile roofs become common in America, though they do have the merit of being almost proof against fire and decay. I do not object to slate roofs, for though it will not answer to walk on them, they look well. If Jahveh has to spend his time above the clouds and to be constantly looking down upon these brick-colored tile roofs in the large cities, I have often thought he must have anything but a pleasant prospect beneath him.

Vines are largely cultivated between Rome and Naples, one-half the ground being occupied with them, though they are not so compactly planted as in Germany and Switzerland, nor are they so well cultivated. In many places the grass is allowed to grow up between the vines. Often poplar and other trees are set out about as near as apple trees in our orchards, and the vines trained upon them—or rather allowed to run where they please—where they remain year after year with apparently very little attention or care. Italy is so productive, and the climate so genial, that the tillers of its soil do not have to keep so constantly digging as in more sterile countries. The growing of poplar trees, or any other kind of useless tree, simply to afford something for the vine to run up on seems to me a very thriftless style of agriculture. It would be far better to import poles or stakes, if not obtainable here, and thus be able to get four times the yield from the same ground. The olive tree is also largely grown on the side of the road, many groves or orchards being seen on the knolls and hillsides all along. Fig, peach, pear, and apple trees are also met with. With all the luxuriance that abounds on almost every side there is a general appearance of thriftlessness, and these country houses look far from tidy and comfortable. Many of the peasants live in the merest huts, sometimes of rough stone, with heavy stone roof, and sometimes a mere shanty of thatch and straw, about the size and shape of an Indian wigwam, with an opening for ingress and egress, but no windows whatever.

We did not reach Naples till about midnight, and Vesuvius had a light out for me—well, not for me specially, as many others were equally favored, but I nevertheless enjoyed the light just as much as though it had been gotten up for my express benefit, and regarded it as a personal favor. Never having seen a burning mountain before, I watched it with great interest for the nearly hour and a half in which it was in plain view while the train was making the wide circuit between the ranges of mountains which brings us into the city. It is hardly a real blaze, that at ordinary times appears above the rim of the crater of the volcano, though it looks much like it, but it is the strong glare of light which comes from the seething mass of fused rocks and metals not far below. The light is not steady and constant, but appears to be governed by pulsations, and between these the light dies down, and every minute or two bursts up with new vigor, like the embers of a nearly exhausted fire when stirred up. It looks as though it might be Vulcan's huge forge, and that ever and anon he gives his immense bellows an extra amount of pressure. The old mountain belching its fire and smoke in the night looks like the huge chimney of some great furnace, with its flame of fire and light shooting up many feet into dark space. I greatly enjoyed my introduction to Old Vesuve, for a sight of it is what I have many years longed for. The natives here invariably call it Vesuve, thus making a clear saving of two syllables in the pronunciation of the name. Being fond of economy I have easily adopted the name Vesuve.

It was one o'clock when we reached the Hotel Metropole, and got to bed, so the night was not so long as some nights I have passed, especially of those I passed in prison, when sleep wholly forsook me, and I was not permitted to even rise from the irksome bed and sit on a chair between 8 P. M. and 5 A. M.

Sunday morning was balmy and pleasant, and the beautiful Bay of Naples lay like a lovely picture spread out before us. The shape of the city next to the bay conforms, of course, to the water, and is in the form of a crescent. Few cities in the world have a more charming location. You have all seen representations of the Bay of Naples, and the city, with old Vesuvius burning and smoking away seven miles to the south, but not looking to be more than half so far, and I need not attempt to give a description of it. But I do not think there is one of you, could you take in the beauty of the bay, the city, and their surroundings, but what would exclaim, either aloud or mentally, Oh, how lovely!

Half of what the Italians save in the spelling and pronunciation of Vesuvius they lose on Naples. They spell it Napoli, and pronounce it as we would if spelt Nap-po-lee, with the accent on the first and third syllables. They spell and pronounce the names of but few of their cities as we do. Thus Rome is Roma, Milan is Me-lan-o, Venice is Ve-ne-zia, Florence is Firenze, Pisa is Pe-za, Genoa is Jan-a-wah, Turin is Tor-re-no, etc. In Italian as in nearly all languages save the English, a is ah, e is a, and i is e, and that gives the speaker of English extra trouble in learning to pronounce the words in other languages correctly.

Naples has very often been described, and not unfrequently in rather uncomplimentary terms. For dirtiness, laziness, mendicancy, and kindred qualities, the lower grade of the Neapolitans have been soundly berated again and again. Count Arrivabene does it in this language: "The appearance presented by the streets of Naples at sunrise on a summer morning is at the same time curious and delightful. You breathe an air of gentle warmth, filled with the fragrance of a thousand flowers, the odor of which is increased by the slow evaporation of the night dews under the first rays of the rising sun. The sky, a bright and glowing azure, reflects itself in the silvery waves of the bay, whilst right and left the whole of the scenery is beheld faintly through a luminous mist. The busy stir of the morning, the going to and fro of the fishermen hastening to the beach of Chiala, where lie the boats, the bustle of water-carriers, of lazzaroni, of women hurrying towards the frutti di mare market at Santa Lucia, in short, the lively movement of the lower population, conversing in their almost unintelligible dialect, which nobody is able to understand except themselves—all this makes the Neapolitan morning very striking to the stranger. At the tolling of the bells which call the faithful to early mass, the Capuchin monk leaves his convent to collect the offerings of the people, which he will share with the poor the next Friday. He is one of the earliest persons to appear in the streets. The working population of Pozzuoli and Portici are fast pouring into the long and bright Toledo, or directing their steps toward the churches, whence, after having heard mass and received the benediction, they proceed to their daily work. Meanwhile the girls of Baiæ, Portici, and other neighboring villages are offering fruits and flowers in the market."

Bradshaw thus speaks of the city: "Until lately crowds of disgusting beggars swarmed the streets, and pursued one with cries of 'Qualche cosa, signor, por l'amore di Dio,' or, 'Moro di fame,' putting the thumb and finger to the mouth and rattling the jaws; and what they get is often spent in a government lottery, or gambled away. These lotteries produce a profit of £200,000 to the state. Natives as well as foreigners battle about a few scudi. The lazzaroni (so named from Lazarus) are the working classes just above the beggars, facchini (porters), fishermen, costermongers of every description, who, though they live by their wits in the streets, without troubling their heads about rent or taxes, are not so destitute or so distinctly marked from the rest of the community as they were formerly, or are usually believed to be now. Such a class is to be found in the back streets of most large cities. Here the sweet 'do-nothing' feeling exists in perfection."

Mendelssohn says: "At Naples I felt languid, disinclined for all that was serious; in fact, lazy. I lounged about the streets all day with a morose face, and would have preferred lying on the ground without the trouble of thinking or wishing or doing anything. Then it suddenly occurred to me that the principal class of Naples live, in reality, precisely in the same manner; that consequently the source of my dejection did not spring from myself, as I had feared, but from the whole combination of air, climate, etc. The atmosphere is suitable for grandees who rise late, never require to go out on foot, never think (for this is heating), sleep away a couple of hours on a sofa in the afternoon, then eat ice, and drive to the theater at night, where again they do not find anything to think about, but simply make and receive visits. Again, the climate is equally suitable for a fellow in a shirt, with naked legs and arms, who also has no occasion to move about—begging for a few grani when he has literally nothing left to live on—taking his afternoon's siesta stretched on the ground, or on the quay, or on the stone pavement, where the pedestrians step over him or shove him aside if he lies right in the middle. He fetches his frutti di mare himself out of the sea, sleeps wherever he may chance to find himself at night; in short, he employs every moment in doing exactly what he likes best, just as the animal does. These are the two great classes of Naples. A middle class of trades and working citizens scarcely exists. There are a few who like work for the sake of working." With regard to their dishonesty he says: "My landlord invariably gives me too little for a piastre, and, when I tell him of it, coolly fetches the rest. When you give anything to them they say, 'Niente di plu?' (no more?) You may be sure that you give them too much. If you give just the right fee, they will walk away and then come and beg for it again."

These quotations represent the Neapolitans rather worse than I found them, but they were penned a few years ago, and I presume there has been some improvement since. I think this has been particularly the case since Naples became incorporated in the same government with the rest of Italy. "United Italy" is better for all parts of the country than the disunited condition which existed for many years. But the poorer classes struck me as being especially dirty, indolent, and almost worthless. I think I never saw so many half-dressed, filthy-looking persons of both sexes and all ages. Many half-grown boys were running about the streets with but a single garment on, and that of not very much value. It is not much better with the other sex. The lower limbs are neither always kept covered nor clean. I do not mean to intimate that I have seen the legs of all the men and women of Naples, but I have seen quite as many as desirable, and those I did see impressed me not favorably. A free application of soap and water would improve their appearance.

I think I never saw so many beggars anywhere, though I have seen a great plenty in all parts of Italy, and such persistency is rarely met with as is presented here. The beggars, three or four together, will follow you for a square, constantly importuning you for the love of God to give them something. If you are in a carriage they will run along by the side of it as long as they can, and keep up their horrid appealing clamor until you are glad to throw them a soldo to get rid of them. It, however, does but little good, for, like hungry flies, one set is no sooner gone than another comes. I have often wondered, when I have seen these poor wretches around the entrances of the cathedrals, churches, and galleries, how one country could produce so many cripples, blind men and women, and so many piteous objects of charity. It is a question whether it does much good to be always giving to such persons, and even whether much is gained to themselves or anybody else by prolonging their existence. It is to be hoped that some day the government of Italy will be able to make suitable provisions for its helpless poor, and take some steps so they may not be a constant annoyance to every person who has the temerity to step a foot within its boundaries.

Another style of begging is pursued by persons who have something to sell. They will importune you to buy until you get utterly tired of them. It is of no sort of use to say "No" to them; they will continue their importunities all the same. Some girls, nearly women grown, selling matches, etc., beset you in this same merciless manner. If you stop on the street and say "No, no," to their importunities, they will still plead and often drop a box of their wares inside your vest, and the same if you are sitting in a carriage, hoping soon to start, and if you look another way to avoid them, they will take you by the knee, and keep shaking it, saying, "Signor, signor," until you are utterly wearied out with them. I was several times served in this way. The drivers of cabs and carriages are little better. They know a stranger at once, and half a dozen or more will simultaneously beset him to ride. It is a relief to get away from them. I do not know as I have found the people of Naples more dishonest than in other places, though they seem strongly inclined to get all they can from the strangers who visit them, and do not withhold their importunities. All parties seem to think that sight-seers have an unlimited amount of money, and that a large share of it should be distributed in Naples.

One sees many grotesque sights in the streets. Much of the freighting and transportation of vegetables, produce, and other articles is done with donkeys, both by panniers and by being harnessed into small carts. The most of them are diminutiv in size. A strong man could take one under each arm and walk away with them. Still, these little fellows carry themselves with great dignity, and seem to be the most sedate and useful class in the community. It is curious to see what large loads they carry. A large sack of matting, with a long opening in the center, is placed upon their backs, and each end is filled with cabbages, onions, potatoes, and all manner of vegetables, in bulk much larger than the donkeys, and they stride off with it most heroically, and not unfrequently with a big man in addition.

Oxen are also considerably used, and most often worked singly in heavy shafts, with perhaps as auxiliaries a donkey on one side and an old horse on the other. A singular trinity indeed.

Just now the grape crop is being extensively gathered, and the juice being pressed out for wine. I have seen hundreds of large casks, holding 150 or 200 gallons each, of this new juice in transportation from one place to another. Six of these casks make an ordinary load, containing in the aggregate not less than one thousand gallons. Horses or oxen are used for hauling these heavy loads, very frequently a single ox, with a horse on each side. The roads are of stone, solid and smooth; thus heavy loads can be transported.

It is not at all uncommon to see droves of goats being driven from place to place, sometimes to pasture and sometimes home to be milked. The milking is often done on the streets before the house of the owner. The milk is rich, but milking goats, after all, seems like a small business. They are extremely tame and domestic, and very little is required to keep them. Two or three in a drove of two dozen have a bell, which keeps up a constant tinkling. The Neapolitans, like the Romans, are blessed with strong lungs, and the street venders cry out the wares they have to sell in a loud and vociferous manner. They are a noisy people.

A peculiar feature in the suburbs of Naples is the thousands of muskmelons hung up against the houses to dry. The greater part of them appear to be unripe, and with cords around them are suspended whole. I have seen thousands of melons thus drying, the walls of many buildings being literally covered with them. In our climate they would rot long before they would dry, but in this dry air of Italy it is different. What use is made of these dried melons I cannot say, but they undoubtedly enter into some rare dish. Tomatoes are dried whole in a similar way, branches heavily loaded being hung up on the walls of the buildings.

Naples is noted for the manufacture of jewelry and ornamentation in gold, shell, cameo, etc. The crest of the city is a horse. Different names are used for street, thus, Strada, Vicola, Vicoletto, Largo, Porta, Rompe, Strettola, Piazza, Solita, etc. The principal street is called Strada Toledo; it is wide, and a mile or two in length. The buildings on either side are imposing, and possess much architectural merit. The city is better built and more regularly laid out than I expected to find it from what I had heard. Its streets are more regular than those of Rome, running straighter, and usually crossing each other at right angles. I do not mean to say that all the streets are at right angles, but more so than in Rome. Many of the streets are very narrow and the buildings usually very high, reaching six and seven stories; and where some of the streets run up the steep hills they have steps across them like a continuous flight of stairs which no horse and carriage can ascend. These high houses and narrow streets make near neighbors of those who live on opposite sides of the street. On each floor of the houses is a door with a small railing or balcony before it, and from these doors and the windows the women and children are almost constantly hanging out, that is, those who are not in the streets. To look on the streets one would think all the women in the city had turned out for an airing, but when the eyes are cast upward every door and window is found fully occupied with more women and children. It is curious to look up those narrow streets and see what an aggregate of human life they exhibit. They make one think of a hive of bees in the act of swarming. The city has a circuit of six miles, exclusive of its frontage on the bay, which is four and a half miles. The population is over half a million, the largest number of inhabitants of any city in Italy. It will be seen at once that the people live very compactly, and as they have the reputation of being uncleanly it can be easily imagined that Naples is not as cleanly as some of our neat American cities and not nearly as clean as many European cities. As narrow as the streets are, many kinds of works are performed on them, or close beside them. It is very common to see women sitting around the doors engaged at sewing and many other kinds of work. The shoemakers, tailors, carpenters, and blacksmiths have very small shops, and are usually on a level with the street, and have large doors immediately before which the mechanics are seen prosecuting their work. Shoemakers and tailors can be reached by your hand as you pass along the street, and carpenters frequently do the sawing of their lumber in the street, and blacksmith's anvils and vises are often in front of their little shops. These remarks about small shops and being on the street will apply to all Italian towns. The people of these cities live very much out of doors. Naples was formerly the capital of the two Sicilies, but since these have been incorporated into the kingdom of Italy it simply stands at the head of the province, being the seat of an archbishop, and having a university. As is well known, it stands on the Bay of Naples, which for centuries has been considered as one of the most lovely in the world. While it is an old town, it did not attract marked attention till the thirteenth century, when Charles of Anjou fixed the seat of government here and drained the marshes now traversed by the railroad. What he did for the city was of permanent benefit. It has over three hundred churches, many of which are built on the foundations of pagan temples, and several thousand priests. It may be said to have more dirt, dishonesty, and religion (always excepting Rome when religion is taken into consideration) than any other city on the continent. Strada Toledo and other streets are well supplied with stores, among which jewelry and fancy goods hold a very conspicuous place. I noticed here, as well as in other Italian cities, a deficiency of bookstores. It is safe to say there are six jewelry stores to one bookstore, and I have not the slightest doubt that the people wear six times as much jewelry as they read books. They are far more fond of decorating their persons than improving their minds. They do not care to waste their lives in doing much thinking. They are willing in place of it to pay the priests for doing their thinking for them.

Naples stands on the north side of the bay, and as seen from the sea is divided into two crescents, or gently-sloping amphitheaters, with Castel dell' Ovo and Castel St. Elmo behind it. The western half is called the Chiaja, and is about one and a half miles in extent. Here the foreigners mostly live. The eastern and older part is mostly built upon stretches from the central hills to Portici well on toward Mt. Vesuvius. The Strada Toledo rather divides the older from the newer parts of the town. The prominent places near the water are the Mergellina, under the hill of Posilipo; the Promenade, close to the two curves of the sea-side; the Villa Reale, with its Roschetto and public gardens lined with trees and statuary; various fine hotels; the arsenal, Darsena, and military college; the Royal Palace and Castel Nuovo; the harbor with its lighthouse and moles; the health office; Strada Nuova, Marinella, and the royal barracks. The harbor proper is sufficiently large to accomodate all the shipping. Two steamers, a few moderate-sized ships, and several barks and smaller craft are in port. The amount of shipping is not excessively large. It seems to me two squares on East River, New York, have more shipping than the entire harbor of Naples.

MOUNT VESUVIUS.

The first thing to be done after breakfast on Sunday morning was to go and pay my respects to old Vesuve. I was more anxious to see the inside of its old crater than anything else about Naples. So, getting the proper instructions where to buy a ticket, I walked around to the Vesuve Society's office and paid twenty francs, or lire, for the trip out, up, and back. I was again struck with the amount of trade and work being attended to all along the streets on the "Sabbath." One would not have the slightest conception that it was the Lord's day more than any other. The stores were open, as usual, and dealers of all kinds were crying their wares on the street. It is very evident that the priests attach very little importance to keeping Sunday after the Puritanical fashion, for if they did they would change the habits of the peasants and poorer classes. The mode of conveyance to Vesuvius is by carriage. A German and myself rode in a two-horse carriage, while four others rode in another carriage drawn by three horses working abreast. The street, as we passed along the bay, was very much crowded with people, and for some time we were absolutely stopped by a jam of carriages caused by a religious procession in a most grotesque uniform, being a monkish white robe over their other garments, with cloths over the faces of many, so they could not be seen. Many little boys were also in the procession, neatly arrayed for the purpose. I did not learn the particular object of the procession. My companion could speak but a few words in English, and those few were not easy to understand. Our conversation was accordingly quite limited, but we did lots of enjoying in common.

Vesuvius is some six or seven miles from Naples, and three miles from the shore of the bay. Its base is thirty miles in circumference. We started on the trip at ten o'clock. For four or five miles through Portici it is a continuous city, and the people all along were prosecuting their various avocations the same as if it had been Saturday or Monday. My attention was particularly called to the manufacturers of macaroni. They were in full blast, and their goods were hung on poles and placed out by the side of the street to dry. As the dust was flying considerably, it seemed that the damp macaroni must catch a good deal of it. Macaroni is a preparation of wheat flour, the gluten of which is worked into a very stiff dough, or paste, and this is pressed through a plate with holes in it of the size wanted for the sticks or rods when dry. They are usually a quarter of an inch in diameter and four feet long. A large number are cut off at a time, and then hung on poles to dry, when they are packed in cases and shipped in large quantities to all parts of the world. The Italians use it in great quantities, and other people also make considerable use of it. When pressed through a plate with much smaller holes it is called "vermicelli," from vermes—worms. I saw several teams loaded with this product for shipment.

All along the street we were importuned by an almost endless lot of beggars. They put on doleful countenances, and implored us in the most piteous manner, for the love of God, to give them something. If this was not done readily they would run along by the side of the carriage for the distance of a square, or as long as they could keep up. We were so many of them our soldi gave out, and we were compelled to desist. Some were doubtless mere frauds, and some were deformed or crippled or blind, with some one to lead them. I again wondered why nature, or God, or any other power, should make so many crippled and deformed.

At length we reached the foot of old Vesuve and began to climb its somewhat steep acclivities. The road was good, and wound in a serpentine manner. It seemed not a little like crossing the Alps at Simplon, when I came into Italy. Vesuvius is over 4,000 feet in hight, 4,320 as one of the guides stated. It takes not a little climbing to reach that altitude. I kept my eyes pretty steadily on the smoking summit, and as we neared it the way grew more and more rugged, the immense amount of lava that had in times past flowed from the mountain top lying in ridges and uneven surfaces all around us. Fully half way up the mountain we passed through continuous luxuriant vineyards, the vines loaded with generous clusters nearly a foot long. Fig trees also abounded in great numbers. The soil, composed of lava, seems very productive, and very free from weeds. It is easy of cultivation, being fine, soft, and mellow. I saw great numbers of the cactus, the largest I ever saw. I saw some plants ten or fifteen feet high, and some with a crown below the branches a foot in diameter. The century plant was also seen in great numbers, growing here as well as everywhere else in this country. They have to take no more pains in growing them than we do in growing thistles.

The entire mountain is composed of lava. In ages that are passed it flowed for many miles in every direction. Naples is said to be of volcanic formation. As observed, on the lower half or two-thirds of the mountain vegetation is abundant, and luxuriance is seen on every hand, but at length we pass that by and come into a region of aridity and blackness, where nothing at all grows. The black lava lies in huge windrows and big waves, which like the huge roots of large trees, intertwine and overlap each other in a most curious manner. This black, rough lava is the modern contributions of the old mountain, while that below is the old outflow of many centuries ago. After we had apparently passed by the tillable portion of the mountain, we came to other vineyards which seemed like oases in the great desert of aridity and sterility all about us and above us. The whole upper part of the mountain is as devoid of vegetable life as a blacksmith's forge, or the ruins

Appreciative.

We again wish to thank the kind friends who hav so promptly complied with our request to send in the amount of their arrears and to renew for the forthcoming volume. This promptness has been an essential service to us, and has enabled us to liquidate some of our obligations We trust the other friends will go and do likewise, especially those in arrears. Our needs are still urgent. In this connection let us say that we will be very glad if all our readers and friends will remain with us and continue their support of THE TRUTH SEEKER. If, however, there are those who do not wish it nor pay for it, will they be kind enough to notify us and remit for the time they hav not paid for? We trust no good Liberal will ask us to send the paper to him for nothing. We would gladly send it gratis all over the country were we able to do so. This is, unfortunately, not the case. Every minute's work done on the paper costs money, and without money it cannot be furnished. It is to be hoped that the Liberals of America will not become indifferent to the support of their journals.

Ten Weeks in Europe.

In reply to several inquiries we hav received whether our letters from Europe, which hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, are to be published in book form, we hav to say they will be, and as soon as their publication is completed in the paper, which will be in two weeks more. Many express themselvs as highly interested in these letters, which, of course, is gratifying to the writer. Will those who wish a copy of the book be kind enough to notify us at once, so we may know how many to hav printed? It will contain some eight hundred 12mo pages, and will be furnished, neatly bound, at the low price of $1,50, postage paid. The letters are undoubtedly fuller than any which hav been written by any traveler while on a tour of the same length. We will be glad to dispose of a goodly number of the book.

Liberal Lecturers.

Friend W. S Bell writes us that he intends soon to start West on his annual lecturing tour. It will be well for those Leagues, societies, and others who wish to avail themselvs of his professional services while passing through the country to confer with him at once that he may lay off his route accordingly. Mr. Bell is an earnest and able advocate and supporter of Liberalism, and perceives clearly the inevitable conflict that must ever exist between supernaturalism and ecclesiasticism on the one hand, and scientific research and Liberalism on the other. He vigorously opposes the first, and will not be found seeking a union with them. He is a steadfast defender of the second, and is in no sense a trimmer or cringer. Our Liberal lecturers should be kept at work at this season of the year, and we hope the [illegible] will correspond with Mr. Bell upon the subject. His address is No. 38 Upton street, Boston, Mass.

A Favor Requested.

We wish to hav the names and post office address of Liberal people all over the country. Will friends send us a list of such names? To those who will send us such lists we will mail a good book or pamphlet in proportion to the number of names sent. The names of those not taking THE TRUTH SEEKER desired.

WE were in error in copying from The Infidel of Allegany, N. Y., that The Liberal of Lamar, Mo., had discontinued. We are glad to see it has again come to hand, and hope it will be long before it has to silence its guns.

LET it be remembered that we will furnish extra copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for specimens to those who will make an effort to obtain new subscribers, and that we offer very liberal premiums, amounting to one dollar's worth of our publications, for each new subscriber.

THE STORY OF A DOG THAT HATED LIES AND LIARS.—In the very early age of the world there was a dog, very wise and brave, who hated a lie most of all the sins under the sun. Now this dog one day came to a church where a preacher was being listened to as though he were an angel from heaven. The dog knew better, and sprang on him and tore off his robes, showing a cloven hoof and a tail beneath them. "Foolish people," cried the dog, "your priest is the devil of falsehood," and he drove the devil out of the sanctuary.

He went to a second church and found the priest the devil of greed, and drove him out the same. He went to a third, and there exposed the devil of lust; and to a fourth, and there unmasked the devil of self love; and to a fifth, and there sprang upon the devil of empty words, and the people all stood aloof and wondering cried, "Eh, then, are our priests all devils?"

But the devils themselvs were sorely frightened, and said, "If the dog tear off all lies, then the trade of devils and priests will be gone! So they banded themselves together and persuaded the foolish people that the dog was a wizard, and must be killed for the weal of the world. And, in the end, the wicked people stoned the dog to death. He died because he had dare to witness to the truth and had not let those fools alone to their worship of falsehoods. From that day devils, still having great influence, and above all being strong in pulpits, whence they throw dust in the eyes of the multitude, hav always hated dogs and hav kept them out of their churches. This is the true tradition. —Guido.

"Sixteen Saviors or None."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Kersey Graves might with propriety hav headed this work with the language of Thomas Paine to Howe, that "To argue with a man that has renounced the use and authority of reason, and whose philosophy consists in holding humanity in contempt, is like administering medicin to the dead."

When the war-hoop wild resounded calling Infidels to meet the foe, Graves responded, armed with weapons fierce, you know. This work, "Sixteen Saviors or None," completely demolishes the entire superstructure of the Christian scheme of redemption. Adamantine mountains of evidence are here presented to thoroughly and irrefutably demonstrate the title of the work. The evidence presented is overwhelmingly against John T. Perry. It conclusivly demonstrates that Perry's arguments are mere nothings, and therefore utterly worthless. We know Mr. Graves has spent much time in searching into the mystic fables of ancient religions, consequently his works are a feast of startling presentations. Graves has crushed the very last molecule of Perry's evidence by unimpeachable authors, and in all his works he has shaken Christianity from center to circumference. It may be termed a production, its author a Christ researcher, perhaps of unequaled parallel. Mr. Graves has incontestably proven his claim clear. The historical, circumstantial, and methodical evidence brought forth annihilates John T. Perry forever. Graves has put a quietus upon the matter, never to be removed. Graves is an extraordinary critic. He has brought forward the most profound authors to establish his claim, and I think that Perry will find it an irresistible production. Portions of the work are sarcastic arguments, presented with much force and candor. Commentators hav in all ages tried to prop up an impracticable religion by ignorance and fear. Those damnable and bloodthirsty hyenas known as priests hav covered the earth with blood, the faces of the living with tears, and their minds with sorrow. Christianity is now seen as it is, a curse to the living, a mockery upon the dead, and it must soon step down and out. It is known as being born in an ignorant age, and must be laid away, never to be resurrected, as the child of the world. When I see a priest coming forward and straining the last nerve of his mental power to prop up the worst curse of curses that ever dawned upon the world, trying to prolong the rotten fabric of Christianity which is, and always has been, the bondage of the man, I say deliberately that that man would, if he could, be a John Calvin of the blackest dye, and would burn every reformer as quick as Calvin burned Servetus. That man is feeling for the blood to drain the life of those that mark the highest upon the intellectual thermometer of the world. And when such a man as Kersey Graves comes forward and wipes out their entire claims, I say without hesitation that his works should be published by all lovers of liberty.

Sexual Intemperance.

DEAR MRS. SLENKER: In your article on "Sexual Intemperance" (No. 6) you seem to assume or admit that continence may be, or seemed to be, "cold, barren, and austere." I hope you really do not think it is or will be. I think that when all people accept continence from principle the world will become much more beautiful, warmer, more prolific. Passion has reigned and ruined like a fire in a forest. Love will kindle a genial fire upon many a cold hearthstone. E. S."

Perhaps friend S. is right in thinking I should hav somewhat qualified the "cold, barren, and austere." But when I penned the words as the outcome of pure continence I only intended them to apply to things as they look now to the majority of our readers. The young, loving, vigorous, and passionate who are full of life and desire look upon marriage continence as a deprivation of rights. They think to liv an alphaite life would be like sitting down to a table spread with all the delicacies of the season, and partaking only of a little cold water, boiled rice, cracked wheat, or graham mush. These things may taste pure, clear, and beautiful to those who are accustomed to no stronger or more highly-flavored diet, but they are dry, insipid, and barren in comparison with hot coffee, juicy steak, rich shortcake, flakey pies, quivering jellies, roast turkey, sweet, rich poundcake, and fragrant wines. But when true knowledge teaches the higher blessings of health, purity, and abstinence, we hope and trust that little by little people will learn to refrain from all indulgence that is harmful even though it may yield them a keen but brief and temporary pleasure. We would not drink strychnine or arsenic no matter how palatable they were, nor would we cut off a limb even if it gave us an exquisit pleasure while the knife was going through the flesh, yet many of our domestic habits of eating and drinking, as well as other indulgences, are really slowly and surely snapping the foundations of health and life.

It is very true, also, that a pure, true love, when it takes the place of the present lustful passion that rides rampant all over the world, will "kindle genial fire upon many a cold hearthstone." Friendship and affection, sympathy and congeniality, will draw the sexes together in a bond of simple, heartfelt communion, that, resembling the free intercourse of children tempered with wisdom, experience, and refined culture, which is gathered only by years of gleaning, will be more lovely, satisfying, and happifying than the ups and downs of the passion that now passes for real love, and is mingled with the warmth and ecstacy of actual, bona fide love.

Says a correspondent: "Gratification, where there is a natural desire, can hav no detrimental tendency. If nature creates a desire and fails to meet the vital demand of that desire, she is untrue to herself." I consider these sentiments unfounded in fact. We hav many natural desires that it is wrong and unwise to gratify. The natural impulse of revenge inclines very many of us to retaliation even unto the death of our enemies. Like the mythical Jesus, we would hav them brought to us and slain at our feet if wishing would do it. The impulse of a child is always to strike back when it receives a blow. The natural impulse is to eat as long as food tastes good, but true temperance teaches us to stop as soon as we feel we hav eaten enough to satisfy hunger.

People are born with all manner of abnormal appetites, and these are perfectly "natural" under the circumstances; but it is not best or proper to yield to those natural feelings. Reason and education are called in to govern and guide natural impulses. After ages and ages of lustful indulgence the feelings are no proper criterion as to the times and number of the sexual acts. We must strive to study out the original use and design of our organs as far as possible, and bend our conduct so as to do what is best for the whole man or woman as well as the whole race.

It is a fact, I grant, that "nature is never untrue to herself." If a drunken parent generates a child while he is rendered idiotic by liquor, nature, true to herself, may produce from the act an idiotic being as a consequence of the wrong against her just requirement of a sound mind in a healthy body. If a lunatic becomes a parent, nature, "true to herself," often reproduces the lunacy in the offspring, and so of a great majority of mental and bodily ailments. If a tree is bent, twisted, and mutilated in its first years of growth, nature, "true to herself," endeavors to make as perfect a tree out of it as she can under the adverse circumstances she has to contend with, but the giant of the forest will always bear marks of its crippled infancy. Now, the desire for sexual intercourse, while a natural and perfectly legitimate one, may be controlled, governed, and even mastered with no injury at all to a healthy and properly organized man or woman. The procreativ fluid which is capable of giving life is also just as capable of giving strength to other portions of mind and body if reabsorbed into the system instead of being expelled. Galen has told us that "the best fluids of the body, and even the brain itself, are enriched by the retained semen, which in its composition is so nearly allied to that of the nervous system. Everything is full of it with those who abstain from sexual indulgence, but there is often little or none of it to be found in those who abandon themselvs to sensuality." "To abstain enables people to resist cold and heat, fatigue, hunger, and thirst, sudden changes and sickness, better than others do."

Says Dr. Hufeland, "I actually knew a man who believed there was no poison more detrimental to the human body than the procreativ fluid, and he got rid of it as often and as speedily as possible, and by this means he became an old man at twenty, and in his twenty-fifth year he died of old age."

But people who hav lived continent and temperate lives, who hav been full of work, full of high aims and noble impulses, who hav lived above all lascivious, obscene, and mere passional dalliance, hav found no inconvenience from any surplus, or overplus of the procreativ fluid. Nature, "true to herself," only works to supply the demands made upon her. Reason and judgment are ours, and we must make nature's demands subservient to the highest and best good of individuals and of the race.

"To be respected by the great, or honored by the wise,
They say my thoughts I must suppress, though bleeding manhood dies.
My soul was made for freedom, its impress on it rests.
And no smiles or frowns shall ever quench its fires within my breast."

Liberals of America, Greeting:

When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for any one class of honest folks to make common cause in the way of self-defense against an implacable enemy, their first step toward showing a solid front is to let friends and enemies both see that they are in earnest, and are determined to stand by their colors. Hitherto the Liberals of this country, although their numbers count thousands upon thousands, hav contented themselvs with carrying on a feeble sort of guerilla warfare, while their enemy, the church, forms a thoroughly disciplined phalanx, under able, wily, and unscrupulous leaders. The greatest weakness of the Liberals has been and still is that they are not aware of their own great strength, not only in a moral sense, so to say, but numerically. The forming of Leagues has been the first organized effort or step toward remedying this evil, and it is to be hoped that these Leagues may prosper and multiply.

A simple and easy method has recently been introduced by which Liberal-minded people all over the world may recognize and know each other and meet at home or abroad on the one broad and common platform which Liberals of all shades of opinion are in harmony with, "Universal Mental Liberty." To symbolize this grand idea, the basis of all liberty, it has been put into the pleasing shape of a beautiful little badge pin. (See advertisement in this paper.) A great number of these badges are already being worn by many of our Liberals, men and women, and all those who hav been wearing them report the intense satisfaction which this little token has given them, in serving as a sort of Freemason introduction to numbers of Liberal and agreeable people who otherwise would hav remained entire strangers.

It is very desirable that this badge pin should come into universal use among the Liberals of the whole country. Beside being a tasteful personal ornament (which nobody will object to), it will be of immense assistance in marshaling our forces, in bringing Liberals together whenever they may happen to meet, and in forming acquaintances and friendship among people who, without this little badge, would probably pass and ignore each other forever. And this little personal ornament, this golden symbolical sign, small as it is, can assist in piercing the solid phalanx of the arch enemy, the church, by pointing thousands of inquirers into the path which leads straight to intellectual freedom, the path of investigation. Let every friend and advocate of liberty order a badge without delay, and then let his or her light shine before all the world by wearing the badge of "universal mental liberty."

The Bible Obscenity and Ignorance.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just finished reading "Cupid's Yokes," which you sent me, and I cannot find any lascivious obscenity in it whatever. Consequently, I must say to Judge Benedict, Judge Clark, and in fact all other judges that see fit to take exception to "Cupid's Yokes," or any other reformatory book or pamphlet, that they had better suspend their bigoted and superstitious judgment till they read thoroughly and understandingly the lascivious, obscene, Jew-begotten Bible. I will here cite these tyrannical and bigoted judges, and Comstock in particular, to a few of the choice morsels of that so-called divine book.

The first I will giv them is a Holy Ghost in the form of a pigeon impregnating a human virgin, producing a man god, or a god-man, the same as God, and sitting at God's own right hand, co-eternal with him and the pigeon; and yet there is not one God and one pigeon, nor three Gods, nor three men, nor three pigeons; but one God, inseparable yet separated; indivisible yet divided; infinit yet sitting on a cloud; eternal yet begotten, suckled, and crucified; spiritual yet sweating blood; incomprehensible, yet backed and defended by bigoted judges, godly priests, and Anthony Comstock.

And if this is not satisfactory I will cite them to a few such passages as those referring to Lot and his daughters (Gen. xix, 32), Abram and Hagar (Gen. xvi, 12), Isaac and his sister (Gen. xvi, 7), Shechem, Dinah, Jacob, and Hamor (Gen. xxxiv, 1–29), Reuben and his father's concubine (Gen. xxxv, 22), Judah and Tamar (Gen. xxxviii, 13–30), "And the Lord said to Moses" (Lev. xviii, 6–30), the woman and the priest (Num. v, 14–31), the Lord, the Ammonite, and the Moabite (Deut. xxiii, 1–13), Tamar and her brother Amnon (2 Sam. xiii, 8–17), Solomon and his amours (Solomon vii, 1–10), what Rabshakeh said (Isaiah xxxvi, 12), Ezekiel and his cakes (Ezekiel iv, 12–15), the two sisters (Ezek. xiii, 1–9); also to Hosea xii, 16. I will say to Comstock, Judge Benedict, Judge Clark, and all others that are hunting out simon-pure obscenity, read the foregoing passages I hav pointed out in the Jew-begotten Bible, and if you do not pronounce them lascivious and obscene, you had better shut your mouths and stop your action against Dr. Trall's "Sexual Physiology," "Cupid's Yokes," Dr. Foote, and others, and against the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for selling them.

"Repent, then, all ye rogues; ye'll be forgiven,
And giv the saints a holiday in heaven."

I will say further to Mr. Comstock that while he has a chance he had better go forthwith to all the Bible-publishing houses and clean them of their obscene Bibles and send them to Washington as trophies of his hunts. He might also giv strict orders that no more obscenity be sent to the heathen, for they do not want to be degraded with it any longer. What is the use of forming foreign aid societies, when in New York there are over sixty thousand Christians living in beggary and want, besides the thousands in Boston and Philadelphia who are suffering beyond all description in the midst of Bibles, churches, and religion. See the thousands of priests, at the cost of millions annually, teaching lies and superstition every week in the churches in this "land of liberty." And see the thousands of ignorant sycophants crawling to these gospel-shops to listen to a lot of lying, hypocritical, lascivious, sensual scoundrels called priests spouting out of a mythical, lascivious, obscene book called the Word of God, while they listen for hours with their eyes shut; and if any one should happen to breathe upon them, or if any one should question their religious folly, or object to it, or attempt to enlighten them on the subject, they become corrupt masses of brutalism.

Oh, what a specimen of civilization and progress! Talk about the heathen! Why, they are moralists compared to Christians. Look at our jails that are filled with the most ignorant and degraded lot of Christians, alias lunatics. They hav over fifteen hundred of them in the Georgia penitentiary. Think of it! Priests are a lot of the most godly impostors that ever existed, for they cannot touch anything but they pollute and defile it.

There is one law for the Christian and another for the so-called Infidel. The rancor of the God-spirit that has been manifested in this country since the passage of the Comstock laws is an insult and a disgrace to any nation or people, either savage or civilized. The object of the Bible-taught, Christ-taught, God-taught Christian fanatic Comstock, and others of the same kidney, appears to be to bury their fangs in such men as you, Mr. Editor, and others of the most genuin and sterling worth. And also it appears plain to me that their sole effort is to break down THE TRUTH SEEKER, free press, free speech, and the little liberty we hav in this country. But then, what better state of things can be expected when the manners and habits of a Christian people are entirely rotten, for they are ready to take advantage of each other in every trade and calling wherever they can. They talk honesty and practice rascality. Men are the willing tools of priests and political bull-dozing humbugs, which show that they are corrupt in their morals and extremely selfish. It is said by some that it is the false systems and laws that corrupt the people, but it is a grand mistake, for if the people had not been corrupt there would hav been no corrupt systems or laws. If the poor people of to-day were raised to power, to make laws, with their present ignorance, they would be just as big rascals and cheats as the men we hav in power to-day.

Let the working people become rich, with their present sensual habits, and they would be about as miserable as they are at present. The fact is the people are just as mean and selfish as they can be. Yes,

"Sowing the seed of a maddened brain,
Sowing the seed of a tarnished name,
Sowing the seed of eternal shame."

And what is the harvest? Superstition and ignorance. But I must close—as I am intruding on your space and time—with the remark that the Comstock postal laws are an insult to free speech, free press, and a free people.

How to Promote the Leagues.

The National Liberal League must be upheld. It is vital to the life of mental liberty in this republic. It is the only organization peculiarly set for the freedom of the mind. This country of ours is thatched all over with organizations for limiting, dwarfing, trammeling the human mind, with the sole, only, and lonely institution of the Liberal League established to permit and promote absolute liberty of thought, opinion, view, doctrin, belief, tenet, dogma, or even whim or conceit that any man may choose to entertain, or publish, or carry out into action provided he injures no one else. Every Liberal in this country, all men and women whose hearts beat in sympathy with the spirit of liberty, should feel it in their bones, as well as in the more tender tissues of the heart, that such an institution with such objects must be sustained.

The season for reading, for assembling together, for social and co-operativ enterprise, is here; and this is the season to promote such an organization as the League. Every year the literature of Freethought penetrates farther, wider, and into new places. Every year Liberal speakers find new audiences and increase old ones; and now, this winter, there must be many new places where Freethought has gained sufficient foothold with numbers enough to form an auxiliary Liberal League. We hope, in every case where it can be done, that Liberals will see to it that it is done.

We hav now the magnificent start of two hundred firm, unshaken Leagues. With these all in unison and in activ affiliation we can easily go on to conquer more Liberal worlds. Let us set to ourselvs the task of doubling this number the coming year so as to go to the next annual congress with a possible delegation from four hundred auxiliary Leagues.

The political discussions in the Liberal papers the past year hav developed a general repugnance to casting the Liberal vote for either of the two great political parties; on the contrary a widespread desire appeared to organize a new political Liberal party. Well, the larger we can make the League, the broader and deeper will be the groundwork, and the more practical and easy the formation of such a party will be. No Liberal will object to this, provided all will turn in and swell the new party to formidable dimensions. To that end then let us organize Leagues—organize, organize, organize League after League, and never cease the work till Leagues are as plentiful and powerful and activ as the churches and Christian Young Men's Association.

LIFE AND ANNUAL MEMBERSHIPS.

There is one feature of the League, specially provided for in its constitution, which has never been made as much of as might be done. That is, life and annual memberships. Large numbers of the Liberals of this country liv as yet in neighborhoods where there are not enough others to form a League. These isolated ones might all join the National League directly and become either life or annual members. Every subscriber to a Liberal journal, wherever he may be, might become an annual member, and many members of the families of such Liberals might also become annual members of the League. If there was not an auxiliary League in existence the National League might still exist and be made up of thousands of individual annual members, each paying one dollar every year into the League treasury, making a fund for the defense of persecuted editors, the support of lecturers, publishing documents, holding conventions, and prosecuting League work generally. Each member of a local League may also be an annual or life member of the National League. There is no objection to that; on the contrary, it is a new dollar contributed and a new tie created which helps to strengthen the relations with the national body. Each annual or life member belongs directly to the National League, is enrolled on its books, and is a more intimate and immediate constituent than is a member of an auxiliary League.

The constitution of the National League provides that a life member paying twenty-five dollars for his membership may hav a vote in the annual congress; and an annual member paying one dollar every year may hav a seat in the congress, but no vote. On this point I wish to make a practical suggestion, which will giv every annual member who chooses to attend a congress the right to speak and vote, and to all the privileges of the congress.

As the local Leagues extend and cover the whole of this vast country, it is already found in practice that many of them are unable to afford the expense of sending delegates. Many of the auxiliaries remain wholly unrepresented, though each League is entitled to a representation of five delegates and five votes in every congress. In practice we do not get a personal representation of even one delegate from each League in any congress. The usage has prevailed to some extent of distant Leagues sending proxies to such known individual Liberals as lived near or were able to attend a congress even whether members of local Leagues or not. Others hav sent proxies to the National League, with instructions to vote in certain ways on impending questions. The grotesque incident happened to Prof. Rawson, in the last congress, of his holding proxies from different Leagues, and he voted in opposite ways on the same question, according as he was instructed by the auxiliary whose proxy he held.

Now I would suggest that individual Liberals in large numbers, two or three thousand of them from all parts of the republic, become annual members of the National Liberal League, sending their one dollar every year and receiving a signed and sealed annual certificate. Then every year, say two months before each congress, let every annual member who can attend send his name and address to the bulletin of the League and to the Liberal journals. Then instead of distant Leagues cumulating many proxies in few hands, or sending them to persons who are neither members of a local nor the National League, let them select from the printed list of annual members who promis to attend the Congress such names as appear nearest to their own locality, or such as they happen to know, or whose opinions they know on questions in which they are interested, and vest them with their proxies, each annual member to receive a proxy from only one delegate and to cast only one vote, but let each League, if it chooses, send proxies for all its five votes to five different annual members. Also let each League, if it chooses, come partly represented by its own resident delegate members and partly by proxy vested in annual members.

Whenever there may be special questions pending and likely to come up in the Congress, annual members might solicit proxies from Leagues taking the side to which they themselvs incline, and the Leagues by correspondence and otherwise, could select the annual members whose convictions accorded with their own, so that every vote might be an honest, hearty vote and not a mere perfunctory one such as Rawson and others hav had to cast. This plan, too, would secure every prominent Liberal, every public speaker, every organizer and man of practical affairs a place on the floor with a vote and all privileges. A few proxies might be placed in the hands of the directors to be distributed at their discretion to such illustrious strangers or other worthy persons as might unexpectedly be present at the Congress.

In practice not nearly all the annual members would attend any congress any more than all the delegates permitted from auxiliaries now do. Also in practice, very likely, not enough annual members would attend to take up all the proxies the Leagues would hav to offer; but many would attend, and this plan would secure a fuller and fairer representation of the Leagues than is now done, and would convene a larger and more imposing congress.

But aside from any advantages accruing to the annual or life member personally, the consciousness that he is a member of a powerful, influential, and useful organization, and the sense of the good he is doing by belonging to it, should be compensation enough for the giving of his dollar and influence to the great League. One man can do so little, but a thousand men, five thousand, ten thousand, can do so much and exert an influence that the world will heed.

The National Liberal League, then, solicits the adhesion of individual Liberals, men and women and children all over the country, through this medium of life and annual memberships. The life memberships of course will be few, but there ought to be some, and the annual membership many. Whenever the great League is assailed from any quarter there is no Liberal anywhere so poor or humble but in this way he can back it up. If factious individuals attempt to disorganize it, to sow disaffection, to "sever the connection" of some its auxiliaries, it will be in the power of its own immediate members to make good all losses and vindicate its mission of mental freedom, equal rights, and good will to men. With both features of its organization, individual membership and local auxiliaries in full play, it will be invincible.

Now let us hav a revival and an overflow of applications for charters of local Leagues and applications for life and annual memberships—$25 for life; $1 for annual.

"NO MIRACLE was ever performed before a people who did not believe in miracles."—Renan. In connection with this saying of the brilliant Frenchman let the reader turn to Matt. xiii, 53–58, and especially let him "mark, learn, and inwardly digest" the last verse: "And he did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief." Surely, if miracles had been of any real value, this would hav been the time and the place to add miracle to miracle—to pile Pelim upon Ossa and to fix both on the top of Olympus—till the most skeptical and "slow of belief" should cry out Hold! Enough! But Jesus, as reputed by his biographers, took a different view of the matter. He reflected that he was among his own kindred and his own people and that they had known him too intimately to admit of any juggling. It is not before the savants of Paris that the Blessed Virgin makes her appearance, in these latter days. She prefers presenting herself to a lonely shepherd girl, as silly as her sheep and as unfit to judge of evidence. A miracle reported is believed readily enough even by those who would hav scorned to look at it if done before their eyes. One is tempted to believe that credulity increases directly as the square of the distance, and we have the word of Jesus for it that "blessed are those who hav not seen and yet hav believed." A precious maxim truly.—Hylax.

"JOHN'S WAY" is good. The plot is splendid, and the book carries conviction where many a more pretending work would fail. It is a good little book, a dear little [illegible] a little [illegible] of a brick building that has been burnt to the ground.

We had a lovely view of the great extent of beautiful country, including mountains, valleys, plains, and ocean, spread out like a panorama below us. There are but few places in the world where more beautiful views can be seen. The Apennines are very plainly seen on the opposite side of the horizon, and from them an outlying branch winds round to Salerno, and then blends in the distance with the Calabrian range behind. In the distance are many conical mountain tops, which look as though they might once have been volcanoes themselves, and in the wide intervale between the mountains, called the Campagna of Naples, are highly cultivated fields, laid off finely in vegetable gardens, vineyards, etc., which can be taken in at one glance, showing a wide vista of rich vegetation. As, however, we neared the mountain top we became enveloped in a thick fog, a letting down of the clouds themselves, which cut off the beautiful panorama we had viewed with so much pleasure. For some time this dense fog had hung over the summit of the smoking mountain, and we were well aware it portended no addition to our enjoyment. We would much prefer to see the crater entirely divested of fog and mist and clouds.

At length we reached the end of our journey so far as the horses and carriages were concerned. We came to the Vesuvius railroad, which was completed some four months ago. I was somewhat disappointed to find that the road was no longer. When I heard about ascending Vesuvius by rail I inferred it was rail all the way, but I was mistaken. The road is but about two thousand feet in length, or nearly a third of a mile, and it rises at a grade of forty-five degrees, or equidistant betweeen the perpendicular and the horizontal. The ascent is made by means of a stationary engine, which is at the lower end of the road, and the cars are taken up by the means of what may be called an endless band, or wire cable, an inch in diameter, which runs on pulleys at each extremity. Two cars are in use, one ascending while the other descends, and thus it will be seen they must both be taken into the endless band. The cars run upon a single rail, and the rail is securely fastened to a continuous beam of timber twelve inches in width and sixteen inches in depth. To keep the cars from tipping, a brace-wheel runs horizontally, bearing against the heavy timber at its lower edge, near where it comes in contact with the mountain. This arrangement keeps the cars quite firm, though they run on a single rail. The cars are not large; they contain four seats each, with two persons on a seat; thus eight persons constitute a load. The car is divided into two divisions, the upper several feet higher than the lower end, and each division has a level floor. The cars are named Etna and Vesuve. We made the ascent in the former and the descent in the latter. It requires ten minutes to make the ascent or descent, and seems a little like "pokerish" riding. All along up the mountain side are stationary pulleys or rollers about twenty-five feet apart for the wire cable to rest upon while the trip is being made. There seems to be no way possible by which life need be endangered on the road. Even if the engine should give out when the cars are in transit they have brakes to apply to hold both cars still; and even if in motion, one car balances the other so that neither could run down rapidly.

When we arrived at the end of the road a heavy task was still before us. It does not go within about a thousand feet of the top of the crater, and this very steep ascent has to be made on foot. The guides proposed to carry me in a sedan chair, on two poles, one end of each on a man's shoulder, and all for the sum of five francs, but I declined, thinking I would be as safe depending upon my own feet as theirs, and preferring to reach the summit by my own exertion rather than by that of others. I asked why the railroad had not been continued to the top, and as nearly as I could learn from their very bad English, it was because the cone of the volcano trembles and shakes at times so severely.

The climbing that last five hundred or one thousand feet gave me the most vigorous exercise of anything I have done for a long time. The grade is fully forty-five degrees, and the cone is mere loose ashes, and at every step one slips back half as far as he goes forward. It was about the most laborious traveling I ever attempted, and made me puff like a broken-winded old horse. Once on the way, I was glad to sit down on a pile of lava, and get my breath a little; nevertheless I enjoyed it greatly, though all around me were ashes, cinders, and scoriæ, the very quintescence of aridity and desolation. At length the edge of the crater was reached, and more than ever I realized that Vesuve is a great old smoker, and that like all other smokers, he has a bad breath. The fumes of sulphur and vapor poured out in abundance, though partly on the opposite side of the crater from the first point we touched. The crater is over half a mile in circumference, and is of irregular height, the south side being fifty or one hundred feet lower than the opposite. On the north side there seems to be a solid crusting over fifty feet or more below the rim of the crater, but as we passed around toward the opposite side we came nearer the smoker and could easily hear the bubbling and splashing of the fiery liquid mass inside the abyss. It sounded as though a heavy rock had dropped into the fluid mass which caused the waves to dash up against the rocky sides of that literal Tartarus. Ever and anon I could hear the ceaseless bubbling over in the chasm, and the sulphurous vapor poured out upon me to such an extent that I was constrained to say, "Vesuve, you are not very mannerly toward your visitors. You have a horrid bad breath, and you would show more courteousness to retain it or puff it the other way." He kept on, however, in his own coarse way, paying no attention to my rebuke. When I could scarcely breathe I could not help thinking of the Elder Pliny when he was smothered by the same gas in Stabiæ, now Castellemare, in the year 79, at the time Pompeii and Herculaneum were destroyed.

The grandest thing in connection with what I saw while on Mount Vesuvius was the sight of a stream of melted lava running down the side of the cone. Yes, I saw the red-hot stream of fused metal and rock, fresh from the bowels of the earth, as it made its way down the fiery mountain. I was within a hundred feet of it, and I saw it distinctly. The guide went down to the lurid stream and succeeded in getting some of the lava. He brought to me a lump nearly as large as my fist, and still so hot I could not hold it. I regarded it as the latest importation from the infernal regions. While looking, listening, and admiring that which is so grand, so stupendous, and so unequaled, old Pluvious came along. It rained pretty lively for a while, long enough, at all events, to wet me through. This was all the fault of that overcoat of mine; it was in Naples. It has the very disagreeable habit of being absent when I want it and present when I don't want it. But I will "get even" with it. One of these times I will take it out and give it a good wetting; then I will be revenged. It looked so pleasant in the morning and was so warm that I thought I would not need it, and that I would avoid being annoyed with it by leaving it behind. But I did not mind the rain, and all for the sake of old Vesuve, who is far grander than all the cathedrals in the world. He is enough to atone for several wettings. The rain only fell on the summit of the mountain, for when we descended into the valley below we found it had not rained there at all. It was an instance of being up in the clouds and getting moistened when it was fair weather below. The crater is said to be two thousand feet in depth, and how much farther down the fiery mass extends no man knows; assuredly it would be a decidedly uncomfortable place for a person to be dropped into. I concluded while there that if hell is such a place as the inside of that volcano, I do not wish to take up board and lodging there for more than a million or two of years. I think, rather, that hell is only fit for those who invented it, whether it was Jahveh or his many very officious and most vindictive priests.

Making the descent from a high mountain, you all know, is a much shorter task than making the ascent. When we reached the foot of the railroad we found our coachman waiting for us, and we were very soon whirling back to the city. The horses in going toward home did not need the same prompting they did in coming out; the driver did not have to so often use the word which means for the horses to go faster. Instead of saying "get up," or "go along," they simply say "ah-h-h-h," in just such a tone and with such an emphasis as one would if he had run a sliver under his finger-nail, or hit a very tender and painful boil. That "ah-h-h-h" is to be heard from all Neapolitan drivers, and it answers the horses' and donkeys' purpose just as well as the Frenchman's "Ge" or the American's "Get up." We were back in the city in good time for our evening meal (which everybody insists upon calling "dinner") feeling that a good day's work had been performed. I had for many years desired to see Mount Vesuvius, and my desire had been realized.

CASTELLAMARE AND SORRENTO.

The next morning I resolved to make a trip down the Bay to Castellamare and Sorrento. I took the cars to the first named place, passing through several good-sized villages along the shores of the bay. Fine views are obtained all along. Castellamare contains over 25,000 inhabitants, and is situated close to high hills of precipitous rocks which form the lower end of the St. Angelo range of mountains. The scenery all around is exceedingly grand. Both Vesuvius and the Bay are seen to great advantage, while the mountains of abrupt rocks coming close to the Bay make a very striking contrast. Upon the mountain sides are a few conspicuous castles or mansions that make a most imposing appearance, and the locality must afford the occupants a splendid view of the sea, the volcano, and much of the contiguous country. There is a winding path up the mountain which is climbed with some difficulty. I did not care to try it. The highest castle or edifice is said to stand on the ground where once stood a temple of Diana. Castellamare stands on the site of ancient Stabiæ, which was ruined by Sylla, and destroyed in 79 with Pompeii and Herculaneum. The sea retired from the locality during the eruption, leaving a place for the modern town. It was here that the elder Pliny, from a too ardent spirit of investigation, lost his life, and his nephew, the younger Pliny, barely escaped with his. The sulphurous acid gas from Mount Vesuvius was too powerful. Several relics found there are now in the Naples Museum.

In December, 1857, a terrible earthquake occurred here. Miss Catlow, who was a resident of the place at the time, thus describes it: "We retired early, but after a short time were disturbed with a slight crackling noise, which, as we attributed it at first to the wood fire in the adjoining room, did not occasion any alarm. As it increased, however, our attention was aroused, and as we listened the same noise began in our room, accompanied by an indescribable grating and rustling as though the walls had been suddenly endowed with life. We started up with a vague feeling that something terrible was about to happen, and then the whole house began to move, and we knew it was an earthquake. Almost before the motion ceased (it lasted but a few seconds) the large square in front of the hotel was filled with people, screeching and calling out, 'Il torremoto, il torremoto!' While getting a light the awful and mysterious sounds returned far more vigorously. All the walls and beams seemed to be rubbing against each other and cracking as though they would split from top to bottom. Two minutes after, the oscillation began again, and with much greater violence. We stood in the middle of the room, holding by the chairs and each other, the floor appearing to heave under our feet and the walls swaying backward and forward. This was a terrible moment, and not the least fearful part was the shrieking of the poor people, the loud screams of the children, and the ringing of the church bells caused by the vibration. We felt as if one more shock must bring this large, square, solid house down."

In some instances walls five feet thick were rent asunder. Next day Vesuvius looked very grand and ominous, with its enormous column of smoke rising in the air, then taking the shape of a pine tree, which, when the evening sun touched it with gold and crimson, was the grandest scene ever witnessed. In the evening there was again another shock of sufficient force to disturb the water in the washbowl, and to set the chandeliers to swinging. And even for a month the earth had quite a tremor many times daily, with a motion like that of the lid of a boiling kettle. On the last day of the month an additional shock was felt.

I was not informed how to go from Castellamare to Sorrento, which is ten or fifteen miles further down the Mediterranean. I knew the railroad ends at Castellamare, but I did not know whether another started there, or whether I would have to hire a carriage. A plenty of hackmen were at the terminal station, extremely anxious to carry me any where I wished to go; but I did not wish to hold a tete a tete with them. I wanted to look at the town, so I walked down the street toward the large mountain of rocks, thinking I would make inquiries after a while. I found myself rather in company with two or three priests and the same number of laymen, who seemed to be going somewhere together, and it occurred to me that they might be going to Sorrento, and that I would follow them—follow priests for once, and see what would come of it; but it turned out about as might be expected—they led me astray. I followed to about the end of the town, when they entered a large building. Thinking it might be the station, I still followed. They ascended several flights of stairs, which I also ascended. I began to conclude we were going up into an observatory, and that suited me. I soon found myself on the upper floor, and discovered that the premises were occupied as schools. I saw in several rooms desks for the teachers and seats for scholars. I naturally concluded I had got into the wrong pew, and was about retracing my steps when a gentleman approached me, and in Italian said something tantamount to "Well, sir, what do you went here?" Smiling, I replied that I hardly wanted anything. I had followed some gentlemen up there under a misapprehension. I soon perceived that he comprehended me far less than I did him. I asked if he spoke English. He shook his head. Several gathered around me, but none of them could speak English, and I was unable to explain my embarrassment; but they evidently did not think I intended to carry off their schoolhouse.

I inferred from what they said that there was one among them who could speak English, and they called for him. Soon a tall, good-looking gentleman came up, and I asked him if he spoke English. He replied, "Very leetel." I soon found that it was not only "very leetel," but also very poor; but, as I have several times discovered, wretched English is better for my use than the best Italian. I told him I was an American, that I wished to go to Sorrento, and was not informed how to get there. He smilingly gave me to understand that the best way was to go by water, to hire a boatman to row me there. He then called a servant, and directed him to take me where the boats were to be had. We descended the stairs together, and were soon by the water's edge, and a few soldi paid all damages. The boatman to whom I was introduced called himself Captain Santaline. I was gratified to find he could speak English a little. I asked how much he would charge to take me to Sorrento. He said six francs. I suggested that perhaps I had better go by carriage, when he said five francs would do. We agreed on the five, and were soon on our way, he doing the rowing and I sitting at the stern, looking on and taking in the many beauties around us. When I learned that the distance was fifteen miles, I concluded the first price was not too much. It took Captain Santaline three hours to row the distance, and he handled his oars skilfully.

I think it one of the most picturesque fifteen miles I ever traveled. The beauty and grandeur began at Castellamare and continued all the way—the lovely Medeterranean, as smooth as glass on the one side, and the lofty and ever-changing scenery of rocks on the other, interspersed with grottoes, caverns, towns on the hills, fine hotels on the high bluffs, etc., etc. Castellamare has a good harbor, and considerable shipping lay there; among the rest an English bark, on which, Captain Santaline informed me, was much sickness, nearly all the crew having the fever. The captain also informed me that he had been as a sailor to London, Liverpool, Glasgow, Dublin, and New York. When I said New York was my home he seemed much pleased and said, "Fine city, plenty people, plenty workee, plenty money, plenty commarce." I assured him he was quite correct. The captain was very sociable, and though his English was quite defective, I understood him better than he understood me. When I inquired of him the distance to a certain village, the number of its inhabitants, the hight of the mountains, and questions of that sort, he invariably answered "Yes, yes." I concluded he thought Yes the proper answer for all questions. Another thing was very noticeable in the captain—he was extremely friendly, and often expressed it in this way, "I likee you so mooch; I likee you likee mine own brother." I smiled audibly, and told him we were brothers, and that I had many more besides him. Sometimes he would say, "I thinkee I likee you too mooch." I assured him there was not the slightest danger in the matter; that I never knew harm to arise from a person liking me too well; but that I had known of some trouble to grow out of liking me too little. The captain has a gray beard but has not seen so many years as myself. I noticed as we passed along the shore that large quantities of rock were being quarried to take to Naples for building and street purposes, and also for burning lime. Several gangs were loading vessels with the stone, some taking large heavy blocks, and others the small pieces. The first were run upon rollers and steep slides, and the latter carried in baskets on the back from the quarry to the boat; and among the workers I saw some women. It seemed very heavy work for women, and I thought that wheelbarrows would be better for moving stones than baskets. For that kind of work laborers are paid four francs a day—about seventy-five cents of our money. I saw also several companies of fishermen at work hauling the seine. I should also have said fisherwomen, for about half were women, and they pulled on the ropes and stood knee-deep in the water the same as the men. Sometimes, as in the days of the apostles, they make good hauls, and sometimes quite light. Such is "fisherman's luck."

I was highly interested in the majestic piles of rock which skirted the Mediterranean all the way. Sometimes they rose almost perpendicular to the hight of a thousand feet, and in some instances they even hung over toward the sea. Under these massive piles of rocks are many most picturesque grottoes and caverns. The captain rowed into many of these, sometimes to the distance of three hundred feet, and so far that the daylight could not reach, and all was dark. It reminded me of crossing the river under the rocks in the Mammoth Cave, Kentucky. Sometimes the opening into these caverns was small and sometimes large; sometimes the rocks overhead came down low, and at other times they were high and vaulted, and looked almost as though they had been cut out by the hand of man; but the hand of nature does far more than the hand of man can perform. I frequently shouted in these cavernous recesses, and found the echo quite interesting. In some places these grottoes resembled cathedrals and chapels, and were large enough for a good audience, and again they seemed like hallways to some interior palace. In some instances we found men fishing far under the rocks.

The captain was very kind to take me into these cavernous recesses, and in every instance asked, "You takee mooch pleasure?" I assured him I enjoyed it very much. He also repeatedly reminded me that I could not have seen those grottoes had I gone by carriage. I was aware of the fact, and was glad I came by boat, though it took longer. I told the captain that he need not take the time to enter all the caverns, that it answered very well for me to look into them. His reply was: "I wantee to givee you mooch pleasure, I likee you so mooch. I takee you into every one if you likee." I thanked him for his kindness, and restrained his exuberance of good nature. Several we passed unentered.

In several places where the water touched the rock were considerable deposits of sulphur, sufficient to make the water white for several rods around, and a coating of sulphur was left on the rocks. Bathing places are fitted up and people resort there to use the waters for health. In other places the water was charged with some other mineral and had a reddish color, as though iodine was held in solution. I took two drinks of these medicated waters from a cup which the captain uses for bailing his boat. With the salt and sulphur in the water it tasted decidedly medicated, and I am glad to be able to say I have since enjoyed very good health.

In a few miles we passed the lime rock, which is in strata twelve to twenty inches in thickness, running sometimes horizontally and sometimes with a decided dip, and we came to a sand-rock without strata, which reaches the same great hight. In this sand-rock are also caverns and grottoes, and as the rock is much softer than the limestone considerable cutting has been done at the orifices of the grottoes, giving them the appearance of the large doors of cathedrals, and in other cases I deemed the caverns and chapels nearly entirely artificial or made by man. In many instances they do not extend into the water, but have the rock for a floor, and meetings have often been held there. Sometimes small rooms have been dug into this soft rock fifty feet above the water and reached by steps cut in the rock or by a kind of ladder. The hotels and boarding-houses on the top not unfrequently communicate by private stairs with the caverns and chapels below, as well as bathing houses fitted up for the use of guests. Many fine hotels and pensiones (boarding-houses) are located all along on these beautiful high bluffs and cliffs, and many people from England and other countries come here to stay a few weeks. I can hardly imagine a more delightful place—the most genial climate in the world, a beautiful view of the Mediterranean, as grand mountain scenery as the world affords, with a plenty of fruit and all the accessories of health and pleasure. Vineyards, orange and lemon gardens, olive groves, and fig trees are growing on the rocks along the roadway above, where there is soil enough to sustain them. There are quite as many of the beauties of nature here, quite as many means of enjoyment as can be found in any locality. By the names of the hotels, "Hotel de Angleterre," "Hotel Victoria," etc., it would seem they cater for English patronage.

After passing several villages situated up among the rocks, we finally reached Sorrento, the Syrentum, or Syren Town of the Greeks, and Sorrentum of the Romans, having a population of about eight thousand. It is some hundreds of feet above the Mediterranean, and this altitude we had to climb by a continuous stone stairway, up a deep, picturesque, and wild-looking gorge. At length we reached the square of the town, and found the remains of old pagan temples, those of Hercules, Ceres, Sethos, and others. We also found the statue of Tasso the poet. Sorrento was the birthplace of this talented man, and the people of the town take not a little pride in making this claim known. The site of Tasso's house is on the cliff, near Villa Strongoli, and is now used as a hotel. To this he came in 1577, after his seven years of captivity in Florence. The house belonging to his sister is near by. Boccaccio also once made Sorrento his home, as did Dominichino, Spagnoletto, Caravaggio, Santa Rosa, and other artists. It has been a favorite residence since the time of Augustus. Its environs abound in magnificent natural scenery. Several popular places of resort are in the neighborhood, among which are the Conti delle Fontanelle, and Cermenna hills, at the back of the town, on the ridge which runs through the peninsula, said to be infested with wolves in winter; Monte Sant' Angelo, where is a splendid view of both the Bay of Naples and the Bay of Salermo; Cape Minerva, the Rock of Capri, the Syrens, the Groves of Amalfi, the Plain of the Pæstum, a prospect of incomparable beauty, thence down by a steep, picturesque path, Scaricatojo, on the Bay of Salermo, the nearest place by boat to the Isles of the Syrens, two miles distant.

These uninhabited rocks were formerly the state prisons of the little republic of Amalfi, and are the Sirenum Scopuli of Virgil, where the syrens lived who attracted their victims with a song, and then ate them up. I did not see any of the syrens, unless they were those damsels who were carrying baskets of stone or engaged in hauling in the seines, and they did not look as though they would eat anybody.

Some three miles from Sorrento once stood a temple of Minerva, and another of Juno. On the site of the latter is now a lighthouse, which is certainly putting it to quite as good use as building a church or a chapel there.

We no sooner made our appearance in the streets of Sorrento than the natives, perceiving myself to be a stranger, and deeming me their lawful prey, beset me to the number of a dozen or more, some wishing me to ride in their carriages, and others that I should employ them as guides. In vain I told them I did not wish to ride, and that my friend, the captain, was all the guide I required. They followed me for squares, importuning me as if their existence depended upon my employing them. If, however, that was the case, their existence must soon have terminated, for I employed none of them. To get rid of their ill-mannerly teasing, the captain and I retired to a restaurant. He showed me his hands frequently, that I might see how he had nearly blistered them in rowing me so long a distance. I told him I was very sorry, and that I was aware it was hard work. His reply was, "Me no care; I likee you as my brother." Knowing he must be weary and hungry, I said we would have some refreshments, and that he might order what he pleased. He said he wanted some macaroni, and asked if I would have some. I replied that I would, as I had never eaten any, and it was about time I commenced. So, as a prelude, we each had a plateful of stewed macaroni, composed of those long slippery strings of wheaten gluten before spoken of. The dish looks about as much like angle worms as anything, only they were longer and slipperyer. The fashion is to add to them grated cheese, a mixture of tomato, something like catsup, and then to go ahead and take in those long slippery strings as fast as possible. It was new business to me, and of course I acted awkwardly. The captain perceiving this, said: "Lookee me; lookee me," and the way he forked those strings in and sucked them down was a marvel to me, a new beginner. I tried to imitate him, but with only partial success. They were so long and slippery that I could not at once acquire the art of transferring them from the plate to my stomach. I think, however, that with considerable boldness, dextrous handling of the fork, and not a little sucking, I made away with about half my plateful by the time the captain had made his invisible. He said, "How you likee macaroni?" I replied that it was very nice, but I wished he would be kind enough to finish mine, as I thought I had taken enough for the first lesson. This request he cheerfully complied with, and smacking his lips said, "Macaroni very good." When the second course, of beeksteak, came on, I felt more at home, and was able to keep up with the captain, who himself was not slow. A little wine closed the act, and four francs paid the bill.

When we had completed our inspection of the town and its surroundings, we set our faces toward Castellamare, and not having to stop on the way to enter and inspect grottoes, we returned in less time than we consumed in going down. I had old Vesuvius immediately before me on my return, and I watched him puffing and smoking with unabated interest. The captain often asked me, "You takee mooch pleasure?" I replied, "Yes, I am full of pleasure, and almost running over."

At Sorrento I reached the utmost limit of my journey, it being further south and east than any other point visited. From here almost every mile traveled will be toward home. My return will be much more rapid than the first half of my journey. Feeling so many of you drawing me, and my own anxiety to reach home, will accelerate my returning steps.

When I perceived that it would be night before we reached Castellamare, I said to the captain that I believed I would stay there over night, and then early in the morning go to Pompeii, which is but three miles away. He at once insisted that I should stop over night with him. "Oh," said he, "I likee you samee as mine brother; mine homee your homee, mine wifee your wifee, mine children your children." I thanked him, and said he was extremely kind but that I could not possibly think of accepting so many favors from him, and that I could not yet promise that I would accept any of them, but I would see. Not knowing what kind of a place he lived in, nor whether I would wish to lodge there, I did not commit myself. Perhaps he perceived my hesitancy, for he said, "You no likee me?" "Oh, yes, captain," I replied, "I like you very much, but I do not wish to say that I will lodge with you till I see. I fear it will not be convenient for you to keep me; I think I had better go to a hotel." He urged, "I have good room, clean bed, all nicee, and I likee you all samee as mine brother." He added that he would accompany me to Pompeii in the morning and see that I got there all right. Not wishing to pay him for his time when I did not need him, I rather demurred at his going, when he immediately again said, "Oh, you no likee me, but I likee you all samee as mine brother." I had to once more assure him that I entertained quite a high esteem for him, and upon our arrival at the landing I accompanied him to his home and found that he had told me correctly. I found his wife a pleasant woman, that he had two children and that he had a spare bedroom with a clean bed in it. His house faces the bay, and from his front windows old Vesuvius was plainly in view, belching out its fire and smoke some six or eight miles away. I complimented the captain upon his pleasant home, and assured him that many persons would travel thousands of miles to look upon what he had there every day and night before him. I said I would accept his kind offer and tumble that bed for him. After that he was much pleased, and we walked about the town some, visited a macaroni factory, etc., when we returned to his home. After looking at old Vesuve till I became sleepy, I retired to rest.

POMPEII.

In the morning we were up betimes, and the captain and myself repaired to a restaurant and took our breakfast, when he chartered a carriage to take us to Pompeii, which the Italians pronounce in two syllables, as we would if spelt Pompay. Our driver was a regular young Jehu; and the way he cracked his whip and said, "Ah-h-h-h" to his horses was almost startling. We reached Pompeii before eight, ready to inspect the city that was alive with activity two thousand years ago and was suddenly submerged with hot lava and ashes in the year 79 of our era.

A payment of two francs has to be made at the gate, including guide; and the captain said as he had often been in he would wait for me at the entrance till I came out. I could not dissuade him from this decision.

I enjoyed this visit to the city of the past very much. I have for many years wished to look upon the ruins of the busy city which eighteen hundred years ago was so suddenly submerged by an extraordinary eruption from old Vesuve. I greatly enjoyed what I saw there on the spot, and only wish I could hold it up to your view as it was presented to mine.

Pompeii is on the plain of the Sarno, the ancient Sarnus, and three miles from the south base of Vesuvius, and on the side opposite the city of Naples, from which it is distant some twelve miles. The city of Pompeii, in the days of its glory, stood close by the sea, but the terrible commotion in the earth at that locality, together with the enormous outpouring of lava, turned the course of the river Sarno, and placed the site of Pompeii two miles from the sea. At the time of that wonderful outpouring of the volcano, immense showers of fine ashes fell somewhat gently for several miles on the leeward side of the burning mountain, and easily penetrated the houses of Pompeii, with their rather open tops, and after bursting in their roofs, gradually buried the entire city to a depth of from twelve to twenty-five feet, without otherwise destroying it. This catastrophe took place on the 24th of August, in the year 79, but a few years after the time when Jerusalem was taken and destroyed by the Romans under Titus.

Pompeii thus remained submerged for many centuries, not being discovered or in any wise unearthed till the year 1755, when the excavations commenced. These excavations have been continued more or less vigorously until the present time, and very many remarkable facts and treasures pertaining to that most unfortunate city have been brought to light. Its temples, halls of justice, its places for public assembly, its theaters and amphitheaters, its palaces, stores, and shops, its bath-houses, its many private residences, have been unearthed, and the choicest and richest works of art have been brought to light, including the most beautiful paintings, frescoes, bas-reliefs, statues, bronzes, mosaics, glass ware, terra cotta vessels of the richest workmanship, the finest jewelry and works of ornamentation the world has known. The gold work and the exquisitely-cut cameos which have been taken from these ruins, and are now preserved in the museum here in Naples, are justly pronounced the finest and most artistic that the hand of man has executed. It is wonderful to look upon those fine works of art executed by a pagan nation two thousand years ago, evincing a very high state of civilization and refinement. The vases and vessels of ornamentation that have been taken from Pompeii and Herculaneum—destroyed at the same time—are rich in the extreme. Its glassware, including the furniture of the apothecary, and many other useful vessels, appear equal to and not materially unlike those of the present day, while the paintings and frescoes taken from the walls of Pompeii have been and still are the most elegant and beautiful models which artists have been able to find to pattern after in reproducing the high art of former ages. It is, perhaps, not so much to say that no painter has at any time produced more lovely pictures, more exquisite conceptions of loveliness, than have been taken from those ruins. I saw in the museum here half a dozen good artists engaged at copying those beautiful paintings taken from the ruined city, finding them more ready and more saleable than anything they are able to produce.

As works of art are a very correct means of measuring the grade of civilization a people has attained, it cannot be denied that the Pompeiians were highly civilized, though they had never had the slightest aid from Christianity, which we are told over and over again by its advocates is the source of civilization. But this claim is just about as true as many others which they set up.

It is thought that Pompeii had about forty-five thousand inhabitants at the time it was destroyed, and that the larger portion of the people made their escape from the flood of fire, but many who were unable to get away were submerged by the lava and ashes, and their bodies have been found just as they lay when the fiery mass overwhelmed them. Several of these bodies, or casts from them, still exist, and the looking at them excites a deep feeling of solemnity. About one-third of the area of the city has been unearthed, and a force of men is still engaged in removing the ashes, cinders, and pumice stone, and new treasures are still being found. Within the past year many very interesting relics have been brought to light, including the bottles and jars for medicines and ointments in the shops of the apothecaries, many articles of jewelry, fine vases, lamps, etc., etc.

The city had six gates and twelve towers in the walls, which were two miles in circuit, and twenty-five or thirty feet high, sloping on both sides, and wide enough on the top for two or three carriages abreast. The remains of two gates are left, and the grooves in which the portcullis was made to drop, to keep out approaching enemies, are still plainly to be seen. About thirty streets, thought to comprise one-third part of the city, have been excavated on the northwest side, and thus the miniature city, which is thought to have been a summer resort, is exposed to view. The streets, though quite perfect, are narrow, and the houses are of a compact character and appear to have been but a single story in hight. The roofs were crushed in and are no longer to be seen. There were several rich palaces belonging to the wealthy classes, but the dwellings of the poor were of a somewhat inferior character. The dwellings of the rich extended through from street to street, with a front on each. The entrance or portico led into the outer court, thence into the inner or two inner courts, the whole surrounded by rooms, not large, but very neatly decorated, evidently designed for bedrooms, rooms for meals, retirement, etc. These were closed in, but the courts were open, and generally covered by an awning. Glass was used in some of the windows. There were seats and sofas round the courts, which had artistic and ornamental mosaic floors, with tanks and fountains for use and ornamentation. Vases of flowers, statuary, and marble tables were abundant. The walls and pillars were oftener of stucco than marble, but marble columns and statues were very often met with. Many of the walls of the houses have holes in them, supposed to have been made by the owners who returned to recover some treasures, like caskets of valuables, which they had left behind in their flight. On the base of one of the columns in one of the courts, and about three feet from the ground, were found scratched the first few letters of the Greek alphabet, doubtless being the work of a child pursuing his studies within those walls eighteen centuries ago. Within the private palaces were found many statues and statuettes of gods and goddesses; these were kept in a careful place near the entrance, and were doubtless revered very highly. These, with the numerous temples and altars for sacrifice found in various parts of the city, show that the Pompeiians were a religious people; but their religion did not save them from the terrible calamity which overwhelmed them any more than the religion of the people of Chicago and Boston saved their cities from the direful flood of fire which a few years ago swept considerable portions of them out of existence. The religious or other beliefs of people have very little to do with the nature of natural causes, which invariably act irrespective of personal opinions.

Upon entering the grounds the first relics to be examined are in the museum, comprising three rooms, with an aggregate depth of sixty or eighty feet. In the first room is a representation in plaster of a door with two folds, and with it are the locks and the iron work as they existed when Pompeii was in its glory. A door of wood is also shown in the antique form and fashion in every particular. Among other articles in this room are the models in plaster of a small twig basket, a mason's chest, a purse, the wheel of a chariot, of a wooden press, a box with a bronze lock and hinges of bone, as was in use there two thousand years ago, etc. Here is also a reproduction of a piece of ancient wall, with window grating, and shutter of the olden pattern.

In the second room is a painting representing Narcissus looking at himself in a fountain. The walls of this room are well covered with upright cases with glass doors, in which are a great number of curious articles found on the grounds when the excavations were made, consisting of shells, bottles, lamps, articles of glassware, scales and weights, lamps, cups, small altars, porringers, pots, vases, money-boxes, imitations of flowers, plates, masks for fountains, tiles, waterspouts, little gods in bronze, terra cotta, marble, etc. In the showcases standing in the middle of the room are figures of human beings found under the lava and ashes. Some are of men and some of women. On the heads of the women may still be seen the arrangement of their hair and the folds of the drapery, all of which hav become petrified into stone. In one instance two women were found together, apparently mother and daughter; they fell together, but their faces do not indicate extreme suffering. Probably they were smothered before the liquid lava reached them. The faces of some of the figures have agony and fright depicted upon them. Here are also many samples of charred and partially burnt articles of clothing, ropes, etc.

In the third room are more shells, human skulls, on some of which the hair of the owners is still visible; loaves of bread as they were found in the ovens and in the houses, only blackened by the great heat; specimens of dried fruit, paints and colors used by the artists, mills or mortars for grinding them; jars of ointment, various drugs, lamps, lanterns, door latches and handles, bottles, glass ware, pins, small bells, bridles for horses, copper pans, various vegetables and eatables, egg shells, horns, pincers, trowels, snails, tortoises, candlesticks, ladles, baskets, compasses, hooks, hammers, needles, funnels, braziers, measures of capacity, skeletons of horses, dogs, cats, rats, etc. Here was also a seashell bronze, with a little sucking pig, the bones of fowls, etc. In this room are seen the statues in marble of Venus, a beardless youth, and a satyr as executed by the ancient artists.

I will not undertake to give you the names of all the streets, nor a description of the many houses, shops, stores, and other places, which I visited, as that would make my letter tedious, but they were all most interesting. The private palaces of the wealthy, the temples for the gods, the pillars and floors of which are still there; the halls of justice, with their large rooms, pillars, platforms, etc., for the judges; the theater and the large amphitheater, are the most imposing objects of observation, and are worthy of a full description. The amphitheater is very commodious, and must have held a large number of people. It is probable that gladiatorial sports were witnessed here, and possibly contests with wild beasts. They also had a tragic and a comic theater, the ruins of which are easily traced. The stage, the place for the orchestra, and the seats for the audience in circles, one above another, are still there. The pavement of the floor of the orchestra in the comic theater is of fine marbles, and bears the name of Marcus Occulatius Verus, at whose expense it is supposed to have been made. In the tragic theater were private boxes for distinguished characters, such as pro-consuls, duumvirs, priests, and vestal virgins. The military also had places assigned for them.

The Civil Forum is still standing, with much of its primitive grandeur. It was the place where the public assembled to discuss the affairs of the city, public and private. It was also used for games, marketings, festivals, and often for sacred purposes. Porticoes of travertine columns surrounded it on three sides, and between the columns were placed the statues of the most illustrious citizens, the pedestals of which are still there. Besides this there were also three courts of council, and besides this again was the basilica, another public edifice where justice was administered. It was composed of three naves, the center one uncovered, and the others inclosed. At the lower end was the tribunal for the magistrates, before which is a pedestal for an equestrian statue. Under the tribunal is a cell which is supposed to have served for a prison for criminals.

The temples are a striking feature in the whilom city; that of the goddess Venus is the largest and most sumptuous. It has forty-eight columns of the Doric order, changed into Ionic, forming a portico, covered with a roof on three sides. In the cella or sanctuary which rises in the midst was found on the basement a statue of Venus. To the right of the portico is an erma in marble representing the goddess Maia, or the earth. Before the sanctuary is the larger altar for sacrifices, bearing an inscription with the names of the magistrates — Marcus Porcius, Lucius Sestilius, Gneius Cornelius, and Aulus Cornelius—who had it built. On the left side of the steps to the cella is erected an Ionic column of Phrygian marble, with a sun dial upon it. Upon the walls were various paintings, considerably dimmed by time, the best of which were removed to the museum here.

The Temple of Mercury is worthy of mention. It is not very large, but the pieces of polished marble which still adhere to the walls show that it was once an elegant place of worship. The vestibule, with a roof sustained by four columns, stood before the peribolum, which was entirely uncovered, and enclosed by a wall decorated with pilasters which support the tympanum and arches. In the center of the enclosure is a marble altar with a bas-relief representing a sacrifice in which the veiled priest makes a libation on the tripod, assisted by the ministers, the player on the tibia, a boy assisting, also two lictors while the popa and another victimist lead forward the bull about to be sacrificed in the same manner in which Jahveh's chosen people used to perform the same kind of business. This temple is now used for storing the various images, figures, relics, etc., found upon the grounds.

The Temple of Jove must have been an imposing structure, and is thought to have occupied one of the best sites in the city—north of the Forum, flanked by two triumphal arches. The podium was ascended by two series of steps and was ornamented with colossal statues. The vestibule was adorned with six columns in front and three on each side. The sanctuary was also flanked with Ionic columns, with a statue of Jove standing on a pedestal. Below were cells for the sacred treasures and sacred furniture. A staircase leads to an upper floor where a fine prospect of the city is obtained. It is thought the temple was undergoing repairs at the time the calamity occurred.

The Temple of Isis was another imposing structure. It is thought to have been damaged in the earthquake which took place sixteen years before the eruption, and had been repaired. The Egyptian gods seem to have received much respect from the Pompeiians. The walls of this temple were adorned with images and paintings of the Egyptian deities. Beside the door were found two lustral fountains and a table of marble, on which was placed the box containing the money offered to the goddess. A large statue of Isis was found in the temple, with various articles for decorating the image, similar to what Catholic Christians do by the image of their Virgin or Isis, for it can never be forgotten that Isis was the mother of a son of God, the same as the Virgin Mary. Two altars for sacrifice are still standing. Adjoining the temple were rooms for the priests, and in one of them the body of a priest was found with an ax in his hand, showing he had made efforts to escape.

The Temple of Hercules is also called the triangular forum from its shape. The lower part of the columns that stood in front of it still remain. Statues of Neptune, Hercules, Bacchus, Apollo, and numerous other gods were found in many public and private buildings in the city. One street is called the Street of the Twelve Gods. On a wall at the entrance of the street are painted representations of Jupiter, Juno, Neptune, Vulcan, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Minerva, Venus, Ceres, Vesta, and Diana. It can hardly be claimed that the Pompeiians did not believe in gods, but, like all the gods that men have believed in, they were of but little service to them in time of need.

We have good reason to regard them as a cleanly people, for they had fine bathing houses fitted up in the most convenient manner. I entered one having a plunge bath for cold water in one room, warm baths in another room, another for hot air, similar to the Turkish bath of our time; another place for shower baths, with dressing rooms, etc. Portions of lead pipes used for conveying the water are still seen in the walls. In connection with the bath house was one for physical exercise, similar to a gymnasium. The bathing establishment was evidently gotten up in fine style. On the walls are still seen paintings of Apollo pressing Daphne in his arms, and Cupid lifting her veil. A faun, a girl speaking to a slave, Perseus and Andromeda, etc. Opposite the entrance a painting represents Leda showing to Tyndarus the twins issued from the egg, the consequence of the visit to her of Jupiter in the form of a swan; also Phyxus and Helle, and Ariadne abandoned by Thesius. Again is seen two neriads crossing the ocean, one seated upon a marine bull, the other upon a hippocampus, guided by Cupid. Narcissus is also painted looking at his reflection in a fountain. A garden was attached with two fountains, one quadrangular in form, the other a boy holding a vase from which the water issued. A large square, surrounded by sixty-four columns, is thought to have been a place for gladiatorial sports and exercises.

The numerous shops and stores which line the streets indicate very plainly the purposes they served. The bake shop has the mill in which the wheat was ground, the stone table on which the dough was kneeded, the oven in which the bread was baked. The oven is still in good condition and looks much like modern ovens. Many loaves of bread were found when making the excavations. These retained their shape, but are blackened by the heat. Many of them are on exhibition in the Naples Museum.

The butcher's shop is known by the table and block for cutting up meat and the hooks for hanging it upon. The wine dealers' shops have the large earthen bottles for the wine and the places to keep them. The blacksmith's shop is known in a similar manner, as well as the painters', sculptors', artists', and druggists' places of business. Over the doors of many were signs indicating the kind of business pursued within, and everything gives the assurance that the people who lived there were industrious, enterprising, and artistic.

Those people possessed many virtues; they also had their vices. They evidently practiced the vice which is so common in our own times—prostitution. I saw three houses unquestionably used for that purpose. Over the door of one is a stone phallus—the inverted cross—and on the walls are still finely executed paintings of the same indecent character which Comstock keeps an extensive museum of, and which he is so fond of showing to clergymen, editors, Congressmen, etc., and a bagful of which he takes with him when he goes to religious meetings and gatherings of preachers. The divisions into small rooms, the mason work for beds and couches, with the character of the decorations, leave no room for doubt. These houses are kept locked.

The beautiful palaces of the wealthy class contain many works of art of an interesting character. The entrance passage or hallway leads to an open court, in which was a fountain, with statuary all around. The floors are mosaic and the walls decorated with beautiful mosaics. Dining rooms, sitting rooms, and retiring rooms surround the court, and the kitchen and servant's rooms are in the rear.

In one of these palaces I was pleased to meet Miss Sarah M. Freeborne, a young American artist, sculptor, and painter. She was making sketches from the fine old frescoes on those ancient walls. It was very pleasant to meet within that now quiet city a person from America with whom I could converse. She has been three years in Europe, in company with her mother, and has been busily engaged prosecuting her favorite art studies. She is prepared to furnish sketches and designs of fountains, decorations, and everything of the kind at reasonable prices. She will remain abroad some two years longer. Her permanent address is care of Maquay & Hooker, Florence, Italy.

The Arch of Triumph, which probably stood in the street of Pompeii over two thousand years ago, still stands there. By the wear of the stone pavements on the streets by the wheels of the vehicles—in several places six inches in depth—as well as the wear from human feet which many of the stone steps exhibit, Pompeii must hav existed a long time before it was destroyed.

I will not detain you longer with descriptions of this former city, though I have left unsaid many interesting things respecting this once busy town; I must not make my letter too long. Although but one-third of the city has been unearthed it is quite intricate, and one could hardly find his way out. As I stood there where the feet of busy thousands once trod I realized the sudden destruction which overwhelmed them; and when I looked up and saw old Vesuve, the cause of all that mischief, standing there smoking away as though he had done nothing, I said to him, "Oh, you big, naughty fellow, how could you serve these people so?" Perhaps he may at some time get on the rampage again and once more spread death and destruction broadcast around him. The principal eruptions which Vesuvius has been guilty of since that great outburst in the year 79 were in the following years: 200, 472, 512, 685, 993, 1036, 1049, 1139, 1306, 1500, 1631, 1660, 1682, 1694, 1698, 1701, 1707, 1712, 1717, 1720, 1728, 1730, 1731, 1737, 1754, 1758, 1793, 1804, 1805, 1809, 1812, 1813, 1817, 1820, 1822, 1828, 1831, 1834, 1838, 1845, 1850, 1854, 1855, 1861, 1864. These eruptions were quite variable. Sometimes ashes only, and again melted lava in immense quantities; but it is said that the lava of no two eruptions is alike in appearance or chemical combinations. The later effusions from the crater seem largely composed of iron and is hard. In former centuries it was sometimes stone, and at other times soft and pliable, easily converted into soil. The eruption of 1779, was a severe one, and the solid flame of fire was estimated to shoot up two miles in hight. The appearance must have been most grand at night. When the volcano is in full blast and the lava is running down the mountain sides, the streets of Naples are made so light at night that one can read by it, and the reflection in the bay presents a magnificent appearance.

It is very noticeable that notwithstanding the great destruction and loss of life the volcano has caused, people still live in great numbers all around its base and up its sides, as though no danger lurked near. There are thousands of people living nearer the mountain than Pomeii, and some day the old lion may again become aroused and spread wholesale destruction all around him.

When I left the ground I found my friend the captain and young Jehu patiently waiting for me. I did not visit the site of Herculaneum, though but a few miles away. It has fewer attractions than Pompeii and I concluded one would do. I told the captain that I would go to the tramway (horse cars) and return in that way to Naples, but he said, No, he would accompany me. When I objected he taunted me with not liking him and not wishing his company. So I yielded, particularly as the steam cars would not go for several hours. Jehu was soon cracking his whip again and in about ninety minutes we were in Naples.

My next point to visit was the museum. The captain accompanied me to the entrance, but would not go in, though I offered to pay for him, and urged him. When after two hours of highly interesting examination I came out, I made some apology to the captain for keeping him so long in waiting. "Oh," said he, "I waitee for you all day."

The museum is a large structure at the head of the Strada Toledo, and is one of the best collections of ancient Grecian and Roman statuary, antiquities, paintings, etc., etc., that I have seen. Many of the statues are the originals from which copies have been made and placed in various other museums. On the ground floor are the statuary, bronzes, and a large collection of bas-reliefs, frescoes, etc. The Egyptian antiquities are especially interesting. I have hardly seen a better collection. Some of them are from Pompeii, and some from Egypt. On entering the building by the vestibule are met the statues of Alexander Severus, Flora, the Genius of Rome, and Melpomene, with several kings. Inside is the Farnese Hercules and bull, and many highly prized Grecian statues of Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, Ceres, Venus (several of them), Mercury, Hercules, Bacchus, Cupid, Psyche, etc., etc. On the next floor are several rooms filled with very fine paintings, but by far the most interesting feature of the museum is the articles of wall painting, statuary, and other works of art brought from Pompeii and Herculaneum. There are some 2,000 specimens of painting, etc., many of which are daily being copied by resident and visiting artists for a distant market. Among the Pompeii paintings most prized are the Sacrifice of Iphigenia; Old Women Selling Caged Cupids to Young Girls; The Thirteen Dancers; Ariadne Deserted; Education of Achilles; Telephus nursed by the Hind; Achilles giving up Briseis; Medea Preparing to Kill her Children; Theseus and Minotaur; Massinissa and Sophonisba; Dyers at Their Trade in the Fullonica; The Seasons, Morning, Noon, and Night; The Graces, etc., etc. Several bodies are also here taken from Pompeii. One is a woman near whom were found ninety-one silver coins, two silver vases, some jewels, keys, etc. She was in the act of fleeing, carrying her valuables with her, but fell in the street. Her appearance indicates that she died in agony. Others of both sexes were found near her. The utensils and manufactures of the Pompeiians are very interesting to examine, but none more so than the jewelry of various kinds, particularly the cameos, which, as before observed, are very finely executed.

The mosaics, the Etruscan antiquities, the paintings, the Apollo room, the Muses room, the Adonis room, the Jupiter gallery, the Atlas room of illustrious men, the Tiberias room, the inscriptions, collections of ancient glass, bronzes, terra cotta, etc., are all very fine, but I will not dwell upon them.

Jehu next drove to the cathedral of St. Januarius—San Gennaro of the Italians—as I wished if possible to see that bottle of the saint's blood, and whether it would liquify for me. But I could not get a sight of it. It is carefully stowed away in the saint's private chapel, and is not shown but three times a year—the first Sunday in May, the 19th of September, and the 16th of December. On those days after considerable delay it liquifies, after a sufficient amount of money is paid in to induce the saint to work. Sometimes the result is not obtained for three or four hours on the first day, though large numbers of people assemble to witness the great miracle. They are frequently importuned to give their money so the miracle may act, and after all is obtained that can be, the dark, clotted mass becomes fluid; but one suspicious feature of the holy operation is that a certain chemist is always sent in beforehand to examine the blood, and see that it is all right. It is quite probable that if no money was paid, and the chemist did not examine it, no miracle would occur. The exhibition is kept up several days, and on the second, third, and fourth days the number of spectators diminishes, and as a consequence the money is sooner collected and the miracle works quicker. On the last day four minutes are enough to cause the miracle to perform. The fools are by no means all dead yet.

This cathedral is not as large as some, but it is richly decorated with forty-two pillars, seven altars, nineteen bronze statues, many paintings, etc. The chapels are rich, and contain some valued relics, so considered. The descent and entrance to a tomb under the floor is richly overlaid with a great variety of most beautiful polished marbles, variegated and of all colors. I did not have time to visit others of the three hundred churches, but many of them are said to be rich. I was rather anxious to make a visit to Puzzuoli, situated on the shore of a small bay by the same name, some eight miles north of Naples. Intimating my wish to the captain, Jehu was soon cracking his whip again, and we were spinning off on a new route, passing through the grotto of Possillip, or a tunnel some two thousand feet in length, through a large hill, for a roadway, and through which there is a large amount of travel, it being kept lighted by artificial means. Puzzuoli is a very old town. It was once the chief Roman city on the Bay of Naples, and carried on a large trade with the Levant, but it has sunk into insignificance, containing now some twelve thousand inhabitants. Here and in the immediate vicinity

Is there a Hell?

BY A. W. WOOD.

Is there a God, Omnipotence, or Infinity, or any distinct and separate, or any abstract power from matter by whatever name you choose to call it? There is certainly some subtil, mysterious life force, potency, and direct connection of power permeating and influencing, if not governing by absolute law, every material thing. Is it not the only power we can truly know, or prove, or hav any true conception of, except by connecting it with matter? Is it possible to hav that power separated from matter? A proper inquiry in regard to that power, its connection with matter, its necessity of action as revealed by matter, and whether there is an inexorable law of matter, or whether any other law or power can or does exist, ought to furnish the mind fairly disposed some place to rest, amidst the restless imaginings of the visionary, the ambitious plans of selfish men, and from the cruel, inhuman, and unnatural creeds superinduced by or deduced from mythology or superstition, and from both. To enable such minds to rid themselvs of all fear of the future, except so far as their present connection with matter is concerned and the necessity of submitting to its laws, is the present pressing need—to understand, in fact, the laws of their own being.

If there is an omnipotent power, has that power a will? and is the will also omnipotent? If so, has everything existed always—existed eternally? Is it all the result of that will—that eternal existence without which there can be no omnipotence?

Or was all matter the result of that will, pre-existing before there was any matter? Has all matter so made added anything to omnipotence? if not, did he make anything? and if he did add anything to his omnipotence, does he change and become changed?

There must be a will, for without one there could be no omnipotence, as we use and understand language. There could be no plan, no creation of matter, no space, extent, place, or material thing without one; or is it all law? There is no mistake about the answer to one part of the question, for we know there is a law. Everything would be inert without thought, and to all intents and purposes would be dead, so far as we can know, if separated from will or law, perhaps from will and law. Nothing could exist, could be created, could be conceived, without first supposing a will and law and matter.

What higher presumption or more unfounded assumption can be entertained than that man can change that will, can change omnipotence.

Would it be omnipotent if it could change or be changed? would it be a law even unto itself, much less to any created thing or delegated power? In the outset it is a consolation to know if omnipotence embraces all power, all life, and there is no other power or life, we are a part of that power and life, and so far omnipotent.

But being material and created, how can we hav any connection with omnipotence immaterially pre-existent, how know anything about such an existence, how conceive it? and do we know anything of any, not confined exclusivly to matter, or what we call created things, and are we not governed entirely by material laws, the laws of matter? To me this seems so patent, I hav very little charity when I hear professions from people of intelligence, who ought to know, and many do know, that the human mind cannot conceive anything without attaching to it material elements, that it is the reality of the thing conceived that induces any belief in its existence, and must be in accordance with some real, not an abstract or separate law from matter; that the "eternal fitness of things" means things, material things, so far as conception of law and existence is concerned. Although pain and suffering of mind and body is part of the law to us, is part of what seems to be inevitable, without being apparently, in many cases, a penalty for violating any law directly, hence induces the thought that nature, or Omnipotence itself, may suffer, even if it is in the pre-existent, shows us how easily we can hav unnatural ideas.

For all pain and suffering seem a great ill to us, it may seem so because we are finite, can only see partial ends, and cannot distinguish or understand the principle of universal good, or in other words, we cannot see the whole. This seeming must be applied only to the present existence. Let us suppose, again, that whatever you call cause is infinit, acts only, and cannot in any other capacity, or in a finite capacity only, being infinit, then there cannot be any power, even finite, separated or divided from it, because the first finite being that could act without the Infinit would most effectually destroy the idea of infinit power.

If it is not separated from it, it is a part of it, and every act of man is only a part of the whole infinit action. If I can defeat that power, and I can if any of my acts are against the desire and will of the omnipotent infinity, I then become so far equal or superior, or if allowable I am in degree omnipotent and infinit, and omnipotence is in degree finite, not only a contradiction in terms, but a revelation of the fact that we cannot run outside of matter by which to illustrate or show omnipotence without exposing such theory to absurd conjectures and incongruities, by doing in fact what no necessity exists for. What more unnatural, monstrous, or insane idea can be conceived than to claim that the omnipotent infinit God is constantly and hopelessly in conflict with millions of finite beings, with angels and devils, battling with sin and wickedness, in as much trouble and misery as we are, unable, and always will be, to help or correct it, and all of it a part of itself, its own creation, its own will. This is the creed of all Christendom, from Catholicism to Mormonism, and its senseless division of isms between.

It is hardly more rational to suppose one atom can disturb the whole Infinity, every other atom and the will or law that holds them in their place in that Infinity, and if it does not, and can not, it is not infinit. If it can and does, and is infinit, then it is blasphemous, if there is such a thing as blasphemy, to hold or propagate the idea that any thing we can do will change a hair white or black from what is fixed in infinity, and God cannot punish or make us suffer without punishing a part of himself. If it happens otherwise than is fixed or governed by unchangeable law, I would not giv a rational life of worldly happiness for a fee simple title to the whole universe.

It is a dangerous institution, and may slip its anchor, leave the proprietor alone, run riot, and smash every locomotiv from this little earth to the fixed stars, skip over every side into other universes, and play the mischief generally. Why do we believe that omnipotent and infinit goodness made a hell, or willed it into being, or is a part of it? If a part of it, then we are. If pre-existent he made it, then why call him good? You must answer, if he made it, it was done for a purpose, because he saw and knew it was desirable to hav one, or else he ought not to hav made any.

Unless he saw it was necessary (and what could cause the necessity?) it was fiendishly cruel and inhuman to permit one to exist when he could hav made a place of happiness as well.

But who shall rebel against God? Had he not the power to make the place he thought best, necessary, and desirable, and did he not think it best? Did he not do better than man could, and did he not know better what and which place was most desirable and needed? Must not man, if he believes in such an Omnipotence, also believe it is a much better thing to hav a good hell than to be without one, or to hav substituted a better place. Do I say better, a better place than hell? Do I not blaspheme? Is it not blasphemy by me to say to Omnipotence that he could just as easily hav made a better place, when he did not, but made a hell instead?

We believe and teach "Omnipotence to be everything, all power, all life, all extent, all space, everything the human mind can conceive; that in him we liv and move and hav our being, and besides him there is none else;" that he is perfect, so of course could not make anything imperfect or bad, hence hell is just as good as any other place, is a very desirable place, is very badly needed. We should desire to go there if it was made and fixed for us by the Omnipotent, or to any other place of endless inhuman torment. Indeed if we do not wish to find fault with him, we must go there. We must not defeat the purpose he had in view in making it. We ought not to cause an Omnipotent failure by running away from hell. To hav made such a dangerous place, so costly a thing, and used up so much raw material to make it, when he could make the earth and all that therein is out of nothing, is too much to throw away, or hav go back to nothing, for such kind of nothing would not work well into another earth and all that therein is. It would also be bad if it should turn out useless from non-use, or, if an opposition government should be established there, it might injure the reputation of Omnipotence to submit to a divided power.

Man with only a little, and that only delegated by such a source, seems by such dogmas to possess sufficient, so the source no longer remains omnipotent or infinit, because it is difficult for a finite being to see how a thing can be separated, divided, and delegated away and still remain a whole and only one thing. It staggers the intellect to think a spirit without body, parts, or passions could not make a hell even without using materials. Perhaps being so long out of the practice of making things out of nothing, may be the answer, for hell is really only a modern invention, has only been known less than two thousand years.

Then when the spirit leaves the body to return to the God who gave it, it mingles with Omnipotence, and leaves his material hell out in the cold. It can only be used then a la Moyne, and will not hurt any dead body after the spirit has left it. Hence, without seeing as a whole, you can see that hell is a good place and what it must hav been made for, viz, burning our dead bodies so as to purify the universe and leave our pure spirits fresh, pure air.

I would rather assume, however, that the omnipotence of the universe is perfect, a fact of which we are only deprived of seeing and knowing by being finite, by being just what we are instead of something else; and that if there is a God, a perfect ominipotent and infinit, and no successful power in opposition to him, we better see and hear him with our senses if possible, resting when the imagination would otherwise run riot.

If we knew there was no God, I mean the Christian's God, and the force, potency, invisible power, and life inherent seemingly in all matter, and connected inseparably by law with it, does not overwhelm any sane mind, does not teach it reverence and adoration, yea! giv it all the shades and beauties of sublimity, of divinity, infinity, omnipotence, omnipresence, and majesty the human mind can conceive, and infinitly more than it can appreciate, then a million gods outside of matter and its life could be of no conceivable value to such minds. The human mind is incapable of conceiving anything without attaching to it form and substance, and when that man wrote that God was without body, parts, or passions, he made him a nobody, and only because he knew everything material had body and parts at least, and that by comparison of matter and use of language enabled him to write a senseless negativ, a foolish falsehood.

It is proof squinting toward conviction that the man who wrote it was own brother to the fool who said in his own heart there was no God. Take modern disciples of such illustrious knowledge outside of matter, why cannot they describe their God even, or show what they do say about him without using matter to state some other being or spirit in comparison with matter. Being created, and spirit, pre-existing spirit, ought to hav some history or standpoint, to define itself, yet of itself is an improved immaterial nothing.

When you ask what this God is, without body, parts, or passions, he answers, spirit, of course, and the ablest lexicographers hav only been able to define spirit to be nothing, viz., "immaterial," "not material," "not matter," "no matter," that is of no importance, to wit., nothing, a thing the mind cannot conceive even by comparison with matter, which only leaves a conception of the absence of matter, to wit, again nothing; and who would suppose the mind could grasp it, when all matter and the vast, unexplored, unknown universe, yea, and the spirit permeating it also, were made from it, viz, nothing?

Let your attention be directed to creeds embracing such doctrins and ideas, until you find some Christian who is able to tell you how matter came to be made by or from spirit, and the spirit to consist of an entirely different nature, above and separate from it, and lose none of its entirety by such creation, existing as Omnipotence and Infinity before matter and then being everything the human mind could conceive matter, as well as spirit. Would it not be as difficult to tell how that spirit came into existence from nothing, and is it not as potential and important to prove it had a designer, and did not come by chance, as to imagin such an argument to show the world did not come by chance? or do you believe that a being who could make the universe out of nothing could make himself out of nothing as well? One is as hard to believe as the other, as easy to imagin as the other, and what evidence is there of any spirit or life except in matter?

Does it need any to satisfy a rational man? While matter contains in the germ of the mustard-seed as mysterious and unknown a spirit as their God is, and if matter is separate and distinct from their God-spirit, made by it, it had a beginning, as did the spirit which infuses all matter, and neither are immortal or eternal, unless that God-spirit is capable of making anything not eternal in its nature. If incapable, then matter is as eternal and infinit as that God is, and so is the spirit inherent in matter. So you reason away the necessity of any such spirit outside of matter, for matter and its life we know exist.

Why matter is rife with life, with mysterious, undefined, and undefinable life and spirit, almost surely, certainly, satisfactorily showing us that wherever, whatever, it is, shall be discovered, the source and secret of infinity will be revealed at the same time. The spirit we are speaking of is something, not nothing. Our spirit of matter is the power, from the swelling bud to the "music of the spheres." In proper organizations and combinations it makes us listen with thrilling interest to the divine anthem as the pealing organ thunders or whispers its own fascinating harmony in our ears and makes us respond to the spirit of sound, conveyed even on the senseless thread. By the glorious rays of light coming in wavelets of thirty-six thousand to every inch of space the cunning eye gathers in the colors of the rainbow, and sees the vast starry frame of the universe shining in celestial splendor around it; sees the ruby on the grape or the crimson of the peach, but is less satisfied with the sight than with the blissful luxury which a keen appetite givs to their consumption, each really being perfect in its place. Then the feeling which by touch of a loving hand, or affectionate words fitly spoken, or inspiration taken in by smelling and breathing the nectar of the fresh, pure air, filled with the aroma of flowers, are a little item in the matter and life of contemptible, material man, not yet, however, quite totally depraved.

Edison can successfully perfect ten thousand advance theories, with the machines to giv effect to his inventions, and among them obtain fire from water, to convert itself into steam, with power to rejuvenate itself, and thus be perpetual, while the machinery lasts that does it; may make diamonds out of carbon, as nature makes them; may make a telescope enabling us to see the man in the moon, and whisper him with the telephone so we can learn his name and family history, with his idea of a God; in fact, whether any Savior had to suffer death there for the sins of his ancestors and him, by bequest or inheritance, together with the creation in full of the moon, as we know of the earth. And when Edison has accomplished this, let us unite the concentrated philosophy and science and knowledge of all ages, and we should then be unable to solve the principle of or discover the germ of life in the little mustard-seed, or what heat is, or any other fixed principle or secret of life.

We could not define its existence or its mysterious connection with matter any more in the animal kingdom than in the vegetable, no more in either than actual knowledge enabled us to, and so far totally repelling the idea we can define or know anything of an Omnipetence or Infinity separate from matter, entirely outside of and not influenced thereby. Cunning, unprincipled, and ambitious men hav in all ages taken advantage of everything to obtain power, and the mysterious has been a prolific, the almost universal, means by which they hav obtained it. They hav found in the mysteries of nature fine and exhaustless capital, not only to obtain a living and luxury without labor, but to speculate with in the region of mind; to hold the liberties of others, and hence power over them; and they hav always also found some honest ones full of zeal without knowledge, giving them their only reliable strength, and without whose influence and aid they would soon lose their masks.

If man was naturally irreligious he could never hav been induced to believe the monstrous absurdities connected with the good things in every system yet invented or believed in, from the sun-worshipers down to Mormonism.

The Christian system has in many things been the hardest to believe, the worst in its influence and practice, the most incongruous and inconsistent of any, the most humiliating and impracticable to practice in accordance with its teachings, and the most heartless and indifferent toward virtue and good works.

It is more than grossly inconsistent in taking the Jewish system as its own, in endeavoring to graft itself on that system while the parent tree refuses to grow the graft, denying their right to use their invention and system, in fact calling their leader an impostor instead of a god.

While the Jews had lords many and gods many, they had no trinity, they had no hell. The two systems are unmatched in every material or important thing, from the pretended creation of all things about six thousand years ago, down to the resurrection of the dead, and the elements melting with fervent heat, as taught by the Christian system, to wit: "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up" (2 Peter, iii, 10). "They shall perish, but thou remainest" (Heb. i, 11). "Who laid the foundation of the earth that it should not be removed forever" (Ps. civ, 5). "One generation passeth away and another generation cometh, but the earth abideth forever" (Eccl. i, 4). "They are dead, they shall not liv, they are deceased, they shall not rise, therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them and made all their memory to perish" (Isa. xxvi, 14).

The Jewish system was not singular in being without any hell, because it needed none.

It recognized no doctria of a future life. Its great poet Job, who is acknowledged to be as spotless from worldly dishonesty and impurity as any life recorded there, has this to say, and it ought to be received as his conviction: "As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more" (Job vii, 9); "But man dieth and wasteth away. Lo, man giveth up the ghost and where is he?" (Job xiv, 10.) Job knew whether there was any doctrin of a future state or punishment after death believed in, or there was none in his time. He could not hav stated his disbelief in any such doctrin, if any was believed or taught in his location, in any stronger manner or language than by asking such a question to any believer, implying he did not know of any future himself. There are numerous declarations of similar import in the book attributed to him. These declarations for instance: "Yet in my flesh shall I see God;" "Whom I shall see for myself and mine eyes behold, and not another" (Job. xix, 26, 27), must shock the Christian who believes God is only spirit.

Again, "All flesh shall perish together and man shall turn again unto dust" (Job xxxiv, 15). Here he is positiv and shows himself a firm believer in the dust theory. The wisest man indorsed the same doctrin and agrees in many things with Job, showing what doctrin was believed and taught in his time. Hear: "For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope, for a living dog is better than a dead lion;" "For the living know that they shall die, but the dead know not anything; neither hav they any more reward, for the memory of them is forgotten;" "Also their love and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished, neither hav they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun" (Eccl. ix, 4, 5, 6).

Again, "For that which befalleth the sons of men, befalleth beasts, even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath, so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast, for all is vanity;" "All go unto one place, all are of the dust and all return to dust again;" "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?" (Eccl. iii, 19, 20, 21). The positiv declarations in the 19th and 20th verses winding up with the query in the 21st verse show the writer intended to say to anybody who questioned it, "You do not know to the contrary, and do not know whether the spirit of man or beast goes down or up." It does not, like the new system, pretend to define Omnipotence and to know his place. Read Ecclesiastes xi, 5, and see how it contradicts and illustrates the want of any such knowledge even in regard to matter: "As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in her that is with child, even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all." All reference to the separation of the spirit from the body of pointed meaning is found in Eccl. xii, 7: "Then shall the dust return to earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." How could it return unless it had been separated? and how remain infinit while occupying a material body for a time, and then only capable of finite acts? As the body does not act at all, is dead without the life or spirit, how could it affect or hinder the operation of an infinit spirit, so it could only act the finite?

THE Rev. Thomas Tellier has been pastor of the Baptist church at West Pawlet, Vt., for over a year. He preached his farewell sermon last summer. It is a very common thing for ministers to preach their farewell sermons at that place, and there are a good many who make a practice of going to hear them from curiosity, so the church was well filled (a very uncommon thing). Money matters seemed to agitate the preacher's mind and the whole discourse was of a financial tendency. He told them that they did not giv enough for the support of the gospel. If they would giv one-tenth of their income it would hire a good minister. He said it was not honest or right to hire a minister and not pay him at times when agreed, and when he came to go away to ask him to take up with half what was his just due. He advised them to settle up the debts of the church, pay money that was owing to the ministers who used to preach there, pay up the bill for coal and lights, etc. He said it was not on his own account but that they might not scare away the young man who was coming to fill his place. He said that it were the church a bad name, said he was told before he came here that he would get starved to death, that they never paid their ministers. He said they could not afford to hav the church shut up, that anybody had rather their children would be at the Sabbath-school than at a bar-room or a Liberal League! He compared money given to support preaching to grain planted in the ground—it would increase some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold. But some people didn't wish to trust God's word in regard to temporal things, and looked upon money paid to a minister as wasted. He said the Lord would prosper those who gave to the church, told about a young man who gave one-tenth of his income to the ministers until it amounted to five hundred pounds. He then ceased giving, and lost nearly all his fortune. He began to giv money to the minister again and he soon made up his loss and became vastly rich. He took three worldly men into business with him. They did not "go much on religion," and he stopped giving to the minister again. Misfortune overtook him and he died a beggar. Just think of it; the God who tells us to return good for evil sent bad luck to that man because he didn't pay the minister. A new version of the Golden Rule. He said once a church thought they could not afford to keep a minister and were about to let him go, when the miller said he would pay him alone. They were much surprised, as he was a poor man, but accepted the offer. At the end of the year the miller asked the church if they were poorer for having preaching. All said no. Well, said the miller, you hav paid for it yourselvs; after taking out my regular toll. I tolled it for the minister, sold it, and paid him his money. That is Christianity! We'd like to see a miller at West Pawlet try that game and see how it would work. And he talked money to them in a business-like manner, and used no soothing syrups. It made the old ones lop their heads, but they are used to hearing such sermons. But it was hard-hearted for him to blow them up so when so many of the world's people were in, people who cannot sympathize with them. He advertised to speak in the evening about the rich young man who wanted to inherit eternal life. But the people had heard enough about money matters and only four or five were present. He said he could not talk to empty seats, and dismissed the congregation. ***

Junius Rediscovered.—Concluded.

HE REAPPEARS IN 1775 IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

Four days after my first sight of the "Crisis" of 1775, as I was examining Sherwin's "Life of Paine" (1819) on a question in no way connected with Junius, I read this note on page 45:

"In the edition of Paine's political works recently published there occurred an error with which it is proper the reader should be made acquainted. The article which is there inserted as the first number of the 'Crisis' is not, from all I can collect, the production of Paine. A friend has lately favored me with a copy of the 'English Crisis' (a work entirely distinct from that written by Paine), in which I find the first number in the edition lately published, inserted verbatim under the signature of Casca. The error was copied in an edition published a few years ago by Eaton in Newgate street [1796]. I hav since seen several editions in all of which the piece is omitted. This shows clearly that it could not hav been written by Paine, and its insertion in the edition published by Eaton can only be attributed to the ignorance of the person who furnished him the copy."

This mysterious passage, containing an apparent reference to the "Crisis" of 1775, "a work entirely distinct from that written by Paine," and a reference also to "Casca," who signed ten of the numbers of the "Crisis" of 1775, surprised me greatly. But I was still more astonished to find penciled on the margin of the same page this note:

"It is by Paine, but does not belong to the 'Crisis.' It refers to Gen. Gage's proclamation of July 17, 1775, and is entitled 'A Crisis Extraordinary.' The first number of the 'Crisis' proper is dated Dec. 19, 1776. Neither is the 'English Crisis'—if by that the writer means the English edition of the 'Crisis' published by Eaton in 1796 [which he does not]—a work entirely distinct from that written by Paine, but simply Paine's works with the omission of two or three numbers, and the paper above referred to [i. e., 'A Crisis Extraordinary'] tacked on at the beginning."

I went straight to the librarian to inquire who penciled that note. "It is against the law," said an assistant to whom I first showed it, "to write in a book, and it must be rubbed out." "Oh, don't do that," said I, "it is too valuable." Then up stepped the chief librarian, who carries in his head a whole library, alcoved, shelved, indexed, and catalogued. "My clerk did that," said he. "Indeed," said I; "then please show me, if you hav it, a copy of that English edition of Paine's 'Crisis' containing 'A Crisis Extraordinary,' about Gen. Gage's proclamation." "We hav it," said Mr. Spofford, "but it has nothing to do with your Junius inquiry." "Let me see for myself," I replied. "Here is 'Casca' in the 'Crisis' of 1775, and I want to see how it happens that Paine writes, as you say, 'A Crisis Extraordinary,' and signs it 'Casca,' and it gets into an English edition of Paine's 'Crisis' in 1796."

Well, in a few moments Mr. Spofford produced a volume of "Colonial Pamphlets," the last of which was entitled "A Crisis Extraordinary," 16 pages, dated Wed., Aug. 9, 1775, signed "CASCA," and another volume containing, among other things, thirteen of the fifteen numbers of Paine's "Crisis," published in London by Eaton, 1796, with this same "Crisis Extraordinary" prefixed, as Paine's "Crisis No. I.," and signed "AMERICAN C. S." ("Common Sense")!

So then this "Crisis No. I." of Eaton's edition of 1796, which Sherwin argues is erroneously attributed to Paine, is pronounced by the learned librarian of Congress to be the work of Paine, who signs it "Casca," and it afterward goes into an English edition of his works while he is in Paris writing a pamphlet on "The Decline and Fall of the English System of Finance" and his famous "Letter to George Washington." Is it not highly probable that Paine authorized Eaton to insert that "Crisis Extraordinary" as introductory to his later series, it being specially suited to English readers? At all events he must hav known of its insertion as one of his productions; and it is a remarkable fact that Paine's "Crisis No. X.," dated Oct. 6, 1780, was entitled by him "The Crisis Extraordinary." And Oldys, in referring to it in 1791, erroneously calls it "A Crisis Extraordinary."

The identification of Paine as "Casca" by the all-searching librarian of Congress, who hitherto has withheld his assent to the claim that Paine was Junius, ought to hav great weight with those who rely more on authority than on their own judgment or that of a humble student like myself.

The internal evidence of the identity of Casca with Junius is stronger than that of Paine with Junius, because Paine, in his open life, had to conceal the great secret. And while it is true that Casca is less polished than Junius, this may be easily accounted for by the fact that Junius was compelled to maintain with credit his assumed character of a man of "rank and fortune;" and he himself speaks of the labor bestowed on the composition of his letters. But Casca, in his own little subterranean transatlantic weekly, striving to arouse the middle class to revolution, needed no polish to his periods, and they are perhaps a little inferior in style to Paine's acknowledged writings. Nevertheless "the brilliant pen of Junius" is manifested both in Casca and Paine, and the parallels between Casca and Junius are more frequent and palpable than between Paine and Junius, as might be expected.

One of the strongest characteristics of Junius was hatred of Scotchmen. Only two allusions to the Scotch are found in Paine's works; first in the original draft of the Declaration of Independence—"Scotch and foreign mercenaries"—and secondly in "Prospects on the Rubicon," 1787, where he alludes to the mistaken policy of conciliating the Scotch by the house of Hanover—the only passage, by the way, in which Paine mentions Junius. But Casca abounds in scathing allusions to the Scotch, two of which are found in "A Crisis Extraordinary," unquestionably written by Paine.

Most of the persons assailed by Junius are likewise denounced by Casca, while those whom Junius praised are likewise lauded by Casca. And I find no uneven parallel or incompatible fact.

Casca makes a single allusion to Junius in "Crisis, No. XVII.," an epistle in rhyme, addressed to Lord Mansfield:

> "Should galling Junius make a new attack
> (Whose lashes still are flagrant on your back),
> The libeler by some state bloodhound trace,
> And let him feel the terrors of your place."

In the same epistle is this couplet:

> "These lines, inspired by Churchill's laureled shades,
> I write, unknown, unpatronized, unpaid."

This is a most striking parallel. Junius absolutely refused Woodfall's proffer of one-half the profits from the sale of the authorized edition of his letters; and he wrote privately to Lord Chatham, "Retired and unknown, I hav only a speculativ ambition." "Common Sense" first appeared anonymously, and its author gave the copyright to the Colonies. Nor did Paine ever accept or receive the profits of his literary works. Another such parallel cannot be found in all time. Junius, Casca, and Paine all wrote "unknown, unpatronized, unpaid."

But without further citations of parallels, I will conclude with two quotations from "A Crisis Extraordinary." Beneath the caption is a Latin quotation with Casca's usual free translation (exemplified in seven of his prior essays), thus italicized by him:

> "Projecit ampullas.—Hor.
> On souls of slavery more than death afraid.
> Gage wasted his pardons and his gasconade."

The closing paragraph, capitalized by Casca, is as follows:

"The die is cast in the great Divan (the wise council of this nation) and those who would RISE AGAIN to the STATE and LIBERTIES of ENGLISHMEN must RISE through BLOOD. The parricides of the constitution, General, are to be found in England, NOT IN AMERICA, nor can HAPPINESS, PEACE, LIBERTY, and LAW be now restored (unless Providence miraculously intervenes) but by ANOTHER REVOLUTION."

And now a parting word to my esteemed Col. Ingersoll. I hav challenged you to prove your assertion that Junius was "a coward and a sneak," and I hav recalled the challenge until I could present this newly-discovered evidence of the ideatity of Paine with Junius. If you still persist in your estimation of Junius, how are you going to meet the fact, which Mr. Spofford discovered before me, that Paine was Casca? And does it not inevitably follow that if Junius was "a coward, a culminator, and a sneak," so was Thomas Paine? But you say "Paine was not an unjust man." So say I. Nay more. I know of no great historical character who combined in himself such brilliant genius, disinterested benevolence, stern integrity, noble ambition, life-long persistency, and world-wide philanthropy, as the author of the Letters of Junius and of the Declaration of Independence.

Notice.

Mrs. Colby and Smith closed their second engagement in Rochester, N. Y., Nov. 14th, having a crowded house; attended a three days' convention at Binghamton the 19th, 20th, and 21st; will remain there during November, and return to Rochester for the month of December, notwithstanding Mrs. Colby has given over forty lectures in that city since last April to large and appreciativ audiences.

Persons desiring the services of Mrs. Colby and Smith for week evening lectures or funerals will address them accordingly.

are the ruins of several old pagan temples. The most important is the temple of Jupiter Serapis, dedicated to Osiris. Three of the stately columns out of the original sixteen, forty feet high, are still standing. They tell a remarkable tale of the changes made by time and the elements of nature. The surface of the ground here has been greatly affected by earthquakes and volcanic action, and has risen and fallen alternately. The attention of the eminent geologist Lyell was called to the indications here given, which he deemed very remarkable. For some distance above the pedestals these columns are smooth, owing, probably, to their having been buried to that depth in ashes from the volcanoes in the immediate neighborhood. Above this line is a space of about nine feet which is eaten away by the action of the water of the sea, bored into by the lithodomus modiola, a boring mollusk, the shells of which may still be seen in the holes. Above this, again, the columns are quite smooth. In explanation of these phenomena it is said that the ground on which the temple stood, from the effects of an earthquake and volcanic action, sunk even before the building was abandoned, for there are two pavements, one a distance of several feet above the other. The sea then encroached, and for many years covered a portion of the column, during which those perforations and the eating away by the water were done, the little borers being quite unaware of the record they were making to be read in after centuries. In the sixteenth century there were many earthquakes on this coast, and in 1538 the Monte Nuovo was raised in a few days by the great quantity of ashes and burning matter thrown out, which formed a hill nearly five hundred feet high; the whole coast being elevated, and the sea consequently retiring beyond its previous bounds. The Temple of Jupiter was doubtless ruined during these extraordinary commotions, and the little sea borers which had recorded their history died out. At the early part of the present century the floor of the temple was dry. In twenty years after it was covered by the high tides, which though but slight in this part of the Mediterranean do make a difference on the shores. Since that time the water has been gradually gaining a higher level, and now it is about thirty inches deep.

I visited on the high banks, overlooking the sea, the large ruins of an ancient temple of Neptune, where, if he chose, he could dwell and watch the operations carried forward upon his special element. Heavy portions of the walls, twenty feet or more in hight, are still standing, a relic of the past. In the neighborhood are the ruins of a temple of Diana and other pagan deities. This portion of the bay appears to have been a favorite resort of the old Romans, whose villas lined the coast in thick succession, and rendered it one of the most populous spots in Italy. It embraces the noted volcanic district, including the Phlegræi Campi, or Burning Plains, Styx, and Acheron, the Elysian Fields, Tartarus, Lethe, the Cimmerian Shades, and other apparatus of the Roman poets. The Gajola rock divides the Bay of Naples from that of Puzzuoli. Here are the extensive remains of the Villa of Vedius Pollio and the Villa of Lucullus, with a theater, baths, fish-ponds, etc. Near this Virgil had a country seat, where he wrote some of his poetry. Cicero's Villa is near Puzzuoli, once called Academia and Villa Puteolana. It was once close to the sea, but was put back by the earthquakes. A part of the portico still remains. Here the great orator wrote his "Academical Questions" and other works. Near the same are seen the ruins of a theater, a temple of Antinous, while a temple of Neptune and another to the Nymphs have been submerged by the sea.

The spot I visited with the greatest interest in this locality is the old volcano of Solfatano, or Solfatara, the ancient Forum Vulcani. It was once a very active volcano, but has for a long time pretty much retired from the business. It is 1,000 or 1,500 feet high, and the old crater is probably 1,500 feet across, and the outer edge is perhaps 200 feet higher than the hard, stony substance now forming the floor of it. I walked over it; and by throwing a stone upon this crust a hollow, cavernous sound is heard, showing that quite a vacuum exists beneath.

The evidence of the internal fires and eruptions are abundant. On one edge of the old crater hot sulphurous smoke and vapor constantly arise, and at night fire is sometimes seen coming out from between the crevices of volcanic rock, in a small, rocky recess, whence the smoke and vapor exude. The steam and smoke are hot enough to cook an egg in a few minutes. I walked into this sulphurous cavern, and by holding my face well down toward my feet I managed to stay in for a minute or two. I obtained a piece of the hot rock, coated with sulphur, where the vapor exudes, and brought it away with me to show my friends what they may expect hell to be. In 1198 this volcano poured out a large amount of lava, but since that time it has been comparatively quiet, though the smoking is kept up without cessation.

Monte Astroni, in the neighborhood, is another fine specimen of an extinct volcano. It is about four miles in circuit, and the crater was turned into a royal forest preserve for deer and wild boars. It contains three small lakes. About a mile west of this is another defunct volcano called Monte Barbaro, the Guarus of the ancients. It is now covered with vineyards. All around here is a part of Phlegræan Fields, the region of volcanoes. About a mile further up the bay is Monte Nuovo, a volcano of modern date, which, in September, 1538, had a furious eruption and overwhelmed part of Lake Lucrine, the villa of Agrippina, part of the canal of Agrippa, and the village of Tripergola, which had previously been resorted to for its baths.

Lake Avernus is another crater bed about two miles in circuit, which, according to Virgil, was the scene of Æneas's descent to the Cimmerian Shades. It is about 180 feet in depth. Around are the remains of ancient baths called the temples of Apollo and Minerva. Here are also the Tritoli or Sture di Nerone (baths of Nero), hot sulphur springs in a cave at a temperature of 180°, quite hot enough to boil an egg. These grounds are now covered by vineyards and do not seem particularly gloomy.

Turning into the little bay of Balæ, the road cuts along the face of the cliffs, passing the deserted walls, foundations, and remains of Roman villas, many of them for want of space built right into the sea, where their buttresses may still be seen. Some are named after Cæsar, Cato, Pompey, Sylla, Hadrian, Nero, and others, real or fanciful. The young Marcellus, who was to have succeeded Augustus, died here. Here are also several ruined baths, called temples, as the temple of Diana, the temple of Mercury, a cracked building with an echo inside and a domed rotunda seventy feet in diameter. Also a temple of Venus, an eight-sided structure, the most perfect of all. It is circular inside, ninety feet in diameter, and ornamented with stucco reliefs.

Balæ, once a favorite watering place of the Romans, and notorious for its dissipation and loose morals, where, it was said, if a woman went as chaste as Penelope she went away a Helen, is now a hospital or invalid depot. Here the Romans found a soft climate sheltered from the cold winds, but open to the sea breezes, with a smooth sea, delightful views, and hot springs in abundance. Stagnant pools, vineyards, and a few farms are seen there now.

The Elysian Fields is a cemetery covered with some low hills, excavated with chambers for the dead, two hundred feet square, with recesses for urns. Lake Fusaro, the ancient Acherusia is at the back of these. It is the crater of another volcano, and was the old port of Cumæ.

I omitted to say that it was at Puzzuoli that Paul landed in a trading vessel from Alexandria. He stopped there with his Jewish brethren seven days before proceeding to Rome, or so it is said.

Night coming on, we were admonished to return to the city. The possibility of further sight-seeing was over for the day. Jehu was again cracking his whip (I give him the credit of using up about six inches of his whip-snapper that day), and in about an hour we were again in Naples. Jehu's horse must be a tough one to stand such a day's work as that. I reached my hotel, a little tired, but feeling that I had done a good day's work at sight-seeing.

At the door I parted with my friend the captain, paying him a reasonable sum for his time, and assuring him if he again visited New York I would endeavor to show him around somewhat extensively.

I have little more to tell you about Italy, and that will be in another letter, this being already long enough. Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

ORTHODOXY is irrational. It disparages reason and says reason is of the natural man and to be held always in subordination to faith. The thing of most importance to be done, the thing most pleasing to heaven, the thing without which there is no safety or salvation, is to believe, simply believe. And the explanation of the mystery, why the old theology is able to retain its hold upon the minds of the people as it does, lies, more than anywhere else, in just this fact, that it teaches that men must not doubt, must not question; they must believe. To use their reason in connection with religion, beyond a certain very narrow limit, is of the devil.—J. T. Sunderland.

Letters from Friends.

MONROE, WIS., Nov. 28, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please excuse delay in renewing subscription, which I think expired about August 1st, and find inclosed money order for $3.

Having just read the letter of C. S. Morgan, in the issue of the 20th inst., and your remarks in answer, as a temperance man as well as a Freethinker, I want to say a word by way of replication.

A strong impulse has moved me to speak for a cause that is very dear to me. Whenever I hav seen anything in your paper militating against total abstinence for intoxicants, I hav heretofore suppressed it. I can't do it now, but in the midst of business cares that absolutely forbid an extended argument or anything more than some very brief suggestions I must notice your aforesaid answer.

You say, "True temperance with regard to any article means its use in moderation." Dr. Willard Parker, eminent authority, said: "What is alcohol? The answer is, A poison. It is so regarded by the best writers and teachers on toxicology. I refer to Orfila, Christison, and the like, who class it with arsenic, corrosiv sublimate, and prussic acid. Like those poisons, when introduced into the system, it is capable of destroying life without acting mechanically. Introduced into the system it induces a general disease as well marked as is intermittent fever, small pox, or lead poison."

Now, will you say that to be temperate one must use arsenic in moderation? Will you say that the individual who does not use corrosiv sublimate in moderation is intemperate? And will you please state what quantity of prussic acid can be taken into the human stomach to constitute such moderate use as will entitle the user to the appellation temperate?

You say, "There is probably quite as much intemperance in eating as in drinking, but still it would hardly seem reasonable to demand that for this reason we should never taste of beefsteak or plum pudding."

Dr. Parker at another time said, "Alcohol is the one evil genius, whether in wine, or ale, or whisky, and is killing the race of man." Who would drink beer, whisky, or wine, but for the alcohol they contain? In the teachings of Buddha we find, "Drink not liquors that intoxicate or disturb the reason." Mohammed forbade his followers to drink wine. Total abstinence from intoxicants was taught in ancient Egypt constantly over a period embracing twenty-five dynasties, several hundred years. In China the manufacture of intoxicating liquors was prohibited a thousand years before the Christian era. Our own laws prohibit the sale or giving of intoxicants to Indians, and in most of the states, if not all, to minors. Why? Is beefsteak or plum pudding tabooed or interdicted by any statute known to you? If the use of those articles was attended with the evils that follow in the train of wine, beer, or whisky drinking, would there not be somewhere a statutory inhibition?

Our prisons are full of criminals made such by the use of alcohol. Do you know of a single criminal made such by the use of beefsteak or plum pudding? Our poor-houses are thronged with paupers as the result of alcoholic beverages. Do you know a pauper made such by the use of corned beef, butter, or cheese? Two-thirds of the expense of our recent October term of court—many hundred dollars—was the direct result of the use of intoxicants, and I think the same may be said of courts generally all over our land; but I hav never yet known one cent of litigious expense imposed upon the people by the use, as a beverage, of buttermilk or water.

I hav seen much of the horrors of delirium tremens. Within the last year I hav witnessed three terrible cases, all caused by the beverages of which you speak so kindly, not one by the use of tea, coffee, fruit, or mutton.

For more than three years last past I hav had the honor to be president of a Reform Club with over two hundred names enrolled under its pledge of total abstinence. Most of them are Liberals; all have been drinking men. A large number hav been drunkards. Many of the latter who but a short time ago were reduced to the lowest poverty through drink, whose families suffered for the necessaries of life—for beefsteak, corned-beef, or bread and butter, are now industrious, useful citizens, happy in the integrity of an unviolated pledge, and with happy wives and children and comfortable homes. If my efforts and abstinence hav tended to confer and promote such happiness, whatever of self-abnegation I hav assumed has been a thousand times repaid. Such happiness has given me more satisfaction than all the wine I ever drank, and that has been considerable. I do not envy you the pleasure you hav derived from the juice of the grape. A few of the members of our reform club hav gone back to their old habits through the influence of the apostles of moderation. Others may fall, but they shall not through my influence or example.

In relation to what you say of the temperance of the wine drinking people of Europe, the police reports of Paris show a large number of arrests in that city weekly in consequence of drunkenness. Statistics show a large amount of intemperance all over Europe, and that its increase is alarming and is attracting the attention of several of the governments. Charles Dickens and Dr. Holland found intemperance there, and a German friend of mine, who has traveled in nearly every country and speaks nearly every language of Europe, tells me that drunkenness is largely prevalent there and that its increase is appalling.

And now, Bro. Bennett, if I question the propriety or expediency of publishing the fact that you drank a glass of wine at the ovation tendered you on your return from Albany, or that your principal drink in Italy was wine, when it could interest, benefit, or enhance the happiness of none, and would surely grieve a large number of your warm friends, of which your correspondent is one, I want THE TRUTH SEEKER all the same for I regard it as one of the very best and most valuable papers published in America, or any other land. Very truly yours, E. BARTLETT.

REMARKS.—Our friend states his arguments very tersely, and with undoubted truth. Intemperance is unquestionably a great evil. We do not wish to be an advocate of the use of alcoholic beverages. We hav no partiality for them, nor for those who use them to excess. We hav seen in our own time many persons who were seriously injured by alcoholic stimulants, and readily admit that great evils arise from their use. Alcohol in a diluted form may in certain cases be used as a remedy, but nature has little use for it, and total abstinence is far better than its immoderate use. Still it is quite possible for a person to take an occasional glass of wine without injury. We hav known those who occasionally use fermented liquors and never become intoxicated nor the worse for the indulgence. And though alcohol is pronounced as poisonous as arsenic or prussic acid, many of us hav known people who hav used it almost daily for nearly half a century and still were vigorous and tolerably healthy. It depends very largely upon the quantity that is used. Some poor slaves to intoxicating drinks last but two or three years and reach a most miserable end.

There is undoubtedly much intemperance and intoxication in Europe, but we saw very few signs of it in countries where wine is in general use. More intemperance was seen in England, where whisky, rum, and gin are excessivly used, than in all the continental countries we visited; and that was why we believed if Americans would be content with the use of wine and discard all stronger drinks they would be gainers thereby. It is undoubtedly the tendency of Americans to go to intemperate extremes in the indulgence of their appetites, and this is why we so often see drunkenness among us, why so many moral and physical wrecks are made. For such, total abstinence is the only safety.

Intemperance in eating is the cause of many diseases and the source of much ill-health and unhappiness; but intoxication, moral and social ruin, are not among them, and this is why intemperance in the use of alcoholic drinks is worse than intemperance in eating. It is questionable, however, whether a glutton is much more respectable than a drunkard.

We wish, we repeat, not to be an advocate of the moderate or immoderate indulgence in intoxicating liquors. Their use is always attended with danger and often with most fearful results. It is far better for everybody to let them alone.—Ed. T. S.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I congratulate you on your return safe and sound. Some one lectured you on temperance lately. The inclosed on temperance, written for a local paper here, I would like to see reprinted in The Truth Seeker.

I will contribute one dollar to fight that trial of the Le Claire editor if it takes place. Yours truly,

F. J. Emary.

TEMPERANCE DEFINED.

This word has a wider meaning than many persons are willing to allow. The popular meaning is abstinence from alcoholic drink in public. The ancient Spartans reckoned that stealing was not a crime, but to be caught stealing was a crime. Our modern temperance morality is on a par with ancient Spartan morality.

Temperance in all things is the only kind worth notice. A man who eats more than is good for him, although he may abstain from alcoholic drink, is intemperate. A man who drinks a pint of water where half a pint would suffice is intemperate. A man who chooses to work beyond his strength and damages his constitution thereby is intemperate. A man who "sleeps the clock round" of twelve hours when eight would suffice is intemperate. A man who becomes angry on slight provocation is intemperate. It need scarcely be remarked that but a very moderate amount of malice, fraud, lying, and deception are needed in a temperate man. If a man never touched alcohol, but was full of "pure cussedness," he is by no means a temperate man. Where the evil passions of human nature revel unchecked, temperance in the true sense of the word is but a name and has no existence.

Temperance in all things is a noble virtue. To regulate the passions; to eat and drink moderately; to be equable in temper; neither to be lazy nor work to excess; to forbear all malice and deception; to avoid anger without a cause, is temperance; but to neglect all this and tack the word on to abstinence from spirituous liquors is a miserable misnomer, and really admits that any vicious scalawag may be a temperate man, which is impossible.

I will just add a fact which will be ignored and scouted here. No people were ever made virtuous or temperate by statute law, by local law, or by compulsion of any law.

F. J. Emary.

Crosswicks, Dec. 1, 1880.

Mr. D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: In thy safe arrival home from thy trip to the Brussels Congress with renewed health and spirit, I most heartily congratulate thee, but am sorry to learn of thy being in arrears for material for publication. We Liberals ought not to allow this. Thee should be compensated for loss of time and thy fine paid. I hav enjoyed reading thy letters written while abroad. After reading The Truth Seeker it is loaned to neighbors, then I send it to friends in several of the states, and even back to the city of New York. We hav not a number on hand though a subscriber more than a year. Please accept the inclosed $5.00 for thy use.

With best wishes for thy continued health and prosperity,
Very truly thine, Caroline S. Ellis.

Many thanks to this kind friend for her generosity. It is not the first proof that has been given of the interest she has taken in sustaining Liberal publications. Every dollar shall be used for that purpose.—Ed. T. S.

DECLINE OF SUPERSTITION.

Mr Editor: At the present time even the most superstitious hav to acknowledge that the myths of antiquity are gradually fading away. As men advance they think less of the next world and more of this, and for that reason superstition opposes enlightenment to the full extent of its power. The superstitious Christian thinks of the time when Christianity held absolute control over the fairest regions of the earth, and regrets that it has not the same power now so that it could exterminate the heretics and wield its iron scepter of ignorance and superstition over this American people. But let me tell the zealous Christians that their power is lost, never, never to return. They hav the same disposition to-day as they had when Huss, Jerome of Prague, and Servetus were put out of the way to uphold the most damnable doctrin that ever was presented to civilized man. Even now I am told that Ingersoll and his followers ought to be hung. Why don't they hang them? Simply because they lack the power. I am glad that they do for if they had the power we would hav another St. Bartholomow, or the horrors of the Inquisition repeated with redoubled fury. Many people mourn because the faith in Jehovah is growing less, as many of the Greeks did when Zeus passed away, and many of the Romans did when Jove was no longer supreme. Science is dethroning the heavens of their gods and putting in their place an infinit number of shining worlds that move in accordance to the rules of nature's immutable law. Brahma no longer governs the affairs of the universe, and Isis and Osiris were nearly forgotten centuries ago. Mars, Jupiter, Jove, and Venus hav all passed away, and upon the face of this fair earth serenely as ever falls the dim luster of the beautiful stars.

Vitziputzli, the supreme god of the Mexicans, no longer sits upon a throne supported by an azure globe of heaven, and Jehovah with a mighty hand and a st etched out arm turns the earth upside down no more.

The false teachings of Christ concerning wealth and the resurrection are now considered fabulous, and the sword he came to bring is no longer wet with the blood of innocent people. Let us rejoice that this is so, for when the myths pass away we will see the dawn of a brighter era. We will rejoice in the advancement of science, and instead of persecuting heretics, men will practice justice and humanity.

Yours truly, W. E. Fairbanks.

Richford, Vt.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: According to history, nearly all people hav had a system of superstition in some form. And their superstition has been blended with their politics, as the chief handmaid. It is so in democratic republican America, although our Constitution declares that "Congress shall not make any established system of religion, or prohibit the free exercise thereof." And yet our government employs chaplains in every department, to make a little silly prayer and force the people to pay their salaries. Hence religion is virtually established. Hence religion is a part of politics, and politics is united with religion, and we are idolators all.

But what is religion? Any system of faith and practice, Webster says. Then the practice of a faith is religion. Dr. A. Clarke says (Com., vol. 5, p. 829), "The word religion was made of two Greek words, 'I fear a demon.'" If so, whoever fears a devil has got religion. Now, join my church and you are all right, so say all. But what was the origin of this absurdity? Why, one legend says that a goose laid an egg and hatched herself from the egg. The origin of all living creatures! The goose laid another egg and hatched out man. That was the origin of man. Another legend (Jos. Antiq., book i, chap. 7) says Abraham got up the Jahos or Jewish God, similar to the goose; God made Abe, and Abe made God. Again, Josephus says (book ii, chap. 12) that Moses made God tell him his name, that was never known before. And he says (book 8, chap. 11) that God made himself. So the goose story is just as true holy scripture as any on earth.

Kersey Graves says that Abraham was the son of Tuva, who was driven from the Hindoos for heresy. And the Chaldeans drove Abe from Mesopotamia for heresy (Antiq., book i, chap. 7). And Abe went among the Phœnicians, and then to Egypt and lied his wife upon Pharaoh, and got rich. Then Abe lied Sarah upon Abimelech; and Isaac lied Rebecca upon Abimelech.

> He knew Abimelech loved his ma like honey,
> And paid his daddy down in silver money,
> Sheep and oxen, asses, slave-, maids, and gold,
> To enjoy the dear old rib a century old.

After all this the Lord appeared to Sarai as he promised, and "the Lord did to her as he agreed to do" (Gen. xxi, 1). "It came to pass"—"Now when!"

The Lord appeared to a virgin espoused to Joseph, and did to her as he agreed to. And she magnified the Lord—made him more than there is of him! (Luke i, 45, Matt. i, 20.)

Thus began the most human-damning of all curses, Judaism and Christianity, the religion of the most proud, boasting, hypocritical, money-loving, civilized nations on earth A. D. 1880. After the preaching of hundreds of millions of mystagog liars twenty thousand years, man's origin and destiny are yet unknown, save what he can learn of his own experience and observation, and always will be. Man knows only by experience and observation. All else is sheer assumption. Our Jewish and Christ book is overwhelming evidence that it is the greatest book of falsehood ever manufactured. And the people of republican America are so crazy after fashion, money, and power that they will not try to know what it contains. (See "Bible of Bibles," by Kersey Graves.) It is true as that the sun shines that no man ever knew a real thing called God or Christ or Ghost, or heaven or hell or soul or angels or devils or spirits, or a future life after we are dead—only priest-forged names and our own imagination. If there be a personal superhuman being in the universe who will not make himself known to us positivly, but send us to an endless hell because we do not believe in him without any evidence, he is worse than all the devils ever preached of. I don't think there is any such being. So good-bye, all priests; I don't want to pay for your prayers. You say God is unchangeable, yet you get on your knees and tell him what to do! Why not let God be honest with himself, and all mankind, male and female, do likewise? That is all we need to hav a good world, but we never can hav one with seven hundred quarreling sects of priests for hard-working people to support.

A LETTER FROM THE OPPOSIT SIDE OF THE GLOBE.

Surveyor General's Office.
Colombo, Ceylon, Oct. 20, 1880.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I hav the pleasure to inclose a draft on the Bank of England for the sum of two pounds, thirteen shillings, being the value of books and tracts appearing in the inclosed list, which is prepared from The Truth Seeker of June 19th, 1880, and the subscription for a year in advance to your paper, and hope that you will kindly dispatch them by return mail.

A few catalogs of Freethought publications, and some specimen copies of any periodicals published in the interest of the Freethought movement in America and Europe, will greatly oblige. My object in getting down these Liberal tracts, etc., is to translate them into the Sinhalese language and to circulate them gratis among the Christians, who are increasing in numbers daily in Ceylon.

I send you a small tract, published under the auspices of the Colombo Theosophical Society, by this mail, which is a translation into Sinhalese of the open letter addressed to the St. John's School Board, by M. Babcock, which appeared in your paper of June 19, 1880, to show you that we are also assisting you in your praiseworthy undertaking in fighting against superstition and bigotry.

I remain, dear sir, Yours sincerely, J. R. de Silva.

Leavenworth, Kan., Nov. 17, 1880.

D. M. Bennett Dear Sir: Noticing you hav returned from your trip abroad, I drop you a note of congratulation, hoping the trip furnished pleasure exceeding your expectations at the time of your departure, and that you may be spared by the great dispenser to resume your old post at the head of The Truth Seeker, not that I think it has been poorly managed during your absence, but because the passengers aboard the Liberal ship always feel better when they know the captain is on board also. This city is full of Liberals, though the League as such never meets. Mr. R. Beiga, the treasurer, says, since the president moved away there has been no meetings held, partly because the older members with settled convictions think it unnecessary and the younger ones don't like to lead. He has money belonging to the League, and it is possible we can get up a revival this winter. I propose to try though I never hav been a member of a League anywhere, and know very little about the process of organization or management. I learn there is a very strong, activ League at Valley Falls, thirty-six miles west from here; hav been requested to lecture there soon; will endeavor to do so, and ascertain at the same time the modus operandi of League construction. While wishing the bolting secularists success, would say that Western Liberals generally are not in sympathy with the movement. The majority with whom I hav talked want no compromise with orthodoxy on the Comstock law business. They no doubt believe with Ingersoll when he said, "A compromise is a proceeding in which hypocrites deceive each other," and they prefer repeal, and so do I. Yours accordingly, M. Fillmore Green.

Martindale, N. Y.

Bro. Bennett: My definition of mental culture and observations is submitted to the hosts of readers of your journal.

DEFINITION.

Education is the truth of the knowledge and wisdom of nature, the tradition of her characters into the language and acts of men, the means to secure the mental harmony of the world.

OBSERVATIONS.

1. The veil of hypothesis is a medium which perverts reason and understanding and causes by pseudo education the holiest and sincere, with the most depraved of men and women, to stumble and fall.

Hence that angel benefactress, sister Slenker, with her astringent cordial for the cure of sexual intemperance, and those intelligent pupils of Euclid, who enlighten us with the dogmas of their master who died not knowing the cause of sunrise.

2. The cure and removal of error is truth. It is life without guile, love not knowing a burden. It is errorless education. It is the cure of sexual intemperance, the precursor of children conceived in love. Its heavenly, sinless rule, "Love one another with pure hearts fervently." Wave of glory roll on, hasten the time when every conjugal heart shall throb hallelujah.

NEW GEOMETRY.

Given a circle and inscribed and circumscribed hexagons. The perimeters and periphery of the circle are unequals, and their areas are unequals, and any amount of bisection cannot reduce them to equality. Hence the accepted quadrature of the circle was not only a misnomer, but a romantic sophistry in mathematics.

Yours for the removal of the hundred-headed dragon of our false system of education, the clog which incapacitates us so that we cannot enjoy the merry dance of universal truth, Rev. W. Isaacs Loomis.

South Dartmouth, Mass, Nov. 28, 1880.

D. M. Bennett, My Dear Friend and Brother: I hav been reading to-day the many communications in your paper of yesterday, and hav been much interested in their perusal, especially in those which congratulate you on your safe arrival home from your European journey. And now, with your permission, I also would like to write a few words of like tenor.

After suffering from cruel imprisonment, deprived of the society of your family, I am sure that your health must hav been restored by traveling through the countries of the old world, which you hav described in so graphic and interesting a manner through the medium of The Truth Seeker. Each week that I receive the paper I am always deeply interested in your letters from Europe, and thank you very much for writing them in such an entertaining manner.

May you, now that you hav returned to your home, be enabled to do valiant service in behalf of the cause which we all hav so much at heart.

I was much interested in the very full account of the banquet and reception given in the city of London, at the Hall of Science, in your behalf, on the evening of Friday, October 29 h. Mr. Bradlaugh spoke noble and ringing words, Mrs. Besant was not one whit behind him in her utterances in welcome to you. All the other speakers did nobly. It was, indeed, an occasion of which you may well be proud, and will go far, very far, to show to those Liberals who left the last Congress of the National Liberal League that your deeds in behalf of a free press and free mails are fully appreciated by the leading Liberals of old England. I think that you will be encouraged in view of this glorious tribute on the part of our English Liberal brethren to greater deeds in behalf of the Liberal cause.

I will not trespass on your time, patience, and space much longer; but before closing I would just allude to a few words occurring in the communication of A. W. Wood, of Kewanee, in yesterday's Truth Seeker. They are as follows: "All men are not Bennetts, Ingersolls, Wrights, Underwoods, Gregg, or Bradlaughs; nor are all women Besants, Slenkers, Wixons, or Colmans." What a glorious array of names hav we here! They are names dear to all the friends of Freethought; and among those noble women whose names are here recorded is that of Susan H. Wixon of Fall River, Massachusetts. I know she will excuse me for thus referring to her in this connection. She has done valiant service in our cause. Years ago her pen was employed in that time-honored champion of the cause, the Boston Investigator. I know not but that she still continues to send her words of truth through its columns. I hav seen her, talked with her, heard her from the forum, and I will say that among all the women of our land who hav done their part in emancipating the public mind from the thralldom of priestcraft and superstition, there is not one who is more devoted and earnest in her efforts.

Pardon the length of this communication. Accept my kind regards. May you prosper in strength, wealth, and happiness. Truly yours, Edwin H. Bartlett.

Eli and Hannah.

BY ALHAZA.

"I saw thee standing 'neath a spreading palm,
No lotus flower more lovely, pale, divine;
I would hav worshiped 'neath the azure sky,
Slighting the perfume of an inner shrine.

"The air is heavy with the breath of flowers;
Thou leanest now on snow and fretted gold;
Sweeter than Isis in a dim recess,
Just from the bath, her bosom white and cold.

"Drink of this cup, I love its fragrant dew.
It makes me joyous, beautiful, and young;
Come, I will whisper words within thine ear
That sacred Orpheus never thought or sung.

"I'll wrap thee in the leopard's gorgeous robe,
With Indian pearls I'll twine thy silken hair;
And while I kiss thy brow and tender arms,
Full many a gem shall burn and sparkle there.

"Thy dark eyes languish; didst thou taste the cup,
The richest fruit thy parting lips shall stain;
Why struggle thus, and dash the wine away?
Is my deep love, my madness, all in vain?"

"Away, old fiend, these precincts are not pure.
Thy breath is foul, thy bosom dark and vile.
This altar, stained with sin, O let me leave,
To find my peaceful flocks, my husband's smile.

"What villains lurk within the holiest shade,
What crimes this venerable pile disgrace,
While angel vestments drape the limbs of ghouls,
And heavenly tissues hide the devil's face."

Progress.

BY ELLA A. BACON.

The car of progress moves along,
Freighted with its vast human throng,
And this the burden of their song,
"Humanity, rise higher;"
Look up to catch the glowing light
Which bursts upon thy yearning sight,
And from the shadows of the night
To beams of truth aspire.

From hampering creeds which bind thee down,
Humanity, look up! Thy crown
Consists not in the bigot's frown
Or stern denunciation;
But rather in kind, loving deed,
To scatter wisdom's precious seed,
The earnest soul which feels its need
Will yield appreciation.

Ye workers in this phalanx grand,
Who strive to spread throughout the land
The truths which lie on every hand,
Waiting for lips to proffer;
The moving caravan of fact
Impels the thinking soul to act,
Regardless of the cataract
Which blinds the creed-bound scoffer.

The world moves, and Galileo,
Within his earnest soul, did know
The truth which he essayed to show
Would yet become a power;
But, menaced with the bigot's threat,
He hushed the proclamation, yet
With bated breath announced the fact
"It moves, this very hour!"

The whispered truth it spread, it grew,
Till priestcraft knew not what to do
With this strong fact, which overthrew
Their heavenly "revelation."
The flat old earth has rounded out,
And science gives a mighty shout,
Which puts old error's host to rout
By progress in the nation.

Confucius and brave Socrates,
And lofty-minded men like these,
In their philosophy did seize
Truths that were inspiring.
That spirit of true progress still
Inspires mankind, and every ill
That now afflicts, progression will,
With energy untiring.

Place every wrong beneath our feet,
And make our homely duties sweet
Till victory shall be complete,
And all the sky be brightened.
And searchers shall not be afraid
To breathe of new discoveries made;
No longer shall we stand dismayed,
For all shall be enlightened.

Whippoorwill.

BY CHARLES BRADLEY.

"—Decendo a l'anima-sospiro."—Dante.

Fading, with the fading light,
Softly he sighed, Dear world, good night.—B.

Let nature, going to her rest,
Lay this song upon her breast;
For nature resteth, as methinks,
When the whippoorwill he winks.

I will, I will, and if you will,
Sing you the song of the whippoorwill;
In the shade of the glade,
Which the deepening twilight made,
This is the song he singeth still,
"Whippoorwill, whippoorwill."

When the evening star appears,
Then his little throat he clears,
And to coming hosts of night,
In the heavens shining bright,
His sweet song he singeth right,
"Whippoorwill, whippoorwill."

Now in awful silence deep
Nature draws the curtain sleep,
Through which the watchful stars do peep;
Still the little notes prolong
The sweet cadence of the song,
"Whippoorwill, whippoorwill."

He nods, he winks, and all is still,
Save the echo from the hill
And the ripple of the rill
And sweet hum of slumbrous air,
Where the unseen rosss are;
And the far, low-breathed waterfall,
Which from music's deep doth call;
He sleeps, and dreaming, singeth still,
"Whippoorwill, whippoorwill."

By PROF. RICHARD A. PROCTOR.

Five of them were delivered at Steinway Hall, this city, in the winter of 1875-6, and were reported phonographically expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER by Miss M. S. Gontcharoff. This is the most popular course of Lectures ever delivered by Professor Proctor, and ought to be in the possession of every person. Price 20 cents.

The titles of the Lectures are:

I. Growth of Worlds.
II. Life and Death of Worlds.
III. Other Worlds than Ours.
IV. Other Suns than Ours.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To Miss Anna Knoop, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers by permission to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Association.

Address Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.
DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.
PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR
Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.
Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED IN MODERN THOUGHT.
BY HENRY C. PEDDER.
Extra cloth, beveled, black and gold back and side stamps, 12mo, 185 pp., price, $1.00.
Everything that we now deem of antiquity was at one time new; and what we now defend by examples will at a future period stand as precedents.—Tacitus.
An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.
He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.
The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.
BY L. FEUERBACH,
Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc
Translated from the German.
Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)
The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

THE POCASSET TRAGEDY THE LEGITIMATE FRUITS OF CHRISTIANITY.
A Discourse by
WILLIAM DENTON.
This is the masterly lecture reprinted in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the best on the subject, and shows in the clearest manner that that sad tragedy was but the to-be-looked-for outcome of the teaching of the Bible.

JUST OUT!
Another Extraordinary Book!
Sixteen Saviors or None;
OR,
The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.
By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind,
Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.
Second Edition.
Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

UNCLE SAM AND AMERICUS.
A DIALOG ON
LAND, LABOR, AND REFORM.
By F. E. BOYD.
Outlines of a plan for a new American national land and labor co-operativ system, by which land and comfortable homes may be secured to the poorest classes of every race, without money or price, with the educational and social advantages of modern civilization. Designed to ameliorate the condition of the struggling masses; to equalize population; to prevent vice, crime, and pauperism; to prevent the recurrence of industrial crises and feuds, labor riots, and popular insurrections; to terminate Indian wars; to avoid or do away with an oligarchy of landlords and capitalists; and to preserve or restore the liberties of the people and the rights of self-government by bringing immediately together the two great elements of universal progress, land and labor.
"The land shall not be sold forever; for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. xxv., 23).

Gems of Thought.

A WISE man proportions his belief to the evidence.—Hume.

REASONING presupposes the trustworthiness of reason.—Parker.

THE simple believeth every word, but the prudent man looketh well to his going.—Prov. xiv. 15.

IF an offense come out of the truth, better it is that the offense come than that the truth be concealed.—Jerome.

HE that takes away reason to make way for revelation puts out the light of both and does much-what the same, as if he would persuade a man to put out his eyes, the better to receive the remote light of an invisible star by a telescope.—John Locke.

IF, after a deliberate and impartial use of our best faculties, a professed revelation seems to us plainly to disagree with itself or to clash with great principles which we cannot question, we ought not to hesitate to withhold from it our belief.—Dr. Channing.

A MISTAKE is not the less so, and will never grow into a truth, because we hav believed it a long time, though perhaps it be the harder to part with; and an error is not the less dangerous nor the less contrary to truth because it is cried up and held in veneration by any party.—Locke.

THE church may flourish for a time in sentiment, its pews may be filled by its deftly advertised social entertainments, but only the power of thought can save it as a dominant instrumentality toward the higher civilization of the coming century. The final test of its success is not numbers, but the awakening of truer thinking and the inspiring of nobler character.—W. J. Potter.

A MAN that is of judgment and understanding shall sometimes hear ignorant men differ, and know well within himself that those which so differ mean one thing, and yet they themselves would never agree. And if it come so to pass in that distance of judgment which is between man and man, shall we not think that God above that knows the heart doth discern that frail men, in some of their contradictions, intend the same thing, and accepteth of both.—Bacon's Essays.

IT is not given to those who do not prize straightforwardness for its own sake to perceive that it is the wisest course. The maxim that "honesty is the best policy" is one which perhaps no one is habitually guided by in practice. An honest man is always before it, and a knave is generally behind it. He does not find out till too late

What a tangled web we weave
When first we practice to deceive.
—Archbishop Whately.

THE Reformers were at first nearly as much disposed as their opponents to force their own interpretations of scripture on every one, and to call in the magistrate to suppress heresy by force. But not being able to agree among themselvs whose interpretation of scripture should be received as authoritativ, and who should be entrusted with the sword that was to extirpate heresy, compromises and mutual concessions gradually led more and more to the practical adoption of principles whose theoretical truth and justice is even yet not universally perceived. —Archbishop Whately.

THERE is no one of us but ought to engage in the important work of self-reformation. And according to the well-known proverb, "If each man would sweep before his own door, we should hav a clean street." Some may hav more and some less of dust and other nuisances to sweep away; some of one kind and some of another. But those who hav the least to do hav something to do; and they should feel it an encouragement to do it that they can so easily remedy the beginnings of small evils before they hav accumulated into a great one. Begin reforming, therefore, at once; proceed in reforming steadily and cautiously, and go on reforming for ever.—Archbishop Whately.

THE great truth has finally gone forth to all the ends of the earth that man shall no more render account to man for his belief, over which he himself has no control. Henceforth nothing shall prevail upon us to praise or to blame anyone for that which he can no more change than he can change the hue of his skin or the hight of his stature. Henceforward, treating with entire respect those who conscientiously differ from ourselves the only practical effect of the difference will be to make us enlighten the ignorant on the one side or the other from which it springs, by instructing them, if it be theirs; ourselvs, if it be our own, to the end that the only kind of unanimity may be produced which is desirable among rational beings —the agreement proceeding from full conviction after the freest discussion.—Brougham.

MAKE home just as much of a paradise as you can. If too poor to buy costly knicknacks or expensiv furniture, first make the place sweet and clean, and then glad and gay with flowers and vines. Fill all the air with pleasant words, cheerful smiles, and good deeds, and you will make it worthy to be called by a name, which is second to none save that of love itself, "Home, sweet Home." Economize so that you may hav enough to use, enough to enjoy, and enough to make sunny, glad, and bright your life, the life of those dependent upon you for happiness, and as many more of earth's inhabitants as you can.

"Then pleasant as the morning light,
In peace shall pass your days,
And heart-approving radiant joy
Illuminate your ways." —Slenker.

THE WILLIAM GOAT.

Mary had a William goat,
And he was black as jet;
He followed Mary 'round all day,
And liked her! you just bet!

He went with her to school one day,
The teacher kicked him out;
It made the children grin, you know,
To hav the goat about.

But though old Whackem kicked him out,
Yet still he lingered near;
He waited just outside the door
Till Whackem did appear.

Then William went to meet the man—
He ran his level best;
And met him just behind you know,
And just below the vest.

Old Whackem turned a somersault;
The goat stood on his head,
And Mary laughed herself so sick
She had to go to bed.

LUCY L. CHURCHILL,
West Richfield, Summit Co., Ohio.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT,

Of Boston, Massachusetts, writes: "I should be happy to pay for and wear on all suitable occasions the beautiful badge you hav designed to distinguish the friends and advocates of liberty from the slaves of a false theology. 'Universal Mental Liberty' is not a creed to be ashamed of, whether Christian theology be true or false."

Again he writes: "On my recent return from the West I found your letter and beautiful badge waiting for me. I am quite delighted with it, and could not ask for anything better. I fully agree with you as to its utility and importance, as well as its beauty. It is not obtrusiv or ostentatious, but unique, attractiv, and comprehensivly Liberal. This round, terraqueous globe, so motherly and grand to us, though such a tiny, white, blue, and green speck among the immensity of worlds, ought to be unspeakably dear to every man, woman, and child of us. We should be proud, every one of us, to beautify it and wear its image in pure gold on our bosoms. This sign, that we embrace the whole of it in our hearts, and mean to do our best to make it a heaven, is the sign to conquer under."

H. L. GREEN,

Of Salamanca, New York, writes: "I am much pleased with your 'Freethinkers' Badge Pin.' It is a splendid design, and every Freethinker and every member of the Liberal League should hav one and wear it 'to be seen of men,' and women, too, and thus 'let their light shine.' Send me one as soon as they are completed."

After he received a badge, he writes: "Your Badge Pin received, and I am much pleased with it. I am confident you will hav a large sale. I hope so, at least, for it is just what the Liberal public need. We want something by which we can recognize each other, and I can think of nothing better than your gold pin. The design is admirable. If I were a Spiritualist, I should say you were under the spirit control of Thomas Paine when you designed it."

JAMES PARTON,

Of Newburyport, Mass., writes: "Your idea of an external and visible sign for the friends of mental liberty to exhibit to one another on their persons, seems to me very good. In union there is strength. In union there is also conscious strength; i. e., courage. A quiet, pretty badge, such as you propose, can certainly do no harm. I should like to wear one. But it must be pleasing, for part of our mission here is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly."

Later he writes: "I hav received the beautiful badge."

ELMINA D. SLENKER,

Of Snowville, Va., writes: "My little box with its precious contents received. I highly approve of a badge. I used to wish years and years ago that Liberals would wear some token by which they could recognize each other, and no prettier one could be wished for than thine. Good Templars and Masons are displaying their badges all around Snowville, and now it will be honored, graced and blessed by one badge for U. M. L., a better, grander, and nobler motto than is displayed by any other on earth."

LUCY N. COLMAN,

Of Syracuse, N. Y., writes: "It has been the habit of almost all peoples from the earliest times down to the present, to speak in symbols. Your badge is beautiful and expressiv; significant in all its suggestions. I shall be very glad to wear it, and, by wearing, be recognized as an acknowledged Freethinker. Once the cross seemed to me beautiful; but it speaks of servitude and persecution. Let us abolish it for the symbol of freedom and knowledge."

MARY E. TILLOTSON,

Of Vineland, N. J., writes: "The little treasure which will serve as introduction, presentation, keepsake, and badge, is all safe in hands that will try to make it avail much to you, as well as the cause. I am pleased to find your Badge Pin approved, and would gladly see the symbol of progressiv truth on every breast till triumphant liberty unites its scientific leaves so firmly around the planet that error, blind, and evil, open eyed will feel their fall and seek to rise by reason's light and love's subliming power. Since humanity is imitativ and needs example above precept, the living out of goodness is the potent teaching while a sign that hails the passing eye and prompts the incipient thought is near kindred to them both, like the banner on the tower, to the wall and sentinel. Let men having already the costume badge of physical capacity for what freedom claims, pin it with the sign of mental liberty. Let women assume such badge as soon as possible, rend their chains and cast off their silken clogs, regardless of scandal, which is but the contemptible lash of sham popularity. I hav gained the costume badge of individual might, and am pleased to crown it with the sign of integral liberty."

E. C. WALKER,

Of Norway, Iowa, writes: "After following me over a good part of the state, the beautiful badges finally overtook me here. Every wholesouled Secularist should wear one of these most appropriate emblems. I felicitate you upon the good taste and skill displayed in the design and finish of these badges. May you sell thousands of them is the sincere wish of your radical friend."

J. T. HOUGHEY,

Of Paola, Kan., writes: "It is the article every Liberal should hav, and if I can assist you in its sale I will do so gladly."

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY.

BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,

Graduate of the Hygeio-Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.

The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Notes and Clippings.

A BUILDING for 160 boys is soon to be added to Girard College.

PROF. ARNDT, of Leipsic, who has been devoting himself for some time to the study of Goethe's life and writings, has discovered a hitherto unknown work of the poet, a "Singspiel" in prose, which will soon be published in proper form.

THE Rev. F. W. Fraeger, of St. Paul, says that a clerical training totally unfits a man for mercantil pursuits. The reverend gentleman combined storekeeping with preaching, and before three months had elapsed he had forged a note for $1,500.

THE Rev. Henry Morgan, the Talmage of Boston, preached a series of sermons entitled "Boston Inside and Out," and they were afterward published in a book. His secretary now sues for royalty, claiming that he wrote all the sermons, and Morgan none.

THE preliminary agreement between Russia and the Vatican provides for the equality of the Russian and Polish languages in religious teaching, for free communication between Polish Catholics and the Pope, and for the removal of all civil disabilities on converts to Romanism.

THE Rev Mr. Dobson, of Muncie, Ind., was a Universalist, but now says that Universalism is only a pretext for Atheism, and that it is lacking in Christianity. Therefore he leaves his old faith and becomes a Congregationalist. He seems to hav found there is after all virtue in a belief in hell.

MORIARTY, who had been assaulted by Mr. Schmidt, appeared against him in a San Francisco police court. "Did he hav a provocation to strike you?" the justice asked. "He may hav had something of the kind concayled about his person, but it was a brick he struck me wid," replied Moriarty.

NEW YORK and Wisconsin produce the greater part of the Limburger cheese manufactured in this country, which amounts to thousands of tons. It costs less than half the price of the imported article, and is more profitable than any other cheese, because more weight is obtained from a given quantity of milk, and better prices are realized.

U. N. ARNOTT, an old member of the West Virginia Legislature, and once its President, while on his way home from a religious meeting on a dark night, took a path along an overhanging cliff, trusting to his familiarity with the ground for safety, but a misstep sent him down the precipice, and his neck was broken. If he had not gone to a religious meeting he would hav been alive to-day.

THE Jesuits banished from France are said to be taking over to Jersey over 18,000,000 francs, to be laid out in the purchase of property there, as well as 3,000,000 francs to Malta for the purpose of founding a college, while the inhabitants of Poitiers complain that their town will lose 10,000,000 francs by the shutting up of the college. What an amount of filthy lucre these pious heaven-lovers succeed in accumulating.

THE Rev. Lewis Barber was the most popular negro preacher in Georgia. He had a circuit of four congregations, with a membership of about 3,000 persons, over whom his sway was absolute in both temporal and spiritual affairs. He died several months ago. Over the pulpit of his church in Lee county an effigy of cloth and straw, blackened with charcoal, has been placed to represent the dead pastor. This rude image is regarded with awe by the negroes, some of whom are said to bow before it in worship.

THE total abstainers' argument that even the beasts will not drink alcoholic fluids is often met by adverse facts. In Grass Valley, Cal., all the hogs on a ranch went on a spree together. The contents of a wine cask ran out into a pool, and they found the beverage good. The account says: "Some were frisky and full of play, others belligerent and swaggering around hunting up fights; some maundering around in an imbecil way, walking in corkscrew style, and tumbling over the least obstruction that lay in their path, while several of the larger hogs, that had managed to get in the heaviest loads, were incapable of motion."

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK has made a discovery which may turn out of some importance to our Western farmers. In the neighborhood of the site of ancient Troy Sir John has come across a beetle whose mission it seems to be to destroy locusts by consuming their eggs. Even before they arrive at the dignity of full grown beetles, while in the grub stage of their development, they begin their attack on the unhatched young of the "winged destroyer." The voracity of the Lubbock beetle is said to be extraordinary, and some of them seem to be able to destroy the whole crop of "hoppers," and they hav actually done so in certain parts of Asia Minor this season.

THE Marriot Aeroplane Compally for Navigating the Air is a San Francisco concern. The projector of the enterprise assures the stockholders that "matters are so far along that a few weeks more will see a machine in practical operation," and in the mean time he keeps up their courage with such verses as this:

Now high, now low, away I go,
A twist of wrist will lift me;
The steerer's hand has full command
In any way to shift me.
I want no sails, or costly rails,
Or land appropriation;
My track runs through the ether blue
That's free to every nation.

SUN spots that can be seen by the unassisted eye are rare. Such a spot is now visible a little to the right of and below the center of the sun's disk. By protecting the eye with a piece of smoked or colored glass the spot may be seen like a black speck on the smooth yellow surface. An opera glass magnifying three or four times makes the spot conspicuous. A telescope shows it to be composed of two huge spots, each many thousand miles in extent, and surrounded by a vast shadowy border, or penumbra. A notion may be formed of the tremendous forces that are at work upon the sun when it is recollected that the earth could probably be dropped into either of the huge chasms that this spot contains. Yet such holes in the sun are often formed or closed up in a few days, or even a few hours.

A pout and a parting of lips as they touch,
That's a kiss in the abstract. It does not seem much;
But where is the language can rightly express it?
What letters can sound it to help you to guess it?
What simile suggest, or what fancy reveal,
The mysterious bliss it can cause you to feel?
Here nature assuredly won a diploma
For fragrance of flavor and perfect aroma.
A kiss is electrical—comes with a start
That tingles a delicate shock to the heart,
And sets the eyes twinkling with rapturous delight,
Like stars in the sky of a clear frosty night.
When 'tis over the ecstacy clings to you yet;
'Tis a joy to remember and never forget.
All pleasure condensed in an instant of bliss
Can but partly describe what's contained in a kiss.

THE book called "Scotch Sermons" has made a wonderful stir in the Established church of Scotland. It is charged that they contain denials of no less than twelve of the leading doctrins set forth in the Presbyterian Confession of Faith. They question the authority of some parts of the gospels, and throw doubt on the authenticity of several of the miracles as recorded. An attempt to bring the writer to ecclesiastical justice has been made in Presbytery, but has not as yet been a success, the Presbytery being largely tinctured with the same alleged heterodoxy. The matter will be carried to Synod and to General Assembly. There is a prospect of quite as lively a controversy over this sermon book as that which has almost rent the Free church of Scotland in the Robertson Smith discussion. The ultra-orthodox men are alarmed at the spread of heresy, and those who are in sympathy with the newer views tell the ultra-orthodox not to be alarmed, for even if the views promulgated are not exactly in sympathy with the Westminster Confession, they are in accordance with those set forth in the scriptures. The ultra-orthodox, on the other hand, claim that the Westminster Confession and the Bible are in perfect harmony.

JONATHAN H. GREENE, once the most notorious and successful gambler in America, and afterward known as an exposer of gamblers' tricks, is now aged and poverty stricken in Philadelphia. From 1831 to 1842, he won money right and left, not only from amatuers, but heavily from professional players. On one occasion he took $86 000 from a party of card sharpers in three days. He was wonderfully skilful in handling cards, and invented several of the swindling devices still used by faro dealers. At length he renounced his evil ways, restored a great deal of money to men whom he had robbed, and spent the rest of his fortune in the advocacy of laws against gambling. The statutes on the subject in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Ohio were largely passed through his exertions. In lectures and books he described the means by which he had won, but this after a while failed to yield him a living. His family are now supported by charity.

THE Spread-the-Light Club, an association recently formed in Brooklyn for the purpose of diffusing knowledge on social and scientific subjects among the masses, held its initiatory meeting recently at the club's hall in Fulton street. There was a large attendance, mostly of workingmen. Mr. Henry George, of California, delivered an address. The name of the club, he said, embodied the great duty of the hour. The many injustices which prevail among men were the fruits of their own ignorance, and there could be no higher duty than to find the truth and spread the light. Until this was done it would be useless to attempt anything. In countries where workmen were ground down to a mere pittance it was impossible for a republic to exist. In our own country the monstrous inequality between the classes is becoming greater every year. The world has never before seen such an aristocracy as exists in our great railroad magnates to-day. They are citizens, but they wield a greater power than has been held by many kings. These things confront us to-day, and lie directly across the path of the republic. It is to discuss these questions that the society has been organized. Mankind must mount up into the ideas of social justice or follow the path that every preceding nation has followed to anarchy and ruin. The time has come when our civilization must take that move or go down. The speaker spoke strongly in support of the abolition of private property in land. The land question, he averred, was not an Irish question, but the fight of the times for the regeneration of mankind. This was the great cause of inequality.

THE Rev. James W. Cole, a Methodist pastor of Charlemont, Mass., is a nice man of God! His case has been before the public for over a year, and has just been tried in a court of law. Mr. Cole married a girl who had been his first wife's servant. He had been accustomed to enforce severe discipline in his family, but the new Mrs. Cole rebelled against his rule, and became violent in her conduct. He claimed that she was at times insane, and had her sent to an asylum; but the physicians hav since testified that she was rational while there, and she was soon discharged. Her mental trouble arose from pregnancy. Rumors that the minister habitually whipped his wife were circulated in Charlemont. She showed a blackened eye, which she said her husband had caused with his fist. One day her cries for help were heard by neighbors, and when they went in they found her on her knees, while her husband stood over her with a whip in his hand. Her shoulders bore the marks of blows, and she declared that he had frequently beaten her. Cole was tried by his conference. He admitted that he had struck his wife, but pleaded that he could subdue her in no other way. He said that she had assaulted him, and by hitting him in his blind eye injured it so that he could not wear a glass substitute. The conference exonerated him. Encouraged by this success with his own brethren, he began a suit for damages against the Greenfield Gazette, which had published a truthful account of the affair. In the course of the trial, counsel urged the admission of certain testimony because it had been used by the conference. Judge Pitman ruled against it, and said, "Heaven forbid that we should follow the rules of evidence of ecclesiastical trials." The verdict was different from the ecclesiastical one, too, being for the defendant.

Letter from Europe.—No. 17.

RETURN TO LONDON.

LONDON, Oct. 26, 1880.

DEAR READERS: Now that I have performed quite a respectable share of my homeward journey, I shall have to detain you much less time with my dull descriptions than I have hitherto done. I left Naples on Wednesday morning, and the next morning was in Turin and on Friday morning in Paris, where I stopped one day, taking the cars in the evening for Dieppe, en route for London, where I arrived on Saturday afternoon, the 16th inst.

It rained at Naples a trifle as we took the train, but it lasted only a short time. We had a fine view of the suburbs of the town as we left the city behind, and as the road makes an extensive circuit in the level Campagna of Naples, between two ranges of high hills or mountains, for nearly an hour and a half I sat and watched Mount Vesuvius as it slowly receded in the distance. As it thus retired from our presence I instinctively said:

"Good-bye, old Vesuve. I have come a long way and at some expense to see you, but I do not begrudge it. You are a grand old fellow—the grandest I have seen. I have wanted to see you from my boyhood days; now I return to my home well satisfied. You have fully met my expectations; you have not been overrated; you meet the descriptions in the bills; you certainly cannot be ranked among the frauds of modern times. Smoke away, if that sort of amusement pleases you, and belch fire and flame for another hundred thousand years, as you have for the hundred thousand of years that are past, but don't be naughty any more and bury unsuspecting thousands of the sons and daughters of men as you have done in the past. If you cannot be entirely civil, be as civil as you can, and at least give timely warning before you send your overwhelming floods of fire and smoke and ashes over those who have deserved nothing amiss of you. Though Abraham and Moses and Samuel and David and Solomon and Jesus knew nothing of your existence, millions have since known you, and millions more will look upon your stern, fiery face with awe, and vast numbers will climb your arid steeps and look down with an intense sense of your grandeur into your burning, belching crater, and hail you as a true son of the universe. Good-bye, Vesuve; I will probably never look upon you again, but I shall remember you until the close of life. Smoke away; belch fire and melted rocks and metal when you will, but do as little harm as possible. Good-bye, Vesuve; good-bye."

I had a fine opportunity in returning to Rome to see in the day-time much of the country which I passed over in the night on my way to Naples. For fifty or sixty miles the railroad passes through valleys, skirted on either side with ranges of mountains and hills with conical and sharp peaks, many of which looked as though they might once have been volcanoes. In places these valleys were five or ten miles wide, while in others one or two miles only. Many of the older towns are situated on the hills, and sometimes almost on the very rocks, where water must be obtained with difficulty. They were probably located on these elevations, both as being easier of defense from enemies and to escape the malaria which in the summer season is the bane of the low lands. The valleys are very fertile, while the hills are rocky and sterile. Many of the more modern villages are upon the level ground and in close proximity to the railroad. The vine is largely cultivated all along, both on the hills and level ground. Wheat is also a prominent crop in many localities. The natives were busy in many places at gathering the grape crop, and many basketfuls and small cart loads of the white and purple grapes were seen being conveyed to the wine press. Nearly one-half the grapes raised are white, and the juice has but little color. Perhaps the white grapes are not quite so prolific as the purple, and the white wine commands a somewhat higher price, and it has a rather more agreeable taste.

I can hardly speak in the highest terms of Italian agriculture, it being, as it seems to me, of a somewhat thriftless character. The land is not cultivated to the best advantage. I am sure the Swiss people would make Italy produce nearly double what it does at present. Much of Italy is covered with very rugged, rocky mountains, the upper portion of which are barren and not susceptible of cultivation, but much of the residue consists of beautiful plains, the most lovely gardens in the world. The Italians are not so fond of hard labor as many of the northern nations, and they have not developed their beautiful country to the fullest possible extent. Their agricultural implements are comparatively crude and clumsy. The hoes which they use are not light and handy as our people use, but are heavy and more like mattocks. Their plows are also much inferior to the plows of America. The same remarks will apply to the farm vehicles and everything used in agriculture.

Improvements are, however, steadily being made, not only in the character of the implements used but in the system of agriculture generally. Much of the land of Italy which was formerly unproductive is now being made to produce bountifully, and large portions of the country which had poor or no markets have now learned to send their produce to the hungry millions in other portions of Europe. This state of things has largely been brought about by a very enterprising Italian by the name of Francisco Cirio, a native of Piedmont, the northwestern province of the country. He was a peasant by birth, but his enterprise, industry, and practical common sense has made him a very wealthy man, besides conferring a great good upon the country. He began by renting for a term of years such neglected and unprofitable lands as could be had at a low price, and upon these he set out vineyards and raised such vegetables and other crops as he could find a market for, and this course he has pursued from year to year until he has brought hundreds and thousands of acres under most successful cultivation, and has opened markets for his produce in almost every northern country of Europe. He engages largely in the cultivation of garden vegetables, and has hundreds of railroad cars for conveying them northward, and has extensive custom in Germany, France, Russia, and other countries. In this way he has made a princely fortune, and has at the same time set a most commendable example to his fellow-countrymen, showing them how to cultivate their land properly, how to make what was regarded waste and poor land productive, and how to find a market in other countries for what can be raised to almost unlimited extent in their country. He took a lease of five years of many tracts of land, and at a merely nominal price only, taking them in a very unproductive condition, and returning the same with flourishing vineyards upon them, or in condition for the highest cultivation. He also bought cheap lands extensively, and of course on these made far greater profits. He has proved a great friend to the agricultural interests of Italy.

This country is justly called the garden of Europe, and is capable of growing half the garden vegetables which Europe needs. I have seen thousands of acres of vegetable gardens teeming with luxuriant horticultural crops of all kinds. Among the numerous products I noticed many fields of cotton, but I thought the crop not so large and luxuriant as grows in the rich bottom lands of Mississippi and others of our Southern states. I am pleased with many of the trees grown in Italy, and with none more so than with a beautiful variety of the acacia, which is largely grown for its neat and cleanly appearance and fine form. Its leaves are about the size of the locust, but the tree is much prettier and more delicate. The mulberry and chestnut are also pretty trees. Italy labors under one serious defect, and that is of fuel. She has but little coal or wood. The most of the coal used is imported, and the railroad trains are propelled, as before observed, by pressed blocks made of coal dust and pitch or asphaltum. These are some six inches square. Wood is very dear, and is furnished in the cities sparingly and at high prices. I have noticed in places where lime is largely burnt that it is done with very light twigs or fagots, the trimmings of fruit trees tied up in bundles and dried. People in our country would not think they could burn lime with such trashy fuel.

The dwellings of the Italian peasants are of a very rude character. In districts where stone is abundant they often consist of rough huts of that material, the roof being also of stone. In other places I saw many huts built entirely of straw, six or eight inches thick, thatched together in the form of an Irish railroad shanty, with the roof coming to the ground, like an old-fashioned hencoop, and without windows, and a hole for a door. It must be a dreary home that such huts afford.

Many of the Italian towns and villages are built on the tops of knolls and hills, and sometimes on the bare rocks. This course was doubtless adopted as easy of defense, as well as being free from the malaria and unhealthiness which prevails on the plains and lowlands. These towns are often unsightly places, and present anything but a neat, cleanly, and attractive appearance. The well-painted American frame houses, with green window-shutters and painted door yard fences, are not seen in these Italian villages.

The women of Italy work in the fields the same as the men, and I am inclined to think they do fully one-half of the out-door work; and the consequence is they are deeply tanned and sunburnt. They are just about as deep in color as our American Indians or mulattoes. In addition to the deepness of color, a marked coarseness of features is observable, which renders the daughters of Italia less attractive than they otherwise would be.

Around every station several of these tawny damsels congregate to sell grapes, pears, and other refreshments, and it is difficult to give them all the money they desire. If you pay them twice as much as their wares are worth they will hold out their hands for more and deprecatingly exclaim, "O signor, O signor!" as though they had been badly cheated. It is amusing also to see how the children are brought up to beg, or how inherent it is in their very natures. At nearly every station at which we stopped, little boys from six to ten years of age gathered around the cars and with most piteous tones begged for money until the train moved on, and even then they would follow so long as their legs would enable them to keep up, crying for soldi at the top of their voices. A German on the train afforded sport to himself and others by throwing out copper coins to see the little urchins tumble over each other in a heap in their eagerness to possess themselves of the coins so thrown.

The buildings in the cities of Italy are much better than those of the smaller villages. They are of hewn stone, or of rough stone covered with stucco and made to closely represent hewn stone. The floors of the better buildings, as before observed, are marble, mosaic, or a beautiful concrete, while the ordinary houses have floors of common stone or tile, the cheaper like large flat bricks and the better glazed and ornamented in a beautiful manner. The inner walls of the houses are not unfrequently finished with these ornamental tiles. The windows invariably open on hinges, like double blinds, opening in the center. This is the universal style in Europe. I think I have not seen a window sash to raise and lower as ours do in America since I have been on this side of the ocean. Perhaps the European plan is the best in some respects, for the whole can be thrown open, whereas if half the sash raises or lowers only half the window is really open.

The return ride to Rome was a pleasant one, we arriving at the Eternal City about the middle of the afternoon. After nearly an hour a train was made up for Turin, when we left the city of popes, cardinals, priests, monks, and churches almost without end, for the last time. The ride of nearly thirty miles across the Campagna, to the coast is not intensely cheering. The country is too monotonous, and there are too many proofs visible of the want of good management of that half-waste land. Instead of being divided up into small plantations and farms, giving homes to hundreds of families, it seems to be in very large tracts and used for pasturing herds of cattle. The houses are long distances apart, and do not look as though occupied by their owners. Much of the stretch of country has a barren appearance, and is greatly subject to malarial fever in summer.

Civita Vecchia is the first town of any importance reached. It was the ancient seaport of the Roman kingdom and was originally called Centum Cellæ. It has a population of some eight thousand. It is the seat of a cardinal-bishop, and has a cathedral, an old castle, a museum of Etruscan and other antiquities, also a fort designed by Angelo, as well as a large convict prison.

The country along the coast for many miles is flat, with a succession of swelling hills and wide plains, desolate and poorly cultivated, with a few miserable cabins and here and there a dilapidated castle or ruined medieval fortress. Considerable herds of cattle of not remarkably fine quality are the principal indication of husbandry to be seen.

The train did not reach Pisa till near midnight. It had been my intention to stop there and view the leaning tower belonging to its cathedral, to climb its 187 feet in hight and look over its side fourteen feet from perpendicular, and see if my great weight would make it fall to the ground. I have had a desire to see that leaning tower ever since I was large enough to lean against my mother's knee and learn about it, but it being in the night, and as it would be necessary for me to lose over twelve hours, and possibly because I felt you imperceptibly drawing me, I concluded not to halt for the leaning tower, and let all the leaning be toward home. I will remark in passing that it was built as a detached tower of the cathedral, and is fifty-two feet in diameter, and was erected nearly seven hundred years ago. Some claim it was built in a leaning position to show what architectural skill could do, but it is far more probable that the leaning has been produced by one side settling in the soft earth more than the other, the foundation stones on the one side being more crowded into the earth than on the other, and the floors being out of level to the extent that the tower leans. The stairs and moldings are also inclined. This tower is additionally made memorable because it was here that Galileo made many of his experiments on falling bodies, and the bronze lamp hanging in the nave of the cathedral is said to have suggested the pendulum to his mind.

There is not very much in Pisa, except the tower, to attract the attention of the tourist save its rather magnificent cathedral; but cathedrals, like old castles and other ruins, after a while lose their novelty; when a person has seen two hundred and forty-nine of them he does not care very much for the two hundred and fiftieth. So it was not hard for me to retain my seat in the train instead of stopping for a day or two in Pisa. The same remarks apply to the old town of Leghorn, with its nearly one hundred thousand inhabitants. Its cathedral is about the only noted feature it boasts.

Neither did I stop at the old city of Genoa, situated on the Gulf of Genoa, and where Christopher Columbus was born. It abounds in palaces and fine cathedrals, but they did not offer sufficient inducement for me to stop over. It was in the latter part of the night when we passed it, but it was not so dark but that I could take some note of the picturesque scenery in its vicinity, among which are grottoes by the water's edge, high cliffs, numerous tunnels, etc. We arrived at Turin at about 5 A.M., after a rather chilly night. I had intended to stop over one day at this model city, but the desire to hurry on still possessed me, and I concluded not to halt. It is a rich, pleasant, and somewhat modern city, and a day could be pleasantly passed there, though it has no special attractions.

As we neared the mountains to the north of Turin we perceived that for a circuit of fifty or one hundred miles they were white with snow. The highest peaks are covered with perpetual snow, being a part of the Alpine range; but probably the larger share of what we saw was the result of a recent storm, and but temporary in duration. The change, however, from the mild, genial air of Naples was marked. For several miles our road was through a beautiful country, teeming with signs of a thrifty culture, the mulberry trees and the vine growing in luxuriance, and the mountains in the distance affording a strong contrast to the plain immediately around us. In due time we gradually began to make the mountain ascent by the side of the river Dora, which grew smaller and smaller as we increased our altitude and neared its source. The grade of the road is not excessively heavy, but is constant; and when the Mount Cenis tunnel is reached, in the course of twenty-five miles, an altitude of two or three thousand feet must be gained. As we rose higher and higher, the valley through which we passed became more and more narrow, and the mountains beside us more rocky and precipitous. Many small villages were passed away up in the narrow valley and ravine, where it would seem there was hardly soil enough to sustain even a very small community; but the sides of the mountain steeps are clad with the vine, much as along the Rhine and the approach to the Simplon pass in Switzerland. The disposition is evinced to make every foot of ground available where the vine will grow. The little villages clustered up there among the rocks reminded me of the same feature when crossing the Alps. It seemed singular that men should build villages in such places. Of course they are humble in character; the houses are not large nor rich, but are the abodes of a frugal, industrious people. The church, with its spire, is never absent where fifty houses or more are to be seen, and the black-robed priests may be seen gliding around among the people, who toil to feed and clothe them. Yes, few elevations among those mountains are so high but that villages and hamlets are to be seen; few so high but that churches and priests are found which the people cheerfully support. Thus it probably will be until they have learned a better way.

There is much grand and picturesque scenery in ascending Mount Cenis. We approached very near to the peaks of the Alps, whose tops were white with snow. We could look out the car windows and up almost perpendicularly for two or three thousand feet, and trace the piles of solid mountains of rock all around us. Waterfalls and cascades were frequently passed, and the rapid mountain streams were rushing to reach the plains miles below. There is a great deal of grandeur and sublimity dwelling amid those Alpine ranges. We must have passed through more than twenty tunnels, varying in length, before we reached Mount Cenis tunnel proper. Several times we closed the windows of the car to exclude the sulphurous smoke, thinking we were passing through the longest tunnel in the world, but as often we soon emerged again into daylight, perhaps to find another and another village away up there among those mountain peaks. At length, however, we reached the main Mount Cenis tunnel, and were twenty-five minutes passing through it. I do not remember what the statistics are in reference to it, but think it must be five miles in length, while the shorter tunnels on either side must be about as much more. Those ten miles of tunneling through solid rock cost years of labor and millions of francs to accomplish.

The descent from the altitude we had gained, so far as mountain scenery is concerned, was much like the ascent. High and sharp peaks, lofty cliffs, picturesque cascades and waterfalls, were passed in considerable numbers, and the same class of mountain villages were observed, the denizens of which seemed to be struggling for an existence. In rising to the tunnel the Dora had become a very small stream and finally run out altogether, but anon as we descended toward the French valleys to the north another stream bore us company; constantly augmenting by the tributaries which continually flowed into it from the mountain sides along the way, in a dozen miles it grew to be a large stream. It was interesting to note its increasing size, and the beautiful panorama of small farms, snug villages, and picturesque scenery which was spread out before us as we rolled past, rapidly passing one view after another on our course to the plains below.

We soon reached the French frontier, and in the mountain village of Modane we again went through the formality of having our baggage examined by French Custom House officers. They are not at all rigid in their examination, and like the most of the officers of the various governments on the continent, wish to throw as few obstructions as possible in the way of travelers who visit their countries to see its sights and disseminate their money among their citizens. In this particular they show good sense, for it is good policy not to make the ingress and egress annoying to strangers. I think my satchel has been opened but once or twice for Custom House officials to ascertain what I carry. A negative answer to their inquiries whether I have spirits, tobacco, cigars, perfumery, and jewelry satisfies them, and they let me pass easily.

It was at this station that I had an interview with the Right Reverend Lord Bishop of Rochester, of England, we being passengers on the same train. He is next in authority to the Archbishop of Canterbury and consequently the second in command in the English division of God's great moral vineyard. He is a modest, gentlemanly man and does not seem to think he stands very much nearer the throne of God than some other men and women. We had a little conversation together, but it was principally about the customs of custom houses, baggage, etc. He has been taking an excursion in Italy, the same as myself, but I will wager a bushel of wheat against a quart of buckwheat that he gets ten times as large a salary as I do, and got rid of four times the amount of money I did while on this trip. There is some similarity in the positions occupied by us; we are both trying to disseminate our peculiar views and to induce our fellow-beings to think as we do, but he is sustained by far the greater number, and makes it infinitely more remunerative than I do. I, however, have the advantage of him in one respect: I teach nature's truths, while he is advocating the baldest and most senseless superstitions.

Now as I am leaving sunny Italy, probably forever, a few parting words will perhaps be in place. It is indeed a beautiful land, having a very agreeable diversity of mountains and plains; it possesses the most beautiful climate in the world, with as much sunshine as almost any country can boast, and as balmy, genial air as any land can claim, with as small a proportion of storms and tempests as any country knows. It is largely surrounded by the most lovely seas on the globe, and has all the natural advantages that any portion of the earth can lay claim to. Its history runs far back into antiquity, and its ancestry was perhaps equal to what any country can claim. Brave warriors in almost countless numbers were born in that land. Their victorious arms spread over all the known parts of the world. In art and literature that land did much for the world; in fact, no country has produced such a wonderful profusion of statues and paintings. In mechanical arts few lands have surpassed Italy. In the wealth of poetry and music it has greatly abounded. But in spite of all this Italy occupies to-day a subordinate position among the most enlightened nations of the world. Although the old Etruscans and Romans were among the most noble ancestry which the world has produced, their descendants are to-day to a great extent a race of imbeciles, ignoramuses, and beggars. From the first country in the world Italy has moved away down to nearly the foot of the class. From the position of being the bravest nation in the family of nations, it has become one of the most puerile and pusillanimous; from being the most learned nation in the world it has become one of the most ignorant of those which lay claim to intelligence; from being one of the proudest and most imperious of nations it has become one of the most abject and cringing; from being a nation of heroes and rulers it has become one of dependent and superstitious cowards.

There is a cause, or series of causes, for these great changes, and that cause is largely the Christian religion, or the special phase of it exhibited in that country. Italy has been the most ardent Christian nation on the earth, and has for centuries been the headquarters for the religion and its church. Italians have for hundreds of years been successively elected to the papal throne, and, with a fearful array of Italian cardinals they have, with an iron hand ruled the destinies of Christendom. This power has absolutely crushed out the independence and manhood which inhered in the Italian people, and has had a very similar effect upon many other nations where that religion has been in the ascendant.

This state of things, like a huge and cruel monster, has rested upon this unfortunate people generation after generation. Italy is to-day cursed with its religion. The baneful pall of priestcraft, like an incubus, like a huge vampire, has settled down upon it age after age, seeking its best life blood, and depriving it of the pure light and breezes of heaven.

Italy is the dirtiest, the most religious, and the most utterly priest-ridden country in the world. In no country are there so many expensive cathedrals and churches. In no country have so many millions been expended in establishing what is called the religion of Jesus. In no country is the Virgin Mary—the mother of their God—so extensively and so expensively worshiped. In no country are the useless saints of the church so greatly revered, and nowhere have such vast sums of money been expended in making countless marble images and the paintings of the highest artists to perpetuate their memory and fasten this huge "Man of the Mountain" upon the people.

In Rome alone, and that is not the largest city in the kingdom, are nearly four hundred churches, one of which alone cost from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000, and many of the others are very expensive, costing millions of dollars each. It is by no means an extravagant estimate that the churches of Rome cost the enormous sum of $500,000,000. This immense amount of money has been wrung from the people by playing upon their fears and ignorance, and filling them with the most absurd and pernicious falsehoods.

Naples has some three hundred churches; Florence has between one and two hundred; Venice has a similar number; the same with Milan, Bologna, Turin, Leghorn, Genoa, and the hundreds of smaller cities and towns. It is not too much to say that Italy has five thousand churches, which, with their foolish decorations and adornments, have cost the people $3,000,000,000.

In Rome alone there are seven thousand priests, including the indolent monks, and all of them combined do not perform so much manual labor as would suffice to grow and harvest one bushel of potatoes or onions. In the whole country there cannot be less than one hundred thousand of these useless priests. This fearful array of worthless, heavenly vagabonds claim that they are in the service of the God of the universe; that without their very valuable services his work and his kingdom would come to naught.

At the head of this miserable hireling class is one who is called God's vicegerent, and who claims that he has power to act for God, to speak his word and will, and that to this same priest is due the same homage and obedience which belongs to God himself. The poor people, in fear of the hell and purgatory which have been held up before their distempered visions for centuries, have accepted this claim, and readily accord this head-priest the same homage which they are told his master demands. Men having clear minds will inevitably see that such absurd and lying doctrines must produce the worst kind of mental degradation.

In several of the larger Italian cities are over one thousand priests each, while there is hardly a village or hamlet so humble and small that has not one or more of these expensive and exacting appendages—members of this celestial aristocracy, for whom the people have the privilege to labor and toil. Yes, including the monks who act as priests, there is probably in the whole of Italy not less than one hundred thousand priests, and some believe the number is much greater. Think for a moment what it costs the people to sustain this worthless class of men, and what a vast sum has been so consumed within the past fifteen centuries! Think for a moment of the system of basest lies this priestly class have taught the people and fastened upon them, like a nightmare, to obtain and perpetuate this power! They have constantly told the ignorant masses about a terrible God who resides somewhere above the clouds, but of whom neither they nor anybody else knows anything at all. The dread of this fearful God and the big devil he is said to have made to torment and torture poor helpless children, men, and women has been sufficient to hold this people in the most abject terror and slavery. Suppose that money had been expended in teaching the laws of the universe—the very information those people need—and in building schoolhouses every few miles, paying for good teachers for the children, and in building good dwellings for the people—think for a moment how much wiser, better, and happier that people would now be, and how many less would now be occupying the hells of ignorance and crime.

The expense of running a single church alone in Rome, with the one hundred priests attached to it, is said to be over one hundred thousand dollars per year. The cost of the 375 churches and the seven thousand priests cannot be less than $250,000 yearly in Rome alone. In the whole of Italy it cannot be less than five million dollars annually. You may well exclaim: "What a load for a poor people to carry! What an imposition upon a credulous, ignorant, superstitious populace!"

But these are the people who are able to boast of the blessings of the Christian religion. This is the land where this blessed religion has flourished in its greatest purity and activity. From this country this system of faith has gone forth to other nations—to all included in the term Christendom. From Italy the Christian world has obtained its creed, its dogmas, its superstitions, its blinding faith in a terrible God and devil, in the supreme rule of the Son and his mother, and all the beautiful or ridiculous, as you please, claims and falsehoods making up the expensive Christian system. In fact Christendom has nothing in the way of religion that it did noe obtain from Italy. Here, too, was got the Inquisition, its horrible subterranean dungeons for heretics, its ripping knives, its rack, its wheel, its pincers, its pulleys, its boot, its stake, and all the infernal paraphernalia for torturing and murdering heretics which the church has invented.

Very natural questions to ask are: "What has been gained by all this enormous outlay and all this cruelty? Has God been in the slightest degree benefited? Has man been blessed by this great and foolish outlay of treasure to build up these absurdities and lies? Have the people of Italy received an adequate return for this heavy investment? Has the sun shone any brighter, have the showers been more gentle, has the soil produced any more abundantly, has nature been any more lovely, for all the priests have done?" No, no, no! none of these have been accomplished; but instead of this thousands of men and women have been made wretched, their ignorant minds have been filled with fear and terror, they have looked upon God as an unfeeling tyrant who willingly thrusts his creatures into eternal fires, they have been made to bow cringingly before designing priests who, by false representations, have robbed them of their hard earnings and deprived them of the peace of mind to which all the sons and daughters of men are equally entitled.

The rule of priestcraft has been the most terrible the world has known, and all in the name of God and religion. Italy has been the seat of this tyranny, for here priestcraft has had its home. Here their power has been greater than in any other country, and here its terrible blight has been greater than in any other land.

It is easily perceived that I am not a lover of the priestly class. I take no pains to disguise my antipathies toward them. I regard them as the enemies of their race. When I see them in Italy, France, and Germany, moving stealthily about in their long black garb, I instinctively feel that I behold the positive enemies of human kind, the promulgators of falsehood; that they are only the pretended agents and ministers of heaven, and that the evil they do in the world far transcends the good. This class of men have indeed been a curse to Italy, and through Italy to all Christendom. I trust the day is not far in the future when this class of men will be estimated at their correct value, and that even the people of Italy will get their eyes sufficiently open to see that the priestly class are enemies, not friends; tyrants, not liberators; destroyers, not saviors. May even Italy learn to be wise, and may it be prosperous and happy! May its thousands of priests cease to make it their avocation to delude their fellow-beings by false claims and pretensions, and learn to follow an honest employment for a livelihood. May priestcraft die a natural death, and may men and women become mentally emancipated, prosperous, and happy!

But let us leave the priests and all the religious trappings of Italy and hasten on our journey. At Guloz, a fine mountain town, we halted, and the train from Geneva joined us. We passed gradually down among the French slopes and declivities of the Alps, enjoying the beautiful scenes so bountifully lavished upon our vision. At length in the plain below we reached a beautiful lake of several miles in length, of which the train nearly made a circuit, passing through several tunnels cut in the prominent rocks which line a portion of the shores.

Being anxious to prosecute my return with all reasonable diligence I stopped at neither Marseilles, Lyons, Dijon, or any of the towns through which or near which we passed. Our journey being toward the north we were constantly nearing the source of cold, and the long square metallic vessels containing hot water which were placed in the compartments of the cars to put our feet upon were by no means disagreeable. These were changed once during the night. We had frequent reminders that we had left the balmy summer air of Naples far behind.

Nothing occurred on our night ride to Paris particularly worthy of notice. The country is interesting and we could see its outlines, but night-riding is unfavorable for seeing the beauties of a journey. We arrived at Paris between four and five in the morning, and before daylight had assumed the supremacy. But by the time the passengers and their baggage were stowed away in the scores of carriages, busses, etc., it was light, and we sped on a three or four mile ride through Paris in the early part of the day. I stopped at the same hotel—Madame Feron's—at which I stopped in August. After breakfast and a little letter writing I made my way to the New York Herald office to look over late papers from home, devouring political and other news with avidity. Two hours at least were agreeably spent in that way.

I found no lack for objects to visit during the only day I proposed to devote to the great French city, but I preferred to revisit some of the places where I had agreeebly passed the time when there in August to looking up new novelties. The Louvre was one of these places. I again fondly strolled through its miles of galleries of paintings, halls of statuary, and vast rooms of antiquities and endless curiosities. It is decidedly one of the greatest storehouses of works of art, beauty, and interest in all Europe. I appreciated it all the more for the great museums and galleries I had seen in other cities.

I also revisited the Pantheon, the magnificent pagan church of Paris. I wished before crossing the Atlantic to stand once more by the tombs of Voltaire, Rousseau, and Mirabeau. After again viewing with interest the stately edifice, a company of twenty or thirty of us were taken by a guide through the extensive halls and rooms in the cellar or basement under the vast church. The columns, pillars, etc., of stone for sustaining the great weight of the edifice are grand and imposing. In the rooms lining these continuous archways are many tombs of distinguished persons, and many of them rich in art, but none possessed the interest to me that did the tombs of Voltaire and Rousseau. These are in compartments by themselves, and the elegance of the massive stone structures marking the resting-places of these two great Infidel writers does much credit to the Parisians. Among the great number of tombs of distinguished personages, with which the subterranean apartments of the Pantheon are filled, none are more beautiful, more elegant, than the tombs of Voltaire and Rousseau.

We were much amused with a remarkable echo in these archways under the great church, of which the guide gave us repeated illustrations by retiring to a certain point and striking an iron door with a rod, while the company were stationed at another point favorable for hearing the echo. Shouting and singing were also indulged in, and the wonderful echo was highly amusing to all.

Passing the fine cathedral of Notre Dame, I called in to once more look over its grandeur after visiting many other still more noted cathedrals in other cities. While here two funeral corteges came in, one a little after the other. Each coffin was placed before one of the chapels in the body of the cathedral, when the priest made a prayer and went through various ceremonies; but the one plied the most earnestly was collecting the money from the friends of the deceased, probably to pay the expense of praying the souls out of purgatory. As the friends passed by the head of the coffin to take the last view of the departed they each dropped a coin into a receptacle for the purpose; but this not being enough to secure the freedom of the dead from the clutches of the devil, one of the priestly attachés went around among the assembly to gather more money so they could make the peace of their dead friend fully secure. Considerable additional peace-money seemed to be gathered in this way, whon the coffin was borne away to the cemetery or back to the home of the departed. Perhaps these were hardly funerals proper, but the bodies seemed to be taken into the cathedral preparatory for the funeral and to secure the peace of the dead before the last rites were performed. At all events, an exhibit was here made of the power which the priests hold over the people, and of the delusion they are still able to keep up.

After spending a reasonable time among the stores and making a few purchases, night had come, and an hour or two after the evening meal I repaired to the Gare du Nord and took the train for Dieppe. We passed over the same road which took us to Paris in August; but being in the night, I took little cognizance of it. At two o'clock we reached Dieppe, but it was daylight before the steamer started on its trip across the Channel.

The passage was not very rough, though the small steamer tossed and rolled sufficiently to disturb the stomachs of some of the passengers. I am proud to say my stomach acquitted itself very creditably on this occasion, as it has on many others. It seemed to consider itself on its good behavior, and it did its best. By retaining a recumbent posture, vomiting was wholly obviated.

We reached New Haven on the English coast before noon; and besides once more passing through the custom-house ordeal of examination of baggage, the most of the passengers rewarded their stomachs by partaking of dinner or lunch. I joined in this exercise.

In a reasonable time the train was rolling rapidly on toward London. Better time is made on the English railroads than on any others in Europe. We arrived at London Bridge Station at about 2:30 P.M. I took a cab for Finsbury street, thinking to call upon my friend Mr. George Standring, editor of the Republican; but it being Saturday, and the business places being closed at 2 P.M. on that day, I was not able to see him. Judging I would have no better success in other quarters on Saturday afternoon, I directed my cabman to drive me to South Place Hotel, in the immediate neighborhood.

A few hours were spent in visiting White Cross market where the poor people go for their meager supplies of meat, vegetables, and fruit. It is pitiful to watch impoverished men, women, and children trying to see how with a few pennies they can purchase enough to feed themselves and families over the dreary Sunday. How I pity these poor people, dressed in rags and tatters, with hungry stomachs and woe-begone and sorrow-stricken countenances. I feel quite sure, were I God Almighty, and possessed of power equal to my will, I would provide better for these miserable beings than they are now provided for. It seems to me I would take pleasure in making such creatures happy. I would not wish to bear down heavily upon them, and lead their paths in gloomy, sorrowful places. I would not fill them with hopelessness and misery. I would not give them the merest pittance necessary to keep soul and body together, and allow them only the filthiest rags to wear. I would rather lead them in pleasant places. I would provide them with comfortable dwellings. I would make it possible for them to obtain palatable, nourishing food, and I would make it a point to see that the possibilities of a reasonable amount of happiness were placed within their reach. Yes, were I an all-powerful God, I should make it my business to render my subjects happy, or at the very least I would not compel them to drag out a miserable, groaning, dejected, starving existence. But possibly that is because I am an Infidel. So, if I were a god, I would be an Infidel god, while the God that these English paupers believe in seems to be an unfeeling, unsympathetic, hard-hearted, Jewish-Christian, incomprehensible nondescript, that allows millions of his own children to live and die in the utmost wretchedness, and then go to an endless hell after all.

It is most agreeable to get back to a city where my own language is spoken, where I can make myself understood, and comprehend what others say to me. After many weeks hearing very little but French, German, and Italian, the English language has a very sweet sound; it falls with wonderful agreeableness and euphony upon the ears, and the people who can speak to your comprehension seem like brothers and sisters of your own family. For this reason it is most pleasant to an American to return to London after being a weary pilgrim in strange lands where unintelligible languages are spoken. A perceptible feature in London is the great amount of business being done here. A few hours running about its busy streets, after a visit to continental cities, impresses one with the belief that more real business is transacted in London than in all the other cities combined. London is truly a place of immense trade, but it has the most miserable weather of any place in the world. Its everlasting fogs, smoke, mists, and rain are almost intolerable, except to those who know no better. For three hundred days in the year it knows little else than its dense fogs and dark smoke. I have hitherto been under the impression that the sun is a very important factor in human life, health, and happiness. I have even deemed it an indispensable agent in the very existence of human life, but I have here been compelled to modify my views. I find that London people manage very well to get along without it. I am of the opinion that they do not have more than twenty or thirty bright sunny days in the year, and even on these the sky is not so clear and transparent as it is in Italy and America. There is almost always a painful opaqueness in the atmosphere.

I have wondered how the people of London can be cheerful and happy. It would seem that this never-ending fog must make them perpetually gloomy, but they are so taken up with their various pursuits that it is doubtful if they fully realize the miserable weather they have. Often the fog is so dense one can scarcely see across the street. Some wicked American wag has accused Londoners of cutting their fog up into blocks and packing it away for fuel, but I am quite sure it would have to be compressed considerably so as to get the dampness out of it before it would burn first rate. I notice that some of the London scientists have been discussing the possible means by which the fogs may be dispelled. I think one learned savan suggested that dynamite be exploded in the air and drive the fog away. If that is possible, a few thousand pounds could be very sensibly used in driving this black, dense fog into the German ocean. What is the real cause for the fog was also discussed. It is quite probable the million fires of bituminous coal, the dampness arising from the valley of the Thames and from the waters of the ocean on either side of the island, with the conformation of the country, embody the principal causes. I think I am not extravagant when I say that I had rather live twenty years in New York than ten in London, and, paradoxical as it may seem, there is more pleasure to be seen in one year in America than in two in London. These continued fogs are not without their effects upon the health of the people of London. Lung complaints are very frequent, asthma and consumption are very common complaints, as well as rheumatism and gout. These are the penalties which Londoners pay for living in their perpetual fog. But biliousness is not one of the ills they labor under; no sallowness is observed upon the countenances, and none look sun-burnt in the slightest degree. The ladies of London and all England are doubtless the fairest in the world.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT.

On Sunday morning I had to walk but about half a mile to reach the Hall of Science, 142 Old street, City Road. I knew not whether speaking would be held there, and was very glad to learn by the bills posted in front that Mrs. Annie Besant would speak at 11 A.M. and 8 P.M.; the subject in the morning to be, "The Land and the Landlords," and in the evening, "What is Conscience?" I was very glad of an opportunity of hearing this celebrated woman, having the opportunity of hearing her only in Brussels, and then chiefly in French. The Hall of Science has been the principal meeting-place of the London Freethinkers for many years, but its roof has recently been raised some fourteen feet, which makes the hall a much pleasanter room. It has a gallery that will seat over five hundred people, and is in every way a pretty hall. For the satisfactory manner in which the hall is managed much credit is due to Mr. Smith, who takes immediate charge of it. A dancing academy is held in the hall several nights in the week, and a number of Freethinker clubs also meet in the club rooms on the second floor. The National Secular Society holds its meetings in the hall. Radical and Freethought publications, are kept there for sale, and everything is conducted in the best manner. Mrs. Besant's morning lecture was well attended. It was of a political character, showing the wrongs entailed upon the people of England, especially with regard to the tenure of the lands of the nation, and particularly with reference to the thousands of acres of good lands thrown out of use for the cultivation of breadstuffs and for the worthless purpose of raising deer, wild boars, hares, and rabbits for the nobility and wealthy to shoot, but for which the poor man, should he venture to shoot one of them, would be sent to prison without mercy or delay. She depicted in clear and eloquent language the wrongs under which the poor labor, and the unequal advantages which the privileged classes enjoy. Her references to the useless royal family were in the purest and keenest sarcasm.

In the evening the hall was full to repletion, though the admission is sixpence, equal to twelve cents of our money. Probably some twelve hundred persons or more were present. The discourse was of a philosophical, anti-theological, and somewhat metaphysical character, and possessed marked ability. She handles her subjects with care, and displays great logical power. As a public speaker, one able to discuss almost any subject, rich in resources, and ready for criticisms, objections, and questions, she probably has not a superior among the women of the world, if an equal. I heard her also deliver two lectures in the same hall on the following Sunday, the subject of the first being, "How to Save the People's Money;" the second, "Modern Science on Free Will." Both subjects were ably treated. After the discourses are over opportunity is given any person in the audience to state objections, make criticisms, and ask questions, and I could but notice the perfect ease and readiness with which Mrs. Besant replied to all these; it was sufficient to arouse one's liveliest admiration. I marveled, too, not a little when I learned with what assiduity the lady is applying herself to the study of several sciences, among which are physiology, anatomy, biology, chemistry, botany, etc., devoting thereto a certain number of hours per day or week. Her intention is to make herself thoroughly familiar with all the different departments of science. While taking lessons herself in the more advanced portions of physiology she is teaching a class in the elementary branches of the same science. She is also about taking a class in French, being familiar with that language as well as with the German. I think there are few women in the world, or men either for that matter, who apply themselves more closely to work and to study than does Mrs. Besant. She is a co-worker with Mr. Bradlaugh in conducting The National Reformer, which has a pretty large circulation, and is partner with him in the Freethought Publishing Company, which is now bringing out several International scientific works, as well as a large number of Freethought and reformative books and pamphlets, which have a quite extensive sale all over the kingdom. In addition to her other labors, she is now translating for publication Prof. Louis Buchner's last work. Besides all this, she is much in the lecture field, speaking in all parts of the kingdom. If she is not performing a large amount of mental labor, I know not who is. In a few weeks she is to hold a public discussion with the Rev. Mr. Hanchard, one of the questions being, "Is Jesus a Historical Character?" I feel quite sure she will prove herself equal to any clergyman who may venture to debate with her.

It is quite enough to excite the indignation of all good men and women to realize how this worthy woman has been treated by one of the courts of the realm in depriving her of her only child, a young daughter six years of age. Her former husband, the Rev. Mr. Besant, brought suit for the possession of the child, and an unjust judge ordered that the mother should not be allowed the possession of her little daughter, on the ground that being an Atheist she was not fitted to rear and educate her own child, when in reality there is not a woman in England more capable of rearing and teaching a child than is this lady. This is a specimen of modern justice in a Christian land. I trust she will visit America ere long when I am sure thousands will be anxious to make her acquaintance.

MR. CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Mrs. Besant is a most valuable assistant to Mr. Bradlaugh, who by the by is performing more labor than almost any man living. Besides his Parliamentary labor and preparation, besides the editorship of The National Reformer and the conduct of his publishing business, he is delivering some forty lectures per month in all parts of England and Scotland. These lectures are mainly of a political character, having a special reference to land reform, the abrogation of perpetual pensions, and other reforms of a similar nature. He has been very instrumental in establishing Land Reform Leagues in all parts of the kingdom, and these have a membership of some 50,000. The lower classes are taking a deep interest in this. The movement is not confined to Freethinkers or Secularists alone, but many Christians take a very lively interest in the reform. Mr. Bradlaugh informs me that even several clergymen are ardent members of his leagues. His lectures are principally before these leagues, and it is not uncommon for from 3,000 to 5,000 persons to attend his meetings. The poor people, farmers, etc., throughout the country are learning to look to Mr. Bradlaugh as their coming deliverer to lead them to most valuable reforms and to bring them to a better system of government. Many of them walk ten and twelve miles to attend his meetings and listen to his rousing, eloquent speeches.

At the present time he is having monster petitions signed in all parts of the country asking Parliament to abolish what are called "perpetual pensions," which is the transmission to children, grandchildren, and great-grandchilden, annuities from the government for services or supposed services performed by their fathers, grandfathers, and great-grandfathers. These petitions are being extensively signed preparatory to the meeting of Parliament in February next, and in the aggregate will probably make one of the largest petitions ever presented to that body. It is of course expected that the measure will be strongly opposed by the nobility and wealthy classes, and probably will be defeated the first, and perhaps the second, year in which the effort is made, but the measure is popular with the people and eventually must be successful. In addition to this measure, Mr. Bradlaugh will move for the passage of a law doing away with the keeping of large bodies of as good land as any in the kingdom for parks by the nobility for the raising of deer, wild boars, hares, and rabbits for them to hunt at their pleasure, but which no poor man, at the peril of his liberty, dares hunt. He insists that all the good land of the country should be employed in raising bread-stuffs for the sustaining of the lives of the people, and that the nation has a right to demand this. Next he will move for the abolition of the House of Lords, believing that a hereditary branch of government is not only useless but not in keeping with the spirit of the age. This conviction is fast becoming popular with the middle and poorer classes. It is not at all uncommon now to hear Englishmen say with earnestness, "We want no House of Lords." The next movement will be the establishment of a republic; and there are many who expect to live to see monarchy and royalty done away with in England, and the country become a republic. One thing is very sure, Mr. Bradlaugh is increasing in popularity very rapidly among the rural classes. He is building up a constituency that will serve a most important purpose in time of need. In ten years from this time, I believe Mr. Bradlaugh will be wielding an immense influence in the politics of Great Britain. The measures he is advocating will of course have to be fought for inch by inch; the rich and aristocratic will oppose him at every turn, but he is a powerful man, and so long as he has the masses with him he will be all right, and must ultimately win.

Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant are in earnest sympathy with the position taken by the National Liberal League in the United States with reference to the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press. They are utterly opposed to the meddlesomeness of an ecclesiastical society influencing courts of justice and sending unbelievers to prison under the sham pretext of punishing obscenity. The fact that they published and sold a book with which they were not fully in sympathy, because they wished to vindicate the liberty of the press, and the manner in which they fought the question in the courts, prove them to be brave and undaunted souls. They will defend human rights, though unpopular. They are not cowards, trimmers, nor time-servers. Well may the better and braver portions of humanity be proud of such a man and such a woman.

DR. EDWARD B. AVELING.

Among the worthy Freethinkers of London this gentleman deserves a notice. He is a comparatively new convert to Radicalism, having been brought up within the lines of orthodoxy. His father is a clergyman of London. He is a young man, not far from thirty years of age, a graduate of the University of London, and a scientist of the first grade. He has made no small sacrifice in yielding obedience to his honest convictions. He was well aware that the avowal of his unbelief in the dogmas of Christianity would cost him the fellowship of dear friends, and even the members of his own family; but when he saw his duty clearly he did not flinch from it. He embraced the truth and avowed it, though he was thereby tabooed and practically ostracized by his nearest relatives and friends. He has now formed a new circle who will not turn against him for advocating what he believes and knows to be the truth. He is a growing light in the cause of science and Freethought, and is destined to do a great amount of good. He is very arduously laboring in this direction, giving frequent lectures in various parts of the country on Freethought subjects, but more especially applying himself to teaching classes in the sciences of chemistry, physiology, biology, botany, etc. I heard him deliver his initial lecture to his class in biology in South Place Institute, in which he showed himself master of the subject. The class is a large one. I have two or three times visited him at his rooms in the Royal Polytechnic Institute on Regent street, where he has a laboratory and apparatus for chemical manipulations and experiments. Here he teaches his class in chemistry. In addition to his other duties he writes regularly for the National Reformer, and I have good reason to believe that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will have the opportunity of reading some of the productions of his pen. I think he anticipates making the tour of the United States before many years, and if so I bespeak for him a kindly reception by the Liberals of America.

Let me say a word of Misses Agnes and Hypatia Bradlaugh, two most worthy and intelligent young ladies, who are also doing what they can in the great work of human progress. Besides being their father's housekeepers, and attending to the department of current news and topics in the National Reformer, they are also pursuing the study of the sciences, and fitting themselves for teachers. Miss Hypatia is already teaching a class in elementary physiology. It will thus be seen that the leading Freethinkers of London are making the study and teaching of the sciences a prominent feature in their labors. This is undoubtedly as it should be. Science is the great means by which truth is ascertained, and science and truth must ever go hand in hand.

INTERCOURSE WITH FRIENDS.

My intercourse with the principal Freethinkers of this city has been most pleasant. I have got acquainted with many at the meetings I have attended at the Hall of Science, and I find them very intelligent, progressive, and friendly people. I have accepted an invitation to dinner from several of them. First, after the morning lecture on Sunday Oct. 17th, Mrs. Besant invited me to dinner at her very pleasant residence in the northwest quarter of the city. Of course I was only too glad to accept. Dr. E. B. Aveling, his brother, and the two Misses Bradlaugh made up the party, Mr. Bradlaugh being absent to fill lecture engagements. The underground railway took us across town in half an hour, and we had a most enjoyable time, filling out the day most agreeably until the time for the evening lecture.

On last Sunday I accepted the kind invitation to dinner from my dear friend Mr. George Standring, editor of the Republican. His father, Mr. Samuel Standring, Sr., and brother, Mr. Samuel Standring, Jr., with two sisters, very interesting young ladies, make up the family. They are indeed a very pleasant family, and have a cheerful residence six miles out in the northeastern portion of the city, or rather at the point where the city joins the country. The green fields are close to their residence. We

Is there a Hell?—Concluded.

BY A. W. WOOD.

The Christian system assumes a God separate from matter, and so confuses everything by attempting to graft that doctrin on such as we hav cited from the Jews. By doing it they make Omnipotence finite as well as infinit, while denying him to be material, as well as claiming him to be wholly immaterial, or spirit, amounting to the same thing, viz., nothing. They make him bad as well as good, or else that there are two Omnipotents. It is not surprising, perhaps, looking at matter, with its connections, that such a system should find a place. The human mind has power, and is capable of thinking over years of space, with their details, in a moment of time, drinking in the beautiful with ecstatic emotion, and may be filled with adoration almost sublime, and be happy and zealous even to fanaticism. When surrounded by right circumstances, appreciating the wonders and beauties of nature and art, and only actuated thereby, when perfect health combines and no disagreeable thing intrudes, each adding pleasure, why should the mind not think with some reason that so much beauty, so much pleasure and happiness, so much majesty and power displayed around it, could only come from a holy and infinit cause, and hence feel a sort of inspiration therefrom?

On the other extreme, when disease burns and tortures the body and mind, when all friends forsake or shun, and the Christian doctrin has impressed us with the belief that the most intense agony and suffering we endure is only a very mild condition of one to be made eternal, feeling it thus beforehand, hearing of and seeing our fellows dying from starvation, scalding, cholera, yellow fever, with the poison of the snake or asp, with the thousand ills that flesh is momentarily exposed and heir to, with all their accumulating horrors, what wonder that numbers should believe in two Omnipotents—one good, one bad; a place of happiness—heaven; a place of misery—hell; a God; a demon!

When even a man can so exalt himself in the estimation of mankind that he is worshiped almost as a God, and in a day change, beginning the life of an habitual drunkard (an inconsistency and habit you cannot fix upon any other animal), and when the man thus worshiped becomes disgraced, degraded, and of bad repute from any cause with all his former admirers, why wonder that with proper change of air, circumstances, and nothing to judge from or compare with but such materials, they should make such a God, such a devil, make the two extremes chargeable with their feelings and understanding of the nature of things, and all those things arising without any other proof but the simple knowledge of human minds acting in connection with matter?

If it is true that God, a spirit separate from matter, made a hell which is bad, and made the further provision in that plan for the sacrifice of himself to a finite death (a thing impossible) to save us from its pains and penalties because he had put us in danger of it without our knowledge or consent, we may safely assume that no man who ever lived would hav made such a creation.

No man could ever hav justified himself in his own, much less in others', estimation by creating or planning such a one when he had the power to make a better one; and I regard as wholly unnatural, as foolish, wicked, and devilish, any such creation for any such purpose, and deny that it is wrong or improper or irreverent to characterize such a plan in that way.

It is and was impossible for infinit goodness to make such a creation or such a sacrifice. Extend the inquiry such a creation, such a plan, involves, if there is any other peopled worlds, for they are all under the same government, same omnipotence, there must hav been at least uniformity in their creation. If omnipotence is not carrying out a million plans for as many worlds, and what do we hav as a result? If there are only a thousand peopled worlds, with created beings conditioned like ours, then there has been or must necessarily be a thousand crucifixions of the eternal God for their redemption; there must be a thousand hells and a thousand devils, all opposed to nature, to goodness, and to the Christian's Omnipotence and Creator. The only chance we fear for some of us will be to get into some of the other heavens. How can so many devils hav come into existence, and each obtained a hell for government, without any design and by mere chance? This question comes with good and reasonable grace, for if any other world of inteligences or animals of any kind hav been given superior advantages either in power for enjoyment, greater security for life, no hell, no devil, and no punishment, is that not monstrous injustice toward the people of earth, and is that your ideas of Omnipotence? What a plan, how glorious and sublime, that embraces a thousand devils who from disposition and natural preference like hell—"rather reign in hell than serve in heaven." Do you say there are no other peopled worlds, that all celestial bodies, all the balance of the universe, were made wholly to beautify and adorn the surroundings of this world? That would look egotistical in an individual claim; it may be excusable in a sect. It smacks of too much exclusiveness, of an imperious pride. It certainly cramps Omnipotence and makes his creation dwindle in its proportion. It is remarkable evidence of how easily omnipotence is satisfied.

If man had made one world and all that therein is out of nothing, he would hav tried to beat it in making another, unless absolutely disgusted with the one made. If he had made one hell for the purpose of punishing those who did not please him, and found after he had punished them a million of years in it, he had just begun to punish, and never could finish, he could make two more if he had any fire and brimstone left, or get some other material to make one more severe, perhaps nitro-glycerine, that would explode ten thousand times in a second, so it would giv them continued and rapid experience enough to complete their education and punishment within the bounds of time.

What a fearful conflict may we fear if such a system of devils is true. They are in some localities omnipotent, supreme at least for their special pursuits, and a ring or combination might make every other Omnipotent undesirable trouble, while we hav no single doubt of the availability of the powers and life of matter to conserve itself from all kinds and descriptions of devils, finite or infinit, and in disbelieving all theories to the contrary.

Again, it is sagely stated that "man can look through nature up to nature's god," and this is the generally received Christian doctrin, a simple faith in a god outside of matter, in no sense influenced by it. Such is their boast and claim, while they cannot know or even in the least sense comprehend the germ of life in the minutest seed, or why or how it grows into a spear of grass, stalk of oats, or flowering rose, instead of the spreading mustard tree or the ruddy turnip, and still through that matter, the germ inherent therein, they can see a god without body, parts, or passion, separate and distinct from all matter and its life? Are not such boasts too ridiculous for serious notice. Had the boast been this, in such a mysterious life, in matter so pregnant with it and capable of such extension of growth and being, exists our God, would it not be the more natural, reasonable, and the best proved proposition?

We repeat that all the philosophers, divines, scholars, scientific experts, and inspired men the world ever produced could not, never hav, and never will be able to discover what the germ or principle of life is, either in the vegetable or animal kingdom or in fact what attracts the senseless atoms of rock, or any other body to hold together. There is some power, some life, connected with matter to accomplish that, yet you can see clear through it, can you? and tell who made it all, what purpose he had in view and perfected by making it, and just how the plan and most important of any part of it is to be carried out in the future even in another and distinct state of existence, while you are forced to admit you know next to nothing of the present world and existence you are in? The Christian system has retarded the growth of mental intelligence by its vagaries, its forced conclusions, by its unnatural teachings and pretended revelations.

It teaches the uselessness of doing good, expecting to derive any benefit from it. It makes the hell penalty attach to the best, highest, and noblest motivs and purest actions of man, unless he believes himself a devil by nature, and in the plan urged for his change and redemption. It ignores a life of goodness, purity, and virtue, and stamps it as infamous, Infidel, and ungodly, without its creeds and dogmas are accepted and believed.

It takes a life of sin, wickedness, and filth filled with every crime to repletion, and on the threshhold of the unseen eternal and spiritual world accepts the necessary faith and belief, and ushers a sanctified, pure, and holy spirit, can we add infinit spirit, into the presence (where?) of a spirit God without body, parts, or passions.

The devil receives the other, the good man, and cares for his welfare and hell-fare. If that is the plan and the way it was made to work, God may repent again of his works and his plan, and I trust he may, if there is such a one. Certainly if he cannot get rid of it, he must and ought to take the sufferings and penalty, for he could plead no works or worth, and ought not to be allowed the plea of grace. Having made a place so graceless, so fiendish, he ought to enjoy some of its high and necessary privileges.

I rather he would take my share, if convenient; if a blessing I would cheerfully surrender my claim and all my right to the donor. I hav no known feeling of malice toward a fellow-man if he rather see me there, he would naturally choose that place for me instead of himself. I should consider it a wise choice in him. I will be charitable with him, and own I rather see such a God there than either of us. If he is not misrepresented he would stand a better chance in hell than either of us. Here is the clear and positiv ground to assume, viz., every human being that ever did or will liv, rather see another there than himself. All this incongruity, inconsistency, and misunderstanding among intelligent beings arise from the dogma and teaching that there is a higher and separate power from matter, a power as we hav stated that is not conceivable by the mind, not even in the subtlest thought without attaching to it material qualities. What a power, not influenced by matter, existing before matter, infinit without matter, so it could strike matter out of existence as though it had never existed, and still be infinit, all there is, or ever was, and thus showing matter to be nothing! That is the kind of nothing the world and all that therein is was made of, and no doubt of it. Such facts rather show finite work, things made that can be wiped out, and man being one of them more than giv up the ghost, and where is he? Like the Wisconsin gopher now balanced on the edge of his hole. On the first approach of danger you see him, and now you don't see him.

Is this the man who is reputed to possess an immortal spirit that can never die, that cannot be annihilated, and of course is so far infinit?

Could Infinity pre-existing make another Infinity? Can Infinity do better than man's spirit which never dies, by destroying itself for man's sins, and where did his spirit return to at his death? Why make a finite hell, for it was made or is a part of Infinity, to punish infinit beings in, to punish the immortal spirit, a part of itself, when separated from the body and returned to Omnipotent Infinity, the God who gave it? I abhor that system as unreasonable, cruel, and ungodlike, and if I did not believe it false, absurdly false, should regard the Infinit being who concocted it a fiend. The persons who desire to hav it true are fiends in disposition, and furnish the very strongest proo of an infinit fiend instead of an infinit saint.

I am to be punished forever, and then it has only just commenced, leaving Omnipotence powerless to undo the mischief he has done. A job done he cannot and does not propose to strike out of existence has made me so vile and devilish that he can never sufficiently punish me, and thus renders hell useless for the purposes of its creation, but it must be kept going forever, whether it yields any return or not. There ought to be additional words at human disposal to show the utter contempt a reasonable mind has for such an unnatural, useless, and foolish hell.

The Inquisition inventors made better ones while their effects lasted, and what was it they pained and tortured? Was it the body or the spirit? Without the spirit you cannot pain the body. One sense destroyed, rather one sense separated from the body, and you cease to affect the body through that agency. Does it not look after all as though it was the combination they tortured?

And how prove they affected the spirit at all except through the body? They separated them in fiendish joy frequently.

Does it not teach you that we must recognize spirit as being somewhat hampered by matter, if it indeed can get entirely away from it, is not in fact a material essence, eluding our grasp, and as spirit, even if it is infinit and immortal, cannot so far as we know be pained except by its being connected with matter?

What reason then can be given for going outside of matter, its mysterious life, which we can never hope to solve or understand? Why propose, claim, or speculate, or pretend any knowledge of the operations and plans of a myth and ghost outside in an inconceivable space, neither connected with nor influenced by matter? Why believe in such heavens or hells, that must hav extent and form, and be located somewhere, to exist at all except in the imagination? And even that does not remedy the necessity of space to imagin them in, or for material to giv consistency to the idea of something.

The very name strikes the senses as speaking of something and of that existing and being somewhere. Should the most ignorant heathen inquire where they were, after being informed by you of them, should ask how much territory they covered, what direction and distance they were off, and what they are made of, you would at once find yourself admirably qualified, as most missionaries are, to preach ignorance to that heathen, to tell him honestly you knew very little about it. You could not tell him of that God who rules in that heaven, nor of that devil who rules supreme in that hell, and giv him any true or tangible conception of either without adding material, form, and substance.

Language has yet to be invented to do it with, and new and unnatural ideas entertained to think of any such thing. They are entirely new and contradictory to any Jewish authority or teaching as recorded in the Hebrew Bible.

Of course the claim is that faith superinduced by revelation gives the key to the mystery, and that all rests there. We assume the whole thing rests upon faith only, without one iota of evidence except that acknowledged to be based wholly on authority, to wit, somebody's say-so, with the same—and no more—right to say than I hav or you hav. The little seed lying quiescent in the mummy's bosom, and springing into life and reproduction after three thousand years of dormancy and sleep, is taken by some as an emblem of the spirit of the mummy. And here arises a difficulty to make the comparison satisfactory or at all convincing, for the germ, you say, was separated from the mummy, was even during its connection with him or her a distinct and separate thing, that can never be influenced again by the body; and when it left the body dead, as we call it, that organization and combination of life is forever ended. This did not occur with the seed, or the germ of the seed, nor was the germ or the seed itself dead, nor were they separated. The mummy may never come up more. Job had an idea that he never would, so you see the seed is getting a live advantage. Neither can there be any true comparison instituted or drawn between them. Each has its distinct and hidden spirit and mystery, each its own peculiar manner of reproduction, and still the principle operating so seemingly different may be the universal principle, the principle of life animating both in existence.

The animal kingdom reproduces itself through pairs of different degrees of intellect or intelligence, different organizations of body, and often both exist after their reproduction has also produced and died, as we call it, hav separated from life, and they still hav the power of reproduction left within themselvs, or one of them.

This species of reproduction goes on from its incipiency and growth to its final complete development, spirit as well as body, recollect, by food from the vegetable and animal kingdoms in the form of digestion, secretion, and expulsion, taking on and throwing off through the simple medium of the material animal organization of matter. So while matter is thus reproducing, life is also reproduced as well as matter; and how singular this reproduction continues to go on without the male after conception of matter or germ—male germ—is transmitted.

Now let us trace the seed, which is single, must find its mate by nestling in the bosom of its mother earth, receive the dews and rains, hav the benefit of the heat and light of the sun, hav air to breathe, and having all that, must then die or change to nourish into reproduction its own being. Burn or denude a spot of earth, destroying its fertility, make it barren ten feet deep, throw up its dirt from below, and protect it so it can by no means receive seed from any source but itself; giv it the rains, sun, and light, and unknown plants spring forth into life and beauty, showing that nature contains everything within its own domain. Everything seems to be eternal. Is it singular that Paul and Wesley believed in the immortality of beasts, birds, and fishes as well as the immortality of man? Paul, in his comparison, would seem to embrace the vegetable kingdom also, or why take the death and reproduction of the grain to prove the immortality of the animal kingdom unless he also believed the vegetable immortal. Paul and other thinking minds since hav been greatly exercised in trying to show a life separate and distinct from matter without accomplishing anything more than to exalt and exemplify (the creation) the existence of nature in its wonderful combinations, but hav made no discoveries, and never will, to understand matter any better than they can spirit, or to tell or conceive where either begins, connects, separates, or ends. Paul was zealous, even with his great learning; he sowed one body and raised another kind. What nature does not permit and is not true is contradicted by every known fact in the vegetable kingdom; it would be a more complete evolution than Darwin claims in the animal kingdom. Of his claim, modern and improved as it is over the creeds of Christendom, we at present need more information to giv conclusiv judgment. It pretends to know too much, we fear, and so far is like the other creeds spoken of, still endeavoring to get away from inevitable law, the nature of things, contradicting also the animal kingdom.

Assuming one being made both body and life, or spirit, and made them for each other (and not as a kind), and if you cannot tell, even conceive, where either begins, connects, and how operate together, where separate, continue, or end; and if the body and spirit are sowa in a natural body, together understand, and raised a spiritual body, it must be a body with form and substance, and having been created by the same power expressly for each other, they cannot escape each other their own natural creation, and remain a body without both being changed. The misfortune is no theory has ever been maintained in fact without making it material, or connecting things material inseparably with life or spirit, as the evident law governing and actuating the one governs and giv the other its existence also. If there is no connection between and mutual existence, how can you punish the body after the death of the material part? That was the part committing the transgressions that has done all the mischief, or was it only actuated and influenced by the spirit of God within it to make a devil of itself, so it has no need of any pardon, nor liable or responsible to be punished for it, and the spirit the cause responsible for all the sin and wickedness done by the body under its direction, only exposed to a material hell.

A spirit, a part of Infinity, going back when separated from the body to Infinity, the God who gave it, existing before and uninfluenced by matter? Now tell us honestly what need there is of a hell to punish part of Infinity, even under the Christian system. It cannot influence spirit. If it did, according to that system, it would only punish the author in part, and put the Infinit part returned from the body under the dominion and government of Satan in that hell. If the body was put there and no spirit in it, it would burn up and be ended, not punished at all.

There ought to hav been a spiritual hell made, if you must hav such an institution, and unless you can change your material hell for one spiritual you might as well abandon it. Even a spiritual hell would not be needed to punish material things in, things created, made, and so liable to perish and hav an end, if not infinit, for it would certainly put them out of existence or wretchedly disorganize them even in such a hell in a short time.

We again repeat and claim that there are plenty of material things which ought to overwhelm and bring the mind into subjection without any outside pressure, and leave no need of any hell, from any human standpoint. It is too late a discovery to be valuable to us, and hav the millions gone before us escape it.

What a plan, what an inconceiveable invention, for an inconceivable Omnipotence.

Contrast it with the inspired words of Pope, in his poetic inspirations:

"See thorough this air, this ocean, and this earth,
All matter quick, and bursting into birth,
Above, how nigh progressiv life may go!
Around, how wide, how deep extend below!
Vast chain of being! which from God began
Natures ethereal, human, angel, man,
Beast, bird, fish, insect, what no eye can see,
No glass can reach, from Infinit to thee,
From thee to nothing. On superior powers
Were we to press, inferior might on ours,
Or in the full creation leave a void,
Where, one step broken, the great scale's destroyed.
From nature's chain, whatever link you strike,
Tenth or ten thousandths, breaks the chain alike.

"And if each system in gradation roll,
Alike essential to the amazing whole;
The least confusion but in one, not all
That system only, but the whole must fall.
Let earth, unbalanced, from her orbit fly,
Planets and stars run lawless through the sky;
Let ruling angels from their spheres be hurled,
Being on being wrecked, and world on world,
Heaven's whole foundations to their center nod,
And nature trembles to the throne of God,
All this dread order break. For whom? For thee?
Vile worm! oh madness! pride! impiety!

"What if the foot, ordained the dust to trod,
Or hand to toil, aspired to be the head?
What if the head, the eye or ear repined,
To serve mere engins to the ruling mind?
Just as absurd for any part to claim
To be another in this general frame;
Just as absurd to mourn the task and pains,
The great directing mind of all ordains.
All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body nature is, and God the soul.
That, changed through all, and yet in all the same,
Great in the earth as in the ethereal frame,
Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees,
Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
Spreads undivided, operates unspent,
Breathes in our soul, informs our mortal part,
As full, as perfect, in a hair as heart;
As full, as perfect, in vile man that mourns
As the rapt seraph that adores and burns
To him, no high, no low, no great, no small,
He fills, he bounds, connects, and equals all."

This is the kind of Omnipotence and Infinity we like, we adore, and are filled with its beauty, power, and sublimity; it is fit for adoration. Cease to teach us justice, mercy, or goodness, or call in your outside, hell-making God, your author of all things, with the system you charge him with making, and which, if true, must, by force of infinit law, be carried into hideous, unjust, unmerciful, and hellish execution. Ratner abandon such a creed, and call in your whole hell connected system, and do not again rebel against God.

True Loyalty.

I am not "loyal." And at this declaration the ordinary orthodox mind stands aghast. Possibly the rarer unorthodox mind is not destitute of shock. To the former, loyalty means respectability and propriety, and to the latter that same "loyalty" is apt to convey an impression other than the impression borne in upon my mind as I write the words "I am not loyal." The word loyalty has to so many folk the significance of its derivation. It is not in that significance that it is used by me at this moment. All the world knows that loyalty, etymologically, is connected with the French "loi," a law. It is my hope that I should be the last to be one who is not law-abiding. But the word loyalty has, after a long and checkered history, arrived, as so many words arrive, at a meaning of a very special nature, having little or nothing to do with its primary derivation meaning. If I understand it rightly, loyalty in its ordinary significance means superstition. It implies a belief in certain individuals possessing certain properties because they bear certain titles. Loyalty to-day means a respect amounting to reverence for particular people (or for people who are not particular) because they are labeled, in a museum of antiquities, king or queen, prince or princess. Mr. Herbert Spencer has shown the successiv stages of the superstitious belief in the rulers of men. Belief in them as gods (Thor), as god-descended (Romulus), as god-appointed (Saul, and even Victoria by the grace of God our queen and governor), as with god-rights over subjects (Charles I), and to-day as gifted with the higher attributes of humanity, such as beauty, honor, grace, power (the Prince of Wales). Ordinary loyalty is but the survival of this old belief in rulers as something more than ordinary mortals. It is the remnant of the ancestral superstition that kings were deities. Regarding loyalty, therefore, in this sense, I am very heartily disloyal, and, indeed, I know no greater ill of those at present burdening humanity than loyalty in this especial sense. The little child, of almost any grade of society, asked if it loves Queen Victoria, answers unhesitatingly, "Yes!" and few are at the pains to show the child the worse than folly of such a reply. In the old days love and reverence for the monarch did mean something. There was ability to be loved and revered. The kings then were in advance of their time But to-day! It is very, very sad when one reflects upon the eager devouring of the Court news by the foolish of both sexes to consider the mean nature of these beings of to-day. There was a King Alfred once, with his translations of "Bæda's Ecclesiastical History," then the history of the nation, into English, and with his translation of the "Consolations of Philosophy of Boethius" into the vernacular. There was a Charlemagne, whose court was the home not alone of the knights but of the artists of that time. There was a Robert of Sicily to whom Boccaccio sang and told quaint tales, a John o' Gaunt who was friend of Chaucer. Henry VIII., king of England, was sufficiently able to write a "Defense of the Seven Sacraments."

But with the advent of the Bœotian Guelphs at latest came the period of monarchical nonage. The dislike for "painting and poetry," and all forms of art and science, runs in the main through the race. Is it possible to conceive of the present monarch reading and understanding Shelley, or the heir to the crown studying Shakspere? Does one ever hear of any great scientific thinker, or of any eminent writer, being "honored" with the intimacy of queen or of prince? The former, of course, delights the anxious eyes of her loving subjects by the frequent presentation of her person to them, especially in Ireland, touches their hearts by telegraphic messages in relation to men slain under a wicked war policy of which she approves, honors them by special invitation of the men they hav with terrible unanimity condemned as evil and as traitors, and encourages habits of parental prudence by presenting £3 of her salary from the nation to the mothers of triplets. As to the Prince of Wales, his intimate acquaintance with every branch of modern science, his advanced position in the van of modern thought and progress, his close connection with all the best thinkers of his time, and the high moral tone and purity of his life, are as creditable to the English nation that pays a salary to this person as to the person himself. These are, in truth, but sorry substitutes for the really strong men and women of the past. The only defense I hav personally ever heard from the most devoted admirers of the future king of England is, "Oh, he's such a jolly fellow!" The most lofty adjectiv applied to the heir to the throne is "jolly." Now jollity is a very desirable quality as adjunct to other more notable ones. But jollity as the summum bonum I believe no philosopher has yet noted. "He is so good-natured!" cry the ladies deprecatingly. But something more than mere good nature is required for a true men-leader. Good brains, nay, good life, are both better than good nature.

Are we then to deny ourselvs of the use of the word loyal altogether? Surely not. Entirely eliminating this its evil sense that has grown around it by "damned custom," we use it after the significance of its etymology. The most republican citizen is the most law-abiding. For the very alteration of the law that he desires he works by legal means and legal means alone. An ardent and thorough respecter of the law, he, desiring change in that law, strives after it by lawful means. We hav our loyalty, therefore, to the law, and even in the removal of the excrescence known as monarchy from the fair surface of the body politic would proceed and will proceed by lawful process and none other.

Moreover we hav true loyalty to our cause. And that emotion is of a very different order from the superstitious survival called loyalty by the many. This the true loyalty is a faithfulness to fellow-men, a resolve to be wholly true to our co-workers and co-fighters. It is not a survival of a false creed. It is the dawn of a true one. For when man recognizes that his duty is to all fellow-men and not to a favored few, when be reveres only him or her that works and has no manner of respect for those who play only, when his loyalty is only extended to those that are loyal to humanity and is withheld from the traitors to mankind, then will be the happier and holier time for the which we long and strive.

Of the faithfulness of Freethinkers and of republicans one to another and to their common mistress, Liberty, there is little need to speak. Indeed in this journal dwelling upon this even by one who has had no opportunity of demonstrating how far the good influence has spread might seem in the words of Portia to "come too near the praising of myself." But none can read the account of the reception given to D. M. Bennett, of New York, himself foremost among the faithful, none can observe the quiet, unostentatious heroism of the many privates in our army, without grateful recognition of the faithfulness of the thoughtful ones.

In nothing more does this thorough fidelity shine out than in its swift and accurate perception of any attack upon Freedom, no matter in what specious guise it comes. In America and in our own country we hav seen men and women defending utterances not in thorough consonance with their own feelings, because in the attack on those utterances they recognized side-blows at liberty. And the 200,000 of America and the thousands in England of the nameless heroes were as true in the trying hour as their leaders. At the present moment a like difficulty faces us. Freedom of speech is menanced in Ireland. Much as many radical English people must be pained at certain words that hav fallen from the lips of the men of my own blood, deeply as they must deplore the sad acts that hav occurred, and hav not in many notable instances been condemned with an outspoken condemnation, yet must they recognize the attack even now made upon freedom of speech. The defense of her is of primal importance. At all costs must she be defended, let her entourage be what it may. It is cases such as this that make our loyalty to liberty at once more difficult and more glorious. The foolish folk cannot understand why we, not sympathizing with many of the utterances of Irish Radicals, are yet prepared to plead, and to do more than plead, for their right to perfect freedom of speech. To the foolish people life is so very simple. Its complexity does not enter into their calculations. The Tory in politics and the religious person in metaphysics hav a cut and dried formula adapted to all requirements. The little decimals of advancing thought, of varying circumstances, of altered human relationship never trouble them by throwing out the accuracy of their cut and dried formulæ But with the Radical and the Freethinker no stereotyped rule is of persistent value. Formulæ are in a constant state of variation, of alteration, of improvement. Life is defined as the constant adjustment of internal to external relationships. The life of a Tory or of a religionist is akin to the existence of a fossil animal. There is the outward semblance of a living being. But there is no response of the being to the ceaseless changes of the environment. It is inert. It is like God, horribly the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. But the activ, thinking, living man has to alter and to adopt himself to the changed circumstances around him, but he may remain a living mind. And the loftier the life, the more complex are the relationships. Hence the diversity among radical politicians and the dead sameness of their opponents. Hence from the foolish the charge of inconsistency when English Radicals, disapproving of much that is said and done by their Irish brothers, yet are resolved to stand by their side at this hour. Herein you are most consistent to your high complex life, most truly loyal to your mistress, Freedom.

E. B. Aveling, D. Sc.

A Candid Exposition of the Athanasian Creed by an Orthodox Priest.—When we remember how the church has refined upon, and how enormously it has added to, the simple revelation of God, given in the holy scripture; how it has babbled of the three persons in the one substance of the sacred trinity, of the three incomprehensibles, which are yet one incomprehensible; of the three uncreated, who are yet one uncreated; of the three almighties, who are yet one almighty; when we remember under what awful penalties it has bidden us, "Worship one God in trinity, and trinity in unity, neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance," we cannot affect much surprise that men who want facts rather than words hav revolted from this terrible cloud of technicalities; we cannot even pronounce their revolt an altogether unreasonable or unhealthy one; we can see, we are bound to admit, that the church is largely to blame for their unbelief; we can see and admit that it was very natural for them to assume that, instead of knowing all about the great unknowable God, as the church affected to do, we really know nothing whatever about him.—Sam. Cox's Genesis of Evil.

Too much cannot be said in praise of W. S. Bell's new work.—Ella E. Gibson.

went out by the steam-cars after the morning lecture, and returned in time for the evening lecture.

I proudly accepted an invitation to dinner from Dr. Aveling. His brother and Miss Townsend made up the quartette. The dinner was served at the Criterion, one of the finest restaurants in London, and in the world. It has five splendid dining halls, and everything is in the highest style. The hall in which we took our dinner is richly embellished with fine statuary, paintings, etc. The dinner was an extensive one, and took us nearly an hour and a half to dispatch. After this was over we attended the Criterion Theater, it being an appendage of the same extensive establishment. Dr. Aveling had provided a private box for our party, and to a casual observer it could hardly have been known that we were not of the aristocracy of the city. The entire evening passed most pleasantly. I afterward had the pleasure of eating another dinner with Dr. Aveling at the same establishment.

Upon Mr. Bradlaugh's return from his lecturing tour I called upon him and his daughters in the portion of the city called St. John's Wood, in the northwest quarter, and a very pleasant part of the town. The visit was a pleasant one; it was too early for dinner (from 6 to 9 P. M. being dinner hours), but refreshments were duly served. I called several times upon the worthy veteran Mr. Truelove at his place of business on Holborn street. There are probably few better men living. I always found him genial and friendly.

One evening I passed very pleasantly with Mr. Charles Watts (editor of the Secular Review) and his family. His wife is a very intelligent and pleasant lady. They live in the southeast portion of the city. Mr. Watts is also pretty steadily in the lecture field, speaking several times a week in various parts of the country. He is likewise publisher of Freethought books and pamphlets. He speaks some of visiting the United States in the course of two or three years; if he does the Liberals of America will doubtless have an opportunity to see him and hear him. I met at his house Mr. Charles C. Cattell, of Birmingham, a well-known and long time Freethought writer and lecturer. I found him very genial, sociable, and witty.

I passed two evenings with Mr. John S. Dryden in the north part of the city. He kindly spent several days with me in August, showing me the city sights. I made the acquaintance of his mother, an estimable lady, and Mrs. Flint, an interesting person to visit with. Here I also met Mrs. Dr. T. S. Andrews, whose home is in Kipton, O. She is now on a visit to England. Her parents are quite aged and live at Norwich. Mrs. Dryden is her sister. These evenings passed pleasantly away.

I subsequently became acquainted with Dr. Chas. R. Drysdale, editor of the Malthusian, and found him a very intelligent gentleman and an earnest worker in the line of reform to which he directs his principal attention. He is a very worthy man. I have made the acquaintance of several other worthy persons of our way of thinking, but I will not particularize further now. Suffice it to say, the Freethinkers of London have cordially extended to me the hand of fellowship and recognition, and I shall long gratefully remember their kindness.

Fraternally yours, D. M. B.

"Thought" Again.

On pages 810 and 811 Mr. Chapman replies at some length to our criticisms upon his views on the subject of thought, though he seems not to disprove anything we said or to upset our propositions.

He claims that we "misapprehended" him, but he does not show it. His quotations, on the contrary, show that we did not misapprehend him. We did not pretend to quote his precise words, but we did not misrepresent him.

The grounds of difference between us is about the nature of thought. He seems to regard thought or mind as a primary element in nature or the universe, which enters into and acts upon living bodies and brains the same as the engineer or mechanic acts upon an engin. We cannot see this to be correct, and regard thought as a product of intricate organization in a way similar to that in which sensations—feeling, hearing, and seeing—are the results of intricate organization. We fail to see that he gives any proof of the correctness of his theory.

He makes considerable use of the word "element" but not with perfect clearness He first says: "There is a wide distinction between substance and its properties. Properties are always abstract; elements, concrete." He next says: "In the live bud there is an invisible element of real substance which contains all the individualized elements of the tree which are lacking in the dead bud. . . . I do not call this life element or principle a property, but an element," etc. There seems to be some confusion here; in one instant "elements" are concrete—a coalition of separate particles in one body—and in the next an invisible, impalpable principle In chemistry an element is a simple, indivisible form of matter; thus hydrogen, oxygen, carbon, iron, lead, and gold are elements. To call life or the life principle an element like these is wholly without warrant, and cannot be demonstrated. If the life principle is an element, Mr. Chapman ought to be able to produce it in its separate, unmixed, concrete state, as hydrogen and oxygen are produced. Chemists never claim they hav discovered an element until they are able to show some of it and demonstrate that it is a substance not susceptible of division or decomposition. Can Mr. Chapman do this by the life principle? It is far more correct to say that it is a result, a property, a consequence, than that it is an element. It is the same with thought; it is a result, a function, not a primary element. It can only exist in connection with an intricate organization adapted to its production. It is quite as reasonable to claim that sight and hearing are elements, simple, primary existences, as that thought and the life principle are. Until Mr. Chapman can produce these elements in a disunited state, he cannot truthfully claim them to be elements.

If thought, or mind, or life-force, or "spirit-matter," is an element, and fills the "mighty roservoir" of "space throughout the universe," it must be homogeneous, and the drafts made upon it by different individuals must be uniform in character. Oxygen is always the same, and one sample drawn from the "mighty reservoir" of nature is never unlike another sample; and so it should be with Mr. Chapman's mind, or "life element," if he is correct. If minds and thoughts are simply this element, our minds should be alike; there should be no difference save, perhaps, in the quantity abstracted from the great reservoir, and the minds of animals should be like the minds of men. But this is very far from being the case. No two minds are alike; no two individuals are the same, either among animals or men. All are largely unlike each other, and because their organizations are unlike. This fact alone wholly disproves Mr. Chapman's theory. The sole reason for the never-ending differences between the minds of men and animals and between individuals of the same species is the ceaseless divergence in organizations. If the minds of two are unlike, it is because their brains and their other organs are unlike. If two individuals could be found just alike in their organizations, it is probable that their minds would be found very similar; whereas, according to Mr. Chapman's theory, all draw the same element from the same mighty reservoir, but all draw a different article, a different kind of element.

Some animals hear more acutely than others; some see farther and more distinctly than others; some can see best in a strong light, some can see best in the dark; some are vastly more powerful or muscular than others; some move with far greater activity than others; some think and reason far better than others; some remember far more correctly than others; and all this does not depend upon the mighty reservoir from whence elements are drawn, but upon the ever-varying organizations producing these endless results.

No sensible person pretends that all life and mind forces are wholly "latent in the rocks," or that all the "elements are ground out of or evolved from granit." While it is true that by the action of the air, moisture, the sun, and frost the rocks hav been decomposed and soils evolved, from which plants, vegetables, and fruits hav grown, which in their turn hav produced and sustained animal and human life, it is equally true that granit has not done it all. Electricity, magnetism, light, heat, chemical affinity, and all the subtle forces of nature, hav performed their share and entered into the process producing the grand result. Granit, hydrogen, oxygen, carbon, electricity, chemical affinity, digestion, and assimilation equally perform their part in producing organizations which see, hear, and think. Granit does not do it all; and until an element or existence can be found outside of nature it is the hight of folly to look for another creating power or element.

Of course life is an intricate subject, not easily explained, but it is very safe to conclude that it is entirely within the domain of nature; that it possesses nothing but what is obtained from matter and the forces inherent in it. This is just as true of the highest organization, of the largest orbs in existence, as it is of the simplest forms of life and of crystallization. All forms of life and organization may be said to hav their era or lifetime; and when what is termed death or decomposition takes place, there is, in one sense, no death, but decomposition for new life. Not an atom of matter has really died or become inert, but set free to form new associations. The idea of dead or inert matter is an absurdity. There is not an atom of matter in existence to-day but what possesses the same capabilities, the same facility for combining with other atoms, that it ever possessed. When a tree falls and decomposes, its atoms are not inert, but full of the power for new combinations and new life. It is the same with decomposed animals, and probably with decomposed worlds, the very ashes of which are susceptible of entering into the formation of new worlds. Millions of years may be requisit for these prolonged evolutions, but the principle is the same. Organisms obtain nothing from nature or matter not inherent in them, and neither force nor matter can be destroyed. Life and thought are equally products of nature, and the products of organization cannot be proved to be simple, independent, individual elements or existences.

An Infidel Abroad.

This will be the title of our Letters from Europe, and they will be issued in a volume of 800 pages, neatly bound, for $1.50, including postage. Those who wish a copy will please send in their names.

A Favor Requested.

We wish to hav the names and post office addresses of Liberal people all over the country. Will friends send us a list of such names? To those who will send us such lists we will mail a good book or pamphlet in proportion to the number of names sent. The names of those not taking THE TRUTH SEEKER desired.

Features of Volume VIII.

Among the features of the new volume of THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1881 may be named the following:

1. A SERIES OF ABLE ARTICLES BY T. B. WAKEMAN, by particular request. No. 1 will appear in the issue for Jan. 1st. The same will also appear simultaneously in the Boston Investigator.

2 A DEBATE BETWEEN MRS. ANNIE BESANT AND THE REV. A. HATCHARD.—Held in the Hall of Science, London, Nov. 25th and Dec. 1st, upon the following propositions: 1. "That the Jesus of the gospels is a historical character," Mr. Hatchard affirming, Mrs. Besant denying. 2. "That the influence of Christianity on the world has been injurious," Mrs Besant affirming, Mr. Hatchard denying. This debate, reported verbatim, possesses peculiar interest. It will be taken from the National Reformer.

3 BEST SELECTIONS OF RADICAL ARTICLES, from English Reviews and Magazines; also from the National Reformer and the Secular Review.

4 SUNDAY SERMONS, FROM TRUTH.—These are able, unique, and interesting One will appear each week.

5. WHAT I DON'T BELIEVE.—These articles, so popular two years ago, will be resumed and continued till completed.

6. WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY?—The discussion between Mr. G. R. Mair and the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. This will be resumed at an early day and prosecuted to completion.

7. FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE. — Having effected arrangements with several friends in Europe to write for THE TRUTH SEEKER, to keep its readers advised as to what is transpiring in Freethought circles, this will prove an acceptable acquisition.

8. A NEW DRESS.—This will be a new feature of considerable interest to our readers. It has no doubt been noticed by many that the type from which THE TRUTH SEEKER has been printed has become much worn, and not as legible as it should be. Number 1 of the new volume will be in new type all around. This subjects us to considerable expense, but the interests of our readers demand it. It is for them we work. Every one will undoubtedly welcome the new dress.

In addition to these features others will be added from time to time. The attention to contributors and correspondents will not be abated. The paper will ring with no uncertain sound. It will be positiv and fearless—not ambiguous, conservativ, or time-serving. It will be outspoken and independent, though some may thereby take offense.

Another feature will be noticeable. We shall hav less to say personally than for the past three months. And perhaps right here we owe our readers an apology for our extra long letters from Europe. We were not aware when writing them that they would occupy so much space. We hav undoubtedly presumed too far upon the patience of our readers. One more letter, however, will finish the series.

Another thing that may be mentioned is the fact that fifty-three numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent out in 1881—a paper being issued on both the first day and last day of the year. This counts so much to the advantage of subscribers.

In consideration of all these features, together with those which hav hitherto distinguished THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is hoped that all the present patrons will remain loyal, and that many new subscribers may be obtained. It is to be hoped that those who hav indicated a determination to discontinue will change their mind, renew their courage, and still "hold the fort." A true soldier will not turn his back to the foe in the time of battle.

We hav decided to send two copies of the first number of the new year to each so he may hav one to use in obtaining a new subscriber or two. This will subject us to a heavy expense, but we trust our friends will see that we are not losers by it. They can make it a gain to us if they will only resolve to do so. There is hardly a reader but what can get a new subscriber if he says he will. Some can get five, and some can procure ten. We will send a handsome present to the one who sends the greatest number of new subscribers. Let it be remembered that we hav offered very generous premiums for new subscribers. Let every one be thinking where he can place the extra copy to do the most good in obtaining new patrons. Let those who think they can use more papers to advantage, inform us of the fact, and we will forward more. Friends, let us make a big effort to increase the number of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please consider yourselves as stock-holders, or part owners of the paper, and do all you can to increase its usefulness.

Moses Hull and the "Commoner."

One year ago Moses Hull started a radical, red-hot, saucy, spunky Greenback paper, which they called the Commoner; it has thus far been one of the ablest exchanges reaching this office. To-day we learn that Moses Hull has sold his interest in the Commoner to Mr. Prescott Robinson, an energetic business man of Boston, who is going to try to make it one of the most thorough business papers in the country. D. W. Hull, who was once editor of the Anti-Monopolist, and afterward of the New Era, and who has for the past year been managing editor of the Commoner, assumes the entire editorial management of the Commoner. Moses Hull, who has been speaking to the Second Society of Spiritualists during the last month, is now to re-enter the lecture field and lecture as the way may open on Spiritualism, Liberalism, and political reform. He, accompanied by Mattie Sawyer Hull, starts for the West from New York in January, and they will probably continue their westward course through San Francisco and Australia and on around the world.

As a lecturer on any of the above subjects Moses Hull is everywhere recognized as a full team, and as an improvisatrice and musician Mrs. Hull has few equals. Moses Hull, we understand, will continue his discussion at present going on in the Commoner, act as editorial contributor, and resume his eccentric and trite Broad-Brim letters. Knowing all the parties, we wish them success.

W. S. Bell is having a debate with Dr. Moran in Paine Hall, Boston, on "The Existence of a Supreme Being." The debate has been going on for several Sundays before large and intelligent audiences, composed of Christians and Liberals. The press of the city speaks of the discussion as being conducted with "courtesy and decided ability" on the part of both disputants. After concluding this debate, Mr. Bell will go West on a lecturing trip.

However much people may differ as to the wisdom of wine-drinking those who do drink should drink only the purest, and the attention of such is called to Mr. Bischel's advertisement in this issue.

"Vindicator," please to send your name and address to us or to T. B. Wakeman, 93 Nassau st., N. Y. Anonymous communications cannot be used by him or us.

We believe it is at last settled that Prof. W. F. Jamieson, Materialist, and Moses Hull, Spiritualist, are to hav a discussion on Spiritualism in this city early in January.

League Man No. 2 is out. It contains much matter of interest to the Liberal Leagues. Address T. C. Leland, 201 East Seventy-first street, New York.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's new lecture, "What Must We Do to be Saved?" is just being brought out in pamphlet form. Price, 25 cents.

Those who wish extra copies of The Truth Seeker with which to obtain new subscribers will be supplied.

The following note of distress is from a worthy sister who is in trouble. "Blessed are the merciful."

Louisville, Ky.

Dear Readers of The Truth Seeker: "Alhaza," whose articles hav appeared of late in The Truth Seeker, is now among strangers, in a forlorn and suffering condition. If kind friends will send a few stamps for her relief, to The Truth Seeker office, they will be thankfully received. Respectfully yours, Alhaza.

Personal.

Crowds of people flocked to hear the Hughes-Jamieson debate in Illinois. Mr. Jamieson is on his way East to meet Moses Hull in a debate in New York city. December 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th he will giv a course of lectures in Garrettsville, Ohio. Will begin debating with Moses Hull some time between December 22d and January 8th. Liberals wanting lectures in the East may address him, Garrettsville, Ohio.

Not Dead but Sleeping.

T. C. Leland, Dear Sir: I read a copy of L. L. Man, forwarded from Yank on, and sent probably by you, for which I heartily thank you. It contained a portion of the proceedings at Chicago, in which I feel a deep interest. My sympathies are entirely in unison with Wakeman and yourself on that issue. I can only feel deep chagrin and mortification at the course of Col. Ingersoll, and more so as I hav heretofore regarded him as invincible. I feel, for one, that the mighty has indeed fallen. But then one can get used to anything, and as I glance at my seven or eight volumes of the Index, and think of Abbot as he was and is, startling news ceases to startle, and great events are belittled. And Green has weakened, too, and a few others. Well, what next?

Before leaving Yankton in June, I organized a League (No. 177), and furnished them with a hall at my own cost (a room 24x40, rent free), furnished it and put up a sign, "Liberal League Hall.—Liberty, Fraternity, Equality." The sign is still there, but the League, I am told, is dead, and I hav recently rented the room for a carpenter shop. So much for Liberalism in Yankton. Twenty-five charter members, expenses nothing (as we had paid for the books and three hundred copies of constitution and by-laws), and all weakened. The property, including the charter, is now in the hands of Wm. H. Werdebaugh, a dear, good, earnest, honest brother, who will deliver them over to the League gladly whenever it comes to life. I said all weakened. No, not all. John Treadway, S. R. Fulton, Wm. H. Werdebaugh, Smith, the barber, Chris. Hameister, Wm. Reinhardt, and a few others would gladly go on. I am ready to turn out my carpenter, and will gladly do so at any time the League wants the hall at the old terms, though I get eight dollars a month for it.

We Liberals owe T. C. Leland a debt of gratitude for the many noble words he has uttered in behalf of truth and right doing for the last two or three years. I hav been one of your disciples since you first began writing for the Index, but since the war on The Truth Seeker began I hav allowed no word of yours to escape me. There are a few Liberals here, but my luck at Yankton discourages me from trying to organize them into a League at present. When I get better acquainted I will send you the names of those who are well to do as you requested.

Deadwood, D. T., Nov. 21, 1880. D. P. Wilcox.

Well, the situation at Yankton does look discouraging. But it is not so very unfavorable. All is not lost. There are good elements there yet for the revival and foundation of a permanent activ auxiliary. Without dispossessing your carpenter, isn't there some Liberal in Yankton who has a house, parlor, or room that the League could meet in, not so very often, say once a month, and on cheaper terms? Let them start again on a new plan, and when they do meet let all come together resolutely and faithfully, bring out the women and children, and make the occasion interesting. If they will come together every month after they receive their League Man, and read and talk that over, it will secure the transaction of monthly League business of more importance than any of you now know. The very object of that little paper is to giv the auxiliaries something to do to aid the work at headquarters, and something to talk about and discuss every month. We wish the auxiliaries to look upon it as they would a private letter from the League President, Secretary, and Treasurer, requiring attention and an answer. We shall always hav something in it that will make reading and discussion interesting. Also start a library after the plan of our ever suggestiv Elmira, which is very good indeed.

I print these suggestions to you because there are a few other auxiliaries in the Yankton situation, and these remarks will apply to them also. We wish to hear something from every one, either that they are dead, dying, or still liv.

Liberalism is perhaps in the main safe in this country, and nothing can put us altogether back to the Dark Ages; but organization will put us rapidly forward and make our supremacy sure. There is some way by which we can strongly and successfully organize. Let us keep experimenting till we hit the right way. Perhaps the first thing is to organize the faithful, the devoted, the few who will make sacrifices. Make a sworn and compacted cohort of them, and they will fire the hearts of the million. Giv the rest no rest. At all events, let all hands and hearts stand by the League. T. C. Leland.

Get from Under.

Montrose, Iowa, Nov. 24, 1880.

Bro. T. C. Leland: Inclosed you will find twenty-five cents for the Monthly Bulletin.

This town, containing one thousand inhabitants, has five churches, containing forty-five members, all told, and one-half of them of a doubting mind; the balance are so-called Infidels. But most of the ungodly are too tender-hearted to acknowledge it; they seek after popularity too much to be strictly honest, at the same time they do not take interest enough in these popular themes to attend church. We hav a few independent Freethinkers here that are not afraid to proclaim their moral thought from the housetop.

I hav taken The Truth Seeker for four or five years, and consider it a valuable paper. Long may it liv. My best wishes to you and all Liberals, hoping we may see the day when this country will be ruled by honest men and not by a bonded Christianity, a hellish aristocracy, a long-faced hypocrisy, a deceitful priesthood, and an enemy of the devil, who is the best man of the two. A. Crandall.

On your showing of the Liberal situation in Montrose, it is the very place where there ought to be a Liberal League. Let the few independent Freethinkers unite in a society, bring your women and children out to meeting; lecture, or read or sing for yourselves if you hav no regularly ordained Infidel preacher; and, depend upon it, your Infidel ministrations of divine grace will soon be the most popular church in town. The few, first moving in the matter, will giv courage to the many. Buy or rent one of the five impoverished churches, and see if you can't fill that one with more than the forty-five members which all the others hav.

The National League needs every shoulder to the wheel, and there, in Montrose, stand leaning up against orthodox fences, plenty of idle Liberal shoulders looking on and letting others do the whirling. This must no longer be the low, subordinate condition of things in Montrose; and you, Mr. Crandall, can stop it. I inclose you a form of application for a Liberal League charter. Just you start out and see how many names with a little money you can get signed to it. If you really cannot do it yourself, put it into the hands of some other Liberal who can do it. Anyhow get it done.

You may think it a small matter—one little League in a village of one thousand inhabitants; but I assure you the whole world needs the support and influence of Montrose, and then Montrose needs the happy back-action help of the whole world. Each for all and all for each is the law. Now you are without influence; organized, you at once become a power. As you are, those forty-five church members govern you. They make the popularity, and you submit to it. By their compacted social and sacramental standing together they decree the moral, social, and even political code; while you, many times more numerous, more honest, more intellectual, are only a well-informed, thoughtful, but unorganized mob, and you submit to the decrees of the organized few.

I beg you to come out of that slough of subjugation. The League will help you do it if you will contribute your quota of volunteers to the League. The recruiting sergeant is in your midst Please giv him respectful attention.

Very sincerely, T. C. Leland.

P.S.—This fits a thousand places in the United States as well as Montrose. The recruiting sergeant is abroad in them too. Let them all look to their chances for enlistment. I will forward the necessary papers on application,

World Formation.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Astronomers will be compelled to abandon the condensation theory of world formation. It does not begin to allow time enough for the geological and zoological changes. Prof. Simon Newcomb, in his "Popular Astronomy," third edition, estimates that at the present rate of radiation the sun will be reduced to one-half its present volume in five million years; that its contraction from indefinit space has taken not more than eighteen million years, and that the earth, in its life-supporting state, has not existed more than ten million years.

These inevitable deductions from the condensation theory are at war with the certain data of geology. Take only a single one: From recent examinations of the bone deposits in a Devonshire cave it is certain that man existed at least one million years ago. Now if man, the crown of animate creation, has inhabited this earth one million years, what must be the age of the lowest animal and vegetable life? Is not the limit of earth life to ten million years too short by many hundreds if not thousands of millions of years?

The accretion hypothesis of world formation is not thus hampered, but allows ample time for geological changes and the evolution of man.

Furthermore, how easily it accounts for the internal and external heat of worlds! Gravity alone must cause internal heat in proportion to the diameter of the planet; and when a heavenly body attains a most prodigious size, like some of the nebulæ, it necessarily becomes gaseous. W. H. B.

Must Hav a God, but His God is Material.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Charles E. Townsend, in an article in last week's Truth Seeker, says, "The universe is composed of intelligent and non-intelligent materials, the former as mind matter," etc. That this intelligent, infinit, material mind-matter acts on the non-intelligent matter mechanically, producing all the phenomenal acts of unintelligent matter. Hence, without this mind-force, which is material, and is God, there could be no action in the universe of matter; all nature would be still cold and dead, the sun, moon, and stars would not shine, the winds would not blow, the waters would not run, death and desolation would reign complete. Yet this very state of things has taken place on our own moon, and thousands, yea, millions of worlds throughout the boundless universe, may be in the same dead and desolate condition. Where is this great mind-force, this almighty material God, in which resides all the intelligence of the universe? Has he forsaken these unfortunate dead worlds?

I shall not follow friend Towesend's rather long article, but merely notice a vital point or two. His article is able and plausible, but, like all attempts to prove that intelligence governs matter independent of organization, it must prove a failure. It is mistaking the cause for the effect, putting the cart before the horse.

Nothing is more clear, I think, than that every material thing or substance must hav parts, must hav weight or measure, must be extended, must hav properties, for without properties of some kind it would be just nothing. According to the present state of knowledge our world is composed of between sixty and seventy simple elements of matter, at least they hav resisted all attempts thus far to separate them, and hence they are regarded as simple elements. Now each of these elements has separate and distinct properties that distinguish it from the others. Thus oxygen has properties that distinguish it from hydrogen and all other elements of matter. Oxygen is oxygen, and nitrogen is nitrogen under all changes. The elements enter into an unlimited number of combinations one with another, and readily separate again. Now I would ask do these elements act thus by their own inherent properties, or is it the flat of this intelligent, infinit mind-force that causes them to form combinations? Is it not entirely by chemical action these combinations are formed, and not by mechanical action, as friend Townsend has it? If matter has the inherent property and potency of producing all these phenomena we see, both organic and inorganic, then it is evident that an intelligent, infinit God or mind-force, or whatever you please to call it, is superfluous—would hav nothing to do. We can't conceive of the existence of matter without properties, whether it is eternal or not; and if it is eternal, then its properties are eternal also, which would render a God, or gods, utterly useless. And if the universe is infinit, unlimited, and unbounded, there cannot be an infinit and unbounded God, for it is absurd to suppose that two infinit, separate, unlimited entities can exist in the same infinit, unbounded universe of matter. As well suppose that two persons can be in one.

If God is material, he occupies space, and must hav a location, if he is infinit and unlimited he fills all space, and if he fills all space, there cannot possibly be room for anything else. Throw away your prejudice and look at it calmly, and you will be likely to discover that an infinit, unlimited God in an infinit, unlimited universe is an infinit and double-distilled absurdity. When we see a person who believes in a flat world, and in witches and spooks, we are apt to laugh or treat him with ridicule and contempt, but when we see a pretended man of science, with a solemn face and a wise look, discourse learnedly about a God, either material or immaterial, limited or unlimited, although he invariably talks absurd nonsense and confusion, if we are only sharp enough to see it, passes himself off very readily for a man of learning and wisdom, although in reality his knowledge and wisdom are not much above those of the man that believes in witches and spooks. To believe in witchcraft and the doings of witches, such as making themselvs invisible, passing through keyholes, and doing a great many marvelous and impossible things, is now readily conceded by intelligent persons to be utterly absurd and nonsensical; and yet if we could get rid of our early impressions and prejudices we might be able to discover that the belief in a great monstrosity of a being called God, that is material or immaterial, is infinit and unlimited, yet is unorganized and without parts, weight, or measure, is supreme in intelligence, power, and wisdom, that exists somewhere or everywhere, and yet has no location, is even more absurd than the belief in witchcraft.

We are often told that there can be no effect without a cause. Most willingly granted. Friend Townsend will perhaps agree that matter was never created, but is eternal. Then if it eternally existed, its properties are eternal also. And we hav the daily proof before our eyes that matter has the power and potency to produce all the phenomena that we see everywhere around us. I. King.

Missionary Work.

BELUBBED: Agin is I with you on dis holy Saturday ebenin. I'se rejoiced to see you, yes, doubly rejoiced, an' I hopes from de bottom ob my heart dat health has bin your lot an' prosperity a twin to you durin' de past week. Dis last hope I hope with a fervor dat am genuine, for de cards has been a runnin' agin me, an' de konsekence is your pastor am a financial wreck, an' I doesn't want you to look tother way when dat signal ob distress, de sasser, comes a sailin' under your noses.

Dis am no fittin' starter for a pulpit effort. It's like partakin' ob puddin' before de soup comes on, or a tellin' de point ob a story fust and den go back and 'splain de preliminaries. But I took dis mefod simply to instil a pint into your minds, an' if dar am pints you forget in dis sarmon, don't let de present status ob your pastor's finances be one ob dem.

Dear honeys, I'se a been castin' my eye ober the orthodox field ob stubbles, an' de great big rank weeds a standin' in de corners, an' I tink I'se found a someting dar worthy ob imitation by we Liberals. At least dat's de way my mind was horoscoped de udder night.

At dat time I was conversin' wid Brudder Lemons, an' I sez, "Brudder, I'se powerful glad to see dat dar am a lubly prop ob Jesus in de town ob Brooklyn. I'se glad to see dat de lowly an' gentle Talmage leaves his flock and studies an' goes whar sin an' iniquity abouns. I'se glad dat his 'spansiv voice am a familiar sound in de dance-house an' de bagnio, dat he is a doin' ob his utmost to raise fallen humanity to de ——" An' what you 'spose dat ole nigger Lemons says? Jess dis: "Shet your mouff, you ole fool you. Does you tink dat he does all dis visitin' for de good ob de poor wretches? Don't you know dat he does it simply for de purpose ob panderin' to his depraved taste? If not, why don't he help dem? Did you eber hear ob his takin' a basket on his arm an' servin' out bread to de starvin' or raisin' de head ob de fallin' sister an' puttin' her feet on solid ground? Is it dese he goes for? Does de high motivs of philanthropy prompt him? Does his heart bleed for de sufferin' an' unfortunate? Nuffen ob de sort. He goes hyena-like, nay more, he skulks like Comstock, like in de filthy garb ob a spy, an' dat which he sees he goes home an' multiplies for de benefit ob his flock on de comin' Sunday.

"Poor guileless man, don't he know dat ebery time he speaks he hab among his listeners more depraved hearts stagnatin' underneath de broadcloth an' silks dan doze a beatin' beneath de rags an' tawdy finery ob de ones he am a villifyin'? Don't he know dat many ob his male shouters am frequent attendants 'pon de whitened sepulchers, an' how many unblushing sisters tune dere shrill voices in prayer to Jesus who am probably not utter strangers to—ob course I doesn't mean to say dat de assignation house know deir private knocks, nor, on de udder han', would I be willin' to swear dat dey am all spotless doves.

"But, brudder, don't you see dat dis am simply clap-trap, dese sarmons ob Talmage? De cheapest kind ob buncombe? D'ye 'spose he am sincere in a tryin' to reform de world by a holdin' up depraved an' unfortunate humanity? If so, what am de use ob his spendin' so much time in personal investigations in de low haunts when he could hab a reporter, detectiv, or captain ob police call at his study and in an hour giv him more details an' statistics concernin' crime an' its haunts dan he cou'd nose out in person in a year? Don't you see he has none but de flimsiest ob flimsy 'scuses? All dat dis man Talmage cares for am to make de name ob Talmage known throughout de lan' as de great religious mountebank, acrobat, harlequin, an' clown. An' he has succeeded in makin' a perfect success ob de same.

"Now, brudder, don't hug de delusion dat dis man or any ob his callin' care for de poor an' sufferin'. All dey want dem for am to keep dem in de mire whar dey am an' make use ob dem as a steppin' stone to Christian popularity. Dey paint dem with lampblack colorin' so as to make de contrast greater when compared wid deir own whitewashed selves. It am simply de ole way ob cookin' an' servin' up de "I am holier dan thou" kind ob fodder.

"Now, brudder, let's go whar dat ravin' egotist has been, but, unlike him, do not let us go to pander to a vile taste, or speak harshly an' falsely ob what we may see."

Belubbed, I went wid Brudder Lemons. We entered one ob doze places called sinks ob iniquity an' degradation, an' strange as it may appear, found honorable women who were forced to lead the lives they do or sink in a pauper's grave. Not one in de house but had fallen through the means ob some Christian father, husband, or son. Dese holy seducers am pillars ob de church, an' now tink it deir religious duty to turn deir backs upon dose whom da hav ruined, an' cast out to float wid de rubbish in de dark an' cold corners ob de world. Do dese he saints know dat some ob dem hab wives ob de same faith as deir hypocritical selves, who am not as true an' pure as deir once innocent victims am now? Shame on sech mortals, men who pretend to follow in de trail ob dat gentle Nazarene who reached out de helpin' han' to de fallen, an' who bid de poor chile to go an' sin no more. Dese hypocritical followers change de tune by sayin', Go an' sin as much as you please, so long as you don't bodder me.

We couldn't help de inmates ob dis house only a little. Dar was a poor, sick girl dar, an' it seemed dat she was a bein' nussed by de arms ob death. Brudder Lemons left some money for her with which to buy some little delicacies for to smooth death's pillow, an' I tell you you jess ought to see de tears a tricklin' down de poor one's cheeks an' down de cheeks ob all de girls at de quiet an' delicate way in which de gift was made. Dey all said dat was someting nebber heard ob in Christian visitors, an' axed if we wasn't Liberals. We proudly admitted de fact, an' dey said dey knew it de very fust moment we put feet in de house, kase we didn't commence abusin' dem an' a praisin' ourselves for bein' so virtuous.

We next went to a low dance house wherein was a stage devoted to de lowest kind ob actin' an' singin'. De room was reekin' wid fumes ob tanglefoot, an' de smoke ob villainous tobacco an' sigars hung around in a dense cloud.

"Now," says Brudder Lemons, "I'll scoot you through dis Christian institution."

"Christian?" says I, in great surprise.

"Dat's what I'm a remarkin'," continued our brudder. "Jess watch an' see for yourself."

He went to de bar an' called for cigars, an' as we were a lightin' dem he says to de barkeeper, "Me an' my friend am newspaper men, and we's a gettin' up statistics for publication." I hasn't got time to tell all de pints dat we got, but here am a few ob dem.

We found dat de 'prietor was a Catholic, an' his bartender, as he spressed it, "a member ob St. Patrick's church, be Jesus." De whisky was furnished by a Mefodist, de cheap wines by a Baptis', an' de cigars by a Presbyterian, de beer an' ale was furnished by a English Episcopalian, de keerds by a Irish Catholic, an' de ice was left at de door by a Universalist, which, by de way, was quite 'propriate. We went back ob de stage. De girl's tights were furnished by a Congregationalist, and deir boots by a Unitarian. Deir dresses were made by a Campbellitess, an' de soap dey washed demselves wid bore de sweet-scented name of a Colgate. Everyting in de place was furnished by Christians, while the hard-featured audience all claimed 'legiance to some church 'cept Brudder Lemons, myself, an' all dose present who were sober. As nine out ob ten were drunk, we Liberals was in a unmistakable minority; in fact, in de wrong pew. "Well," said I, "dis am a 'ligious outfit for sush." "Yes," responded Brudder Lemons, "it am 'ligiouser dan hell." I couldnt tell from dat last remark which place was complimented. Two days after a Christian police broke up de dance house, an' a Christian judge fined de 'prietor an' girls. To-day dis auxiliary institution of de Young Men's Christian Association am a runnin' 'long jess as usual, an' will be until de poor girls get a little money ahead, when de same Christian operation will be repeated, an' so on, while de poor girls 'xist to help fill de coffers ob de Christian cormerants surroundin' dem on all sides. Glory be to de Bible God an' his followers, de patrins ob vice an' obscenity.

"De nex' place," says de deacon, "an' in fact all de rest ob de places we will visit dis ebenin' require a kind ob a letter ob introduction." An' so we went to whar a Liberal kept a restaurant. He gave us de letterz. Dey consisted ov two large baskets filled with good fresh food. We paid for dem, an' as we stepped out dis Liberal 'prietor say, 'Hold on, I reckon I'se a goin' to do someting in dat line myself.' So 'long he comes with a great big basket too. Oh, honeys, I can't begin for to tell ob de good dat was done dat blessed night through de instrumentality ob Brudder Lemons. De same placez whar Talmage had been an' left coarse an' brutal words mixed with jeerz an' scoffs at de down-trodden—at dese 'dentical places were left by our band instead, good sensible chunks ob beef, nice light bread, an' suitable fixins for de sick an' weak.

Yes, many a household dat night went to sleep with tears ob joy baptizin' deir changed countenances, an' more good was done in dat one ebenin' dan will be done dis year by a big church full ob Christians. Honeys, de work am jess a commencin'. Dese poor folks must hab work so as to earn deir own grub, an' de sick must be brought back to health. De Christian heathens in our midst must be brought from de dark placez, an' sot whar de sunbeams ob truth can baptize dem with deir enlivenin' rays. Now to come to de start, I doesn't want you to forgit de sasser. To speak plainly, we want de funds for de deserbin' poor an' afflicted. Dat's what I referred to when I done say de keerez was a runnin' agen me. I mean dat one or two ob uz am not sufficient to defray de donations we would like to gib to de poor Christians—we hab no poor Liberals.

We am not vain, but honeys, we is different from de Talmage breed, for when we visits de poor we try to leab dem richer in body an' feelins. Oh, honeys, if ebber dar was a time when I longed for de existence ob a hell, it was at de present juncture. I believe it am a necessary institution, for if dar am a hereafter ob brimstone I believe it was built spessly for de 'commodation ob dat breed ob hypocrites ob which de monkey, Talmage, an' de buzzard, Comstock, are twin chiefs. Oh, but don't it make your flesh crawl, an' de kinks straiten in your har, when you think what a hold hypocrisy an' low cunnin' haz on dese tings, in manhood's guise. Not content with gloating over down-trodden humanity, dese hyenas set traps for de unwary an' innocent, an' do dere lebbel best to inaugurate crime, an' are clussly a follerin' in de trail ob de Bible debbil. My feelin's wont permit ob me pursuin' dis theme furder, but will simply ejaculate as a partin' gasp, May de time soon come when dey will be universally damned, an' as for de future, if we's gwine to be immortals dese kind am bound to be a very inferior breed, an' dey'll find dat all de browsin' dey'll do will be done in de red hot pastures ob hell.

Now look out for de sasser as we sing dat new hymn jess trowed up heah, a commencin':

Whar now am dat ole Talmage?
Whar now am dat ole Talmage?
Whar now am dat old Talmage?
He is with his vile clan.

He am causin' shame an' sorrow,
He am causin' shame an' sorrow,
He am causin' shame an' sorrow,
To de weary ob dis lan'.

By an' by some show will get him,
By an' by some show will get him,
By an' by some show will get him,
An' show him as dar "What Is It?" man.

Is Thought Substance?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I desire to notice briefly your criticism of my article with the above caption as published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 4th. Twice you misapprehend me. You say, "Mr. Chapman says, thought is a condition, or a manifestation of a condition." What I did say was, "As I see it, thought is not substance, but condition." Also, "Although a Spiritualist, I can and do believe that thought is simply manifestation of and a condition of matter." This my first proposition you admit, therefore, further argument on this point seems unnecessary. That the misapprehension occurred inadvertently I do not doubt.

Again you misapprehend me when you say, "Mr. Chapman says, the universe is divided into the ponderable and imponderable, or, mind and matter, and from the tenor of his remarks it appears that he holds mind to be an original element in the universe, comprising a domain distinct from that of matter." What I did say was, "I claim and believe that everything in the universe is substance or matter—that the universe is divided into two great classes, the ponderable and imponderable, or, mind and matter, that, as mind, which we call spirit, is the activ or controling element, it must be substance, for, if mind or spirit is not substance then thinking or thought must be a manifestation of a manifestation, or a manifestation of nothing, which is impossible.'

I think in the above I clearly placed mind within the domain of matter, although a little ambiguous when I said the universe is "mind and matter." I did not intend to claim, and do not, that mind is an original element distinct from matter, for I can conceive of nothing, not even a Holy Ghost, outside of matter. But it has never been proved that all we are as physical, spiritual, and intellectual beings hav been evolved absolutely from the primary rocks, and that there has been absolutely no influx of spiritual or life elements from the universe outside. Astronomers tell us that worlds grow old and crumble back to dust that is absolutely void of all life-forces. The essence or spirit of the matter that composed these worlds has departed and nothing but the ashes remain. Doubtless millions of worlds in the inconceivable eternities of the past hav run their course and been reduced to ashes. I ask, what has become of the life forces, the essence, of all this matter? There must be a mighty reservoir of spirit matter which is ready to affinitize with, and recombine with not only the ashes of those old worlds in the making over process, but also with the matter of other and newer worlds. Here is a problem that demands consideration. If worlds die, something departs from the matter of those worlds, and that something we call spirit, which is all of matter that can be refined or ethereal zed, and if the matter that is left can be remelted and made over anew into new suns and worlds then where do the life elements come from that rejuvenate those worn elements?

It is all very well to talk about the evolution of mind as we see it with the material eye in the various forms of life, from the monad or jelly-fish up to man, but that is only one little factor or equation in the immense problem of the universe. For one I believe all space throughout the universe is a mighty reservoir of spiritual elements, that hav been ground out and distilled from the matter of dying and extinct worlds and suns, and that these spiritual elements, like a great ocean, are ever beating not only upon the matter of this but all other worlds. I believe, too, as fast as condition are made these spiritual elements unite and combine with matter, and that this explains where the life germs and elements come from. When in the ladder of progression matter has reached a certain round or plane, it there finds elements ready to affinitize with it, forming new combinations, forms, and species, and as fast as conditions are made, just so fast are these elements attracted to it. I believe the origin of life and species finds here a ready solution. The union of the sexes and sexual elements is not all that has occurred. A condition has been made by which a something has been attracted or drawn from the great reservoir of life or spiritual forces, and just according to and in harmony with the nature of that condition is the element drawn. Is not here a practical thought, O ye agitators of sexual purification? Make proper conditions if you would hav noble children. It is a shame and a reproach that this all-important subject of borning children is left to the chance of blind ignorance, and is tabooed by the excessivly modest and sanctified hypocrites of the church. So long as people prefer faith to knowledge, and believe a lazy, selfish, good-for-nothing, hypocritical priestcraft, and a Bible that says "wisdom is foolishness with God," just so long will this important chapter in the great book of the science of life, which treats of the proper relations and use of the sexual functions, be unread, and the great bulk of the race be conceived and born under conditions most damning in their degradations. What the conditions are, and should be, I leave for future discussion, but, as sure as the sun shines, I believe evolutionists will yet pick up and unravel this thread, and find it prolific with grand thoughts and startling discoveries.

When you say, Mr. Editor, "from the jelly-fish up to man we find the capabilities — sensation, moving, feeling, tasting, seeing, hearing, and thinking—increasing precisely with the organizations producing them," you say truly; but are you sure absolutely that there is not something in this question of developing from matter, or inoculating matter with these sensations, that you do not quite understand? I think he who assumes to decide absolutely that all the life and mind forces which to day are activ were once latent in the rocks of this earth, is occupying a position that will sooner or later be found to be untenable.

When you say, "these are all produced by organization, and hav no other existence," you leave us in doubt as to what you mean. If by organization you mean purely an organism made up of elements ground out of or evolved from granit, I cannot, for the reasons stated above, agree with you. In the process of evolution very many new conditions hav been made, and each condition, I believe, caused the attraction of elements which once were identified with matter under other circumstances and, perhaps, in other worlds, and there has been thus a gradual accumulation by absorption from space of mind elements, until we find man the climax of all combinations, both spiritual and physical. Organization is an easy word to speak, but in this sense it has a mighty significance. It carries us back through an interminable series of changes, not only of matter of this earth but of other worlds, and before we hav completely solved the problem we must comprehend every and all changes and combinations as well as the nature of the elements involved. Notwithstanding your criticism, I still believe that no property of matter ever controld matter itself, and when I say property I mean an abstract condition of matter that is inseparable from matter. There is a wide distinction between substance and its properties. Properties are always abstract; elements, concrete. When a tree dies, all the abstract properties, such as hardness, softness, etc., remain, but the essence, spirit, or life of the tree has departed. Attempt to engraft a bud from a dead tree and the result is very different from that which follows the use of a live bud. What is the difference? In the live bud there is an invisible element of real substance which contains all the individualized elements of the tree, which are lacking in the dead bud, yet which no chemical analysis has ever revealed. I do not call this life principle or element a property, but an element. The presence of this element may cause an action, an attraction, a chemical assimilation and digestion, and this abstract result we may call force or a property. And yet we must be careful to discriminate between force as abstract results of combinations and the elements themselvs.

I do not call the life-principle a property, but an element. I may be wrong, but I certainly consider it the controling, therefore the superior element. When I am convinced the invisible germ or element in the bud or tree is not an element, is not substance, I shall be willing to call it a property, and not before. Just the same with men. The mind or spirit is an element, therefore cannot be a property.

You say, "When we die life departs." Very well. Life, then, must be something, and if it is something it must be substance. Who ever heard of one atom being a property of another atom? There certainly is a difference between a live man and a dead man, and that difference must be substance, call it life, mind, or spirit.

It may be claimed that death is rest or non-activity of the atoms of the body. Very well. Supply the missing element, even in a remote degree, and activity at once begins, or is restored. Activity, or chemical assimilation, or unison, is always the result of a combination of elements, and when the combination ceases all activity ceases. In death, mind, or spirit, the exciting cause being withdrawn, of course all activity ceases, and there is nothing but cold, unmagnetic substance left. I would as soon say the body is a property of the mind as the reverse. Sometimes a magnificent body produces a very inferior mind; and again, often we find the grandest minds in feeble, sickly, attenuated bodies; therefore one cannot be a result or a property of the other.

I cannot agree with you when you say "the individuality depends wholly upon the organization, and always conforms to or keeps pace with the organization," unless you make the meaning of organization conform to the above.

When you say, "Mind proves not the existence of spirit, mind is the result of the body, or physical organism, and nothing more," you are saying what you do not and cannot prove.

You say, "Every animal has some mind, some far more than others, but always in keeping with the physical organization." Yes, but when each animal was originated, when the two sexual elements united, there was a new condition created; and, according to my theory, an element which completed the triangle was drawn into the combination, and that mind-element was exactly adapted to the condition and combination.

This may be assumption, but I hav presented sufficient data to warrant the assumption, if it may be so called. I can find no theory that has ever been advanced on this point but what is equally worthy of being called an assumption.

You admit that "we may hav a dual existence," and say further: "These finer organizations may be developed during our cruder life, and be ready to set up an independent individuality, when the cruder becomes dead and worthless. If, however, this is so, it would be well had we more positiv proof of it." I think we hav the proof, and to my mind it is most convincing. The mind treasures up and accumulates a vast storehouse of experiences and facts. Many times events "long since forgotten" are recalled, and are as fresh and vivid as ever. Now here is something that is accumulativ and stable. Let us examin the brain. How rapidly the old, worn-out atoms are carried away and new ones take their places. The brain of the intense thinker next week will contain scarcely a trace of the brain of today. Can it be possible that the old atoms, as they take their departure, recount all their experiences, and the accumulated experiences of preceding generations of atoms, to the new-comers, with the injunction to keep it going. In other words, the brain is not stable, and is utterly inadequate to perform all that is done, or to account for all that we find. There is an element associated with the brain that is accumulativ, that hoards up and never loses what it once possessed. This, independent of all other facts, is sufficient to prove to my mind a conscious individualized entity, which is and must be substance, which is not a property of the body any more than the engineer or mechanic is a property of the engin, and which has a conscious existence beyond the grave, as the spiritual manifestations which occur to-day all over this earth abundantly prove. E. A. CHAPMAN.

Obituary.

DIED—At his residence, near Lumber City, Clearfield county, Pa., on November 27, 1880, of heart disease, Jason Kirk. Aged 64 years, 9 months, and 26 days.

Brother Kirk was reared in the Society of Friends, but finding the bounds of a creed too narrow for him, he embraced Agnostic principles, and was for a number of years before his death a member of the Clearfield Liberal League.

The funeral ceremonies were conducted by the secretary of the League, Harry Hoover, and by request I send you a synopsis of his discourse on that occasion:

FRIENDS: By special request of the deceased, and invitation of surviving relativs, I am come to bury my friend in accordance with his expressed wishes, and at the same time add my tribute to his memory.

The occasion which calls us together is a solemn one. Death has entered the field and another sheaf ripe for the harvest has been gathered in. Death is a great mystery. Who can penetrate the veil and pierce the mist that shrouds the last act of the great drama of life?

The universe is a mystery. Life itself is a mystery. Whence came we? what are we? and whither do we go? are questions that hav engaged the attention of earth's wisest and best sons and daughters for all time. He who lies silent before us believed that it was not only his privilege but his duty to attempt for himself the solution of these problems. He brought to this task an honest heart and an intellect of more than ordinary vigor. His desire was to know the truth, which he loved for its own sake. Error he discarded as soon as discovered. In his investigations he took reason for his guide, and appealing to nature lent a willing ear to her gentle teachings. Regarding himself as only responsible for good motivs and correct methods, he did not trouble himself about the conclusions to which his investigations might lead, and if his views of some of the great problems of life were different from some of ours, we must remember that he was as honest, as capable, and as likely to find the truth as ourselvs. When he found a truth he defended it bravely, but where he doubted he did not dogmatize. Casting the robes of superstition and hypocrisy from his shoulders he courageously followed where reason led the way, and if his interpretation of the laws of nature forbade him to hope for a "life beyond the starry skies," he calmly resigned himself to the inevitable and walked down into the valley of the shadow of death with a steady step and a heart devoid of fear, trusting to mother nature to giv her children sleep. Conscious of having done the best he could in this world he was willing to risk the probabilities of another.

The bright summer land he knew not of. This world he did, and tried to make it a pleasant place to dwell in, and regarded a well-spent life as the best preparation for death. Tired of life's fitful fever he sought respite in eternal rest.

"Lay me low, my work is done.
I am weary, lay me low.
Where the wild flowers woe the sun;
Where the balmy breezes blow.
Where the butterfly takes wing.
Where the willows drooping grow.
Where the young birds chirp and sing.
I am weary, let me go.

"I hav striven hard and long
In the world's unequal fight;
Always to resist the wrong,
Always to maintain the right;
Always with a steadfast heart,
Taking, giving blow for blow;
Brothers, I hav played my part,
I am weary, let me go."

My friends, we are all mortal. A few years ago we were not. A few more fleet years and our places will be vacant. From the blank chaos of the past we sprang into existence. Like a flower of the field we flourish for a season and then pass away. Earth that nourished us shall sooner or later claim our bodies to be resolved to earth again. All that breathes shall share our destiny, and we shall sleep beneath the shadow of the clouds, careless alike of sunshine or storms, each in the "windowless palace of rest."

But one who leads a true life need hav no fear of death, or what may possibly follow after. Death has only terrors for the ignorant and superstitious. One who faithfully discharges his duty according to the sphere in life he occupies has no need to recoil at leaving this state of existence. He dreads no angry being, no vindictiv spirit from whom to expect vengeance.

If at death our consciousness (as many believe) ceases; if our individuality comes to an end; if our bodies decompose and return their elements to nature from whence they came; and if the mind gently falls into a quiet, peaceful sleep which knows no waking, we are at least free forever from pain, sorrow, regret, or remorse.

If, on the other hand, as many others believe, we hav a continued existence; that we pass from a crude state to one more subtil and refined; from an imperfect life to one permanent and beautiful, we surely hav nothing to fear. If there is a future life there is no just grounds for believing that it will hav any more terrors than this. We shall doubtless find the same intelligent law governing there that exists here, possessing no more vindictivness or cruelty. We will meet the same powers, forces, and laws. There cannot be any other. So whichever belief proves true, we hav but little to fear in the future. In the grand economy of the universe birth, life, and death are natural sequences. They are complementary parts of one great whole and equally essential to each other.

"Life evermore is fed by death,
In earth and sea and sky,
And that a rose may breathe its breath,
Something must die."

Let us not regard death as a dread phantom, but rather as a white-winged messenger bringing release from the many ills of life.

Thus believing, we accept the natural order of things, and do not rebel against fate. What we can change for our own comfort and the good of humanity we gladly do, but what cannot be improved is borne with philosophic resignation.

And when we shall lie down to our last solemn sleep, worn and wasted with the world's weary warfare, though we may see no voyager's bark returning across the silent sea of the future, we bow to the inevitable, and meet, with heroism, the mystery of an untried existence.

But we are not without hope. Our marvelously beautiful world is all alive with rich and mighty meanings. It bids us hope that even though we perish as individuals the race will go on unfolding and the great tide of life sweep onward forever. Men may come and go, flowers may fade, hearts wither, generation after generation go down into the sepulcher of the ages, but none of the glorious attributes of humanity shall ever cease to be. All that is grand and good and noble and beautiful is secure from the moldering touch of time; and no disinterested deed, no generous impulse of the human heart, but shall survive the stars.

In one sense we do not die, we cannot die.

"There is no death; the festering heap givs forth the rose,
Whose perfume fills the air, and, painted by the sun,
It blooms, the tombstone of decay; its life too must close,
Like all that went before, but ere it ends another is begun.

There is no death; the silent rock creeps up the lofty pine,
And revels in the light, beating the air with leafy wings,
Until some human ear perceives a melody divine.
When through a human brain the rock lifts up its voice and sings,
There is no death."

Our deceased brother needs no eulogy at my hands. His good deeds speak for him. His life was a useful one, and his death peaceful. He died as he had lived, firm in his own faith and faithful to his highest convictions of truth and duty. Let us hope that instead of death being, as he thought, a dreamless sleep, he has found it the vestibule of a higher and truer life. Whether or not this fond hope be realized, Jason Kirk will continue to liv in the hearts of those who knew him.

He was buried in the orchard, and at the grave the speaker said:

In behalf of the relativs of the deceased I desire to thank the friends present for their kind sympathy and assistance; and now, beneath the snowy mantle of winter, with the returning buds and flowers of spring, the verdant robes and golden grain of summer, the ripened fruit and falling leaves of autumn; with changing season and changeless sun, with voiceless stars and tuneful birds, with falling rain and radiant bows, with whispering zephyrs and gentle dews, we leave thee, brother. Fare thee well.

Mongol-Chinese and Ma-Chines.

TEXT—"Which thing is an allegory."—Paul.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Two classes of Chines hav invaded our country—the Mongol-Chines, or Chinese, being the last; but the Ma-Chines had in a more silent way invaded us long before. Both are cheap laborers, the last-named being decidedly the worst of the two. Both hav been mobbed and sometimes destroyed by angry workmen. The complaint against the Mongol class—that they liv on nothing—is more reasonably urged against the others, as they consume scarcely anything and persist inflexibly in their original habits, whereas the others contract ours in time and are known to increase their demands for wages, a thing their confreres never do.

It is certainly astonishing that those who hav been most urgent in demanding the expulsion of one class of Chines because of their cheap labor hav been so silent respecting the others, who are a hundredfold more objectionable in this regard, one of whom, having been known to take the place of dozens of laboring men and ask the wages of but one.

I say, Mr. Editor, let us be just and use our brains like sensible people; and while we demand the expulsion of these Mongol-Chines on the ground of the cheapness of their labor, let us utterly destroy these Ma-Chines invaders. There is one of the latter, especially, against whom women hav in times past made great complaint—a miserable fellow who calls himself Se-Wing, a regular Ma-Chine, and I would recommend special attention to his case, although most of the women who hav complained of him hav turned traitor to our cause and hired him of late years.

So here is to the speedy departure of the Mongols and the Ma-Chines. HOLT.

Oregon, Mo., Nov. 21, 1880

I HAV read every word of the "Outlines of the French Revolution," and think it a most timely and excellent work. The facts admirably condensed, and on unquestionable authority, will be more effectiv with all intelligent people than any comments you or I could make. The book ought to be, and I trust ere long will be, on every table.—Elizur Wright.

IT is a rapid, concise, and vivid presentation of the crags and peaks of that mountain of revolt against landed caste, industrial subjection, and ecclesiastic privilege.—T. O. Leland.

IT is a compendious and vivid view of that momentous event in the world's progress—a drama, as it were, in five acts, which the reader may take in at a single sitting without fatigue. I read it with interest and profit.—William Henry Burr.

Letters from Friends.

MODESTO, CAL., Nov. 30, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In your issue of Nov. 20th, I read of your safe arrival home, and also your appeal. I hope your troubles may soon pass away. I think you do wrong when you blame and accuse yourself of being extravagant in making your trip to Europe. I, one of your contributors, think your letters from Europe are worth the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880, and I feel a desire to express my thanks through your paper for the interesting instruction and information I hav gained from them. Your description of M. Godin's gigantic speculation in co-operation is truly valuable, more especially now as we hav a company in San Francisco who are trying to start a co-operativ vinyard.

I will send you the Chronicle of Nov. 28th, and you can read the advantages they offer. If they would only offer the same benefits and profits that M. Godin givs they may make it a blessing to all who join it

I wish you could make a trip to China and Japan if your friends would only gather around you and help pay your traveling expenses in this way: Let each contributor giv five dollars to the fund, said contributor to receive from you as a premium a book containing your letters from Europe, also all your letters written on China and Japan. I will gladly head the list with five dollars, and will promis to do all I can to gain more subscribers. I would like to see you prosper, and show to the world that you are a man of intelligence. You hav my sympathy for your unjust imprisonment, and my best wishes for your future prosperity. Wishing you may hold me in remembrance, believe me truly yours, D. C. COLEMAN.

REPLY.—Many thanks to our friend for his kind and appreciativ words. His proposition is new, but strikes us favorably. We will not object to making a journey round the world and write up an account of what we see. We would like to visit parts of Europe we have not seen, to call at Egypt, Palestine, Arabia, Bombay, Calcutta, and other cities and parts of India, to "do up" China and Japan, returning via Australia to San Francisco and the Pacific coast. If three hundred friends, by May 1, 1881, will each send in the sum of five dollars we will undertake the circuit of the earth, to write it up, and to return to each one of them two fat volumes containing descriptions of what we meet with on our journey. As politicians say, "We are in the hands of our friends." Those who favor this proposition will of course be heard from in due time.—ED. T. S.

WACONDA, KAN., Nov. 25, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am very sorry you did not ex end your trip to the land of Judea, but of course I did not supply the needful, nor did any other person. So that's what's the matter. The letters are so instructiv that I want to send you back to finish up, but can't do it as I hav not the stamps. But I hav the money for next year's paper, and hav laid it apart for that purpose these two months, not thinking of its usefulness to you before the time. So I am glad you called for it. As ever thy friend,

GEORGE W. CHAPMAN, M. D.

DES MOINES, IOWA, Dec. 3, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am glad that you hav got home again after your adventures with old ocean, strangers with confounded tongues, lovely bewitches in art and nature, ghosts among the dry bones of virgins, saints, etc. I feel as though I would hav been delighted to hav been in your company in many places, such as along the Rhine, among the towering peaks and cascades of the lofty Alps, the ancient ruins of a once enlightened Rome, and skimmed the placid streets (canals) of the once important Venice, and especially to hav mingled with those interesting faces at Brussels and London. But those cathedrals, priests, saints, and dying gods cast a gloom upon my charms. I can only think of tham with horror, though their exteriors seem ever so grand. They talk to me of ignorance, violence, oppression, anguish, woe, and death—of jails, dungeons, racks, chains, gibbets, scaffolds, block, and fires. Fine arguments these to preach to honest men and women, to make them swear a lie, and dwarf or destroy that noblest feeling in human nature which wills us to do to others as we would that others should do unto us.

I would that you could hav extended your journeyings, and visited the place where the mother of Rome dwelt, also the Nile, where the cradle of science is supposed to hav been just rocked. Thence the much variegated India, with its strange people, having as strange religions. Then Persia by the way, and lastly, the country where the people lived who crucified their God, whom the people you hav so recently visited make so much ado about. I feel quite sure that your letters describing what you would hav seen and thought would hav been well worth the necessary expense incurred, as are the letters of your recent travels.

Yours truly, A. CLEGG.

CHAMPLIN, MINN.

FRIEND BENNETT: We are still going on reading your beacon light of truth, and other fearless productions from your press. The Infidel cause still goes on here, never stops nor falls back. You hav always printed good articles, as I find in looking over some old files of your paper; and as you hav many new readers it would not be out of place for their information to reprint some of them.

Yours, J. KINSER.

NEW YORK, Dec. 5, 1880.

DEAR D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find check for six dollars, to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880 and 1881. I enjoy your European letters. When I read about Noah being imprisoned in his ark for thirteen months, it came to my mind that thirteen months was your term of imprisonment, so you are Noah number two.

Yours respectfully, M. REIMAN.

COLUMBUS, O., Nov. 25, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As I did not receive THE TRUTH SEEKER until Wednesday of this week, I began to think you had dropped on me because my subscription had not been paid since September. And now to retaliate, no, to reciprocate, I will just drop on you with $2.00, which please find inclosed. I had as lief go without a shirt as without THE TRUTH SEEKER. One comforts the body, but the other the mind. Your letters from Europe constitute one of its finest features. Its editor and myself hav little to quarrel about, as we both stand upon the same Materialistic basis. You will, however, reckon me among the few who do not indorse the views of Mrs. E. D. Slenker and your Republican correspondents, but now that a man who shouts the praises of an unknown God, has been chosen to preside over the nation's destiny, we hope to be relieved from the howlings of the latter. Let Elmina proceed with her hobby, as she does not occupy much space, and we will patiently await her finis, having hitherto endured many a bore and expect to many more.

The National Liberal League shouts my sentiments every time. Its action at Chicago was glorious. It is a glorious institution, and the only League that I desire to ever become a member of. T. C. Leland's suggestion to publish a monthly bulletin of its proceedings meets with my hearty approval.

Long may you liv and prosper. Very truly yours,

J. J. BURDGE.

SOLEBURY, PA., Nov. 21, 1880.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: Through your polite indulgence I would say in reply to G. W. Chapman's answer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 6th inst., to what he styles my "no answer:"

I would be taught, as well as teach.
And stand corrected in my speech.
To fathom truth is my design.
"To err is human, to forgiv divine."

Your answer to no answer
Brings me to a pause.
To find effect in nature
Produced without a cause.
Our language is imperfect.
Our meaning to convey,
So we should be particular
In what we try to say.

You seem sarcastic in your wit,
And treat me with contempt.
As if you were a paragon,
And felt yourself exempt.
But never mind, sarcastic friend
We're after truth, I trow.
May each to each, an arrow lend,
To error overthrow.

Mankind by leaders hav been led
In ages of the past;
But now the age of reason
Has come to us at last.
The all in all in endless space
Is power. When defined
It ever runs immortal race,
As matter and as mind.

Hence I conclude your logic true,
There is no cause but one,
And that is force or power.
The cause of all that's done.
It forms the light and darkness,
And all the world in space,
And microcosm, god-like man,
To run allotted destined race.

Thus all effects in nature
Proceed from one great cause.
The alpha and omega,
Controled by science's laws.
Science's laws—they govern cause,
And never go astray,
Controling every moving action.
In their almighty way.

All possibilities of power
Ever did exist,
And man's capacity of reason
Can never count the list.
As fruit develops from the bud
That blossoms on the tree,
So motion is result of power.
I think we will agree.

Power is the cause of motion,
From whence effects all flow.
As rolling waves upon the ocean,
Before the winds that blow.
Without the universe of power
No motion could we see.
And if there were no motion,
What would all nature be?

One vast, almighty, silent power
In solitude confined,
With all the possibilities of nature.
And undeveloped mind.
With these desultory remarks
I close my answer now,
If they're not logical to you,
Please show me where and how.

Respectfully, E. W. ALLEN.

SUICIDE A CHRISTIAN INSTITUTION.

If the historical account of Jesus Christ is true, he not only recommended but put in practice suicide when he went voluntarily to Jerusalem to be sacrificed upon the cross, which was virtually putting the climax to his previous precepts enunciated to his followers, such as taking no thought for the morrow, hating their kindred, and even despising their own lives, to become a disciple of his, taking up a cross to all worldly happiness derived from the proper use of good common sense, free from the reputed vagaries of priestly ancient gods, coming under the condemnation of the scripture declaration, "The wicked shall not liv out half their days of threescore and ten years, the time allotted to man's life in this rudimentary state of existence."

When gloom pervades the mind of man,
And fastens on the soul.
It severs then the thread of life.
To find another goal

In dark despair sends up this prayer.
"Eloi, Eloi, lama, sabacthani."
Lord, my God, now hear my cry,
In life or death I trust in thee,
Oh, hear my prayer, and deliver me.
Oh, what a prayer for favored grace,
From one to one who fills all space,
And rules all nature boundless, broad,
The great, almighty, science God.

CRAB ORCHARD, NEB., Dec. 30, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: We are warmly attached to the Liberal cause and its advocate, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I find it difficult to spare the money for so high-priced a paper, but will continue to try and read it, as it is a great source of comfort in this unfriendly Christian country, where we are a target for all denominations and neither receive nor ask any aid or comfort from any. We hav been advancing toward Atheism for twenty years, and perhaps that is one reason why we hav no more of this world's goods than we need; but we would rather be gatekeeper in the tents of common sense wickedness than pope in orthodox palaces.

Outspoken Infidels are rarely found in this part of Nebraska, and life becomes quite irksome for want of genial society. This might be partially overcome had we good health and some wealth with which to purchase those good books, advertised in your paper, but our lot is cast, and thus it will perhaps remain, Yours for the right,

W. G. STONE.

AN OPEN LETTER TO D. M. BENNETT.

ADRIAN, MICH., Dec. 1, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am glad to learn that you hav arrived safe and well at home. It is now some nine months since I last wrote you a few lines of sympathy and commiseration while you were languishing in the hospital at the Albany Penitentiary, where you were put by Christian spleen and Christian spite with the help of United States officials, all because you had outgrown these superstitious notion of an anthropomorphic God, who sent a ghost among the young virgins as a kind of a proxy to beget a child for him, and when the proper time came that this son by proxy, his only son, should be crucified, dead, and buried; that he should go to hell, then to heaven, and that he is now there and has a seat at the right hand of this anthropomorphic God, to act as a mediator for us to this God. And the managements are such to them that believe this story that they will be saved, but to them that even doubt it they shall be damned. Now as the Christian Bible fails to giv us any particular account of this son of his by proxy from the time he was quite a small lad up to the time he was past thirty years of age, it is quite natural for the inquiring mind to want to know something about his boyhood days, how he spent his time, etc. That is a period of my life which I can look back upon with a great deal of pleasure. I well remember how I used to delight in skating, swimming, turning summersaults off a spring-board into the water where it was over my head, and all such sports, and I hav often wondered whether Jesus practiced any of those sports, for I do most certainly believe that those exercises are more preferable for both girls and boys, when guided by wisdom than to hav them trained up in a mopish superstition. Then when I was about entering manhood I began to look around among the opposit sex for a companion in the struggles of life and to fill that conjugal want that is as natural to every well-constituted male and female as the desire for alimentiv food is. (It might be different, however, with a ghost-begotten young man.) When I look back to this period in human life it seems to me now, friend Bennett, that those thirty years, together with the nine months that we lay in our mother's bosom, is altogether the most important period of our lives, because a mistake here may blast our happiness through life and entail misery on the next generation. And yet the biographers of this ghost begotten child, the worshipers of whom hav made such a stir in the world as persecutors, hav failed to giv us any account of this important period of his life that is of any importance to us.

So I was not surprised that you manifested a desire to know something more about the early life of this anthropomorphic child, and that, as his worshipers profess to believe in prayer and do pray a great deal, some orally and others by note, that you were willing to dedicate an open letter to him in which you submitted some inquiries referring to his juvenile years. For writing and publishing this letter, and for your general attacks on the errors in their Bible; and for referring the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to its immoral, vulgar, and obscene readings, without giving them all, as some are of such a gross character, fit only for Bible worshipers to read; in a word, it was for your intelligence, your truthfulness, your boldness, your independence, and your moral firmness in daring to attack the foundations of the Christian superstition with such weapons as the church could not compete with, and their only resort was to their old game of persecution, and as they had been planning for this for some years they now thought they would spring their traps for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but they sadly missed of these hopes, although its editor was taken in their coils. But this has only helped to wake up the true, broad-guage Liberal spirit in this country by which they may be able to see the danger to American institutions from allowing this old superstitious, prosecuting, and persecuting element to hav a place in our secular government.

With your permission I will close my letter with a few lines from the writings of that grand English writer, Winwood Reade. He says: "Christianity, we allow, is human in its origin, erroneous in its theories, delusiv in its threats and its rewards. Jesus Christ was a man with all the faults and imperfections of the prophetic character; the Bible is simply a collection of Jewish writings; the miracles in the Old Testament deserve no more attention from historians than the miracles in Homer; the miracles in the gospels are like the miracles in Plutarch's lives, they do not lessen the value of the biography and the value of the biography does not lessen the absurdity of the miracles.

"But Christianity is not in accordance with the cultivated mind; it can only be excepted or rather retained, by suppressing doubts, and by denouncing inquiry as sinful. It is, therefore, a superstition, and ought to be destroyed. With respect to the services which it once rendered to civilization, I cheerfully acknowledge them, but the same argument might hav once been used in favor of the Oracle at Delphi, without which there would hav been no Greek culture, and therefore no Christianity. The question is not whether Christianity assisted the civilization of our ancestors, but whether it is now injurious to the intellect, is also injurious to moral life, and on this conviction I base my conduct with respect to Christianity. That religion is pernicious to the intellect; it demands that reason shall be sacrificed on the altar; it orders civilized man to believe in the legends of a savage race; it places a hideous image, covered with dirt and blood, in the Holy of Holies; it rends the sacred vail of truth in twain; it teaches that the creator of the universe, that sublime, that invincible power, exhibited his back parts to Moses, and ordered Hosea to commit adultery, and Ezekiel to eat dung. There is no need to say anything more. Such a religion is blasphemous and foul."

A few words from near the close of his work and I am done. Hear him: "Whoever improves his own nature improves the universe of which he is a part. He who strives to subdue his evil passions—vile remnants of the old four-footed life, and who cultivates the social affections, he who endeavors to better his condition, and to make his children wiser and better than himself, whatever may be his motiv, he will not hav lived in vain, but if he act thus, not from mere prudence, not in the vain hope of being rewarded in another world, but from a pure sense of duty as a patriot of the planet on which he dwells, then our philosophy which once appeared to him so cold and cheerless will become a religion of the heart and will elevate him to the skies. The virtues which were once for him mere abstract terms will become endowed with life, and will hover round him like guardian angels, conversing with him in his solitude, consoling him in his affliction, teaching him how to liv and how to die. But this condition is not to be easily attained; as the saints and prophets were often forced to practice long vigils and fastings and prayers before there ecstacies would fall upon them, and there visions would appear. So virtue, in its purest and most exalted form, can only be acquired by means of severe and long continued culture of the mind. Persons with feeble and untrained intellects may liv according to their conscience, but the conscience itself will be defectiv. To cultivate the intellect, therefore, is a religious duty; and when this truth is fairly recognized by men, the religion which teaches that the intellect should be distrusted, and that it should be subservient to faith, will inevitably fail."

And this, friend Bennett, was your case. Your intellectual perception in reference to this Christian superstition had been well cultivated, and your moral firmness was unyielding, and you dared to attack the very citadel behind which this Christian superstition defended itself. And this was the trouble, and nothing else but this. The sham charge about "Cupid's Yokes," obscenity, and all that was the merest bosh, and every intelligent person that is posted on the matter and has moral courage sufficient to be a true American citizen knows this as well as you and I and thousands of other intelligent Freethinkers that belong to the broad-gauge Liberal movement. S. D. MOORE.

JOPLIN, Mo., Dec. 1, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your letters from Europe are just to the point. I hav heard Germans whom I am acquainted with say that they could almost imagin themselvs at home again, your description being so true to facts and nature. I would like to hav you take a tour in South America, and giv the results in THE TRUTH SEEKER. A merry Christmas and a happy New Year to yourself, wife, and foreman. DR. CHAS. F. TITUS.

CARTHAGE, Mo., Nov. 16, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Mrs. Slenker's articles on "Sexual Intemperance" contain generally excellent ideas. I hav read and thought much upon the subject, and believe I fully realize its importance, for more wrecks are strewn along the stream of life, more people sent to premature graves through sexual than by alcoholic intemperance.

As generally understood and practiced, I will not at this time say that her conclusions are not correct; yet because a perverted and unnatural use of any organ of the body has become the rule, with evil results, we should not conclude that a right or natural use (aside from procreativ purposes), when found, would not bring good results.

In Mrs. Slenker's reply to "W," No. 9, she falls back upon her comparison of the use of alcohol in its various forms, and evidently thinks her position unanswerable; but I submit that there should be greater similarity before there can be a true comparison.

Alcohol is a man-made product; the taste or desire for its use wholly acquired, and mankind would be better off if all in existence were destroyed and no more produced. To the contrary, the sexual instinct is God or nature-given; the taste or desire natural in every perfectly-organized person at the age of puberty; and what would be the result to the race if the instinct should cease to exist?

Again, alcohol in connection with the human system is unnecessary and useless; but all admit that for roproductiv purposes, at least, the sexual instinct is necessary.

Again, a system, to be right, viz., "no intercourse except for procreation," must not, while strictly following it, permit of wrong being done; and it is well known that there are many married people so organized or constituted that they could hav intercourse, moderately at least, always for procreativ purposes, yet never producing.

Hoping that this important question will continue to be discussed in your paper until the greatest amount of truth possible is reached, I remain, Yours for the right,

A. W. ST. JOHN.

DETROIT, MICH., Nov. 24, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In your reply in your paper of Nov. 20th to my criticism on the propositions of Mrs. Slenker in regard to the vibrations, or waves of light, and the different colors of different objects we see, I think you hav not answered the question, but simply reversed the proposition, which was that a certain number of waves, as she called them, or vibrations, as you term them, determin the colors, not that the colors determin or produce the waves or vibrations, which is exactly the contrary thing. The idea struck my mind, at the first thought of her proposition, that it would involve the necessity of an intelligent, omniscient, omnipresent, all-sufficient power to do that coloring, which, as I understand Materialism, is not recognized by that system.

That the waves, or vibrations, must know before they leave the sun just what color they must produce, and what and where the object is, and direct and regulate their velocity accordingly, is the logical outcome of her theory, or there must be an intelligent power independent of those waves of light to direct and make them efficient to the accomplishment of that purpose.

My object in these communications is not controversy, but to elicit truth; and if it should appear that I only show my ignorance by advancing such ideas, I shall console myself with the reflection that I am not the first or only one that has done so foolish a thing.

If you feel disposed to let this appear in your paper as my rejoinder to your reply to my criticism of Mrs. Slenker's article on "Sunshine and Colors," I shall deem it a favor, whether it only exposes my ignorance or not. I am willing to risk the consequences.

Most respectfully, JAMES HALE.

D. M. BENNETT, My Old Friend: I hope ere this reaches you you will be safely landed on your nativ shore, for we need you here, but your letters hav somewhat compensated for your absence. I hav read them with a great deal of interest. I see I am behind again with my subscription. Please don't get uneasy, I will come to time as fast as I can. You will find post-office order for $3, for which giv me credit for $1.50, and send the dear old TRUTH SEEKER to E. E. Lewis, Milton, Or. Yours truly,

OSWEGO CENTER, N. Y., Nov. 30, 1880.

FATHER BENNETT: I hav wondered how long you could liv on excuses and send the best paper in the world to fifty thousand delinquents. Well, I hav been waiting to get silver changed for paper, and I am quite a distance from the post-office in the rural districts, but hell will be frozen over before I go back on you or your paper, and I await anxiously for it every time. I hav lain awake many a night while you were in the Christian hell, and wept with grief and provocation, and every time I heard a new word from you my indignation was at the boiling point, and more than once I was on the point of burning all the Bibles and Testaments in the house, and even the harmless chromos on the wall (baptism of the Lord Jesus Christ), but upon reflection, I thought that even the mythical Jesus had reason to be ashamed of all your persecutors, so I concluded to let the books, pictures, etc, die the natural death, which, thank Infidelity, they are fast approaching.

I hav been inside of the old, tumble-down Methodist Episcopal church for eight years, and I know their hellish aims full well, and if the rest of my life is not too short to pull it down, then my name is not A. H. WALKER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 30, 1880.

INDOMITABLE FRIEND BENNETT: I received the inclosed letter from J Hacker. It speaks for itself without much comment. I earnestly request the publication of it in your paper at discretion, as he has been brought to abject poverty in extreme old age by the loss of his fruit crops three years in succession, so that people of this generation may know something about how he has spent his life, and aid him now in his extreme necessity.

I inclose five dollars, three to renew my subscription for 1881 and 1882, 25 cents for the "Summary of Substantiation, or the Philosophy of Knowledge," and $1.75 for the National Defense Fund. You must need oil money to keep our Liberal machine in good running order; and so long as hydra-headed intolerance persecutes editors we want a Defense Fund.

How grandly gratifying to you the Bradlaugh Illuminated Testimonial must be after your durance vile and the indelible disgrace of our bulldozed chief magistrate by the rejection of two hundred thousand petitioners! Please send the Illuminated Testimonial in due time.

Respectfully, JOHN COSGROVE.

MR. HACKER'S LETTER.

BERLIN, N. J., Nov. 25, 1880.

HON. JOHN COSGROVE, Dear Sir:

You sent, with kind intent,
Two dollars for our use,
To buy us food and do us good;
And now for my excuse:

I then was sick, an old dry stick,
And had not strength to write.
But thought of you as moments flew,
And dreamed of you by night.

And if our thanks were bills from banks
You'd find yourself quite rich;
If they were "ile" you'd make your pile.
They'd fill a "muchly" ditch.

But thanks seem lean and lank and mean.
Leaner than Pharaoh's kine.
But will is good, and if we could
We'd send you bliss divine.

So please forgiv, and let us liv
In harmony and love.
Enjoying here that kindly cheer
That others seek above.

Yes, friend, we duly appreciate your kindness, and assure you that our thanks are more than words can express. One year our fruit crops were all ruined by late frosts that killed the blossoms. The next year the berry crops were ruined in the same way, and then a hail storm cut off all the grape blossoms; and the present year the berries were ruined by the drouth. Strawberries and blackberries dried up and died on the bushes when half grown. We got only four bushels where we hav had eighty. We had a middling crop of grapes this year, but the price was discouragingly poor, only from one and one half to four cents per pound, most of them three cents, and freight, carting across the Delaware, and commission for selling to be paid out of that small sum.

When I planted my vines the same kind of grapes sold for twenty-five and thirty cents per pound. Hard, is it not? I do not know what we shall do. One friend very kindly advised us to go the pauper-house, but we will both starve or cut our throats before we will do that. We made regular visits to the Portland pauper-house years ago to feed the sick that were nursed by prostitutes and robbed of the food we carried as soon as we were out of sight. To go to a pauper-house to liv and die among thieves, drunkards, and prostitutes would be too much to ask of us.

If I could raise two hundred dollars I think I could use it in a way that would make us comfortable while we liv, and enable us to keep our little home and devote it to some useful purpose for the good of others when we are done with it. Those whom I helped when they were children, many of whom are now well off, seem to hav forgotten me, or else are very ungrateful, and my old friends of former years hav passed away, so that I stand among strangers of a new generation, who do not know that most of my life and earnings hav been spent in various ways in the cause of humanity, and therefore I hav asked but one or two for help. When publishing a paper in Portland some twenty years ago, and clothing poor children and finding homes for them, a woman who read my paper sent a friendless, ragged, nine-year-old boy a hundred miles for me to care for. I took off his rags, clothed him anew at an expense of thirteen dollars, advertised to find a home for him, and gave him his board six weeks, and then found a first-rate home where he learned a good trade. Two years ago I heard he was married, owned a good farm, with eighteen head of cattle, four horses, two colts, a store of goods, etc., and I twice sent him word that as I was old and poor he ought to make me a present of as much as I spent for his board and clothes, but hav received no reply. About the same time I took several boys from prison, stood by them in court, got them clear without a trial. The judge gave them up to me and I found good homes for them. I hav understood that three of them are ship-masters and well off, but they, too, seem to hav forgotten me.

I visited the jail in Portland every week for four years, and there saw boys playing cards with aged thieves and drunkards, and learning obscenity, and I began to plead in my paper for a state reform school for such boys, and got it without the aid of any other paper in the state, as the old files of papers will prove, and for that act alone the state could well afford to make me a handsome present; but I was a heretic all the time, and did not believe in the rotten trash falsely called Christianity, and told them so, and so I suppose they think starvation is good enough for me.

But enough. I do not write complainingly, but to show you a little more of the world. Yours,

J. HACKER.

CIRCLEVILLE, O., Dec. 6, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Friend: Still the world moves! How strange the contrast between yourself and the writer when compared with our youthful associations, objects, and pursuits! Then we were considered equals in our mental capacities. How vast the difference now! You are permanently enrolling your name (and worthily so) among the wise, self-sacrificing, daring, and truly good men and sages of time. The writer, oh, what is he? a mere cipher on the page of history. Yet, if not noted for any great reformatory pursuits and acts, he may claim only to be morally good. I do not envy you, my well-tried friend, but wish you great and crowning success.

I am glad you had an opportunity to visit the old-country nations and wonderful sights you so masterly narrated in your European letters. I enjoyed the reading of the same hugely, I can assure you, and often wished I could hav the pleasure of traveling by your side. I suppose you will be able to make capital out of what knowledge you gleaned from the ancient sights and ruins, plunderings of the Christians from pagan art to embellish churches, etc.

Well, now that you hav got home and again settled at personal attention to your paper, and to the publishing of new and needful works of scientific progress and reform, I trust you will find ample support from your many well-to-do friends, and enjoy the rest of your days in comparativ peace and prosperity.

I see advertised in the Agent's Herald a new book exposing frauds, impositions, obscenity, etc, by Anthony Comstock. I hope he will never try to wickedly cage you again. I cannot say anything mean enough about him for want of comparison, as there is nothing low, vulgar, and vile enough besides himself to compare him with. But I hav one consoling thought—time, future time, will surely bring its just reward to him in self-abhorrence for all his duplicity and cussedness. E. D. BLAKEMAN.

VANITY CROSS ROADS,
STATE UV PENCILWANY,
NEAR FILIDELFY, Nov. 29, 1880.

DEAR BRUTHER BENITT: Inclosed you will find two dollars, fur which you will please send me the "Six Lecters on Astronomy," by Bruther Proctor, also other trax that I will menshun in this letter before I git dun, if I don't furgit it.

You see there's bin a kind uv a split in our family fur sum time, or ever since Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton got tangled up so bad.

Well, now, bruther Benitt, I'll tell you just what kind uv a fix it left our family in. The old woman, that's mam, she kinder leaned toward Beecher, and I kinder leaned toward mam; and so 'twixt mam and I and Beecher (instid uv the hitching-post), we all kinder leaned toward the church; but the old man, that's dad, he and Sal, that's Sarey Jane, my sister, kinder leaned toward the Piltons, and as Tilton kinder leaned toward Woodhull, I'll giv you my sacred wurd fur it, it cum darnation neer making Infidels uv dad and Sal both; and ever sinse that dad's kinder had his douts about the hul uv the Bible being true; and as Sal (that's my sister, Sarey Jane) reads more than the hul uv us, she says that she's read a good many passages that she does durn well ain't true.

But when mam and I find anything in the Bible that looks scaly or perty thin, we jist think uv the great struggle bruther Beecher had with Mrs. Tilton, and if he hadn't placed his hul relianse on the sacred truths uv that good book, how in the world could he hav got a judge and a jury uv twelve good men together what would say he didn't do it?

Now this Bible question's got our hul family tangled up, and the old woman (that's mam) says she's going to find out all about it, and is going to hav me edicated fur the lecter bisness, and she says there's no noing but maybe I'll be called to preach yet.

You see t'other nite Bob Ingersoll, or, as our preachers call him, "Pagan Bob," giv a lecter here at the Cross Roads, so the old man (that's dad) and Sal (that's sister Sarey Jane), jist to spite the old woman (that's mam) and I, they slipped out and went over to the lecter. So jist to spite dad, mam and I went fur the old man's every-day breeches and slipped these two dollars out uv his pocket on purpis to send to you fur these trax, because mam says she wants me to read both sides uv the question,

Now, bruther Benitt, don't forgit the "Six Lecters on Astronomy," fur I've promised to giv a lecter on astronomy myself down at Sandy Forks, in the old red skoolhouse, this winter, and wun uv these lecters will do jist as well as to make wun up. Mr. Smith, our preacher, sez he does that sometimes hisself; and as long as the congregashun don't no the difference, what's the odds?

I also want "The Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier," 'cause if he was a priest, maybe he can tell me sumthing I don't no, and that's what I want.

Send me "Why Don't God Kill the Devil?" 'cause that's jist what I want to know. I think I no now, but maybe I don't no rite; but I think it is fur the same reason that Uncle Sam don't kill all the Injuns, because then there would be no work fur the soldiers, and they'd git into mischief. And so it would be with about a million uv preachers, deacons, and elders, if God would kill the poor devil. No, sir, I'd ruther giv my last pair of britches, that ain't in use, than to hav him kill the devil, and I hope he won't fur a while yet, anyhow.

I would like the "Philosophy of Spiritualism," by Frederick R. Marvin, 'cause mam sez that's another piece uv humbuggery, and she sez she wants me to lurn all about it.

Well, deer bruther, I see you've jist returned from your grand trip to Urip, and as I hav been readin your letturs I hav come to the conclushun that it panned out splendid.

I read your appeal to the friends ov freedum, in last week's TRUTH SEEKER, callin on all who ode you to walk up, and settle up. Now, bruther Benitt, you no durn well I don't owe you a nickel, and if I did I'd jest as leave pay you as not.

But I want to see the fun go ahead, because I think you've bin a good missionary amung the heathen Chinese, for if a a lam gits outside uv the fold and doant git back before he sees a TRUTH SEEKER, he's a gone sucker, sure.

I buys your paper evry week and sumtimes two a week, one on purpos to lend to my Methodist bruthers, and they begin to like it so that one paper gits all wore out before it gits half way round.

Just to help you along I send one doller fur trax fur myself, and wun doller that an old Methodist bruther handed me fur trax fur hisself, he ses he likes them he thinks better than them published by the American Trax Society, they're got more life he ses in them and not so much soft sauder; he ses if ever the devil gits cramps, its them TRUTH SEEKER trax wot will do it.

Incloased is a list of the Methodist trax wanted by my friend. You may send these by male if you doant think they'l spile the postmaster. I wudent hav one uv Mr. Hayes' postmasters spiled fur the hul wurld.

Please send the trax jist as soon as you git this, and Ile be yourn till the great day uv jubilee. SAM,

The Apostle of the new dispensashun.

P. S.—Please doan't forgit the six lectures and the uther trax.

Tribute to Lucretia Mott.

BY M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD.

Most noble woman of our present age,
Who stood like monarch oak amongst
Thy kind. So firm and strong in all
Thine efforts to uplift the human race,
Whose soul life was bright as stars of
The first magnitude, that shine in the Grand galaxy of heaven, yea, even like Unto the sun's bright rays to such as
Were not blind with ignorance or sin.
And yet thy mortal presence was so
Humble, modest, angel-like, for I am
Sure that all heaven's sweetest angels
Must be modest and lowly to bless
Poor human kind as thou hast done.
When millions were enslaved thy voice
Was raised, beseeching for their freedom.
And never did thine efforts cease until
The shackles had been broken and the
One act that made our Lincoln
Immortalized upon the earth,
Had been recorded in our country's annals
When Henry C. Wright and Garrison, with Phillips, Foster, Thompson, Burleigh, and
Many others, who, worthy to be called men,
Dared gird their armors on and battle
For true freedom, didst thou with honest
Zeal engage in activ combat for the Right. And some of them had passed
To where thy spirit now has gone, and
I am sure they gave thee cordial welcome.
When war, which thou didst ne'er approve,
Swept o'er our sin-sick country, and
Finest youth was led to battle fields,
There to be slain in cruel slaughter,
Thy busy fingers knit good socks,
As if they were thine own dear boys
Whose lives were thus endangered,
And still thy pleadings ever were
For peace. So each reform has Found thee, as an earnest pioneer,
Leading the way, and pointing out
The path to many weaker ones.
And for thine own sex, how nobly hast
Thou labored! And every woman who Has heard thy voice or felt thy touch
Must feel herself made better. And I
Who write these simple lines must
Ever bless the hours when beside thee
Upon the public rostrum my voice
Has formed one feeble strain in the Great anthem prayer which earnest
Souls forever utter. And while I see
The footprints of such feet as thine
Along the sands of time I will not Falter. I will pass on and strive to Make the earth-life better that I, too,
Have lived. Thy last dear words to Me I shall not soon forget—"Do well
What seems to be a duty, and labor
On for peace." Dear angel, we shall Miss thee. But thou wast ripened for
The harvest, and now among that
Throng who wear no more the robe
Of dust will thou pass on from glory
Unto glory. Oh, may I sometimes,
Feel the benediction of thy presence
And with my spirit-vision opened
See thy sweet face smiling on me
As of yore! Though marble monuments
By loving ones may be upreared,
With costly forms and fine inscriptions
Carved thereon, more sacred and
More beautiful will stand, yea, more
Enduring than them all, unchanging
Ones in human hearts. Nearer the
Fountain of celestial life I know
Thou art; and for thy nearness unto
God, we, who hav so much loved thee.
Must be nearer, too. Smile on us,
O Lucretia, and pour the influx of Thine uprisen spirit upon our own
Weak natures! And when we may
Cast aside our dusty garments,
May we still move on in the grand
Army of progressiv souls forever more,
At one with thee, with love, with God.

Jennie's Vision.

BY CHARLES BRADLEY.

(In the year 1851, on one of the Orkney Islands, Jennie McLane was found dead on the shore the morning after she heard that Sandie Cameron was lost at sea.)

The truth of beauty is the sole beauty of truth.—B.

Eros angelos eiredenteros andron.—Sappho.

O angel love, first gift of heaven's grace,
Life-fountain of the human race.—B.

As setting sun on ocean's floor
Kissed many a joyful homeward sail,
A sad maid, on the sounding shore,
Did her lost sailor boy bewail.

"O Sandie dear, come back, come back!
Sore is thy Jennie's heart for thee!
And will he not return, alack!
Why dost thou keep him, awful sea?

"Oh, could I come where thy dear eyes
Lie closed beneath the dreadful deep,
Dear Lord, from light and life I'd fly,
With my true love in death to sleep."

She sighed and sad the wild wind's flight
Over the deeply murmuring sea—
Down went the sun before the night,
And the dimmed stars looked on the lee.

In their paled light round Sandie's grave,
An angel band bowed to the sea,
In their sad eyes, "Too late to save"—
Midst love, as once on Calvary.

Now in the midst her Sandie's form,
More beautiful than life, she sees,
With more than mortal raptures warm,
His cheeks are flowers that kiss the breeze.

The stars gleam on his mighty wings,
Which seem the oceans vast to shade,
And as he soars, the angel sings,
"Come, rest in heaven with me, dear maid."

She heard no more, from her fixed eyes
Softly the parting spirit flew
To meet her lover in the skies,
Where hope and love are ever new.

. . . . . .

Still, on the shore
Sigheth the roar
Of the ever murmuring sea;
But no sorrow parts
The loving hearts
Throughout eternity.

Six Lectures on Astronomy.

By Prof. RICHARD A. PROCTOR.

Five of them were delivered at Steinway Hall, this city, in the winter of 1875-6, and were reported phonographically expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER by Miss M. S. Gontcharoff. This is the most popular course of Lectures ever delivered by Professor Proctor, and ought to be in the possession of every person. Price 20 cents.

The titles of the Lectures are:

I. Growth of Worlds.
II. Life and Death of Worlds.
III. Other Worlds than Ours.
IV. Other Suns than Ours.
V. The Great Mysteries of the Universe.
VI. Religion and Astronomy.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

OPEN LETTER TO THE

ST. JOHNS SCHOOL BOARD,

BY

M. BABCOCK.

This book contains an inspired PHOTOGRAPH of the GOD that's being worshiped at the expense of the district in our public schools; the God that "overshadowed" Mary; the God that's wanted in the Constitution; the gentleman that owns some three billion dollars' worth of untaxed church property; the "so-help-me" God that makes a lie the truth in court; the God that governors besought to stop the yellow fever, which he didn't do. The picture is worth the price of the book. Price, 25 cents. For sale by D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth street, New York.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To Miss Anna Knoop, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1 25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance, such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

DOCTOR FELLOWS
VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness Fits, others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
Syphilis is positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.
DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.
PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR
Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.
Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED IN MODERN THOUGHT.
BY HENRY C. PEDDER.
Extra cloth, beveled, black and gold back and side stamps, 12mo, 185 pp., price, $1.00.
Everything that we now deem of antiquity was at one time new; and what we now defend by examples will at a future period stand as precedents.—Tacitus.
An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.
He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.
The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.
BY L. FEUERBACH,
Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc
Translated from the German.
Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)
The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

THE POCASSET TRAGEDY THE LEGITIMATE FRUITS OF CHRISTIANITY.
A Discourse by
WILLIAM DENTON.
This is the masterly lecture reprinted in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the best on the subject, and shows in the clearest manner that that sad tragedy was but the to-be-looked-for outcome of the teaching of the Bible.

JUST OUT!
Another Extraordinary Book!
Sixteen Saviors or None;
OR,
The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.
By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind.
Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.
Second Edition.
Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Of Kentucky.
Held in Kirksville, Mo., during nine evenings—May 20-29, 1879. Synopsis report—official. This book of 220 pages gives an interesting presentation of the theological questions which divide Christians and Liberals. The Rev. Ditzler is regarded as an able defender of his favorit Christian doctrins, but it will undoubtedly be admitted by the reader that Prof. W. F. Jamieson fully met all he had to offer. Christian readers will take more kindly to a work of this kind, giving both sides an equally fair chance, than to books on our side only.

WORKINGMEN, READ!
ALLEGORY.
UNCLE SAM AND AMERICUS.
A DIALOG ON
LAND, LABOR, AND REFORM
By F. E. BOYD.
Outlines of a plan for a new American national land and labor co-operativ system, by which land and comfortable homes may be secured to the poorest classes of every race, without money or price, with the educational and social advantages of modern civilization. Designed to ameliorate the condition of the struggling masses; to equalize population; to prevent vice, crime, and pauperism; to prevent the recurrence of industrial crises and feuds, labor riots, and popular insurrections; to terminate Indian wars; to avoid or do away with an oligarchy of landlords and capitalists; and to preserve or restore the liberties of the people and the rights of self-government by bringing immediately together the two great elements of universal progress, land and labor.
"The land shall not be sold forever; for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. xxv. 23).
"Moreover, the profit of the earth is for all" (Ecclesiastes v. 9).

Gems of Thought.

HERE'S freedom to him that would read,
Here's freedom to him that would write!
There's nane ever feared that the truth should be heard
But they whom the truth would indict.
—Burns.

WORK is the mission of man on this earth. A day is ever struggling forward, a day will arrive, in some appropriate degree, when he who has no work to do, by whatever name he may be named, will not find it good to show himself in our quarter of the solar system; but may go and look out elsewhere if there be any idle planet discoverable. Let the honest working man rejoice that such law has been made good on him, and hope that by and by all else will be made good.—Carlyle.

PAINE and Voltaire both believed in God—both hoped for immortality—both believed in special providence; but both denied the divinity of Jesus Christ. While theologians most cheerfully admit that murderers die without fear, they deny the possibility of any man who has expressed his disbelief in the inspiration of the Bible dying except in an agony of terror. These stories are used in revivals and in Sunday-schools, and hav long been considered of great value.—Ingersoll.

REASON is the noble gift by which the creator has distinguished man from all other animals. Now it would be a most unreasonable act first to endow a being with any faculty and then to prohibit its use. Such a procedure would be, if possible, more absurd, in reference to the most distinguished and ennobling of all the powers of the mind. Moreover, God, who is all wisdom and all reason, could never create man in his own likeness, as it is said he did (Gen. 1, 27), and then forbid the employment of the very faculties which must form a principal feature in the resemblance.—Spurzheim.

A COUNTRY fellow at the plough
His acres tilled, he's right enough;
A country girl at her wheel,
Her dizzens done, she's vera weel;
But gentlemen and ladies warst,
Wilt e'en down want o' wash and cursed,
The laiter, lounging, lank, and lazy,
Though de'il hast ails them, yet uneasy,
Their days insipid, dull, and restless,
Their nights unquiet, long, and tasteless;
And e'en their sports, their balls and races,
Their galloping through public places,
There's sic parade, sic pomp and art,
The joy can scarcely reach the heart.
—Burns.

EVEN in regard to the virtues of private and family life, the efficacy of the example and teaching of Jesus is diminished by his own exemption from domestic ties. We possess various utterances of his on the subject, depreciating natural bonds in comparison with the spiritual, not indeed wholly devoid of justice, yet liable, by reason of their abrupt austerity, to misconstruction. We learn, besides, that while he looked upon celibacy as the highest state for persons destined to higher things, he entertained vigorous notions as to the indissolubility of marriage, and also that he was a lover of children.—Strauss.

THE most celebrated of the rabbis all learned some handicraft by which to support themselvs, for even those who held the position of teachers were not accustomed to receive money for their lessons. Thus we find different rabbis mentioned as shoemakers, tailors, bakers, incense-makers, builders, gravediggers, landsurveyors, joiners, tanners, smiths, and what not. One of them said: "It is good to combine the study of the law with some handicraft; for the exercise of both together preserve a man from sin. But any study which is pursued without a handicraft ministers to vanity and draws sin behind it.—The Bible for Learners.

ONE of the great objections made to woman's equality is that she is not physically strong enough to take her place as ruler, guide, and teacher of the race. But in a true condition of society, such as we all profess to believe is the highest and best, and one philosophers and humanitarians are laboring to bring about, where love, knowledge, and wisdom shall be the governing forces, and people shall be led and persuaded instead of compelled and forced—then woman will be in her element. Gentle, loving, kind, and persuasiv, the generous and noble patroness of all that is true, beautiful, and good; the teacher, the healer, and the wise, provident, and thoughtful mother, wife, sister, and queen. When moral force is held in priority to physical strength, and pity, compassion, and charity take the place of scorn, contempt, revenge, and hate, then will the holy rule of love and wisdom come upon earth as the great gift of the brotherhood of humanity.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THERE is a very large amount of blind acquiescence in our tacit acceptance of propositions which never become the subject of any real or practical stake. These beliefs, falsely so called, confuse the line of demarcation between mere intellectual notions and states of credence or conviction. Of this nature is the acceptance given by the mass of mankind to the statements they are accustomed to hear from the better-informed class respecting the facts of science and the transactions of history. They do not dispute these statements, and yet they might be little disposed to commit their serious interests to such facts. So with regard to the religious creed handed down from parent to child. Some are found believing, in the full import of the term; others, opposing no negativ in any way, yet never perform any actions, nor entertain either hopes or fears, as a consequence of their supposed acceptance of the religion of their fathers. Their belief, accordingly, must be set down as a nonentity.—Chambers' Encyclopedia.

Odds and Ends.

AT the hight of a hot discussion between two Jews one cried, "Goodness! don't eat me!" "Indeed," said the other, "my religion forbids."

"IF I hav ever used any unkind words, Hannah," said Mr. Smiley to Mrs. Smiley, reflectivly, "I take them all back." "Yes, I suppose you want to use them over again," was the not very soothing reply.

"KINGS I Hav Met," is the title of Mr. Archibald Forbes' lecture. Some day Mr. Forbes will come across three kings and a pair of sevens. Then he will learn something about the truly great resources of this country.

A CERTAIN lawyer was compelled to apologize to the court. With stately dignity he rose in his place and said: "Your Honor is right and I am wrong, as your Honor generally is." The Judge hardly knew whether to feel happy or fine the lawyer for contempt of court.

WHEN an Eastern man goes to Colorado he is called a "tenderfoot" until he has been stabbed, shot at, engaged in a free fight, has fallen down a mine, been kicked by a mule and chased by a vigilance committee. Then they admit that he is getting used to the country, and when he kills his man he is looked upon as a citizen.

IT was in a San Francisco restaurant, the other night, that a waiter was apologizing to a guest for the dilapidated state of his napkin. "Don't mention it," responded the customer, sadly, "I don't mind the holes in the least. That part of your napkin is always sure to be clean." And the next ten minutes nothing could be heard but the butter combing its hair out in the pastry.

IT was in the Galveston Opera House. The two gentlemen were from the country. After the curtain fell on the first act one of them, who had been reading the program, said in an excited manner: "It's an infernal swindle just got up to take in strangers. "What's a swindle?" "Here it says the next act is two years later. I wonder if they think we are going to stay in Galveston, at two dollars a day, for two years, just to see this thing out?" They went out and saw the ticket man about it.

ONE day the poet Whittier was exchanging reminiscences with Miss Abigail Dodge (Gail Hamilton), when he told the following story of an old Friend, who was very much annoyed one afternoon by some boys following him and especially when his hat blew off, calling out to him: "Go it, Broadbrim! Limber up and you'll catch it yet!" The Friend noticed another boy coming down the street, and said: "Boy, is thee profane?" "Then (handing him a quarter) cuss those boys two shillings' worth."

HE HAD NO "SPINAL COLUMN."

Somewhere between Leadville and Gunnison City wanders a Detroiter who is penniless, ragged, hungry, and discouraged. Four weeks ago he met a Michigan man out there and sent his love to all inquiring friends at home, and also explained why he was in that hard-up condition. He was too honest and too particular for that country. He reached Gunnison City without a dollar in his pocket, but with lots of ambition in his soul, and soon met a man who exclaimed:

"I can giv you one of the softest snaps, at four dollars per day. I want you to run one of my faro tables."

"But I don't know the game."

"You don't say, stranger. You must hav had a queer bringing up. Out here and don't know faro! Pass on, no time to bother with you!"

The second man applied to for a situation squinted his eye and took a long look at the Detroiter and quickly asked:

"Whar' from?"

"Detroit."

"No use—that's too far east. My pard ran off with the company funds last night, and I calkerlated on payin' somebody about a hundred dollars to overtake him and bring me back his scalp. You'd look sweet takin' his trail, you would! You'd better inquire on the next corner."

The next corner was the site of a saloon about to be opened. The proprietor was a six-footer with a revolver on each hip, and in response to the question he said:

"I s'pose you know how to pour whisky and weigh dust?"

"Yes."

"Suppose that one of the tuff ones comes in after his nip and refuses to hand over?"

"I'll call the police."

"Police be hanged! Every man's his own policeman out here. You must open on him with a shooter and keep on pulling the trigger until he falls! This sit's open at three dollars a day and found."

"I—I guess I won't take it."

"Then git! No place for milksops around here! Might a-knowed you hadn't any nerve by looking at ye!"

The Detroiter made one more effort. This time it was a man who exclaimed:

"Glad to see ye—sot down a bit. You see there's bad blood between me and the feller called Sandy Tom. We've agreed to drop each other on sight, and we mean business. I want to bulge on him, and beln' you're a stranger you can help me. Put this Derringer in your pocket and go and shoot Sandy Tom and I've got $200 for ye!"

"Why, that would be murder!"

"What of it! Do you expect to hang out around here over a day without doin' any shootin'? Whar was ye raised?"

"In Detroit."

"Git! You havn't any spinal column! You'd better run home to your ma, you had! Out ye go; so long!"

Notes and Clippings.

INGERSOLL has given voice to an aphorism that will liv. "A compromise," says he, "is a proceeding in which the hypocrits deceive each other." That's very good indeed.—Leavenworth Times.

PRESIDING Elder Carhart, D.D., of Wisconsin, lately convicted by a Methodist conference of "lying, perjury, and immoral conduct," has appealed, and is now on trial before twenty-one delegates from various Western states.

MOUNT Baker, Washington Territory, has now joined the array of volcanoes, headed by Mount Vesuvius, in activ operation in various parts of the earth's surface. Whether there is anything more than an accidental occurrence in their apparently concerted outbreak the scientific people must be left to tell.

WOOD cutting is very activ this winter, in view of the great demand for lumber. It is expected that 100,000,000 more feet of logs will be obtained in the Chippewa woods than ever before; the Maine cut will also be much larger; the lumbering business of the Lake Huron shore, of the Big and Little Manistee, and of the Chandiere, Ont., mills will be many millions of feet beyond previous periods. Numerous lumber and shingle factories are projected throughout Michigan.

THE company which has been founded for taking preliminary steps to ascertain whether a submarine tunnel can be made between Calais and Dover has at last succeeded in driving a shaft down to the depth at which the tunnel, if practicable, would hav to be made. Although in the upper strata there was a good deal of water, there is no infiltration of it in the gallery, which is in the solid rock. A second shaft is about to be driven, and the directors say that if no unforeseen obstacle arises the tunnel might be completed in four years.

IN spite of the prejudice against them the Chinamen in California continue to assimilate their practices closer and more close with those of the "Melican man." They get drunk and are arrested and clubbed, run away with one another's wives, contract the small-pox and debts, for which they are sued, and now three of them hav been discovered to be professional burglars, with a complete outfit, from sectional jimmy to dark lantern. They stole just as much as white men would, too, which is another proof of the advancement of the race.

THE English bear the bloody palm of railway slaughter from us. In the first nine months of this year 831 persons were massacred under the wheels of the iron juggernaut in the United Kingdom and 4,791 suffered mutilation. The average was over three deaths and seventeen casualities a day. These figures out-Herod the horrors of actual war. At the famous battle of the Alma there were but half the number of killed and wounded that this sanguinary record shows. If England possessed a few more lines of railroad the country would be in peril of depopulation within the generation.—Truth.

WHY don't the papers which viewed the prospect of the "Passion Play" with such righteous horror hav something to say about the angelic feature of the coming production of "Uncle Tom's Cabin?" If there ever was a burlesque on any subject, sacred or profane, it is the one which has, on occasions, formed that feature of the dramatic fossil in question, in which the impossible young person who dies figures as one of an assemblage of immortals in a heaven of paint and canvas. The characters of the "Passion Play" were men and women who did not pretend to be anything else. The band of angels at Booth's could not pass for anything but very mortal mortals, indeed, no matter what they might pretend.

A CONNECTICUT clergyman, being asked to officiate at the funeral of a poor man's wife, inquired of the widower what carriages had been hired; and, when told, requested that a particular team and vehicle be obtained in addition because they were the ones he and his wife habitually used, and he might wish to take a pleasure ride after the services. This disgusted the widower, and he secured the services of another minister. On the following day the firs clergyman sent for him and inflicted a severe reprimand for disrespectful treatment of his late wife's pastor. "I want you to understand," said he, "that when I marry or bury any one I am paid for my services. As for that other fellow, he's always ready to do any dirty work."

IN a certain city in Italy a reverend canon, the chosen custodian of a church belonging to the general chapter, found means to double his emoluments by robbing corpses. Some time ago he robbed the grave of a cardinal, appropriating the jewels which had been buried with the body. The other day he stole a ring, a cross, and a silver crucifix from the grave of another Monsignore. This fact being discovered, the thief was denounced, and the magistrates ordered an immediate inquiry to be held. The press asserts that the public prosecutor, happening to be a relation of the accused, has hushed up the affair, making him restore the precious objects, and asserting that they had only been removed for ten or twelve days for the purpose of cleaning. This perversion of justice—a magistrate making himself the accomplice of a sacrilegious thief—has caused a great scandal in the said city.

MARK TWAIN having been asked to contribute to the newspaper issued at the fair in aid of abused children in Boston, wrote: "Why should I want a 'Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children' to prosper, when I hav a baby down stairs that kept me awake several hours last night with no pretext for it but a desire to make trouble? This occurs every night, and it embitters me, because I see now how needless it was to put in the other burglar alarm, a costly and complicated contrivance, which cannot be depended upon, because it's always getting out of order and won't 'go;' whereas, although the baby is always getting out of order, too, it can nevertheless be depended on, for the reason that the more it gets out of order the more it does go. Yes, I am bitter against your society, for I think the idea of it is all wrong; but if you will start a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Fathers, I will write you a whole book."

COL. STEPHENSON, of the United States Geological Survey, has turned another page in the long-sealed volume of American antiquities. A large village of cliff dwellers has been discovered between the Jemez Mountains and the Rio Grande river, in New Mexico. The cliffs rise to a hight of from fifty to five hundred feet. Some of them contain two, some three, and others as many as five lines of dwellings, rising line above line, and back toward the mountain, tier above tier. The houses on the top of the cliff in the abandoned city are rectangular in form, but the caves are circular, being ten to fifteen feet in diameter, with arched roofs. Within the excavations are numerous small rooms. Before each line of dwellings there appears to hav been pavements, sometimes four or five feet in width, on the broades' of which Col. Stephenson found imprints of feet. Many pictures and hieroglyphics adorn the face of the rock.

ACCUSATIONS of dishonesty are now made by some of the Mormons against their bishops in connection with the tithing system. Every Mormon is required to giv to the church authorities one-tenth of all his products if he is a farmer, the same proportion of his profits if he is in mercantil or professional business, and of his wages if he is an employée. Special officers are appointed to collect these tithes, and they are exacted with the utmost rigor. Five hundred Mormons lately went into Colorado to work on a railroad, and supposed they were for the time safe from the customary exaction, but Brigham Young, Jr., followed them, and demanded a tenth of their pay. The tithes yield not less than a million dollars a year to the church, and of this large revenue the head men make no accounting to the people. It is charged that a more corrupt and successful ring than Tweed's exists at Salt Lake City, and its early downfall is predicted.

STRANGE revelations concerning the dismal superstition still prevalent in the rural districts of west Prussia were disclosed in the course of Dr. Kotlevski's recent trial at Stuhm for "unlawful practices." This person had acquired a widely-spread reputation among the peasantry as a sorcerer. Some time ago a woman afflicted by epilepsy applied to him for a cure. Having diagnosed her case, he declared that she was possessed by four devils conjured into her body by a female neighbor. He then proceeded to exorcise these demons, three of whom promptly quitted their human tenement in obedience to his spells. The fourth, however, laughed his incantations to scorn. This fiendish recalcitrance led him to the discovery that, in order to expel the obstinate demon, it would be necessary that the epileptic woman should swallow a draught of the witch's blood. In order to obtain this nostrum he betook himself to the dwelling of the woman by him accused of witchcraft and beat her until she lay senseless on the floor. But for the interference of a resolute neighbor he would hav murdered his victim. Arraigned for this crime before a Prussian tribunal, he declared in open court that he had done nothing more than his duty to his patient, and that he had not only frequently ridded possessed persons of their fiendish inmates by similar means, but had often seen and spoken to devils with whom he had thus dealt. He was sentenced to four months' imprisonment by the tribunal of Stuhm.

MOST of the churches which are ever willing to go into the fair and oyster supper business are now actively engaged in enterprises of this sort. The height of the church fair season is from now till Christmas eve, after which time the demand for Christmas presents drops off and the fair business slackens. The old practice of merely holding a quiet sale of the things which go by the name of "useful and fancy articles" is a thing of the past. A fair which is only a sale of dolls and pincushions and the like would be voted a bore, and nobody would attend it except a few retired old ladies with no money. To be at all successful the promoters of the church fair of to-day must provide a Punch and Judy show and a set of tableaux with red and green fire. They must hav musical and semi-dramatic attractions, and something either to be raffled for or got rid of by voting at so much a vote. The churches which do not allow raffling are very expert at voting their goods away. An iced cake as large as a grindstone and quite as digestible is too heavy for any one person to buy. Therefore it is set up to be voted for, the most popular person receiving the greatest number of votes and taking the cake. It sometimes leads to unpleasantness for the pastor and the Sunday-school superintendent to be pitted against each other as to popularity on a cake vote at a dollar a vote. But the cake must go off and the money must be raised, even if Zion mourns in consequence. The church fair business is a costly way to dodge benevolence, and generally costs a good deal more than it comes to.

THE New York Times, in a recent editorial on the advent of Gavazzi, the Italian patriot, in his country in search of aid for his Protestant Mission at Rome, makes the following assertions: "While Protestantism has made an insignificant growth in Italy, Infidelity has grown with enormous rapidity. In the large towns the great majority of the men believe in nothing. They hav broken with their old faith, but hav accepted nothing in it place. It is not unfair to assume that to this result the labors of Gavazzi and his associates hav to some degree unwittingly contributed. Gavazzi boasts that in Rome he preaches every week against the pope, always against the pope. The old revolutionist is still at his congenial mark of attack and destruction. It would be well to convince the Italians of the errors of the papacy if, at the same time, they could be taught a better faith, but there is no mind more acute, subtle, and logical than the Italian mind, and when the Italian is taught to disbelieve in the infallible church, he declines to believe in its stead an infallible book to be interpreted by this or that Protestant pastor, and the interpretation to be accepted or rejected by him, as his own judgment may dictate. No man can abandon the faith which he has inherited through many generations without undergoing a terrible strain which unfits him to immediately assimilate a new creed. The preaching against the pope to which Gavazzi devotes himself may detach men from the Roman Catholic church, but a very small proportion of them will accept Gavazzi as a Protestant pope. The cause that gains where the Roman church loses in Italy is not Protestantism, but Infidelity. There is a menacing prospect that Italy will before long become Atheistic, but no prospect whatever that she will become Protestant."

Letter from Europe.—No. 18.

LONDON AND HOME.

LONDON, Oct. 28, 1880.

DEAR FRIENDS: I will not ask you to listen to a full detail of all the places I am visiting here, and all the sights I am seeing; but perhaps you will be willing to read a little about how I am spending my time and some of the observations I have to make. If you have read the long, tedious letters I have written, you certainly have done well, and as a reward it will only be an exhibition of mercy on my part to make this last letter more brief, and not inflict upon you in my last effort a full measure of my talkativeness.

After calling upon several friends on Monday, and obtaining the mail from home, which had accumulated, I spent a few hours in reading letters and THE TRUTH SEEKERS, which were in store for me. These were a positive pleasure. There are no TRUTH SEEKERS published in Italy, and I assure you it was refreshing to once more peruse a few numbers of that best of all papers.

Among the first places visited was the British Museum. I had of course spent several hours there in August last, but I had not looked through the upper portion of the establishment, particularly in the department of natural history, as much as I wished to. Accordingly, half a day was very agreeably passed there in looking at the hundreds and thousands of stuffed birds of every conceivable and known kind, from perhaps nearly a hundred humming birds of many varieties all the way up through wrens, sparrows, linnets, canaries, larks, quails, pheasants, doves, pigeons, thrushes, nightingales, robins, kingfishers, grouse, hawks, owls, etc., etc., up to pelicans, penguins, flamingoes, cranes, storks, rooks, ravens, crows, eagles, vultures, condors, and ostriches. There were many, many thousands of them all, skilfully prepared and arranged in large upright glass cases next to the walls of a dozen large rooms communicating with each other. The representatives of the torrid zone were numerous and magnificent. One cannot realize how many strange and beautiful members of the feathered tribe there are until he sees a collection of this kind.

In the center of the rooms were perhaps one or two hundred glass cases, like long tables, filled with thousands upon thousands of sea-shells of every conceivable size and kind, from those that are two feet or more across to the tiny little fellows that can scarcely be seen with the naked eye. Many of them are most beautiful and curious, and all are neatly arranged in classes, orders, and genera. The shells alone afford ample subjects of study for a week, and unmistakably impress one with the conviction that nature is a marvelous workman, capable of accomplishing the most astonishing results. The endless variety of these shells is wonderful in the extreme, and the exquisite coloring, diversity of form and style, are quite overwhelming.

The collection of stuffed animals, all the way from the tiny mouse up to lions, bears, rhinoceroses, and elephants is very great. No one would imagine that there were such a great number of varieties of monkeys, dogs, squirrels, deer, elk, antelopes, wolves, and all the rest of them, far too numerous to mention. These thousands of animals, except some of the larger ones, are behind tall glass cases.

The collection of reptiles of all varieties is also very full, from the largest crocodile down to the smallest lizard. Some of the turtles originally weighed over a thousand pounds. The collection of the snake family is also very large. The boa-constrictor is a monster. The collection of corals is very large and interesting. It is wonderful what those little animals have accomplished. The collection of bugs and insects is a museum in itself, and if thoroughly studied would require weeks for the purpose. Many curiosities of the British Museum must be passed unnoticed. It is unquestionably the largest collection of antiquities, curiosities, specimens of natural history, books, coins, works of art, etc., in the world.

On a not very pleasant day I visited the Zoological Gardens, which are located in the northwestern portion of Regent Park. The park is a beautiful one, containing 450 acres, very finely laid off and decorated, and enriched with lakes, statuary, shade-trees, shrubbery, beds of flowers, etc. Its outer drive is a circuit of two miles, the inner one is a circle nearly a mile in circumference, with outlets into the outer drive.

The Zoological and Botanical Gardens were established more than fifty years ago, and are planted in very picturesque style. The collection of animals and birds is doubtless the largest in the world. Here are two hippopotamuses, five elephants, two rhinoceroses, several camels, three giraffes, a dozen lions, with tigers, leopards, panthers, hyenas to match, and perhaps fifty antelopes, deer, elk, etc. Here I saw in a live state a large share of the beasts, birds, reptiles, including serpents, which I saw stuffed in the British Museum. The different varieties of animals, birds, etc., are in houses by themselves and often at considerable distance from each other; thus there is a lion house, a snake house, a monkey house, a parrot house, a bear pit, etc. The lions are fed daily at 4 P.M.; the eagles at 3:30; the seals at 4:30; the snakes every Friday. They are not Catholics, for they eat on that day ducks, rabbits, sparrows, frogs, chickens, etc., and these are given to them alive. The botanical gardens in connection, including the culture of rare plants and flowers, is a very interesting feature.

Hyde Park is a beautiful place of resort in pleasant weather, and it is the most popular park in London. It contains 360 acres, some portions of which are considerably elevated, and the whole interspersed with pleasant walks and drives, the whole ornamented with luxuriant and beautiful trees, shrubbery, and flowers. A lake, a mile or more in length, called the Serpentine, on which are many row-boats, adds much to the beauty of the grounds. The southeast entrance of the park, near Apsley House, is marked by a handsome series of arches and balustrades. Near by, on an elevated pedestal, stands a colossal bronze statue of Achilles, cast from the cannon taken at the battles of Salamanca and Waterloo, weighing thirty tons, and (as the inscription declares) "erected to the Duke of Wellington and his companions in arms by their countrywomen." The cost of it was $50,000. The northeast entrance, at the end of Oxford street, is formed by the marble arch removed from the front of Buckingham Palace. There are several other entrances, but not so distinguished. Most elegant equipages are seen here in great numbers on every pleasant afternoon. It is very fashionable for pedestrians, equestrians, as well as for those who ride in carriages. Wealth and fashion are here largely represented.

Kensington Gardens lie immediately west of Hyde Park; the broad road which connects them bears the uneuphonious name of Rotten Row. The gardens are two and a half miles in circumference, and, combined with Hyde Park, contain some seven hundred acres. Several beautiful gates connect with the street on the southern side. Near the west end of the grounds stands Kensington Palace, which is one of the royal palaces, and occupies a pleasant situation. It was built late in the seventeenth century, and was first occupied by William III. and his queen Mary. Queen Victoria was born in it in 1819. It is at present the residence of the Duke and Duchess of Teck. The Kensington Museum I visited when here in August, at which time I gave some description of the same. A repetition is unnecessary.

On the south side of the gardens, and near the street forming its southern boundary, stands the magnificent Albert Memorial, one of the richest and most beautiful monuments in the world. It was built by subscription in memory of Prince Albert, and cost half a million of dollars. Its total hight is 180 feet. Its four outward corners are occupied by symbolical representations, in marble, of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America. In each case are several large figures, characteristic of the inhabitants of the particular quarter of the earth represented. These are located at the outer corners of the fine stone platform on which the memorial stands, and some fifty feet from the monument itself. Ascending the steps, the four corner groups, also of marble, represent agriculture, manufacture, commerce, engineering. On the four sides of the base are a series of 169 bas-relief statues, in marble, of distinguished men in the various branches of art. Under the magnificent canopy above is a colossal statue of Prince Albert. In front of the pedestal astronomy, geology, chemistry, and geometry are represented by statues. In niches immediately above these are figures symbolical of rhetoric, medicine, philosophy, and physiology. In the upper part of the monument are eight figures; four at the sides representing Faith, Hope, Charity, and Humility; and those at the angles Justice, Prudence, Fortitude, and Temperance.

The inscription running round the arches of the canopy reads thus:

> "Queen Victoria and Her People,
> To the Memory of Albert, Prince Consort,
> As a Tribute of their Gratitude
> For a Life Devoted to the Public Good."

In the canopy are said to be inserted twelve thousand polished gems, of which two hundred are onyxes. The entire monument has a very rich appearance.

Directly opposite to the memorial stands the Royal Albert Hall. The building is of an oval shape, being 200 feet long, 180 feet wide, and 140 feet high. It is used for oratorios and large concerts, and is a magnificent hall for the purpose. It will comfortably seat ten thousand persons. It is lighted in day-time by an immense skylight overhead, and for evenings it has nearly five thousand gas jets, which are lighted almost instantaneously by electricity. The organ contains eight thousand pipes, and is pronounced the finest in the world. The bellows which supply it with wind are worked by two steam engines. Steam power is also used to operate two enormous fans for ventilating the building. The passage-ways, or promenades, outside its three or four tiers of seats, are very capacious, and a circuit round the building is quite a journey, but the walk is enlivened by beautiful statuary. The various private rooms and conveniences for guests are commodious; and I must pronounce the establishment, as a theater, opera, or music hall, one of the first in the world. The Opera House in Paris is probably finer, but I think not so large.

I have visited but three theaters in London; two were rather small, and the Alhambra, very large. Here I witnessed an interesting ballet in which fifty females participated. The dancing was very fine, and the spectacular portion of the play excellent.

ST. PAUL'S.

Any possible bad effects that may have arisen from a visit to the theaters has very likely been sufficiently counterbalanced by calling two or three times at St. Paul's Cathedral. It is probably the most prominent object in the city, situated at the head of Ludgate Hill. Its lofty dome is seen for miles around. A church stood on the same ground nearly a thousand years ago, but was burnt in the great London fire of 1666. Christopher Wren was the architect of the new edifice, which required thirty-five years for its construction, at a cost of $8,000,000. It is built in the form of a cross, 514 feet in length by 286 feet in breadth, with a vast dome rising on eight arches over the center. The total hight of the tower is 365 feet. Besides the main tower are at the angles two bell towers 222 feet high. In one of these towers is a huge clock, the works of which attract much attention. Some idea of its size may be gained by knowing that the pendulum is sixteen feet in length, the ball at the end of which weighs over 150 pounds. The weight of the minute hand is seventy-five pounds, and the length ten feet. The great bell in the south tower, which is only tolled when a member of the royal family dies, is nine feet in diameter and weighs over five tons.

The cathedral has several entrances, the principal facing Ludgate Hill. Upon entering a sense of vastness seizes the visitor. Its stately columns, lofty arches, and marble floor are impressive, but in point of grandeur and works of art it falls far behind the cathedrals of Cologne, Milan, Florence, and especially St. Peter's and St. Paul's at Rome. In contrast with them it seems impoverished and bare. It is comparatively naked of frescoes and paintings, though in the dome are six paintings relating to the life of St. Paul. It is most distinguished for its monuments, tombs, and statues, to commemorate the memory of England's great men. In various parts of the vast structure are found statues and monuments of John Howard, Dr. Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Bishop Heber, Nelson, Cornwallis, Abercrombie, Sir John Moore, Lord Heathfield, Howe, Rodney, Collingwood, St. Vincent, Picton, Ponsonby, and others. On the south side of the nave, in a recess or chapel, is the Duke of Wellington's monument. It represents the great duke lying under a canopy supported by twelve Corinthian columns, and cost over $150,000. The English people seem to never tire of doing honor to the "Iron Duke." In the crypt beneath are the tombs of Wellington, Nelson, Wren, Collingwood, Cornwallis, Picton, Reynolds, Lawrence, Opie, West, Fuseli, Rennie, Landseer, and other eminent men. Here, also, is the funeral car on which the Duke of Wellington's coffin was conveyed to the cathedral, drawn by twelve black horses. This massive piece of workmanship was cast from cannon taken by the duke in the various battles in which he was engaged. Its cost was $65,000. The choir has much elaborate and beautiful carving.

Sunday is, of course, the big day for worship at St. Paul's, but service is also held there every morning in the week. I was present on one of these occasions, and was struck with the similarity of the Episcopal service to that of the Catholic, the greatest difference being that the Episcopal service is in English, while the Catholic is Latin, but the general effect is much the same. One of the canons, or the priests attached to the cathedral with a long white surplice over a black robe, mounts a detached pulpit standing on the floor of the cathedral and reads in a very solemn voice portions of the Bible, also from the regular Episcopal service forms. The elder canon was relieved in reading by a young man, also wearing a white surplice, who read the prayers and other matter also, in a very solemn voice. The choir, composed exclusively of men and boys, perhaps thirty in number, all wearing a white robe over their other garments, performed quite a share in the worship, coming in with fine singing very frequently, accompanied by good music on the organ. The boys acquitted themselves very finely, equaling the best female voices. I cannot explain why the Catholics and Episcopals exclude female singers from their cathedral worship. Possibly it is thought females are not holy enough for such worship, or that it is best that the holiness of the feminines be not there too much blended with the holiness of the masculines. I must say I prefer female voices in church music, and that the female parts be sung by bona fide females. But of course this would not be like the Catholic church, of which the Episcopal seems a pretty close copy. The service on this occasion reminded me very much of what I hav witnessed in the Catholic cathedrals on the continent. But it answered my purpose just as well as any worship, and after it was over I went forth into the great city without fear that I would be run over or destroyed. I did not learn how many persons it requires to perform the worshipful business of St. Paul's, but I judge over fifty. Verily, over the whole of Christendom hundreds of thousands of men are required to attend to God's business; but if he cannot dispense with their services perhaps the people ought to be willing to continue to foot the bills. It might be bad to cease to minister to God's pleasure in this way, and the holy men whose life employment it is to attend to it of course should not be asked to work for nothing; nor do they.

From my marked religious tendencies, I felt constrained to again visit Westminster Abbey—the grand old pile that stands where a pagan temple once stood—which was built by the Catholics, and for a long time was used by them. It is now a grand museum of statues, tombs, and monuments commemorative of England's departed notables. Here are hundreds of fine statues, and many scores of tombs of former kings and queens, warriors, statesmen, and distinguished personages. A few hours can at any time be pleasantly spent in slowly walking through its extensive naves, transepts, and corridors, stopping ever and anon to study the statues and tombs, read the inscriptions, and call to mind the characteristics of those who once took an active part in life's struggles, as we are now doing, but who for scores or hundreds of years have been in silent rest. The old Abbey is indeed one of the greatest statue shops in the world.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

One day was very agreeably spent at the Sydenham Crystal Palace, seven miles south of the city. The extensive grounds by which it is surrounded are very beautiful, being ornamented with flowering plants, shrubbery, fountains, statuary, etc., in the most lovely and artistic manner. The structure, composed of iron and glass, is one of the most remarkable in the world, and owes its existence to the World's Great Exhibition, held in Hyde Park in 1851. After that exhibition was over the materials of the building were sold to a new company, who transferred and reërected the same on the beautiful elevated grounds of Sydenham. The object was to utilize the vast palace for the permanent exhibition of objects of art and science. It was estimated that the removal, etc., could be effected for $2,500,000, but, when all was done, $7,500,000 had been expended, a sum probably too great to ever be returned, or for a satisfactory interest to be paid upon the investment, although large numbers visit it during nine months of the year. The railway takes visitors close to the palace, and everything has been done for their convenience.

The palace is 1,600 feet along, 380 wide, and the central transept about 200 feet high. It consists of a nave and three transepts, all with arched roofs, and composed exclusively of iron and glass, the iron serving as the framework, like sash in a window. The external appearance is grand, but upon entering, the visitor is nearly overwhelmed with the vastness and magnificence which bursts upon his vision. Within, the building consists of a wide central nave, with marble fountains near the two ends. It is thoroughly lined with magnificent statues and beautiful exotics and ornamental plants throughout its entire extent. On each side of the nave are compartments to illustrate the sculpture and architecture of different ages and nations, such as Greek, Roman, Assyrian, Pompeian, Egyptian, Alhambraic or Saracenic, Romanesque, Byzantine, Medieval, in its English, French, and German varieties, Renaissance, Palladian, and Elizabethan. Other compartments illustrate certain industrial groups, such as cutlery, porcelain, paper, encaustic tiles, etc.

On the first gallery are large collections of pictures, photographs, and casts from medallions and small works of art. Near the center transept are all the necessary appliances for two fine concert rooms, one on a stupendous scale, in which 5,000 singers and instrumentalists are sometimes heard at one time. An orchestra of unparalleled dimensions is constructed here for great festival occasions and other musical meetings.

The botanical collection within the building is very fine, and to favor the exotic plants one end of the building is kept at a pretty high temperature all the year round. Considerable portions of the first and second floors are rented out to shop-keepers, by whom a great variety of goods, especially articles of neat manufacture, are offered for sale to visitors. This feature imparts liveliness to the whole affair. The large collections of statuary and the antiquities of different nationalities deserve extended notice, but they will have to be passed by. The representations in life-like figures of groups of the natives of many savage tribes in various parts of the world are an interesting feature. Restaurants and refreshment rooms are in abundance. In an upper gallery is a museum of all kinds of raw products, also of minerals and chemical compounds. In long galleries in the basement are exhibited agricultural implements, with cotton and other machinery. In one corner of the basement is an aquarium and a serpent room.

Of the external grounds I may further say that they comprise nearly 200 acres and are divided into beautiful parterres, separated by broad gravel walks. The terraces, stone balustrades, wide steps, sculptures, etc., are all on the grandest scale. The fountains are perhaps the finest in the world, some sending up water to a great hight, and some displaying thousands of minute glittering jets interlacing in a graceful manner. A portion of the water is made to imitate cascades and waterfalls. The jet from the central basin rises to 150 feet, and those from the two great basins 250 feet. There are two cascades each 450 feet long, 100 wide, with a fall of twelve feet. When the entire water works are playing there are 1,200 jets in all; and when this continues for the length of time customary on some of the "grand days," 6,000,000 gallons of water are said to be used in a single day. Two water towers nearly 300 feet high are used in the process of pumping up the water by steam engines for use on the grounds. The illustrations of extinct animals, and of geology, in one portion of the grounds, are very interesting.

A whole week can be well spent in examining and studying the various treasures of curiosity and art to be found in this palace, and one or two days could well be used in writing an adequate description of them, but that will have to be dispensed with in this instance. Many very interesting features of the exhibition will have to be passed unnoticed, and the mere hints here given must suffice in place of a full description.

WINDSOR CASTLE.

Windsor is nearly twenty-five miles west of the city, and a fine railway ride through interesting country and villages brings one there. It is the winter residence of the queen, and possesses in its history many interesting features. One day was principally occupied in going out and returning and in looking over the castle grounds, town, park, etc. I met in the morning, in Cook's Tourists' office, Mr. Charles Scott, tea merchant, of Boston, and his wife. It did not take us long to become acquainted, and we decided to visit Windsor Castle in company. They informed me they had been married six years. I think them the most loving couple I ever met who had been so long married. I would suppose they were right in the center of the honeymoon. They are going to spend the winter in the southern part of the continent and a considerable part of the time in Rome. I gave them some points, and recommended them to the rooms I had occupied there, which they now seem to think they will try to secure.

The town of Windsor occupies rising ground on the southern bank of the Thames. Eton College, with its schoolrooms for nearly one thousand boys, chapel, quadrangles, and playing-fields, is about a mile away.

The property of the castle comprises a number of quadrangles, towers, gates, mansions, barracks, chapels, and other structures. The principal portion occupies two courts, an upper and a lower one, of spacious dimensions, and having between them a large round tower, or keep, in which the governor resides. The top of this keep is 220 feet above the Thames, and it is said that twelve counties can be seen from it on a clear day, which I apprehend does not occur very many times in a year. In the lower court is St. George's Chapel, an elegant Gothic edifice, where some of the royal family occasionally attend what is called divine worship. The Albert Memorial Chapel is another very fine place of worship, and was fitted up at great expense by Queen Victoria in memory of her dearly beloved departed husband. Here is his tomb, though his bones were buried in some portion of the large park three or four miles away. The chapel is inlaid with the finest marbles of various kinds, and it is said that the queen spent a million in fitting up the place. I think I know of more than a hundred ways in which the money could have been more sensibly expended.

The greatest interest of the place centers in what is called the State Apartments. These are a series of large rooms, some of them very richly decorated with an abundance of gilding, paintings, and tapestry, with a collection in one or two rooms of the armor and warlike weapons of former centuries, for it must be borne in mind that these premises have been occupied by the royal family for many centuries. Here many political prisoners have been confined, and from these walls several have been taken for execution for political offenses. A guide took a company of some thirty of us through the state apartments, describing in each room the purpose for which it was formerly used, the points of historical interest connected with it, and the facts about the paintings, etc., on the walls. One was a dining-room, one a reception-room, one the embassador's room, one a banqueting hall, etc., ete. It took more than an hour to make the circuit of all the rooms and hear the story of each.

A good share of another hour was consumed in looking through the queen's stables and carriage houses. She has about fifty horses in these stables, and they seem to have a decidedly easy time of it. As the queen is at Windsor but about two months in the year, the horses have ten months' rest out of twelve, and not very hard work even in the two remaining months. They are good horses, as a matter of couse, but no better than may be seen in many farmers' stables. Some are heavy, for heavy carriages, some for light carriages, and some for the saddle. One of the saddle horses is said to have cost $350,000, but I very much doubt its being worth the money. The stables are kept remarkably clean, and the straw used in the stables is even braided neatly together. Each stable of a dozen horses has a groom in livery, who has nothing to do but take care of the horses in that one stable. The carriage houses contain nearly fifty carriages of various styles and patterns, some heavy and others light, and among them one presented by Louis Napoleon, and others by other donors. Though all good carriages, they seem not finer than many owned by persons not kings nor queens. In view of the fact that Victoria stays here but one-sixth part of the time, that she has several places of residence, and that it requires fifty horses and fifty carriages to serve her purpose for the two months, some idea may be formed of the total number required for her and her family. But royalty must of course be paid for, and the English people, fortunately, are able to foot the bills.

The queen does not occupy the apartments already mentioned, and those she does occupy are in another part of the palace, and are not open to the public except to a few who obtain special permission. They are described as being very rich by those who have been through them. Of course so useful and essential a person as the queen of England would not be expected to dwell for two months in the year in a suit of apartments not exquisitely rich and grand in every particular.

A large and beautiful park adjoins the palace grounds or is near by. It has one walk or drive of three miles in one direction, and is in every way pleasant. The view down the public drive between the straight rows of stately elms is beautiful. The park affords a fine place for enjoyment to those who have the leisure and wealth to attend to it. Its benefits, however, seldom reach the toiling classes.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

This fine collection of paintings is in Trafalgar Square, humorously nicknamed the "National Cruet Stand," because the fine monument to Nelson, and the other statues, etc., bear some resemblance to a cruet stand. It is, by the by, one of the finest public squares in the city. In 1824 the government purchased the Angerstein collection of thirty-eight pictures for $285,000, and exhibited them for a time at Mr. Angerstein's house in Pall Mall. The building in which the pictures now are was finished in 1838 at a cost of half a million dollars. Between that time and the year 1869 the National Gallery occupied the western part and the Royal Gallery the eastern end. During the latter year the Royal Gallery was removed to Burlington House, and now the National Gallery occupies the entire building; and to the original collection have been added many others until it has become large. Among the additions is the Turner collection, bequeathed to the nation by that great landscape painter. In 1878 the number of paintings in the National Gallery amounted to 1,046. Every year adds to the number by way of purchases. By act of Parliament $50,000 are annually appropriated to the purchase of pictures for this collection.

To name the pictures in this gallery would be to name some of the finest works of the Italian, Spanish, Flemish, and French schools of painters. Some of the more costly are Murillo's "Holy Family," cost $15,000; Ruben's "Rape of the Sabines," $15,000; Francia's "Virgin and Child," $17,000;

Sebastian del Piombo's "Raising of Lazarus," $17,000; Coreggio's "Holy Family," $17,500; Perugino's "Virgin and Child," $20,000; Claude's "Seaport," $20,000; Ruben's "Judgment of Paris," $21,000; Raphael's "St. Catherine," $25,000; Rembrandt's "Woman Taken in Adultery," $26,250; Coreggio's "Ecce Homo," and "Mercury Instructing Cupid," $50,000; Paul Veronese's "Family of Darius," $70,000. A large number of the paintings are less expensive than these named, but the collection is one of the best in the world.

MADAME TUSSAUD'S WAX FIGURES.

This establishment, at 58 Baker street, is an interesting place in which to pass an evening. The collections of figures comprise over 300 very natural, life-like looking representations of men and women.

Besides all the kings and queens of England, including the present queen, the following are among some of the distinguished characters represented: Charles Dickens, Lord Napier, Gladstone, Nelson, Wellington, Palmerston, the Prince and Princess of Wales, Washington, Franklin, Lincoln, Grant, Andrew Johnson, Wm. Penn, John Bright, Charles Bradlaugh, Spurgeon, John Knox, John Calvin, Luther, Joan of Arc, Bonaparte, Louis Napoleon, Josephine, Maria Antoinette, Talleyrand, Marshal Ney, Marshal St. Arnaud, the Shah of Persia, Yakoob Kahn, Shere Ali, Victor Emanuel, Humbert, Cavour, Garibaldi, Von Moltke, the emperor and empress of Austria, Emperor Nicholas, Emperor Alexander, Don Pedro, McMahon, David Livingstone, William Cobbett, Shakspere, O'Connell, Walter Scott, Byron, Beaconsfield, Gortschakoff, and numerous other distinguished personages. These are divided into several rooms. Many of the figures look so much like live persons that they are often mistaken for living persons. This is particularly true of a policeman standing near the entrance; he looks so much like an actual policeman that many have gone up and spoken to him, thinking he was a live man. It is the same with William Cobbett. He is sitting on a seat by himself, and by some machinery inside, the figure's head moves slowly from one side to the other, and many think it a living man. It is the same with an old lady, almost every person mistakes the figure for a live old woman. Another female figure in a recumbent position, apparently asleep, seems to breathe as naturally as a living person, the breast rising and falling just like a person breathing. Many think it a living woman at first.

The Chamber of Horrors contains some of the most noted murderers and criminals of modern times, and the weapons with which the murders were committed. Here are also the gallows upon which criminals have been hung, the model of the Bastile, a model of the guillotine, and the guillotine knife, an instrument which is said to have decapitated 22,000 persons in Paris at the time of the first revolution. A person hardly feels as though he has seen the sights of London unless he has visited Madame Tussauds wax figures. The Royal Polytechnic Institution on Regent street is an old established exhibition. Its object is the instruction of youth, as well as to amuse the public by a variety of musical, scientific, and general entertainments. I paid it one visit.

THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE.

London, of course, requires a very large general post-office. It is situated on Cheapside, corner of St. Martin's-le-Grand. I have not seen the size of the building stated, but judge it to be 300 feet long by 200 feet in width, and it is three stories in hight. It is either of gray stone or marble turned gray by the London smoke and fog. It has been erected over fifty years, built in the Ionic style, with a lofty central portico, beneath which is the entrance to the spacious hall 80 feet long, 60 wide, and 53 high, having also an entrance at the opposite extremity; but this central hall is now entirely inclosed owing to the recent great extension of the postal business. On the opposite side of the street is a newer building, opened six years ago, to accommodate the increased business of the department. This building is 286 feet long, 144 wide, and 84 high, and cost $2,500,000. In Great Britain the postal and telegraph business is performed in the same department and by the government.

The main building, which contains a large number of rooms, is inclosed by an iron railing, and at the northern end is a court-yard, in which mail wagson range up and depart with their loads of bags at certain hours in the morning and evening for the railway termini. From other portions of the building the foreign, colonial, and India mails are dispatched. A most useful institution, the post-office savings banks, was introduced twenty years ago. Forty years ago was established the uniform rate of postage, a penny, or two cents, on letters of half an ounce to any part of the kingdom. At the time of commencement the yearly revenue amounted to $2,355,000; in 1878 it was $30,191,365; and every year the receipts are increasing. The telegraphing portion of the business is transacted in the new building; also the sending of messages over the city in pneumatic tubes independent of electricity. In the center are two powerful steam engines, which are used in operating the pneumatic mode by exhausting the air, etc. In the upper hall are placed the telegraphic instruments, the wires extending thence to all parts of the kingdom, and by ocean cable to all parts of the world. Several hundred young women are here employed as telegraphic operators at salaries varying from $200 a year to $350, and the very highest receiving $1,500. In the year ending March 31, 1878, the receipts from the telegraph service amounted to $6,587,340, of which, however, owing to the heavy expenses, the net profit was but $891,355. The total number of messages was 22,171,783. Thus it will be seen that the transmission of John Bull's intelligence by post and telegraph over his country is decidedly a pretty big business.

THE MARKETS

of London are well worthy of attention. It takes a great number of them to supply the wants of such a vast population. There are markets for cattle, meat, corn, coal, hay, vegetables, fish, and all other articles of consumption. The meat markets are of various kinds, one for live animals, others for carcasses in bulk, and others for the retailing of meat; some, also, are for pork, and others principally for fowls. The new cattle market, Copenhagen Fields, near Pentonville, built twenty-five years ago, to take the place of the old Smithfield market, is probably the finest live stock market in the world. It covers nearly thirty acres, and with outbuildings, slaughterhouses, etc., cost the sum of $2,000,000. Market days here are Monday and Thursday. The hay and straw market is on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. The present Smithfield Market, near the Holborn Viaduct, for meat and poultry, etc., is 625 feet long, 240 feet wide, and 50 feet high. Wide roads on its north, east, and west sides accommodate its special traffic. A carriage road runs through it from north to south, with spacious and well-ventilated avenues radiating from it. There are in this market 100,000 feet of available space. It has underground communication with several railways, to bring in, under the market, meat and poultry from the country, and meat from the slaughterhouses of the Copenhagen Fields Cattle Market. To walk through it and view the immense quantities of meat and poultry here daily offered for sale gives the beholder a comprehensive idea of what it requires to feed the people of London.

A hay and straw market is also in the vicinity of the last named. The Columbia market, Baroness Road, Hackney, E, is chiefly for American meat, and here retail dealers from all parts of the city make their purchases. The quantity of American meat consumed by our London cousins is very great, and will doubtless increase from year to year. The same may be said of our butter and cheese; much of these find their way to the British Isles, and are largely used. The same is also true of American apples. The larger and better portion of the apples I see in the city comes from the United States. I noticed there are much finer apples in market now than when I was here in August. It was too early then for our fruit to be brought over; the early fruit is most too perishable to justify shipping.

Covent Garden Market (connecting by Southampton street with the Strand) is the great vegetable, fruit, and flower market of the city. It is very central, and vast numbers of people come here for their supplies in this line. The supply of vegetables in this city is very large and fine, the cabbages, cauliflowers, and turnips being specially fine. England is surpassed by no country in the growing of fine garden vegetables. The same remarks will apply to the productions of the florists. England abounds in beautiful flowers. Its growers of vegetables and flowers have carried the business to a great state of perfection. The amount of vegetables furnished to the people of London is estimated at one thousand tons daily, or over three hundred thousand tons per year. The flowers also amount to many hundred tons.

Tattersall's, the celebrated horse-market and racing subscription room, is in Brompton Road, South Kensington, in the western part of the city. Mondays and Thursdays are sale days. The other noted repositories for horses in the metropolis are Aldridge's, St. Martin's Lane, and West Central. Saturday is the sale day. Leadenhall Market is a depot for meat, poultry, dogs, etc. At Whitechapel there is a meat, and a hay and straw market, the latter of which is largely attended. Billingsgate is the noted great fish market, but within a few years it has greatly retrieved its old-time reputation. I gave some description of it in a letter written when here in August. There are several smaller markets in various parts of the city, but it is not necessary to name them. To walk through the fine markets of London is calculated to make a New Yorker ashamed of our Washington and Fulton markets. It will probably be a long time before these equal the markets of London.

BARCLAY, PERKINS & CO.'S BREWERY.

A friend wrote me before leaving home that I must not fail, when in London, to visit Barclay & Perkins's brewery, so I remembered to do so. It is on the south side of the Thames, near the river, and not far from London Bridge. It is indeed a mammoth establishment—the largest brewery in the world. It occupies a series of buildings, covering several acres of ground. It has been in operation over three hundred years, gradually growing in its business operations from its small incipiency to the present time, interrupted, however, by being burnt out once or twice. Some idea may be formed of the extent of the business of this establishment when I inform you that 600 men are here employed, 160 horses of the largest and strongest character, 1,200 sacks of malt, containing four bushels each, are daily used, and that from 1,000 to 5,000 barrels of ale and porter are daily made and shipped. The yearly profits of the establishment are said to be $1,250,000.

One of the clerks kindly showed me around the different departments of the works, from the mill-room where the malt is ground, whence it is elevated to an upper story and let down by a shoot into the vast tun or huge boiler, where it is boiled or kept heated with steam, and treated with two or three waters till the strength or virtue is properly extracted. A due quantity of hops having been added, the liquor is conveyed by pipes to the shallow cooling vats, where it cools quickly; to facilitate the decoction it is conducted over corrugated plates and other apparatus whereby it is spread out very thin and every particle soon brought in contact with the air. The fermentation, after the due quantity of yeast is added, is conducted in large wooden vats or reservoirs, perhaps forty feet long, fifteen feet wide, and eight feet deep. It is quite a sight to look into these vats when fermentation is at its hight, and see the frothing, foaming mass, going through the process of generating alcohol, taking from the atmosphere the oxygen necessary for the purpose. In the operation the froth or yeast rises and overflows the tanks, and by a series of conductors or troughs is conveyed into a common receptacle, whence it is sold to thousands of customers. The exhausted malt is also sold to cattle and stock feeders. Everything seems to be utilized, nothing being allowed to be wasted. From the fermenting vats the fluid, which has now become ale or porter (the difference between the two being that the porter is colored by means of roasted or burnt malt, treated like coffee when roasted), is conveyed by pipes into immense tuns or tubs, where it settles and then is drawn off into barrels for shipment. These large tubs hold thousands of barrels. One was shown me which, if I am not mistaken, was said to contain 5,000 barrels. It was thirty or forty feet in diameter, and twelve feet or more in hight. The barrels are filled very rapidly by means of hose leading from the large reservoirs. Shipments are made to almost all parts of the world, including India, South Africa, Australia, North and South America, and all over Europe, but most extensively in Great Britain.

After looking over this establishment the gentleman who accompanied me very naturally supposed I would like to taste the quality of their beverage, and a pint mug of porter was brought to me. Ordinary politness prompted me to taste it. I can assure my temperance friends that I by no means drank to excess; I returned the most of it undrank; but it was not wasted, for I noticed that it was finished by one of the attaches of the establishment. The quantity of ale, porter, and beer consumed by the English people is simply enormous. Probably it would be much better for them were they contented with a much smaller amount; but it would also be well did they confine their drinking to nothing stronger than ale and porter. Unfortunately, however, a vast quantity of gin, whiskey, and rum are consumed, and in quantities that produce intoxication. I have seen much more intoxication here than in any country I have visited in Europe. It appears far more common for nearly all classes in England to make more or less use of intoxicants than with us in America. There are probably none who go to greater excess in drinking than many in our country, but the habit is more generally indulged in, and far more openly. Liquors are kept in the larger share of private families, placed on most dinner tables, and offered to guests who call. This general use of that which can do but little good and is capable of doing a great deal of harm is deeply to be deprecated. There is much work for temperance people to effect in England before the masses relinquish the use of alcoholic and fermented liquors.

LONDON PRISONS.

I passed by the Old Bailey, or Newgate Prison, of which everybody has read, but did not enter it. A criminal prison has been on the ground since 1218. The old prison was burned in the great fire in 1666; and a second time in 1780. It is a large, heavy, gloomy-looking stone structure. Debtors used to be confined here for years, but that is now principally done away. Criminals only are confined here. Within these walls the heart of many a poor fellow has been crushed, and from them many a man has been taken to execution. I have seen several prisons during my journeyings in Europe, and I must confess that it has not been without a deep sympathy for the unfortunates confined within them. Perhaps my own experiences have tended to make me appreciate the sorrows of others. The public execution having been abolished, the executions of Newgate Prison now take place within its walls. There are also the Queen's Bench Prison, formerly for debtors, but now for military offenses; Millbank Penitentiary, Model Prison, a female prison, a house of detention, and two or three houses of correction.

With the immense amount of business transacted in London, with the thousands of vehicles constantly passing on the streets, it cannot be called a noisy city. This is owing to the smoothness of the pavements. Much of it is asphalt, quite a large proportion is of wooden blocks, and the stone blocks are laid so smoothly as to be not very noisy. London seems not more than half so noisy as New York. Probably the latter is the noisiest city in the world. The great travel over its uneven pavements keeps up a never-ending turmoil and din.

It was my intention upon visiting Europe to see something of Ireland and Scotland, but leaving home so late it was necessary to hasten on to Brussels to attend the Congress, and leave Caledonia and Hibernia till my return from the continent. But now the season has become so far advanced, repeated snow storms having already visited those countries, that it is almost too late for sight seeing in the country this year. Thus I feel compelled to omit that part of the programme and hasten on home. Should I retain my youthfulness ten or fifteen years longer, and in that time happen to feel financially able to cross the Atlantic again, I may then see something of the two countries named, and perhaps Norway, Sweden, and Denmark as well. Until that time arrives I shall endeavor to feel content with what I have already seen.

I might give you descriptions of other notable places in this great city, some of which I have visited, while there are many I have not; but I fancy you will be sufficiently wearied with what I have already written. I have occupied a few days at looking up books and negotiating with publishers for their sale. I hope in the future to supply many of you with them.

On the Atlantic, Nov. 5, 1880.

Dear Friends: The most interesting to me of anything I experienced in London, or in any part of Europe, was the banquet and farewell addresses tendered me by the National Secular Society on the evening I left the metropolis of England. It filled me with the deepest sense of gratitude that such excellent friends had so kindly recognized me, heartily extending to me the right hand of fellowship, and bidding me good speed on my way home. [I have already laid before you the report, taken from the National Reformer, of the speeches, etc., of that meeting, and will not further refer to the matter here.]

At the close of the meeting I immediately took a carriage for the railway station for Liverpool, bearing with me the Testimonial that had been presented me, and accompanied by my friend Mr. John S. Dryden, where we parted. At midnight the train started, and soon my London friends were left far behind. The night was cold, and snow was to be seen in some places as we rapidly whirled over the same road on which in August I passed from Liverpool to London. I was enabled to realize the superiority of the American system of warming cars over the English. Travelers by English railways are shut up in the small apartments, and even in the coldest weather have no means of warming them save by a long square metal vessel containing hot water placed in the compartments for putting the feet upon. This is cold comfort on a winter night. But the night passed away, and by daylight we were in Liverpool.

The steamer did not leave port till late in the day of Saturday, October 30th. To pass away the time, the town was walked over, the Museum, Library, and Picture Gallery visited, a few light purchases made, and conversation held with a few merchants and others. I learned that many articles of American manufacture are sold in Liverpool and other cities, and, though it seems like "carrying coals to Newcastle," articles of iron manufacture, too, I learned of one dealer who keeps American carpenters' tools exclusively, and that they are better liked by the mechanics than those of English make. I also learned that doors, frames, sashes, etc., for a certain class of buildings are largely brought from the United States and sold in Liverpool cheaper than the lumber can be bought for manufacturing them. The carpenters complain at this, because it deprives them to a considerable extent of the labor they want. This, and the high American tariffs, are a constant source of complaint with English manufacturers.

Betimes several hundred passengers were down to the wharf ready for the steam tenders to convey us to the ocean steamers, three of which left for New York on the same day, one of the White Star line, one of the Guion line, and our own of the Cunard line. I returned on the same steamer, the Gallia, on which I went to Europe, and, what seems like a singular coincidence, occupied the same state-room and the same berth on my return as on my outward passage.

Among the two hundred and sixty-five passengers to New York I see a few familiar faces of those on the Gallia with me from New York to Liverpool in August. Among these are Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Janes, of New York, and the Rev. J. W. Backus of Brooklyn. Our visit in Europe has been of the same length, and of course notes have had to be compared as to where each has been, the cities and countries visited, the mountains climbed, etc. This has been done by many of the passengers. I meet few or none who have been to Rome and Naples. Among the Gallia's homeward passengers are two or three clergymen, three doctors, an Italian count, Mr. A. B. Darling, mine host of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, Mr. A. R. Eno, the proprietor of the same, Mrs. J. C. Ayer and daughter, and several merchants and business men of New York. Many millions of dollars are represented by the homeward passengers, but I notice that an extremely small fraction of this wealth is to be found in my pockets.

The steamer did not leave Liverpool harbor till nearly night, and by the time we were well out in St. George's Channel it had become dark. The run to Queenstown was pleasant, and not distinguished by anything worthy of special notice. We were in Queenstown harbor before noon on Sunday, and as we had to wait till 4 P.M. for the mail via Holyhead and Dublin, we had two or three hours for visiting Queenstown. The Cunard's tender took to the Queenstown dock those of the Gallia's passengers who wished to go ashore. Some one hundred and fifty of us availed ourselves of this opportunity. I did so the more readily as I would thereby be enabled to place foot on Irish soil, which I never before had the opportunity of doing. I however found that the soil feels to the feet much like other soil, and with the eyes shut no difference can be perceived.

Queenstown is built upon a high rising bank, or nearly a bluff, which commands a fine view of the harbor and the outlet to the ocean, a grim-looking fort guarding each side of the entrance. Here are several fine terraces, where most splendid views are obtained. The town contains some ten or twelve thousand inhabitants, and shows no marks of wealth. The houses are chiefly of a respectable character, but few or none of them are very fine.

The first thing that met our eyes upon reaching the wharf were the numerous poor beggars and pedlers of fruits, flowers, shamrocks, and laces, who confronted us at every step, and in the "sweet Irish brogue" importuned us, "for the love of God," to give them something or buy their wares. They were a poor, squalid-looking set of people, and some of the boys and women, as late in the season as it is, were barefooted, and clad in the thinnest garments.

True to my religious instincts, I at once made my way into the town to a small Scotch Presbyterian church, where a large, heavy Scotch clergyman was breaking the bread of life to a limited number of devout people who wish to go to heaven by the same road he travels. I staid long enough to hear him make two prayers, read two hymns—which were feebly sung—and give out his text and indicate the subject of his discourse. This was about as much Presbyterianism as I had any need for; and as the preacher seemed anything but a smart man, and as it was not very easy for me to understand him, I left to see more of the town.

I made my way to the Catholic cathedral, which is by far the most imposing structure in the town, though not yet completed. It falls far, far short in magnitude and richness of many of the cathedrals on the continent. But it was packed with human beings to repletion. When the congregation was dismissed some two or three thousand poverty-stricken men and women poured out, eagerly dipping their fingers in holy water and making the sign of the cross on their foreheads and breasts. I think I have nowhere met so many poor, impoverished looking people. Poor Ireland! how she suffers from a false system of land tenure, held by absent landlords, and by a false system of religious superstition and errors. When will the green little isle ever be prosperous and free from oppression and superstition? In and about the cathedral were several notices, some painted in large letters, announcing that donations were earnestly requested to help complete the cathedral, which will require still a good many thousand dollars. I fear many now living will pass away, and many unborn will come into existence before this "God's house" is finished.

I next made my way to one of the two Episcopal or English churches in the place. The congregation had departed, but I had some talk with the sexton who informed me there were some three hundred communicants in the two Episcopal churches there, and principally English people. There is also a Methodist church in town. So Queenstown and Ireland are not exclusively Catholic.

In walking through the streets of the town I noticed that O'Flynn, O'Donohue, Fitzsimmons, O'Shaunessy, McGonigle and several other Macs and O's are selling goods in the town. Ireland is now much beset to pay her rents to the landlords in England, and serious trouble is apprehended by some. Should these complications lead to bloodshed may the condition of Ireland be made better instead of worse!

Before returning to the small steamer I inspected the shipment of a pretty large stock of Irish eatables for our homeward voyage, including mutton, chicken, ducks, geese, rabbits, fish, potatoes, cabbages, onions, etc., etc. These all looked of the best quality and they have made us very good dinners here on the ocean. The pedlers and beggars again gathered by the side of the little steamer and implored us most piteously to give or to buy. There seemed many widows who pleaded in God's name for a few pennies to keep them from starvation. Some had Irish songs to sell, and said if we would buy a song they would pray to the Virgin to grant us a safe passage to America. This offer was very tempting, but not sufficiently so to induce me to invest in songs, though I did somewhat in the laces, thinking my little wife at home could appreciate them. It was in vain that we told these pedlers, that it was Sunday, and consequently that we did not wish to buy; they insisted that it was right to buy of them if it was Sunday, and it was curious to witness how, as the time approached for the little steamer to return to the larger one, the prices of their goods tumbled. Within the last fifteen minutes the honest Irish pedlers sold their laces, canes, etc., at less than half the prices they asked for them an hour or two before. If they made any profit on them at the last, it is to be feared they made too large a profit at first. These Irish tradeswoman are evidently not one-price merchants. But at length the mail arrived, and when some two hundred bags of it were transferred to our little steamer we were soon again on board the Gallia, and at four o'clock, passing out into the ocean, we soon left Old Ireland behind us.

The day was pleasant, and our visit to Queenstown had also been pleasant. In the night, however, the winds arose and the ocean became pretty rough and for two or three days the waves have run high and the steamer has rolled very much. I was sea-sick again, and could not in all cases repress the tendency to vomiting. I became fully satisfied that "life on the ocean wave" is not the happiest life for me. The sickness at the tomach interfered considerably with my eating, and for thirty-six hours I took not a mouthful of food or drink. Many others were also sick, and the dining tables were sparingly attended. Good weather, however, followed, and everybody felt better, and reading, talking, etc., have been renewed.

The gamblers in the smoking-room on deck have been the most persistent, untiring class on board. They play a French game, new to me, in which three cards are dealt to each of three players and an additional card given if called for by the first player. The spots count. The one holding the highest or best cards wins. Sovereigns ($5) are put on the boards and are won or lost in a minute. Those standing round the table bet five or ten dollars on any hand they choose to, but no hand is dealt to them. The dealer acts as the banker, and pays the winners and rakes in the gold pieces from the losers. Five hundred dollars thus often change hands in an hour or two, and one unlucky New Yorker, I heard him say, lost $5,000 in one night's playing, but he congratulated himself that he won $90,000 in one night in Paris. The playing on the steamer is done by New Yorkers alone, and to a considerable extent by the young scions of rich families, who have been to Europe on a big money-spending expedition. Believing in total abstinence from all gambling games, I felt not the least desire to try the risky folly; and had I nothing else to restrain me, the little money I get comes too hard to risk it in any such way.

Home, Nov. 9, 1880.

Here I am home again, safe and sound. We arrived here at 6 o'clock last evening, and I assure you I am glad to be home once more. During the last three days of the voyage we had some very rough weather. Saturday was a pleasant day—a regular "weather breeder." Everybody was on deck congratulating one another on the improved state of things and that the prospects were so fair that the voyage would be pleasant from that time on. Up to Saturday evening the Gallia had made the best running that any steamer of the Cunard line had done in forty years. But in the following night a violent storm arose which toward morning amounted to what the sailors term a gale. This not only retarded the Gallia's hitherto remarkably quick passage, but greatly disturbed the comfort of the passengers. The steamer had been making sixteen

What are the Morals of the Bible Worth to Our Age?

The Bible represents the earth as an abode of misery, as a jail, and God as its jailor. By such a view of the world, it fosters in the hearts of its reverers the immoral sentiment of fear of their God. Look at the long, morose faces of the Puritans. The Catholics hear, in their requiems, the hymn "Dies Irae," which thunders in their ears the horrors of the doomsday. The Protestants sing in their hymn-books similar airs. Even children quake already at the idea of the biblical God of thunder. A boy of eight years used, before going to bed, to pray upon his knees, "O God, do not damn me!" A mother must divide her heart between the Lord and her children—nay, tremble if she remembers that he possesses the power to hurl them into the pool of hell, and to torment them forever.

The Bible plants malicious emotions in credulous minds. The pre-elected rejoice at the torments of the damned wretches; by the contemplation of their sufferings their own bliss is increased! The Bible tells us that Lazarus will not even dip the finger-end in cold water to cool the infernal pains of the rich man. If a good man sees a hungry dog whining at his feet, he has mercy for him; but these saints of the Bible look down exultingly with god, the heavenly Lamb, and the angels, on the damned ones, among whom, perhaps, are their children, brothers, sisters, or parents.

Men, in their actions, most follow the examples of others whom they respect and love. Words induce, examples impel. The believers in the Bible act also according to this principle; they imitate its examples; but what ideals does it exhibit! It commands them, "Become perfect, as your father in heaven is perfect." But it represents God in many passages as a deceitful, malicious, revengeful being, who chose a few, without their merits, for heaven, but damned millions, without their faults, to hell. No, the God of the Bible is no perfect being.

The second ideal of the Bible reverers is Jesus Christ. This (if there was ever such a man) had, in general, a reputable character, principally by the reason that he sacrificed his life for his reformatory plans; but the unbiased writer discovers also in his character several faults. He wandered about without a certain business; he suffered himself to be supported by kind-hearted women. His parents must seek him during three days. He purposed to induce Jerusalem to accept his doctrin by means of revolution. As he never was married, he cannot be an ideal for husbands and parents. He, too, threatens the Infidels with the punishment of hell, telling them on doomsday, "Away from me, damned ones!" I should go too far if I would analyze thoroughly his character; suffice that those few quotations already prove that the son is not a more accomplished ideal of moral culture than the father.

The Bible exhibits the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and most of all, David, as patterns worthy of veneration and imitation. It can be easily understood why it preferred them to all other men: they were Jehovah's most faithful adorers. Therefore it calls David the man after the heart of God; and Abraham went in his blind zeal so far that he would sacrifice to Jehovah even his son Isaac. But even for this readiness we call him an unnatural father, a cruel fanatic, who deserves our detestation, not imitation. He delivered also his wife twice to the embraces of other men. He and the two others, Jacob and Isaac, had several wives and concubines; Jacob deceived his father, brother, and uncle. David seduced the wife of Uriah, and ordered him to be killed, for the reason that he could possess her forever. These are the sublime models the Bible recommends. The Mormons imitate the patriarchs strictly, but do we, for all that, reject them? By the fruit the tree is known; Mormonism is a fruit of the Biblical morals.

Among the crimes of the Jewish nation, the Bible calls idolatry the worst, and commands to kill the man who committed it, and to burn his residence. Besides, this book ordered to put to death the neighboring pagan nations, "even their wives and children." Sorcery was also punished with death. The administration of justice of the Bible is inhuman; its base is the law of eye for eye, and tooth for tooth! This book, too, gives protection to slavery.

It is true that the morals of the New Testament are purer; but bad dross is not wanting in this too. If it directs the Christians to the lilies of the field and to the birds of the sky, it demands from them too much confidence in a presumptiv Providence. If it orders them to quit everything and to follow Jesus, it teaches them to despise possession and property. From this preposterous doctrin the cloisters of the mendicant friars took their origin. By preferring celibacy to matrimony, it induced the Christians to introduce the unmarried state of priests, this moral cancer of the Catholic church. The supreme principle of the Christian morals is, Do always that which God wills. From this principle, besides many other villainies, emanated the bloody scenes in the Crusades, in which the Christians massacred thousands, crying, "God wills it."

The New Testament teaches intolerance by the words: "Every plant my father did not plant must be eradicated." In this way the Bible became the mother of the heinous Inquisition, by which it was branded with eternal infamy. Its dogma that Christ, by his voluntary death on the cross, propitiated the divine ire and took away every sin of the faithful, has given the death-blow to the moral energy of the Christians. Moreover, hope of heavenly bliss and fear of hell are impure motivs to virtue and honesty.

Finally, do not many of its precepts contradict each other? For instance, this one: "Take no thought for the morrow," and compare it with the injunction, "But if one provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he has denied the faith and is worse than an Infidel."

I have touched here only the most impure spots of the biblical morals, but even from my few remarks the thinking reader will infer that the moral doctrin of the Bible cannot suffice for our age. It cannot be otherwise. As the religious perceptions of the individual man by and by change in proportion as he advances from infancy to manly age, just so is it with whole nations—nay, with mankind generally. In the lapse of time all sciences advance; religion alone cannot remain back; it must share the progress with them. In vain its priests and blind reverers oppose the revolving wheel of time; the reforms in its domains are either insensibly, in calmness, or, sometimes on a sudden, performed by religious revolutions, as, e. g., in the age of Martin Luther, Zwingle, Knox, etc., etc. The Mosaical religion was well adapted to the rude, ignorant Israelites. When Greeks and Romans spread the seed of civtlization among them, Jesus stood up as a reformer. When, in the sixteenth century, the dawn of the sciences broke in Italy, France, England, and Germany, the iconoclasts of that time set to work in the reformation of the church. And since, sciences—especially physical science—hav advanced with gigantic strides. Then why should theology alone be allowed to continue its lazy slumber upon the moldy pillow of the Bible?

No, a new mental revolution has already begun, and we are living in the midst of it. Concerning, particularly, the morals of the Bible, they don't answer the grade of culture of our age. This wants new views of the universe and life. It demands a moral doctrin which rests upon the necessary, eternal laws of nature; upon reason and conscience as its base; it demands a righteous state, in which the people are the sovereign, for it is tired of the biblical theocracies; it demands equal rights for all men, without distinction of color, sex, and rank; it demands, instead of the bloody wars which are sanctioned by the Bible, the solid brotherhood of all nations, united to one league of humanity; it demands a better education of the youth, because it thinks this to be the foundation of an unshaken state. For these reasons the morals of a barbarian people—the morals of the Bible—do not suffice for our age.

Danger Ahead.

Since the first publication of Truth we hav frequently pointed out the tendency of the Protestant church in this country to make the civil law and its execution subservient to ecclesiastical purposes. The suggestion that this is a "Christian" country has often been made from the pulpit and in the religious press, and there is now a determination manifested more boldly than ever by the Christian community to intertwine the dogmas of religion with the administration of the law.

We hav recently had a notable illustration of this disposition on the part of the church in the clamor raised against the Passion Play. We refer to the clamor, because that was most observable, but of the clamor itself we do not complain. Every man in this country has a right to object to what any other man says, does, or professes to do, and to induce others to object also if he can. So the church had a perfect right to denounce the intended production of the Passion Play, and, if it could find enough people to agree with it, to raise a hurricane of popular denunciation.

But the church was not satisfied to leave the dispute to the people. It initiated steps to make the production of the Passion Play an offense in the eye of the law, by special legislation. This was a long stride toward making the Protestant church an object of special care to the state, and branding unbelievers as criminals.

Some idea of what might hav happened had Mr. Abbey insisted upon giving this perfectly legitimate performance at his theater may be gathered from the words of Talmage in his sermon yesterday. "The police," he saidi, "would hav rushed upon the stage and arrested the actors."

At whose bidding would the police hav rushed upon the stage and arrested the actors?"

At the bidding of the Protestant church.

For what?

Because they were performing a play which, though clean and pure in all respects, was open to a whimsical objection of the church. For this a body of police were to rush into a private building and arrest the inmates. For this a man's house was to cease to be his castle, and men's persons were to be sacred no longer.

From here it is but a step to the suppression of speech and press when inimical to the church. If a play is to be stopped by a law passed at the instance of religionists because it may hav a tendency to ridicule a doctrin of the church (which, by the way, the Passion Play had not), why may not the orator who ridicules, or the newspaper that assails, the same doctrin also be brought within the grasp of the law? It is only logical that they should be. And it is certain that they will be, unless the Protestant church is peremptorily arrested in its now transparent movement toward uniting itself with the civil power.

As Talmage explained what would hav been done had the Passion Play been produced, so Dr. Newman foreshadowed in his sermon on Sunday what may be expected to follow.

Speaking of Col. Ingersoll as one of the most brilliant wits of our day, but an Infidel, Dr. Newman said: "He who comes among us to denounce Christianity commits a crime against public morals. There ought to be a power somewhere to close his lips and prevent him from uttering his blasphemies."

Believing that there ought to be such a power, the aggressiv church of which Newman is a prominent priest will soon find it and a means of exercising it. The power is in the church itself. Once giv it control of the machinery of law and justice, and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll will not dare address an assemblage in New York upon the subject of Christianity, honestly, under penalty of being made a felon.

The Protestant church has recognized the fact that it is crumbling. It can no longer hold its own against the advancing thought of the people. It sees its membership falling off. Recruits are few. Its congregations are composed of women and the men of a past generation. Young men think for themselvs, believing what is rational, rejecting what is merely traditional and stupid. The only way to arrest the decay of religion is to prevent by law the free expression of opinion, and thereby dam up the fountains of thought.

Being a lie, living a lie, and in many respects teaching lies, there is nothing the church so much dreads as an exposure of its dogmas to the full sunlight of truth. There is nothing so dangerous to it as weighing its claims in the scales of reason or testing them by the moral acids of ridicule.

Hence the church would invoke the law to suppress discussion by those who assail it.

The issue is approaching. Soon, very soon, the people must meet it. The church will force it into the Legislature, into Congress, upon the bench, and to the ballot-box.

How will the people answer it? Shall it be ecclesiastical slavery or civil liberty?

[In view of the foregoing sensible remarks, what is to be thought of that milk-and-water, thin-skinned, amphibious class of Liberals who are willing to deny their Liberalism for the sake of currying favor with the clergy and their orthodox enemies of the church? Simon-pure Liberalism can never hope to prosper under such cowardly generalship. —ED. T. S.]

Not the Man for a Defender.

Talmage of Brooklyn undertook lately to answer Ingersoll, the Infidel. Faith was not fortunate in its defender.

If the Bible, whose inspiration he essayed to prove, can be sustained on no other and no better grounds than those presented by the Brooklyn preacher, the Holy Book is bound to go down; it cannot hold its place as the veritable word of God. His arguments were weak and shallow, and he displayed a stupid ignorance of the positions and tactics of the enemies of revelation.

Yet he said he had read all the modern Infidel books. If he had done that in truth, Talmage would hav had little time left for preaching and lecturing, even though he followed his customary method and talked off only what happened to come into his head at the moment. Any man who undertakes to keep up with the literature of modern Infidelity must wade through a great library of books, and books he will hav to stop to think over, too.

Moreover, no minister who had carefully studied even a few of the leading Infidel publications, in the English language merely, and made himself sufficiently acquainted with their premises and conclusions to talk about them intelligently, would hav offered Talmage's helter-skelter, claptrap harangue as a defense of the Bible and the Christian faith. The authenticity and authority of the Bible are not mainly assailed by the great Infidel writers, as Talmage alleged, because the Scriptures are "impure, cruel, contradictory, and unscientific." Their ground rather is that the proof of their inspiration is lacking. Something so far out of the usual course, so contrary to all experience, as revelation, cannot be accepted as established, they argue, without correspondingly strong evidence that it is really of divine origin.

Instead of stopping to parry arguments about the Bible, they simply pass by its claims to inspiration, and class them with the superstitions of mankind, with which science can hold no serious argument. For them there is no revelation except that made to the patient investigator who can present practical proofs of his discoveries. Of course, therefore, they drop the Bible just so far as the actual evidence to sustain its statements is lacking, and dissent from its moral and religious teachings wherever they fail to approve themselves to their understanding and their experience.

It is like any other book in their estimation, to be weighed strictly on its merits. They do not believe in any theory of inspiration of the sort claimed for the Bible. The Scriptures might stand every test of science and of morals, and yet they would not call them the revealed word of God, any more than Newton's Principia or Bacon's Novum Organum.

Talmage, therefore, mistook the ground of his antagonists. He might as well hav talked gibberish so far as they were concerned. His missiles were not directed against their lines, but were merely pyrotechnic bombs exploded high in the air for their amusement.

Such a defense of the Bible as his only provokes ridicule and does perhaps more to encourage Infidelity than the harangues of Ingersoll himself. A weak and stupid defender is worse than no defender at all. At this time, when the assault of Infidelity is on the foundations of religion, it is folly to intrust the defense of the supernatural to a mountebank of theology. The arguments which go to sustain the theory of inspiration are too profound for the comprehension of such a man. He is too ignorant of the merits of the controversy between faith and Infidelity to undertake the part of a leader in either camp.

But of course the church cannot be held responsible for Talmage when he sets out to discuss Ingersoll and his Infidelity. The theologians competent for its defense adopt different tactics, and properly appreciate the folly of underrating their opponents and misstating their positions. Though Talmage is allowed to preach in a Presbyterian church, no balderdash like that to which he gave utterance on Sunday was heard in the Presbyterian Council at Philadelphia. The matter was too serious for it. Modern Infidelity presents too portentous a danger to be made the occasion for clap-trap sermons and shallow arguments.

Half a Million People Away from Church.

In a recent address at Boston the Rev. Dr. Bellows said that there are half a million of people in New York who do not go to church. He, of course, meant that there are that number among the population of the city old enough to attend worship of their own motion, among the inhabitants of adult age or near it.

Probably his figures are not far wrong. It is true that the churches afford accommodations for three or four hundred thousand persons, but, on the average, more than a third of the seats in the Protestant churches are unoccupied on Sunday. Even if that loss of about one hundred thousand is made up in the Roman Catholic churches, whose different services are attended by different congregations, there is still left the half million of whom Dr. Bellows speaks.

And, according to him, these people who stay at home from church are not the "ignorant and untutored." Neglect of religious observances is not so common among that class as among "men and women of culture and intelligence."

Here, too, he is probably right. Leaving out the Roman Catholic population of the city, of whom Dr. Bellows does not seem to speak, the majority of our inhabitants do not look on church-going as a duty. They are neglecting it more and more, and the class in which are included the largest proportion of absentees is the class of what he calls the cultured and intelligent.

It is among these that Infidelity is spreading most rapidly. They are getting further and further away from the sort of Christianity preached in the churches. If it were not for the conservatism of women and their regard for religious observances, the congregations on Sunday could be got into less than a quarter of the churches, for a large part of the men go simply to please their wives. Of thorough, vital faith in the doctrins preached they hav little. Of actual Christian practice they hav next to nothing.

So universal is this absenteeism from church that it has become a question of much importance, Dr. Bellows thinks, whether the coming man will go to church at all. He means what he describes as the intelligent and cultured man, the man who is likely to sit in criticism on the doctrins preached.

Such a question implies a doubt as to the ability of the churches to hold their own against Infidelity. And Dr. Bellows is not the only clergyman who is asking it. It comes from Connecticut, where the Congregational churches are, comparativly, much weaker than they were a quarter of a century ago. It is heard in Massachusetts, where absenteeism from church prevails even in small villages. It is this doubt which is leading religious conventions to inquire whether their creeds do not need to be readjusted and made to suit the spirit of the times. It was their conception of the danger which menaces the church from the growth of Infidelity and indifferentism which impelled the bishops of the Episcopal church to urge on their clergy and laity the necessity of illustrating more faithfully in their lives the teachings of Christianity.

How can we call New York a Christian city when half a million of its inhabitants, including a large proportion of the most intelligent among them, turn away from the churches as offering nothing worthy of their attention? How is this increasing tendency to neglect religious observances to be arrested? The preachers will do well to devote their first and most serious thought to discover the causes of the trouble and the means of removing them.

Discourse by M. D. Conway.

A discourse by Moncure D. Conway, of London, was delivered at Chickering Hall, this city, Sunday, Nov. 14, 1880, and reported by the New York Herald as follows:

The phrase "religion of humanity" has been much and vaguely used, and the best phrases so used are apt to degenerate into cant. There is something pleasant in the word "humanity"—no doubt all sects would claim that theirs is the religion of humanity. Even sects with creeds based on a curse upon human nature would declare their religion adapted to and revealed to save humanity—therefore the religion of humanity. That which we call humanity is the totality of all that is moral in nature, all that distinguishes and chooses, which discriminates right from wrong, good from evil; where all nature not human is immoral, and givs equal support to good and bad. All history is the history of the war of mankind against external nature. When we go beyond history to tradition, and behind tradition to mythology, we find this and only this—man combating Arctic frost and torrid heat, tempest and flood, the barrenness, the ferocities of the earth, the pitiless cruelties of the pestilential and the rainless atmosphere. That siege of mankind against nature has never been relaxed; it goes on still, and in all that time man has learned that his own nature represents all that is moral in the universe which he can comprehend. I say "represents," for certain animals seem capable of love and mutual service, but they possess these in the ratio of their approach to human nature, and of their association with it. Therefore they are man's humble constituency; their feebler minds and affections are represented by him as against the inorganic universe—their common enemy.

Now this ancient interminable war between man and inanimate nature has not been one of sentiment, but of necessity. To wage it has always been the condition of human existence on the planet; all the animals that could not wage it to some extent hav become fossil, and man would hav followed them into extinction if he had not steadily resisted his hostil environment. But during all this war man's sentiments were on the side of his great adversary. He sang hymns to the sun which consumed him, to the storm which beat upon him; he evoked a vast array of deities out of the elements, and prostrating himself before them in one moment, in the next he arose to fight and conquer their cruelty. Primitiv man ascribed to the gods as their particular realm all the elements and regions of nature which he himself could not control. His own empire was built up in practical hostility to the elemental empire of the gods. Man's attitude toward the gods was fear, and that of the gods toward man was deemed to be jealousy, sometimes fear also, lest he might build a tower high enough to be siege heaven or seize on the apples of immortality. There resulted a divorce between man's practical life and his theology. That set of beliefs and diplomatic ceremonials to the play which were called religion had nothing to do with man's humanity. Yet the so-called religions of the world hav been generally cast in the same mold, and that is the shape they bear to this day. Where do you find the doctrin of satisfaction or expiation? Where do you find any basis for the doctrin that no deity can forgiv an offense except the penalty be suffered and the law satisfied? You find it in every creed, but you do not find it in the heart and life of humanity. People do not so exact from others rigid legal satisfaction. Humanity could not hav survived if it had practiced the theology of invariable expiation. But you will find that dogma a reflection of the unswerving course of natural objects; the unvarying sun and seasons, the ever recurring remorseless powers that now freeze, now bring famin, and listen to no entreaties.

Where will you find the doctrin of vicarious suffering? Not in the voluntary life of humanity. The judge or the parent may worship a deity satisfied with the expiation of the just for the unjust, but he would be shocked at any suggestion in the court or in the home that the innocent should be made to suffer for the guilty. And in the household or in society who would deliberately visit the sin of a father upon his children? Where, then, do the creeds get these notions? From the hard forces of nature which punish transgressions of natural law, even though they be virtuous deeds, secure the good of one by the sacrifice of another, now make the mother victim of the child, next makes the child heir of the parent's infirmities. We might, indeed, go through the whole list of degmas, and we should find them a rough translation of nature's roughness; not religion at all, because confusing good and evil; unrelated to the moral sentiment; a crude primitiv science or attempt at a scientific theory of nature. Those which were anciently deities, personifying the inorganic aspects of nature, are now abstract dogmas reflecting the same thing; and as when they were deities or demons, so now, when they hav become dogmas, they represent precisely all that part of nature which it is the business of humanity to resist, restrain, or even exterminate. We must, indeed, never forget that human beings are much better than their creeds; that inside their stony dogmatic walls are cultured spots of human feeling, that they speak and act gently while they worship wrath, and deal justly while worshiping an unjust deity. There is a blessed necessity which exterminates from the practical life anti-social principles, and, while it allows tongues to recite what creeds they please, holds heart and hand to their need and duty by an iron grip. Nevertheless mankind are not passing unharmed through this opposition between their dogmas and their humanity. It is a very serious thing that men should throw the sanctions of sentiment and piety around deified reflections of that inorganic world which it were man's real religion to master and make into his own image and likeness. These ancient religions hav adopted many humane sentiments—some of them even patronize human life and its joys—but they hav never made humanity the main thing, the great religious force and director.

We may then answer our question, "What is the religion of humanity?" by saying it is a religion which transfers to the moral and intellectual forces which are mastering the nature all the piety that now worships personifications of the obstructions mastered.

But it may be asked—and it is the anxious question of many hearts—"Is there no God of nature, no God in nature? Is there no power above ourselvs, or power not ourselvs, that makes for righteousness? And if there be none are we not orphans? Are we not robbed of all heart and hope in our struggle with earthly evil, having no certainty of ultimate success?"

The religion of humanity answers: "Yes, there is a God in nature, a God and ruler of nature, but that divine parent is discoverable nowhere except in the spirit of humanity. You may cry for help to glowing suns and circling stars, to gravitation and electricity, to ocean and sky, or to all of them together, but no help or ray of pity will you get until you hav turned to lean on the heart and arm of human love and strength." For these are the answers of the universe to your cry. The proof of love in nature outside you is the loving heart inside you.

The other day we heard of the Holy Virgin appearing in Ireland. The press even sent reporters, who gathered detailed information about the light that was seen, and Mary, Joseph, and John in the midst. But in their descent these heavenly beings did not bring bread to save the starving Irish family. That was left for Saint America, who went over with a loaded ship, and is now doing for poor human beings what the Virgin Mary does only for her own altars and priests. The heretic is not heartless because he cannot be silenced by the piteous appeals of piety that its idols and illusions shall be spared. He is listening to a more sorrowful cry than that; it comes from the great deeps of human agony, want, evil, despair; it is a cry ever burdening the air, but never heeded by the idols which hav neither eye, ear, heart, nor hand. How sweet those idols seem to those who decorate them, cover them with devotion, heap on them their gold, their love, and bathe them with their tears! Even so, and they seem to one who knows them that it is for want of just that devotion that millions of human beings find this world a hell. Do you suppose that the sentiment which beautifies the world with temples and churches would not also build houses for the poor if that sentiment of humanity were its supreme end and aim? The religion of humanity thus has its meaning and promis for the individual heart, for the soul with its own grief, in that it brings back piety from its wanderings to seek out and love the divine in every heart. It reveals to each generation that it is not only the heir of all the ages, but the incarnation of their summed up powers; that this trust bequeathed from all preceding generations represents not only man in the past, but all that preceded man; every bird that ever sang to its mate, every tiger that ever defended its young, nay, every atom that ever clung to its fellow above amid the star mist, in the first throb of that spirit of life which has climbed on to the splendor of reason and glory of a heart, beside which the sun and the moon are mere sparks.

Another Clergyman Caught.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Another ripple on the placid waters of orthodoxy in this neighborhood has lately occurred in the case of the Rev. R. J. White. Again it is a Methodist minister who comes before the public with his tale of defense against one of the dear sisters of the church who charged him with making an "assault" on her, which is the polite way nowadays of expressing the idea of fornication and adultery. The kind and considerate sister, it seems, after coming home with the clergyman from church of a Sabbath evening, placed a lot of hot flatirons in his bed, for Methodist ministers are proverbial hereabout, not only for an inordinate love of stewed chicken for supper, but for having cold feet at night, especially in revival times. The sister alleges that after Bro. White had gone to bed, she benevolently came down to his room to look after the flatirons, and that while she was doing so the clergyman committed the "assault" and "outrage" upon her, during which procedure she, like the trees which Lorenzo in the play tells of, when the sweet winds gently kiss them, "did make no noise." Brother White's article, in the Pittsburgh Dispatch of the 25th inst., is his mere assertion that the devout sister was entirely untruthful in the charge she makes against him, and thus the public is divided in opinion as to who tells the truth.

I do not send you this as a striking item of news, for the journals of the day abound in cases of this kind. Taken as a class, there is more fornication and adultery, pro ra'a, among the clergy, and especially among the Methodist clergy, than any other class of "respectable" people. There is a very close relationship between the fiery love that prevails among the brethren and sisters of a Methodist revival meeting on the one hand and sexual love on the other. In this case of the flatirons, and in multitudes of others that might be cited, the sister and the preacher came home from church where the religious exercises had almost converted them into angels of purity, so intense was their love to God and each other. As there is only one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, so the records of many a revival meeting show that from the church altar and the anxious seat of the penitent and rejoicing sister, there is but one step into the preacher's bed, either with or without hot flatirons. The sagacious observer understands this philosophy, and has often seen it verified, but the masses of church people are still so blind that excessiv piety and zeal are considered solid gold instead of mere tinsel.

Now, Mr. Editor, when the clergy of the church, availing themselvs of their excellent opportunities, are so much given to lascivious practices among the women saints, thus violating the standard of morals which they preach up on Sundays to other people, it seems a hard case that they should charge the Liberals with being lax in their morals simply because they hav rejected the church and its hollow religion. The Liberals do not profess to walk so closely with God as the clergy do. Most of them do not believe in a personal God at all, but they practice good morals because it pays best both in the long and the short run, by promoting their own self-respect, as well as the general good. The extinguishment of the fires of hell givs no license to a Radical to do wrong.

Last year there was some sensation here when the name of the President of our League got into the police reports. He was, and still is, an intelligent and good man; but in a moment of extreme provocation he treated a Jezebel wife with harshness. I expected that the clergy on the next Sunday would take advantage of the incident and point out to their people the relationship between Liberalism in religion and unkindness to wives. But they did not breathe a whisper on the subject, for they well knew how bare the backs of so many of the clergy about Pittsburgh were, and how well prepared with facts the Radicals were to castigate them to the heart's content of both parties. But of all those who, living in glass houses, are addicted to throwing stones at others, the Methodists seem to take precedence. I would walk a mile just to see a Methodist preacher who could blush.

Mr. Bell's French Revolution.

It is really the best exposition of that very interesting epoch in history I hav ever read, clear, terse, and conclusiv As we read we seem to be carried back a hundred years, and before we are aware our breath comes fast, our eyes dilate with fear and wonder, and we are living in the troubled time of the French Revolution with the oppressors and starving people of that age. The author deserves great credit for portraying the stirring and trying scenes of that period so vividly and accurately.—Susan H Wixon.

knots an hour, but during this severe storm, with furious winds and mountain waves, but twelve and thirteen knots were made. The Gallia makes good speed, and her great length prevents to a great extent pitching and tossing, but when the winds and waves run across her path she rolls fearfully. At the extreme points reached in these lurches it seemed that the deck and floors stood at an angle of nearly forty-five degrees, and the heavy rolling from one side to the other requires the endurance and tact of the hardiest sailors. It seemed that suffering passengers must be thrown from their berths, though the front part rises eight or ten inches above the bed.

That early Sunday morning was a fearful time. Seasickness returned to many, and retchings, vomiting, and groans were heard from many state rooms. To keep out the driving rain and the waves that often dashed over the deck, the windows and openings were closed. The state rooms consequently were illy supplied with air, and the heat and closeness were very oppressive. The night was long and far from cheering. The stanch iron steamer seemed to have found its match in this storm; it trembled, shook, and creaked in a manner to disturb the nerves of the more timid. Even good ships sometimes go down, and it is very probable that that possible contingency entered the minds of more than one that night on the Gallia.

As soon as daylight made its appearance I staggered my way to the deck, where there was at least plenty of air to breathe, and no danger of being suffocated. Taking a seat under the wide, capacious awning by the side of the smoking-room, I sat for hours, watching the furious, driving storm and the mad, tossing billows and surging waves, out as far as the eye could reach. The crests of the waves were sharp and angular, but the furious wind took them off like feathers, and scattered them in the form of spray; and this was going on over the entire surface of the surrounding ocean. The waves not unfrequently dashed over the deck, wetting those who had the hardihood to confront them. This was indeed "a storm at sea," both fearful and grand, a full measure of which was taken in by your humble servant. Eating breakfast was out of the question. On the contrary, my stomach cast up what was remaining on hand of the evening meal before. I sat and stood, really enjoying the storm and the intense commotion of the waves, till twelve o'clock.

Gradually the storm abated, and the elements became less furious. During the following night the wind subsided and the ocean became comparatively civil. Monday came in rather pleasantly, and almost everybody was on deck again, congratulating one another that the storm had passed by and all were safe. By this time we must have reached the longitude of the eastern shore of Maine. We plowed along splendidly on our western journey, Massachusetts lying off to the north of us, but beyond the reach of our vision. We were on the lookout for American land. The first that met our joyful gaze was Fire Island, an appendage of Long Island. Not a soul on board the Gallia was sorry to see America's shores.

Some seventy-five miles out from Sandy Hook we took on a pilot, who had come out that far to meet us. He had with him New York papers, and we soon learned that Garfield had been elected president. That result had been looked for, and none seemed disappointed.

We passed many sailing vessels of various sizes, as well as steamers, some making for the great New York harbor, and some putting out for other ports. All were on the lookout for everything to be seen. Rockaway and Coney Island were closely scanned. In due time we rounded the Hook, entered the Narrows, passed between the forts, and halted before the Quarantine station. Two small steamers came out and boarded us, one bearing the government physician to inquire after the state of our health, to see if it was prudent to allow us to come on to the city, the other bearing Custom House officers to look after baggage and goods brought by the Gallia's passengers. The friends of several on board also came, and the hand-shaking and embraces were most hearty. All were glad that we had made a safe passage.

We slowly moved up the bay, on the eager lookout for everything to be seen. As we neared the city we viewed it with positive pleasure. The towering buildings seemed to welcome us, and the very street lamps seemed to glitter at our arrival. We touched the company's dock at six o'clock. Those who had satchels only merely opened them for a hurried inspection. I was soon in a street car for Science Hall, and in half an hour was home, happy to meet my good little wife, and to find her well.

> "'Mid pleasures and palaces,
> Though we may roam,
> Be it ever so humble,
> There's no place like home."

I will not detain you to moralize or make comments. With all the greatness of Europe, its populous countries and cities, its grandeur and wealth, with its vast works of art and general progress, I am quite sure I like America the best. Here I am content to spend the remainder of my days. May it ever be the "home of the free and the land of the brave."

Thanking you for following me to the end of my dull, verbose, rambling, commonplace letters, I will now bid you good-bye, and quietly subside.

Faithfully yours, D. M. Bennett.

Christmas.

Dear readers, this is almost a universal holiday, and has been so observed for thousands of years. The nations of ancient Asia kept it with great pomp and splendor fully three thousand years ago. The old Romans also kept it in a similar manner before they ever knew anything of Christianity. In fact, Christianity borrowed this festival day of the pagans, just as it has borrowed everything else in its stock of trade. It is claimed for Jesus by the different Christian authorities that he was born in every month of the year. A compromise seems to hav been made by settling down upon and selecting the pagan festival when the sun is born or begins to rise in the heavens after a death or sleep of three days; so what for a thousand years had been a pagan festival has now become a Christian festival, just the same as hundreds of pagan temples hav been transformed into Christian temples or churches, and just as pagan rites and ceremonies hav been transformed into Christian rites and ceremonies.

Christians having no original claim to this festival, it belongs to the entire race, Pagans, Christians, and Infidels alike. Upon this common basis, then, we wish our readers, one and all, a happy Christmas, and in the sense that merriness is happiness, a "Merry Christmas." May we all liv to see the return of many of them!

Features of Volume VIII.

Among the features of the new volume of The Truth Seeker for 1881 may be named the following:

1. A Series of Able Articles by T. B. Wakeman, by particular request. No. 1 will appear in the issue for Jan. 1st. The same will also appear simultaneously in the Boston Investigator.

2 A Debate between Mrs. Annie Besant and the Rev. A. Hatchard.—Held in the Hall of Science, London, Nov. 25th and Dec. 1st, upon the following propositions: 1. "That the Jesus of the gospels is a historical character," Mr. Hatchard affirming, Mrs. Besant denying. 2. "That the influence of Christianity on the world has been injurious," Mrs. Besant affirming, Mr. Hatchard denying. This debate, reported verbatim, possesses peculiar interest. It will be taken from the National Reformer.

3. Best Selections of Radical Articles, from English Reviews and Magazines; also from the National Reformer and the Secular Review.

4. Sunday Sermons, from Truth.—These are able, unique, and interesting. One will appear each week.

5. What I Don't Believe.—These articles, so popular two years ago, will be resumed and continued till completed.

6. What Objections to Christianity?—The discussion between Mr. G. R. Mair and the editor of The Truth Seeker. This will be resumed at an early day and prosecuted to completion.

7. Foreign Correspondence. — Having effected arrangements with several friends in Europe to write for The Truth Seeker, to keep its readers advised as to what is transpiring in Freethought circles, this will prove an acceptable acquisition.

8. A New Dress.—This will be a new feature of considerable interest to our readers. It has no doubt been noticed by many that the type from which The Truth Seeker has been printed has become much worn, and not as legible as it should be. Number 1 of the new volume will be in new type all around. This subjects us to considerable expense, but the interests of our readers demand it. It is for them we work. Every one will undoubtedly welcome the new dress.

In addition to these features others will be added from time to time. The attention to contributors and correspondents will not be abated. The paper will ring with no uncertain sound. It will be positiv and fearless—not ambiguous, conservativ, or time-serving. It will be outspoken and independent, though some may thereby take offense.

Another thing that may be mentioned is the fact that fifty-three numbers of The Truth Seeker will be sent out in 1881—a paper being issued on both the first day and last day of the year. This counts so much to the advantage of subscribers.

In consideration of all these features, together with those which hav hitherto distinguished The Truth Seeker, it is hoped that all the present patrons will remain loyal, and that many new subscribers may be obtained. It is to be hoped that those who hav indicated a determination to discontinue will change their mind, renew their courage, and still "hold the fort." A true soldier will not turn his back to the foe in the time of battle.

We hav decided to send two copies of the first number of the new year to each so he may hav one to use in obtaining a new subscriber or two. This will subject us to a heavy expense, but we trust our friends will see that we are not losers by it. They can make it a gain to us if they will only resolve to do so. There is hardly a reader but what can get a new subscriber if he says he will. Some can get five, and some can procure ten. We will send a handsome present to the one who sends the greatest number of new subscribers. Let it be remembered that we hav offered very generous premiums for new subscribers. Let every one be thinking where he can place the extra copy to do the most good in obtaining new patrons. Let those who think they can use more papers to advantage, inform us of the fact, and we will forward more. Friends, let us make a big effort to increase the number of readers of The Truth Seeker. Please consider yourselves as stock-holders, or part owners of the paper, and do all you can to increase its usefulness.

If any of our readers hav on hand petitions to Congress for the repeal of the Comstock laws will they please send them to H. B. Brown, 141 Eighth street?

The Semitic Gods and the Bible.

Being 333 large-sized pages from Vol. I. of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," the work written by the Editor of The Truth Seeker while serving out a sentence in prison for exercising the American right of the freedom of the press and the freedom of the mails.

Among the gods of the Semitic races treated are the gods of the Chaldeans, Babylonians, Assyrians, Phœnicians, the Jews, and those that borrowed gods from them—the Christians. Among these gods are Baal, Astaroth, Asshur, Moloch, Moladah or Mylitta, Melkart, Chemosh, Ninip, Nebo, Iva, Adad, Allah, Jah, Jahveh or Jehovah (to whom 58 pages are devoted), Satan or the devil, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. This latter god is worshiped by the Protestant Christians of our own time as really as fetiches and idols are worshiped by the savage tribes and polytheists of the earth. To the examination of the Bible 229 pages are devoted, and it is believed it is as thorough and comprehensiv in that direction as anything hitherto produced. The books of the Jewish Bible are examined separately, their contradictions, absurdities, improbabilities, and falsehoods are shown up, and the time given when they were probably written. Those called the gospels of the New Testament are examined, and the fact is conclusivly shown that not one of them was in existence till after one hundred and fifty years of what is called the Christian era had passed away, and consequently could not hav been written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, whom Sunday-school children and old women are taught to believe were the authors of them. The contradictions and discrepancies of the gospels are also shown. The prophecies are examined and proved not to refer to Christ. Five hundred and fifteen improbabilities and impossibilities of the Bible are pointed out; 144 positiv contradictions—a gross of gross divine mistakes—are given. The principal patriarchs and prophets are examined, and much other matter vital to the inquirer is dispensed, including the repulsiv obscenity of the Holy Book.

The making up of this book by itself is to giv in a cheap form the better portion of Vol. I. of the work from which it is taken to those who do not feel like purchasing the entire work, and also to enable those who hav the entire work to hav the gist of it in a cheap form to lend and send out to do good missionary service. There is perhaps nothing better calculated for this important work. Sold at the low price of sixty cents in paper covers, and one dollar, well bound in cloth, including postage. Those who wish copies can now be served.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism,

Being five hundred large pages from Volume II. of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." The work was written by the editor of The Truth Seeker while serving out a sentence in prison for exercising the sacred rights of free speech, a free press, and free mails.

In treating Judaism the following divisions of the subject are taken up: The Claims of Judaism; Abraham; Jacob's sons; Destruction of Jerusalem; What Judaism was; Stages of Judaism; Abraham a Myth; Historical Omissions; Silence of History; Abraham and the Gods; Judaism Contrasted with Other Religions; Characteristics of Jahveh; His Duplicity; His Covenant with Abraham; Sacrifices; Judaism and Paganism; Prophecy; The Prophets; Contradictory Prophecies, They do not Refer to Jesus; Prophecy Limited to no Nation; Modern Prophecies; Greg on Prophecies; Chadwick on the Same; Monotheism in Judaism; Jahveh Not the Only Jewish God; The Scriptures Contrasted; Features of Judaism as Contrasted with Other Religions.

In the treatment of Mohammedanism are introduced: The Life of Mohammed; His Performances; His Conduct Toward the Jews; His Character; His Social Reforms; The Koran; Points in Moslem Faith; Islam and Christianity; Babism and Its Doctrins.

To the examination of Christianity 372 pages are devoted, and it is believed that its false claims and palpable errors are thoroughly exposed. The following are some of the divisions of this examination: The Origin of Christianity, Gnosticism, Writings of the Early Fathers, Book of the Generation of Jesus, Testimony of Celsus, Josephus, and other Writers, Admissions of Christian Writers, Unreliability of the Gospels, Spurious Gospels, Uncanonical Gospels, Facts Worth Remembering, Errors of the Gospels, Unreliability of Gospel Dates, Christianity a Borrowed System, Saviors and Redeemers, Improbability of the Story, Is it Credible? Paul the Author of Christianity, Essenism, The Egyptian Origin of Christianity, The Apostolic Fathers, Fathers of the Second, Third, and Fourth Centuries, Church Quarrels and Contentions, Persecutions by the Church, Saints and Saint-making, Heretics and Heresies, Heresies about Christ, Councils of the Church, Arrogance of Bishops, Hermits and Monks, Divisions in the Church, The Popes of Rome, Kings and Leaders, The Inquisition, The Auta da Fe, Persecutions of Infidels, Recapitulation, Axioms and Postulates, Conclusion.

Probably nothing has been issued more damaging to the false, borrowed system of Christianity thau this. It contains the most important part of the book from which it is taken; is just the work for general distribution, and is furnished at the low rate of $1.50, including postage. Send for a copy of it.

The Martyrdom of Man.

We hav just brought out a new edition of this able and finely written work by Winwood Reade, a book of 543 pages. It is divided into four general divisions—War, Religion, Liberty, and Intellect. The ancient countries and nationalities treated are Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phœnicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

Under the head of RELIGION: The Natural History of Religion; the Israelites, Character of Jesus, Christians, Mohammed, Description of Africa, Mohammedans in Africa.

In the division of LIBERTY: Ancient Europe; Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Tower, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese Discoveries, the Slave Trade, Abolition in America, Materials of Human History.

In the division of INTELLECT: Animal Period of the earth; Origin of Man, and Natural History. The Future of the Human Race; The Religion of Reason aad Love.

Few works hav given better satisfaction in the perusal than this, it being thoroughly radical and in the finest style of English composition. The price of the English work is $5.00; the American sold for $3.00, but we hav reduced it to $1.75. Every truth seeker should hav a copy of it.

An Infidel Abroad.

This volume of "Letters from Europe," by the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, will reach 860 pages; the price, only $1.50, including postage. Many pronounce them very interesting and instructiv. They will be ready for delivery in a week or ten days. Those wanting copies will please forward their orders right along.

"The Truth Seeker" Not a Political Paper.

We are not a politician, nor is THE TRUTH SEEKER a political paper. We do not regard political parties as composed of saints or immaculates. They are replete with trickery and corruption, and will stoop to almost anything base and low to secure power and spoils. We can see but little difference in this respect between the two great parties, and presume the smaller ones, had they the same numbers and prospects, would do the same thing. Politics is a foul pool to wallow in.

Some readers hav felt aggrieved at us because we were in favor of the defeat of the Republican party in the late election. That wish grew out of no special love for the opposing party, but we thought we saw that the party in power had enacted legislation not only very unjust and oppressiv to individuals, especially to Infidel editors and publishers, but subversiv of the highest principles of liberty guaranteed by our Constitution. We thought we saw that the party in power tended to coalesce with the ecclesiastical element of the country, and that the union was being made to oppress Freethinkers and unbelievers. It may be we were mistaken, but we think not. It may be we were influenced by personal wrongs inflicted upon us, but we are sure we felt that freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the freedom of the mails were seriously menaced in the prosecution and imprisonment of several Liberal editors, more than from selfish wrongs. We doubt not there are many who condemned us. Had they lain in prison a year without the least show of justice, they would naturally condemn the law and the party which had thus oppressed them; and should they hav spoken out their indignation and desire to punish the guilty, we trust we would hav been liberal enough not to hav cast them off and forsaken them for it.

The reason why we favored a union with an opposing party was to punish the party that had oppressed and disregarded unbelievers in theology, and because that opposing party was the only one which had the least power to defeat them. Any aid is acceptable in fighting an enemy. But, as before observed, THE TRUTH SEEKER is not a political paper, nor will it be. Its mission is to oppose the theological dogmas of the time, to combat supernaturalism, and keep up a ceaseless conflict with priestcraft and mental servitude. These are the greatest evils known to our race, and we trust that Republicans, Democrats, and Greenbackers who are Liberal will realize the importance of our being sustained. Let not politics stand in the way of the spread of truth. Let not politics be deemed of more importance than Liberalism. The first is degrading, the last is elevating and emancipating. The one is bondage, the other is freedom. Can a true Liberal hesitate as to which to choose and which to discard?

Drawing Near.

The trial of Mr. H. L. Barter, publisher of the Liberal Press, arrested under the Comstock law, is set to take place next month. The National Defense Association has undertaken to defend Mr. Barter, but the funds are low. Let the generous-hearted who feel like contributing to this fund remit to H. B. Brown, Treasurer, 141 8th st., New York. The receipt of the same will be duly acknowledged. Mr. Barter is a poor man and has no money to pay lawyers.

THE close of the year can be no better observed than in remitting the arrearages on THE TRUTH SEEKER and in paying for the new volume for the coming year. Many friends hav responded to our call for aid, but, sorrowful to relate, there are yet a large number in arrears for the paper they hav read during the past year. We earnestly hope this will not continue to be the case. We need the money, and hope no good Liberal will wish to longer keep us out of it. If every delinquent will resolve to do the right thing in this direction before the close of the year, we will begin the new year in a happy frame of mind, and will be able to do far more good than otherwise.

THIS is the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER that will be printed on this old type. The first number of the new volume will appear in an entire new dress. Two copies will be sent to each patron, and we hope a good place will be selected for the extra copy where a new subscriber may probably be secured. Those who can use additional copies of the first number for obtaining new subscribers will please write us at once and inform us how many copies they can use to advantage. The new dress costs several hundred dollars, and the extra copies issued will cost several hundred more. Will not all the friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER make a special effort to obtain new subscribers to it, making the investment of the extra issue a good one? There should be far more readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER than there are. It has opened the eyes of many thousands, and the eyes of many thousands more need operating on in the same way. We should let our light shine, and send the glad tidings forth to the world. Let thousands of new subscribers be obtained.

INDEX to VOL. VII.—This being the last number of the volume, a full index will be found on the last two pages of this issue.

Those who wish a bound copy of Vol. VII. of THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880 can be accommodated. Price $3.50. Bound volumes from the first can also be furnished. The whole seven volumes furnished for $15.00.

MR. W. F. JAMIESON called upon us one day last week, on his way to Boston and the East. It is the first time we hav met him. He is genial, earnest, energetic, and industrious. He speaks encouragingly of the general outlook of Liberalism. He will return here in two weeks and hold in Republican Hall, 55 West 33d street, a five nights' debate with Moses Hull, on "The Pro and Con of Spiritualism." Commencing January 3d. Tickets for the entire course, $1.00. For sale at this office.

A Favor Requested.

We wish to hav the names and post-office addresses of Liberal people all over the country. Will friends send us a list of such names? To those who will send us such lists we will mail a good book or pamphlet in proportion to the number of names sent. The names of those not taking THE TRUTH SEEKER desired.

BRO. BENNETT: I wish to say to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I shall go West to lecture some time in January, and would like to arrange for lectures on my way to Kansas, and also for lectures on my return trip.

At present I am engaged in a debate with Dr. Morron, on "The Existence of God," and when this discussion is ended I shall be prepared to complete arrangements for lectures. Correspondents will please address me promptly at 38 Upton st., Boston, Mass. Yours fraternally, W. S. BELL.

E. H. HEYWOOD lectures in Science Hall, 712 Washington st., Boston, Sunday, Dec. 26th, at 2:30 P. M., on "Money Reform;" at 7:30, evening, on "The New Order."

IT is rather late to speak, as a reporter, of the "Reception" given to Mr. Bennett on the 20th of October; but as this is our first opportunity of referring to the matter, a few words of notice may not be out of place. The reception was a success in every way. At 8:30 P. M. about sixty or seventy friends sat down to a cold collation, and, at the conclusion of the battle, the real business of the evening commenced. Mr. C. Bradlaugh, who presided, made a brief but forcible speech, conveying to Mr. Bennett the thanks of English Republicans and Freethinkers for the brave stand that he had made in America for the freedom of the press. A very handsome illuminated address, gorgeous in gilt frame and of very artistic design, was then formally presented to the guest of the evening, who, in a few words of earnest thanks, acknowledged the testimonial. Speeches were made by Mrs. Besant, Dr. C. R. Drysdale (President of the Malthusian League), Dr. Alice Vickery, and Mr. Das, a Hindoo gentleman. The whole affair was thoroughly representativ and very hearty; and Mr. Bennett, who left for Liverpool on his way to America immediately after the conclusion of the meeting, was deeply impressed by the friendliness displayed toward him by English Freethinkers. If the remark be not too egotistical, we feel great satisfaction at the successful result of the proposition which was first made in these columns. It is only fair to add that the National Secular Society took the matter up warmly, and to this fact it is due that the presentation was officially representativ of English secularists.—London Republican.

WHEN, on one occasion, the founder of Christianity wished to point a moral by the aid of a coin of the realm, he, having no lucre, was obliged to resort to the expedient of catching a fish (of a breed long since extinct) that swam about with silver money in its mouth. The poverty of the founder is not imitated by modern professors of the orthodox creed. Many curates, it is true, starve slowly on a meager pittance; but the dignitaries of the church are adepts at the art of feathering their nests. During 1879 the deaths of four wealthy parsons were recorded, and the sums left by them show that all their treasures were not laid up in heaven. The Rev. E. B. Sparke, Canon of Ely, left £160,000; the Right Rev. Dr. Baring, Bishop of Durham, £120,000; the Hon. and Very Rev. Dr. Duncombe, Dean of York, £500,000; and the Rev. G. B. Paley, of Freckenham, Suffolk, £300,000.—London Republican.

The Wicked Flea.

EUDORA, KAN., Dec. 8, 1880.

T. C. LELAND, ESQ., Dear Sir: I received your letter a few days ago, informing me of the action of the Defense Association in the Conger case, which was soon followed by a letter from Mr. Brown inclosing postal order for ten dollars. Since receiving these letters our Christian persecutors hav withdrawn the complaint against Conger in the district court and the case will go no farther. We will return the ten dollars to your Association, with thanks for your kindly interest in the case.

The Liberals here look upon the termination of this case as a local victory over religious persecution, but it would hav been more satisfactory to us after having gone to so much trouble to raise the funds necessary to prosecute the appeal if the case had been allowed to take its course through to the Supreme Court, believing as we do that the Sunday law is unconstitutional, and that the highest court of this state would hold it to be so if a case was properly presented for a hearing.

I thank you for the copy of the National Liberal League at Chicago. Some of the debates on the Comstock law are interesting reading to me. I hav always been an admirer of Col. Ingersoll, but I think Mr. Wakeman got away with the Colonel at Chicago. Yours fraternally,

ENOS REED.

Col. Crockett's coon came down without waiting for the bullet in his eye. So do these Sunday Christians when they find the National Defense Association is after them. It will be next in order to hear that the Christian Rips who snooze in and around Le Claire and Davenport, Iowa, and are not aware that this is the XIX, not the XV century, in a Republic, not a Popedom, will wake up, come to their senses, and call off their dogs from Mr. Barter. The National Defense Association has sent $75 there as a commencement of his defense, at his trial, appointed for the 20th of January next. More will be forthcoming if the Christians wish to push the case; but they will do well to come down gracefully, as the fellows in Kansas do.

T. C. L.

The Bell Strikes One.

There is nothing the Liberals of this country so much need as a waking up; and what better can perform that office than a Bell ringing up and down the land? yes, a Liberty Bell! with a tongue to tell who tolled the knell that burned up hell.

W. S. Bell is the ringing tintinabulator alluded to. He lectures, works, and makes friends and converts to Liberalism wherever he goes. He organizes Leagues, too, whenever he can on his track of travel, and thus reaps as well aa sows. A lecture, without organization succeeding it, is the Divine Word fallen on stony ground—only here and there a spear of it sprouts up and the wrath of the righteous shrivels it to straw. But a lecture, followed by organization, a banding of the brethren together to be a help to each other and a strength to other Liberals in other places, is the very Logos of inspiration treasured up in good and honest hearts, of which men shall reap some sixty, some seventy, and some an hundred fold.

Whenever the Liberals of a town or a city can employ a lecturer and pay him, let them send for Mr. Bell. He knows the Liberal doctrin well, speaks as by authority, and can tell the glad tidings of the gospel of mental freedom to an audience acceptably. He goes West soon, and needs to know his route and engagements in advance. Address W. S. Bell, 38 Upton street, Boston, Mass. T. C. LELAND.

P. S.—"The Bell strikes one," but we Liberals can go him one better. "We take no note of time, but from its loss." The notes he takes of us will be our gain. "Muzzle not the ox that treadeth out the corn." That was in the ancient days when the disciples "thrashed" with cattle. But no matter. The wisdom of the Evangelists is in the injunction. Let no unhallowed hands withhold it from Mr. Bell just because we reap, thrash, pour into sacks, and garner into barns all at one operation. T. C. L.

N. B.—Yes, and kill and cut up this very ox by machinery. Do not so to the Bell!! L.

Reply to C. E. Townsend.

Mr. Townsend says this writer continues what he seems to think a wonderful question.

Can there be a first without a second? and can there be a second cause for the same thing? This mere quibbler, not being satisfied with my detailed explanation of a first cause, perhaps will better understand this short reply.

There must be by necessity, as an axiom, a first or starting cause for everything. Now, friend Townsend, it just all depends whether there must or not. Perhaps you can better understand this short reply that if there can be a first without a second, then we hav no science of mathematics or arithmetic, and no other science, and we hav all this time been at sea. We hav made no exact calculations; all has been guess work. But if there is a first cause, please describe it and giv it a local habitation and a name, and tell also what is the second cause, and describe its functions; for if you know this thing, it certainly is easy to define it. If you hav followed from the first onward, or from the branches to the root, you, as an axiom maker, must know the road, and are just the person that all mankind hav been looking for in all past ages, and now you are called upon for proof, not closet-hatched axioms, proof indelible, proof infallible, and let it be scientific, or cease to be quibbles.

How Jesus Builds a House.

The ghost that is left of the Baptist society at West Pawlet, Vt., is trying to pay for the new insurance office they are erecting on the site of the old one which, by a dispensation of providence, was recently burned through the instrumentality of a small boy. They will insure you against the fires in the next world providing you will pay their agent here one-tenth of all the money you receive and the crops you raise during the year. At least that is what the last agent offered to do.

After the old salvation factory burned, the Infidels said they could not rebuild it. But Jesus ordered his representativs in West Pawlet to say, "We'll show you that we can build her up, and don't you forget it." They are also showing how they can raise the money to do it with. They hold "Christian catch-cent sociables" every week or so. At these they resort to all conceivable means to remove the cash from the pockets of the crowd into their own "for Christ's sake."

They had an egg sociable, each girl bringing an egg with her name written upon it. These were mixed up, and sold to anybody who had twenty-five cents. The purchaser—no matter who he was, or from what station, the only qualification necessary was the twenty-five cents—was entitled to the company of the young lady whose name was upon his egg. If the name did not suit, they would erase it and put on another. This, of course, was all right, because Jesus got the proceeds. Anybody who says it is not all hunkadory is a low, mean Infidel, and should not be tolerated in the Christian community of West Pawlet; or, at least, he should not be allowed to go into society with "us, the beer-bibbing Baptists!" It is sad but true that there are large numbers of Baptists who are frequenters of the dramshops. Dispute it if you dare, you elect for hell. But that is nothing; the blood of Jesus is an all-sufficient whitewash. With a coat or two of that, and some gin killers in their mouths, they can steal into heaven some time in the night, when the devil is asleep.

The Baptists tell us we can not be anybody unless we belong to "our church," and drink the blood from the same cup with gamblers, topers, and rummies.

Well, they hav resorted to almost everything to pay for their new gospel-cage except cockfights and wrestling-matches. The latest was a variety show, a kind of Baptist circus, at which they had a lottery, theater, brass band, and a laughable farce for Christ's sake.

It was truly amusing. The consistency of getting up a lottery to pay for a church is of course unquestionable! But when they try to blow religion into a man and money out of him with a brass band, it is too much for Jesus. Excuse us, for Christ's sake. Pound themselvs to heaven with a base drum!

Jesus never said much in favor of brass bands, theaters, or lotteries, but the "laughable farce" must hav met his hearty approbation. Lottery tickets were sold, and the prizes, a ring and a thimble, were drawn by those that Jesus intended should hav them.

Liberals, it means something when Christians hav to resort to theaters to pay for a church. Had they held a prayer-meeting, charged twenty cents at the door, there would not hav been enough present to make Jesus hear if he had been in the belfry.

The church is weakening in every part. People would rather witness a "laughable farce" than hear about hell, crosses, and blood.

The large number of vacant and deserted churches all over the land that are as empty as an orthodox heaven, with rust on door-latch, cobwebs in window, and grass growing green in the path and about the door, the half-starved minister shucked and kicked about from one place to another every few months in search of a few almighty dollars—all these conditions of things proclaim in thunder tones the fate which is sure as death to every Christian church in the civilized world. We would suggest that the Baptists buy a rooster of the fighting kind to put on top of the spire. It would be doubly emblematical of their situation. They fight and quarrel among themselvs, and if they ever run the mill it will be a continual quarrel and fight with skepticism and Infidelity. Some people hav suggested that as long as they are in the show business they get Buffalo Bill and raise money enough to pay up some of the ministers who used to preach in the old church.

In times of old Jesus was given to bragging and blowing about how stout he was, saying that he was the happy possessor of all the power on earth and heaven. Be that as it may, he requires a vast amount of waiting on now. He has not even lifted a finger to assist in its erection. And he has never been seen looking it over. In fact, there is no proof of his having been in town since the old shop burned down. The workmen hav got along first-rate without any of his help and it will soon be ready to drink wine in, and for the remnant of the society to get together and thank their imaginary God that they are not going to hell, and that the people who belong to the church across the road and the Liberal League are going to that place which a loving God in his tender mercy has prepared for those of his children whom he did not make as good as their fortunate brothers and sisters. It will be the headquarters of the firm of God Almighty & Co., in West Pawlet. It will be the coward's castle in which a cowardly lying minister will shout gospel, eat Jesus, and pass around the hat. This lazy, lying vagabond will tell these people how they ought to shun Infidels, skeptics, and Spiritualists, and to look wild for Universalists and Unitarians who are the very settlings of society, and merely lack the horns and tail to be devils. It will be the special business of this gospel grinder to tell the society just exactly what they all really know. If he tells them anything they never knew before, they will think the Liberals hav captured him, and he will soon be out of a job.

Protest Against Injustice to Women.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: All people are entitled to honest treatment at the hands of law-making powers. In a republic people inherit the rights of individual freedom (at self-cost and insurance against infringement) and the recognition of citizens with all their privileges. Knowledge of these rights has been expressed by the best minds of many ages, and especially discussed in this nineteenth century. The government of these United States was based on these principles, its Constitution recognizing equality of rights, the enjoyment of liberty of conscience, thought, and speech, of a voice in electing officers and enacting laws, not discriminating against sex, color, or station. Yet with these recorded edicts and the wisdom of historic sages to guide humanity, with the cruelty of past rule warring against tyranny, the direness of vice pleading against ignorance, the piteousness of poverty inveighing against caste, the world at large is a waste of despotism. Civil affairs retain the grasp on old kingly orders, and subjects are divided into the favored and the abject; religions conserve the senseless superstitions of mythic stupidity and pagan rites; fear and faith the debasing incentivs.

The province of a system for the exercise of the devout in our natures would be to relieve of blind fear, to cultivate free investigation and pure modes of life; but in the name of religion the pulpits aid the thrones in keeping the people so depraved that the two vampire powers can sway them to their atrocious services. The popularity, the respectability, prevailing under their control are so false and vile as to be acknowledged by-words and mockeries. Yet, seeing this, their best followers do not turn to reforming bad customs, as that would encroach on the policy; and Liberals hav hardly learned that in sustaining that popularity they pander to the policy and deplete themselvs. Scandal for dissent must be disregarded or scorned.

This nominal republic, boasting of equality and liberty, imitates its mother nations in both church and state; deludes, betrays, and extorts in both. We are slaves to sordid usurpers in both, and especially so by the conniving and conjoining of both.

Our state opposes civil reform and its original liberty. Our church never emerged from ancient barbarism; it still persecutes those devoted to moral goodness and enlightenment of belief. Science and intelligence hav to progress in spite of enmity and treachery, of real and feigned bigotry. But, thanks to the genius of soul-related liberty and the efforts of her lovers and laborers, their progress is apparent in the light of resultant Liberalism. May that light run from brain to brain till majorities are quickened with living might to work for the common good, uniting the true of every land in a just and humane cause. International sympathy is already expressiv and responsiv across continents and oceans, betokening the time when truth and love shall preponderate. Let it be encouraged and aided till practical righteousness enzones the earth and chases the darkness of hypocrisy, the misery of penury, to the borders of dwindling doom. Unswerving vigilance in this is the price of success.

To liberate women from debilitating and inthralling customs, and then establish them in civil rights, is among the first, best, and shortest works for universal emancipation. This would be many steps toward pure heredity—transmitted health and honesty—and allied to liberty. Weak parentage begets imbecility. Maintaining male authority in families, denying to mothers council in social matters, has handed down depraving and slavish tendencies. Holding that authority in law, depriving women of governmental privileges, yet making them amenable to the strictest letter of men's enactments, has perpetuated civil corruption, violated the federal Constitution, and tended backward to the old and tyrannous.

When the tax-gatherer reminds me that unless I deliver to him the sum officers hav associated with my name, my home will be confiscated in one year, though I hav not been consulted in the arrangement, nor allowed to represent my thought in any law that empowers men to command me and seize my means, I know I am aggrieved. And knowing what they take at the point of a bandit government's weapon goes to support that government in making me its vassal, silence would be culpable. When this unfailing event comes with each passing year, I more clearly see the loathsome nature of selfishness and legal wrong, more keenly feel the pangs of men's inhumanity to men their intrigue has made poor; more deeply yearn for the exercise of my rights to resist their consummate meanness to all women.

To-day the demand and reminder are presented, and I pen a moiety of the rushing thoughts duty urges into utterance. Pardon me, sister sufferers, that I protest so mildly. I do not feel so tame as compulsion causes me to seem. Defeat does not conquer. In view of the helplessness of women whom avarice and duplicity conquer in things where law cannot compel, I've rich upholding helps; and those of them that are self-gratulations are not unworthy. Ability to spurn vile usages and vain opinions is a treasure. To advocate sentiments frankly, to reject fashions that inslave body and spirit, to heed nature's law, sustains all powers in harmony, insures self-respect, as much more as is worthful, and priceless integral development. Physically and mentally I am free, while gazing on the wide world's bondage. The fires of patriotism are blazing in my soul, where rebellion to civil and social injustice, to fraudulent shams and flattering wiles, never surrenders.

Sexual Intemperance.

"I think Mrs. Slenker will find that the cause of female diseases and weaknesses of the generativ organs are the result of other causes. Every stomach-full of food diverts vital force for a time, but only to return again with new force for the brain. Why will we never understand that man givs to woman food in every sex act where there is temperance and perfect adaptability. It is a physiological fact that man loses his seed something like once every month, and that too in health. Sexual teetotalism would be no better than what we hav now. But I think temperance and adaptability would bring harmony, and from that condition we soon get health. W. E. Choate, M.D.
Jackson, Mich.

I think friend Choate will find it hard work to prove that female weaknesses of the generativ organs are the result of other causes than sexual intemperance. Some few may be, but the greater number are solely attributable to this and this only. One conclusiv proof of this is the rapidly failing health of most women a year or two after marriage. No close observer can help but notice how soon women break down after they become wives. It is not continual child-bearing that does this, for children properly generated by healthy parents, and subject to proper prenatal conditions, never affect the health of the mother other than favorably, even should they come yearly as do the young of many animals. But when we see childless wives as well as others afflicted with these female diseases, and many of them barely able to go about, the cause is too probable to be denied. All over the land are women groaning under the burdens that religion, law, and love hav laid upon them. Some there are who know the evil and still endure because the environments of custom compel them to. True, they could leave husband, home, and children, but to a great majority disease, pain, and death are preferable. I know, personally, cases enough to fill a volume. Cases where the wives hav been slowly murdered (innocently), by ignorant husbands; others where some honest doctor gave due warning and they were saved. Others where the wife quietly severed the tie and resolutely took her life in her own hands, and afar off from all she loved, began to create for herself a new world of love, safety, and purity.

Dr. E. P. Miller says: "Every child that is begotten is at the expense of a degree of vital force in the parent. The male principle is composed of the elements which form brain, nerve, muscle, bone, in short every tissue of which the body is composed; and by parting with it a portion of the life principle is lost, and a constant loss of this life-principle, whether for purposes of generation or otherwise, must inevitably drain the system of a vast amount of life-force, and render it an easy prey to the innumerable diseases to which humanity is subject.

Dr. J. Hughes Bennett says: "Phthisis or consumption is the result in many cases of the loss of this principle which contains the very essence of life, together with the loss of nerve power which accompanies it."

Dr. Dixon says, "The intercourse of sexes could only hav been assigned for the production of offspring."

It is true that while many confess to the injury of sexual dissipation, there are a few who, like inveterate liquor drinkers and tobacco consumers, boast to having lived a long and healthy life, and indulged excessivly and continuously; but they are exceptions, and no rule to go by, and doubtless if they left children these unfortunates were feeble, weak, puny, and worthless specimens of humanity, for the life principle that gave them birth must hav been weak and diluted, and could not impart a strong mental or physical vitality to them. Then there are other boasters who are suddenly carried off by apoplexy, heart disease, etc., the plain result of their excessiv indulgence, but called by an ignorant public a visitation of God, or some other equally erroneous name.

If man givs to woman in the act, he also takes from her, and at last one begins to rob the other, and the victim dies or drags out a life of aches and pains, weariness and woe.

We do not advocate Shakerism, Paulism, or the chastity of priests, monks, and nuns. We want purity on higher grounds than any of these. We want it on the ground of hygienic morality, virtue, and all that is noble, grand, and worthy. We want a race who shall be above the plane of lust. We want pure thoughts, a thoroughly educated hygienic race who shall banish from earth every form of prostitution and sexual disease, every lustful thought and obscene idea. We must rise above all societies for the suppression of vice by eliminating vice itself from the world by pure and good teaching as well as by lives of correct and happy deeds and thoughts. Purity is hygiene, and hygiene is happiness.

Man does not lose his seed in health. If he is continent in deed and thought the vital principle or seed is absorbed into the blood and strengthens the brain as well as all parts of the system. Temperance is like prevention of conception. It is better than intemperance, but teetotalism is best, just as continence is best.

"A hero he, though drums are mute,
And no gay banners flaunted,
Who treads his passions under foot,
And meets the world undaunted.

"O, then, to bravely do our best,
Howe'er the winds are blowing,
And meekly leave to time the rest,
Is wisdom worth the knowing.

On the Wing.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: After the political campaign I rail-rushed over the rolling prairies of Iowa to the calm, peaceful glades of Minnesota, where I was greeted by Mrs. Jamieson and our friend, Dr. Louts. How great a transition! From the din of politics to the quiet of the Zumbro, amid the hills of Mazeppa—from hell to paradise!

Ten days visiting—Louts, in Mazeppa; Hoyts, in Oak Center; Sweets, Van Burens, Dwelles, in Lake City. Mrs. Jamieson now accompanies me. Five lectures in MAUSTON, WIS.

Wm. Holgate, a graduate of English mines, was to "blame for them." That is what the orthodox say. The barber is a Freethought thorn in the side of piety in Mauston. Mr. Frank Goodrich was activ in securing success financially and otherwise. Mr. Sykes, Mr. Phillips, and others were efficient workers. Fine congregations assembled; at the last lecture the Opera House was crowded. Mr. and Mrs. Holgate, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, and others will be long remembered by us for their kindness.

The course of lectures threatens to stir up a debate. So mote it be. Billy, the barber, will be to blame for it.

CRYSTAL LAKE, ILL.

Here we paused for a few days with our friends Andruss. A course of lectures will be in order there this season. So says M. J. A.

MC HENRY, ILL.

Received a cordial invitation from our old friends Hon. George Gage and wife to come and visit them. Mr. and Mrs. Gage are strong Spiritualists, while I hav become a Materialist. But that makes no difference in our friendly relations, for our friendship was not, in the first place, based upon unanimity of opinion. While Mr. Gage says he knows Spiritualism is true, he can, nevertheless, respect my right to entertain my own convictions of what is truth. I cannot help wishing that all Spiritualists were as rationalistic as the Gages. A monopoly of bigotry might then be left to the bat-like orthodox. While at McHenry we had brief calls from Maria and Georgia Gage, now married and happier than if they had religion. It beats all how some young wives brag of their husbands. Well, in this instance I doubt not that the two husbands are as good as they are good-looking. Met old friends, Dr. Howard and brother.

BUSHNELL, ILL.

A splendid visit with Mr. and Mrs. Denning, Mr. and Mrs. Murphy, Mr. and Mrs. Duntley. The distinguishing trait of Bushnell is its devouring love for the scientific.

TABLE GROVE, ILL.

For one week we hav been here. Began an eight session debate Tuesday morning, Dec. 7th, with John Hughes, one of the most noted debaters of this nation, and one of the ablest I ever met. He has a scientific bent, and is an easy, attractiv speaker. There are but few whom I hav encountered that are his equal in debate.

Table Grove is the home of Mr. Hughes, where he has a host of friends. Four hours every day large audiences came together to listen to our good-natured, wordy war. Toward the end of the disputation, as the interest grew, the Universalist church was packed. Nothing enlists attention more than joint oral debate when properly conducted.

EASTWARD, HO!

We now turn our faces toward the rising sun. Will deliver a course of five lectures in Garrettsville, Ohio, then for New York to hold debate with Moses Hull on "Spiritualism." May the truth, wherever found, be ours. If Moses has any facts I will be glad to get them, but they must be facts, and not stories about facts.

W. F. Jamieson.

A Few Words About Europe, Temperance, and Other Matters.

Mr. Bennett, Dear Friend: I beat you two or three weeks in reaching our glorious America after our summer passed in foreign lands. I sailed from Glasgow, Scotland, on the 14th day of October, and I was glad indeed when I learned the good ship Gallia had brought you safe home.

But I must tell you, from your account, I don't believe you got "shook up" nearly so much, though later in the season, as we did when I came, for just at that time "old Neptune" put forth an exhibition of his almightiness and showed us to what an extent he could rally the elements of the Atlantic. But the grand ship Bolivia of the Anchor Line bad him defiance and brought us gallantly over. And now I think you feel as I do upon one point, and that the Hon. Roscoe Conkling expressed once upon a time when he arrived home from Europe, viz., "A visit to foreign lands teaches Americans to better appreciate their home and country upon their return."

I note with pleasure that the great army of readers of The Truth Seeker duly prize your grand descriptiv letters from over there. Yet they can hardly appreciate the hard work it cost you to gain the exact knowledge and grind it out to them as I can. Could they hav seen you emerge from the place of the sacred tombs in Westminster Abbey, and seen you go through the Tower of London in the heat, they would better know. I wonder you do not publish the reception tendered you in London, complete from Bradlaugh's National Reformer. I hav a copy of the Reformer sent me that contains the speeches upon the occasion, and I deem them very interesting and important.

I am now in the lecture field, and I giv one lecture of my course on my travels in Europe, which seems to interest the people very much.

I hav just been reading your two admirable letters from the Eternal city of Rome with great interest.

I hav also just read in the last Truth Seeker your excellent remarks upon true temperance in response to a lady who writes from Leslie, Michigan. Yes, I can say with you that I saw thousands of wine and ale sippers abroad, and very few drunkards. All tables in Great Britain are supplied with ale, stout, and spirit, and it is considered no disgrace in any circle, but the rule. I dined with a clergyman at Norwich, England, and there were ale and liquors upon his table; and at Brussels and Antwerp in Belgium I saw hundreds of ladies and gentlemen sipping wine and ale under the awnings, of an afternoon; and, strange to say, both in Great Britain and among the French I saw much more social happiness, to all appearance, much more real health, and very many more ruddy countenances than here. It is said the liquors are purer there, and that, together with the difference of climate, makes the difference. But I sometimes think that the raids of our total abstinence (by force) people hav their influence to make our drunkards. Forbidden fruit has always been a great temptation. I recollect hearing a little girl in Ohio, who had just signed the pledge, sigh out, "Oh, how I would like just to taste some strong drink!"

T. S. Andrews.

P. S.—My good wife remains in Europe for the winter, and I want to return and lecture in Scotland and England next winter if my health permits, which has greatly improved since I last saw you. T. S. A.

The Drink Question.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been reading with interest the letter published in The Truth Seeker of Dec. 5, from Mary L. Bonnel, concerning the use of alcoholic beverages, and your reply thereto. Having studied this question pretty closely for several years from a variety of standpoints, I am compelled to side with your correspondent, and regretfully take issue with yourself on a question of such vital importance to humanity. With all due deference to the opinion of others, I must say that no person can arrive at correct conclusions starting from such false premises as, it seems to me, are those upon which the supporters of even moderate liquor drinking base their arguments.

I think your former correspondent has effectually disposed of your proposition that "True temperance with regard to any article means its use in moderation;" but relativ to the one that "Temperance and total abstinence are two different things," I hav a few words to say. That they are two different things I grant you, so far as they relate to that which is useful and beneficial to the human organism, and no farther. But where alcohol is concerned, whether it be that found in beer, wine, or whisky, the majority of our most pronounced temperance people accept the two terms as synonymous.

In my estimation there has never been a better definition of this much disagreed about word, temperance, given to the world than the one by that great teacher and Freethinker, Dr. R. G. Trall, which is, "The temperate or moderate use of everything good and useful, and total abstinence from all things absolutely injurious or poisonous."

That alcohol is a deadly poison, which the vital forces cannot appropriate or make use of, but always make effort to expel, as they do any other poisons, both science and human experience hav clearly demonstrated. That many use it in some form for years without any apparent serious results arising therefrom I admit, while they are many times deluded into the belief that because the immediate effects of this mild stimulation are pleasant, it is one of the "comforts of life," and actually beneficial. This is the very rock upon which thousands of opium, tobacco, and alcoholic drunkards hav been wrecked. Many other known poisons, let it be remembered, when introduced into the circulation in just the right proportion, will produce this pleasant stimulation, this apparent beneficial result. Why? Because the vital forces, roused to act in self-defense, are putting forth undue effort to expel the enemy, yet I think no intelligent person can deny that this increased abnormal activity is at the expense of vital power.

In determining the beneficial or detrimental results of anything, we must not confine ourselvs to a day, a year, or even a generation of human life. If we accept that physiological axiom that "stimulation is always fellowed by proportionate exhaustion," is it not plain that even a moderate indulgence in the milder alcoholic drinks serves to weaken and waste the life forces? Even though a man may care not to conserve these for his own sake, making "a short life and a merry one" his motiv, has he any right to rob his posterity of vital force, nervous energy, mental vigor, or proper balance of brain for the sake of gratifying his own appetites and desires? Surely this is a question which ought to interest every Freethinker and lover of humanity.

Certainly, if any one believes that alcoholic stimulants are a benefit to him, or at least not harmful, he has the right to use them. Yet there are those who, honestly entertaining such views, rigidly abstain from them for fear their example may prove a stumbling-block to some weaker brother.

Again, the opinion of the honored editor of The Truth Seeker concerning the evil effects of universal wine-drinking among certain European nations is so at variance with some who hav gone abroad purposely to study the question from a physiological and hygienic standpoint that I cannot help thinking his observations were only casual, his mind being so much occupied with other matters as to prevent his giving it sufficient thought and attention to enable him to form correct estimates.

I hav no fears, Mr. Bennett, that you will become a drunkard at your time of life should you occasionally drink a glass of wine; I only fear that your open advocacy of the practice may mislead some young truth-seeker who looks to you for instruction and example, and I should not feel that I was true to the principles I hav publicly advocated did I miss this opportunity offered of entering my protest against views which to me are so erroneous, knowing, as I do, that you and I trust the majority of your readers will respect an "honest thought honestly expressed," however much it may differ from your own.

Yours for investigation, Marion Slusser.

Notice.

Mrs. Colby and Smith closed their second engagement in Rochester, N. Y., Nov. 14th, having a crowded house; attended a three days' convention at Binghampton the 19th, 20th, and 21st; will remain there during November, and return to Rochester for the month of December, notwithstanding Mrs. Colby has given over forty lectures in that city since last April to large and appreciativ audiences.

Persons desiring the services of Mrs. Colby and Smith for week evening lectures or funerals will address them accordingly.

John's Way.

Oscar P. Foal writes: The more I think of that little book as an emancipator, pointing the way that pilgrims may return to reason, the more I think it is just the right book for the purpose. If Infidels would only see to it that every young Christian who would read it had a copy placed in his or her hands I believe it would be the means of killing more Christianity in one week than ten million tons of miscellaneous scientific arguments could get away with in ten years. It hits the demon Christianity in its tender spot (ridicule), and the book is so amusing and entertaining withal that the average reader, once fairly under way, will not be apt to turn aside for all the imps he may expect to meet; and as the pilgrim proceeds through the book, the fog will rise from his mental vision and he will see the aforenamed lamed demon, the devil, his imps, and all their tribe humping themselvs off over the horizon of the forever gone.

Buckle's explanation of the decline of the spirit of religious persecution was that in modern times faith had undergone an eclipse and men could not bring themselvs to persecute others into believing that whereof they were themselvs skeptical. The inadequateness of this explanation of one of the most striking social phenomena of our time is forcibly shown in the North American Review for January by Prof. John Fiske, who assigns a number of other causes that hav been at least as influential in bringing about this most desirable result. First, there is the decline of the martial spirit and the greater devotion to pacific industrial pursuits. Then, as men rise in the scale of civilization, they are less disposed to be domineering. Finally, men in modern times hav quite lost the sense of corporate responsibility—the belief that a whole community is liable for the offense of each individual comprised in it. These points are established with all the ingenuity of reasoning and wealth of learning for which the author is so distinguished. The other articles in this number of the Review are: "Controling Forces in American Politics," by Senator George F. Edmunds;" "Atheism in Colleges," by President John Bascom; "The Ruins of Central America," by Désire Charnay; "Partisan Government." by William D. Le Sueur; "Popular Art Education," by Prof. John F. Weir; "The Limitations of Sex," by Nina Morais; "The Mission of the Democratic Party," by Senator William A. Wallace, and finally a review of recent philological works, by Prof. F. A. March.

The Review is sold by booksellers and newsdealers generally.

Are Missions Worth the Cost?—The non-Christian religions are not to the wise man mere monsters; he knows they hav much good and truth in them; he knows that Mohammedanism and Brahmanism and Buddhism are not what the missionaries call them; and he knows, too, how really unfit the missionaries are to cope with them. For any one who weighs the matter well, the missionary in clerical coat and gaiters whom one sees in wood-cuts preaching to a group of picturesque orientals, is, from the inadequacy of his criticism, both of his hearers' religion and of his own, and his signal misunderstanding of the very volume he holds in his hand, a hardly less grotesque object in his intellectual equipment for his task than in his outward attire. Arnold's Lit. and Dogma.

False and true are relativ terms, and I shall probably know very little about the false till I hav arrived at the absolutely true. Let us remember that the false is often a lame step toward the true. A grand thing indeed it would be, in a catholic and hopeful spirit, to regard all reaching of the human intelligence and soul as a growth along the whole line toward the truth. Let us not despise or dread honest and inquiring error. How hav the sciences of medicin and astronomy, how hav the progresses of social life, the causes of education, of health, of legislation, been advanced except by deduction from error and the hard disciplin of blunder. John D. Long.

To all who wish to study and understand the most fearfully fascinating period in the fluctuating affairs of revolutionary France, this unpretentious little pamphlet by Bro. Bell will prove a historical prize. Every page is replete with historical references and observations, which make it of particular value and interest to Liberals. Its style is original, clear, simple, popular, and pleasing. Nothing else in the literature of Liberalism presents such a compendium of facts collected and boiled down for the ready reference of the free-thinking student. It is a powerful and philosophical production. It erases every blood blot from Infidelity, and places Thomas Paine in his true position among the philanthrophists, patriots, and heroes of that time of terror.—S. H. Preston.

Letters from Friends.

LETTER TO LIBERALS.

MARTINDALE DEPOT, N. Y., Nov. 25, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I appreciate the honor of the favor of an effort in THE TRUTH SEEKER to say to the Liberals, Brethren: Let us rejoice and be joyful, for the signs of the times betoken the coming kingdom of truth, when reason, no longer the slave of hypotheses, shall be restored to freedom, and Liberalism, in its divine benignity, be throned in every mind. In so great and holy a state of free breathing, free thoughts, and free love, who is there, having a heart, but would giv it for the good of all in the liberty of doing right?

Who of you but reveres the demi-god, Sir Isaac Newton, the only potentate and king of the mental kings in science, whose word seemed to be law armed with authority to enforce the obedience of every atom and the motions of every heavenly world?

The successiv generations of the scholarly for two centuries, a galaxy of the giant-minded, refined by culture, than whom a more polished company of intellectuals had not ripened in the flower-beautifying beams of the central electrical sun, pledged their integrity that "the heavens and the earth" are governed by their master's law of universal gravitation. This decision of so august a tribunal tends in the mind of so many to cover the nineteenth psalm with merited infamy.

In morals, Newton was the embodiment of unblemished purity—the perfect among the philosophers. His rare attainments in holiness endeared him to the lovely in Jesus. The disciples of the king of Zion saw in Newton the excelsior in geometry and mathematics, an imitator of the God of Moses, who weighed the mountains in scales and the hills on a balance, and in such a refulgence man, born in the line of human fatherhood, had never before been exalted.

Each Jew, Christian, Atheist, Agnostic, Liberal, and all exalted by education, are united in the conclusion that Newton's system of the world is the argument of nature, and all should know that Sir Isaac Newton was the only philosopher who furnished Atheism with his argument of nature—that justified the Atheism of all ages.

Newton's greatness was not impaired by the obscurity of his creed. In explaining his idea of the tangibility of eternity, he aberrated and defined God to be a non-entity. His bosom friends hav not yet determined whether he was Unitarian or Trinitarian. Such trifles are of no moment and without interest to us. But his science is of more value than all the creeds of modern Christendom. His science! What is it? A ray of supernal light, or a myth. Is it truth? or hav we, like the disciples of Ptolemy, been deceived by assuming the optical delusions of nature to be physical facts?

If Newton had been an expositor of nature, and, wooing the goddess, had conquered her charms, and, unfolding the loveliness of her beauties, had exposed them to the longing gaze of men, his work had merited the enrapturing applause of the angels and the approbation of his Maker. But in vain the geological ages waited for his disclosure of the secret of the enabling cause by which a man kneeled.

What little was known, true to nature, was contained in the Hebrew and Greek scriptures; but what of that as long as the accredited men of science did not know how to use their eyes?

In the "Principia," Book III, Proposition VI, page 394, Newton says that "all bodies gravitate toward every planet, and that the weights of bodies toward the same planet, at equal distances from the center of the planet, are proportional to the quantities of matter which they severally contain." Whereas,

1. Not one of the planets gravitates toward another planet, nor toward the sun, for the all-potent reasons: The substance or mass of each planet and its weight are equal measures, which, in the ordinations of nature, cannot be disturbed by orbital revolutions nor by solar distances; and because in nature the sun's center is the immovable center of the system of the sun. Perception, reason no longer a slave, and the philosophy of nature concur in the verdict. A central body is not governed by the accepted third law of motion, hence Sir Isaac Newton's first, second, and third axioms, like Euclid's point, line, and superfices, are nonentities.

2. The balance weight of bodies on the earth's surface are less than their quantities of substance or mass, because in nature the avoirdupois weight of a body is not its whole weight. Hence the system of celestial mechanics, by Laplace, was founded on appearances assumed to be facts of nature, equally fatal to true knowledge, as was the absurdity of the earth's immobility.

N. B.—I pray the Liberals to prepare their mental flails to assist me in threshing out the grain of natural truth for the use of all mankind.

Wishing you and yours and the world the beatification of a bath in the fountain of truth, I hav the honor to say yours in the love of him whose love was purity and universal.

REV. W. ISAACS LOOMIS.

LOCUST VALLEY, N. Y., Dec. 15, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: We continue greatly interested in your luminous letters from Europe, which a busy brain and well-ordered observations could alone hav effected in so brief a visit. Yours most truly,

CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.

NORMAN HILL, TEX., Dec. 4, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your card to hand. Let me congratulate you on your safe return. Truly glad to know you hav taken your old stand at the helm of THE TRUTH SEEKER, with your mind refreshed, invigorated, and expanded by your travels, and that you are as able and willing as ever to battle for the cause of intellectual freedom. And I am also highly pleased to learn that a cordial, brotherly welcome was extended to you personally and through you to the Freethinkers of America generally. Go on, unflinchingly, and great is your reward.

As ever, etc., E. A. ROLEN.

BURLINGTON JUNCTION, Mo., Dec. 13, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Dr. J. R. Baker has visited us and turned his Gattling gun upon the old walls of Zion, five evenings in succession, closing his engagement last night. This morning, as the smoke of battle is slowly lifting, the old theological fortress seems honeycombed from mote to tower. Although the enemy seems demoralized and short of ammunition, they are now busily engaged in stopping the rents, here and there mending a breach, exhorting the faithful, and promising a festival next week, and a Christmas-tree in two weeks.

The presence of a lecturer among us is always the signal for a series of festivals, sociables, and temperance meetings, carried on to keep the people away; but notwithstanding all their strategy, we hav had good, well-behaved, intelligent audiences.

The doctor is a logical and eloquent speaker, sometimes exciting his audience to tears, and again provoking an avalanche of laughter. We hope at no distant day to hear him again. Yours, etc., GEO. W. MAY.

ST. THOMAS, ONT., Dec. 8, 1880:

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I extend to you a hearty welcome back to your nativ country and your paper, hoping that you will hav been benefited by your trip.

All your readers here are pleased with your letters from Europe.

I hav received the tracts.

I send you a paper, the marked item of which is an evidence of the increase of Liberal ideas, also of the intolerant spirit that animates the breasts of Christians. See item on miracles. It resembles the reasoning of Hugh Miller in support of miracles in his "Footprints of the Creator."

Much as I dislike to part with them, I circulate your papers, hoping and feeling that they will bear fruit. Twenty-three years ago, when I became an Infidel, I never thought to see Infidelity become so strong as it is at present.

Your friend and well-wisher, D. NEILSON.

CANON CITY, COL., Dec. 3, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: All hail! Glad your'e back safe and sound. In reading your letters from Europe I wished myself by your side many a time, and that for the purpose of spelling words so that people in this country could know how to speak them; as it is, we must guess. But more of this hereafter.

Now, sir, I hav the two most important subjects for mankind on the brain—religion and intelligence. If an eternal state of bliss or curse hangs upon our faith in this life, nothing under heaven is of so much importance as to know what to believe; but if it does not, it is vastly important we should know that. And is not intelligence very needful to know that fact? If it is, then every means to that end is highly important, and every man owes to his fellow his best effort to accomplish it. What would you think of a priest in Rome who had acknowledged to you the absurdities of their dead forms and yet perpetuated and practiced them for his living in our view of morality? What is a man's duty; that is, what is due from man to man? This is all embodied in the words, "Do as you would be done by," not only to the individuals around us, but to the race; and not only to the race now existing, but to the race in all the future; and the most successful way of doing this is to foster intelligence. Intelligence is mostly promoted through language spoken to the ear and written to the eye. Reading is simply apprehending language by the eye. The language is what we speak, and this only should be photographed to the eye; and then every child or foreigner, as soon as he should know the elements of speech and their signs, could read and pronounce correctly by his eye as now by his ear.

In all your books you print though—six letters for two sounds. We pay you for this word every time we buy it two hundred per cent more than it ought to cost us. And this occurs in all elementary books, devolving upon the learner two hundred per cent more of time and labor in learning to spell and write it. Is this manly? Is this fulfilling moral obligations? Every time we buy eight we pay one hundred and fifty per cent more than it ought to cost us. Every time we buy nail, sail, pail, hail, gail, etc., we pay thirty-three and a half per cent more than is just. Is it honorable, is it just, to foster and propagate such an imposition on the ignorant, who climb the bleak marble stairs on their knees in paying their taxes for schools and schoolbooks when we know better?

If you had always been buying photographs of yourself containing two or three eyes more than there are in your face, and an artist should introduce one with only two eyes in it, would you hav it? Or would you cling to your five-eyed picture? You would be the same man with two eyes in your picture that you were when pictured with five eyes. So your name consists of five sounds and you hav always been photographing it as containing seven, and now will you hav it with only five eyes instead of seven, thereby saving forty per cent both in writing and printing and moral stamina, and lose nothing. Is it enough to be scientific on one subject only? Is not science the law of common sense? Thou that teachest another, teaches thou not thyself? If any man is morally bound to advance the interests of mankind, who is he, and who is exempt? You neglect the final e in giv, liv, etc. All right, but why not drop your useless letters as well? What is there to prevent such a man as you from doing all the good he can? What is there that should prevent you from printing nolej instead of knowledge, making us pay eighty per cent above necessary cost, and we can't help ourselvs, because printing is not like a common trade that anybody can set up at any four corners.

Says Dr. Webster, "The progress of arts and science is sensibly retarded by the difficulties of mastering an irregular orthography." The church of Rome holds people in squalid ignorance that she may liv on them. What worse is she than we when we knowingly retard the progress of their intelligence. And why are we not worse than she? She does it for her living, but we Liberals could liv better on the people's intelligence. When you write giv, why do you not also write givz, livz, etc., instead of using an s, which was never intended to represent the sound of z?

A. B. PIKARD.

HYDE PARK, MASS., Nov. 28, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I read your letters of foreign travel with great interest. They bring vividly to my mind the scenes and places you describe, for I hav visited all of them. I heard Charles Bradlaugh lecture morning, afternoon, and evening at the Amphitheater the last Sunday I was in Liverpool. I consider him the biggest man in head and heart of all that I saw in Europe.

Yours truly, A. E. GILES.

NORWICH, CONN., Dec. 5, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Welcome home again. It has been with the greatest satisfaction that I hav perused your foreign letters. All who hav read them speak highly in their praise.

Through your graphic description of interesting scenes, and vivid delineation of personal experiences, I hav almost been enabled, in flights of imagination, to make that grand journey with you. Am glad you had such a splendid opportunity for self-improvement, in part compensation for the great wrong that has been imposed on you.

After reading your elaborate delineation of the costly cathedrals, with all the sacred shams and farcical flummery connected therewith, and realizing what a host of pious frauds or "reverend" rascals sponge a fat living from the hard labor of a poverty-stricken, ignorant, and priest-ridden people in the name of Jesus, it is passing strange how any sensible person can be duped by the clerical cant and priestly pretense of such salaried sycophants.

Inclosed find three dollars as renewal of subscription for the good old TRUTH SEEKER. BYRON BOARDMAN.

QUINCY, O., Dec. 13, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Allow me to congratulate you as well as the many patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER upon your safe return from your European tour to again take the helm to steer the ship of Freethought.

I hav been much interested in your letters from the old domain, and hav just finished the sixteenth, which in many respects, to me at least, has been the most interesting. You will please set me down for a book containing those letters, as I loaned my papers and they are not likely to be returned. Besides, I feel that those letters are of so much importance that they should be put into shape so they can be preserved and ready for reference when required.

I am happy to state that each number of your paper becomes more interesting, and I long for it before the time for its arrival.

The letters from correspondents is one feature in the make-up of the paper that I like very much, giving every one who desires to hav his views spread upon the journal the privilege of criticising and being criticised.

I herewith hand you a few names of my friends, who, I think will sooner or later become subscribers

Very truly yours, C. H. CUSTENBORDER.

WELLESLEY, MASS., Dec. 15, 1880.

MY FRIEND BENNETT: Your voluminous letters to THE TRUTH SEEKER during your absence are no less surprising than interesting. I think I wrote you once before to the effect that I can not understand by what manner of means you accomplish so much.

With kind regards to Mrs. Bennett, I am, as ever,

Very sincerely, ELIZABETH M. F. DENTON.

STOCKTON, MO., Dec. 8, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find postal order for $3,50, $2.50 of which I want you to credit on my subscription account, and continue my name on your books, for, as I hav before stated, I intend to take your paper as long as I am able to take a paper, or until its course changes radically from what it has been for the last several years.

After giving me credit as above, send me Truth Seeker Tracts as indicated by the inclosed slip, and use the remainder in such tracts as in your opinion will do most good in arousing a feeling of inquiry in the minds of those who believe in the inspiration and divinity of the Bible. I am in a country where Liberals are rather scarce, and I want as much as I can to increase their number.

I hav been reading your travels in Europe with such a degree of interest that I could hardly wait from one week for the paper of the next to arrive.

Respectfully, JAMES T. FARRIS.

LONG HILL, CONN., Dec. 16, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your dun received. I own up to the soft impeachment. I acknowledge the corn. I plead guilty, but as a slight atonement for my neglect, both real and apparent, I inclose you six dollars, in full for 1880 and 1881.

I expected to hav been in New York this fall and seen you and talked with you, as Moses did with the Lord, and at the same time pay my arrearages, but hav been extremely busy and could not well come; but suppose a greenback substitute will do just as well.

Hoping you will continue to put your trust in the Lord, I remain Truly yours, JOHN L. BEARDSLEY.

BART, PA., Nov. 30, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Well, you are at the helm again, and will no doubt deal out heavy blows against that religious curse—the curse of all curses that hav afflicted this matter-of-fact world of ours. I am glad you came home well and that you enjoyed your trip, as your letters indicate that you did.

I was sorry to hear that the Liberal League at Chicago split again. It shows that some of the Liberals or Freethinkers are not rid of bigotry yet. Not a member of the League, I dare say, was in favor of sending obscene literature through the mails any more than Ingersoll or Green. The so-called Comstock law, as it now stands, is utterly powerless to prevent the carrying of obscene matter by mails, and ought to be abolished, for it does more harm than good as it is. The only way to effectually stop this obscene literature business is for Congress to enact a law authorizing postmasters to open all letters that go into the mails, and to burn all letters and books found to be unclean, and the writer or sender to be sent to prison for a term of years or for life, according to the amount of dirt contained in the letters or books.

It seems to me that the Lord made a great mistake when he created mankind of two sexes. Adam and Eve were hardly dry before they discovered, as we are told, that they were naked, and that was obscene, so they were ashamed of themselvs and covered themselvs with fig-leaves. What an amount of trouble God would hav saved his poor children if he had made them all of no sex, for then there would hav been no obscenity to fight and torment one another about! Kindly, J. KING.

BRUSHY PRAIRIE, IND., Nov. 30, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I thank you for sending me THE TRUTH SEEKER after my time had expired, as I hav found much in it interesting to me, You will find inclosed three dollars for it, which will put me all right with you again. Your letters from Europe hav pleased me very much, and I would like to get them in book form if I can spare the money when you publish them in that shape.

Respectfully yours, E. D. GREENFIELD.

SAN JOSE, CAL, Dec. 1, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I see by your paper that you hav reached home safe and sound.

Thanks to the good ship, her captain and engineer, as well as the "providence of God," that you are brought back to duty and to friends.

Your letters hav been very interesting, as they hav been divested from the ordinary halo of romance and sensation, and hav given us an inkling of many things we desired to know.

And I am so glad that you hav had the pleasure and profit of meeting in the Brussels Congress so many noble men and women whose hearts are in the right place and who are pushing on the car of Freethought in the Old World. I am glad also that the political fight is over, and now you can pitch into old theology so that they won't think that you went to the old country to stay.

I want to say to the friends that to-morrow I leave home to speak at Victoria, Seattle, Portland, and other points in Oregon and the territory, during December and January, and at Santa Barbara and other points south during February and March. Yours for truth, J. L. York.

Allegheny City, Pa., Nov. 28, 1880.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Please excuse me for not remitting sooner, and find inclosed the sum of $3, in payment for one year's subscription to your valuable paper.

I am sorry to hear that there are so many in arrears as well as myself; and will endeavor in the future to be punctual in payments.

I was a reader of your paper for a good while before I subscribed for it, and think I could not do without it.

I was a member of the Baptist church some three years ago, when "John's Way" was handed to me to read, which I did, and which entirely changed my religious belief. Of course, I never knew that such a paper as The Truth Seeker was in existence, as there are many others that don't. But I wish to say that I think I hav gained a good deal of knowledge by reading your paper; and will add, with pleasure, that I am as much of an Atheist as you are yourself. The idea of a personal God, let alone a literal hell, or any other kind of hell, is what I cannot believe. M. Babcock's writings suit me exactly.

Hoping that you will be prosperous in your good work, I remain yours for liberty of thought and speech,

James Woolley,

Howe, Tex., Nov. 27, 1880.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I hav been much interested in your letters from Europe. I hav so wondered about your writing. I don't see how you can crowd so much in unless you use the shorthand system, or else hav a system of your own, in which you write almost as fast as you speak.

How I hav laughed over that experience of yours in obtaining lodgings in Rome!

I suppose you will publish those letters in book form. They will make a good book.

I will not trespass longer on your valuable time and good nature. Wishing you continued health to enable you to fight the errors of that mythical system, Christianity, I remain, as ever, Your sincere friend,

Anna M. Brooks.

Pratt, Ill, Dec. 15, 1880.

Editor Truth Seeker, Dear Sir: I hav a request to make of the clergy; they profess to believe that the Lord will answer prayers made in good faith, and the Bible so teaches, I think, especially if said prayer is consistent with the wishes of God. Now there are two men in the city of Morrison, Whiteside county, Ill.; one is an American and a grain dealer, the other is a German and a saloon-keeper; both good men, honest, upright, and good. The worst thing about the American is that he is a Republican, and the worst thing about the German is that he keeps a saloon, although he will not sell to any person who gets drunk, neither will he sell to a minor. Both men are unbelievers in Christ; neither of them believe that Christ was any more divine than any other person. Now, for the sake of humanity, and to establish the fact that prayers of the righteous are answered, I would ask the prayers of the clergy for the conversion of those two men. I not only ask, but insist that you do so or else ever after hold your peace and acknowledge that your prayers are not answered, or else you are not servants of the Lord, as it is distinctly set forth in 2 Peter, iii, 9, and Ezekiel xxiii, 11, that it is the wish of the Lord God that none should perish, but that all might be converted. I ask no miracle, but just establish the fact that prayers are answered, and I will allow you two weeks after this notice for the conversion of these two men. Please do this, as it is God's will, and also for my sake, as I sincerely wish the fact established (if it is a fact) that prayers are answered now. Do not think, Mr. Clergyman, that this is addressed to your neighbor; it is for every clergyman in the United States. Respectfully, James M. Pratt.

St. Joseph, Mo., Dec. 11, 1880.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: You well deserve the title of apostleship as one of the tried and persecuted sons of civil and religious freedom in the nineteenth century. It grieves me that my means are so limited that I cannot contribute more freely to your numerous publications of human rights and Christian wrongs. Your letters from Europe, from the hot-bed of Christianity, if put in book form, no intelligent Christian family should be without, as a cherished text-book of the many delusions and absurdities of the Christian theology, both borrowed and fashioned to suit an avaricious class of the human race. I believe all mankind hav a natural right to civil and religious freedom, but when religion becomes hypocritical and delusiv, I think every human being that loves truth and abhors lies should expose its errors in its various forms, that our children and the rising generation might not be deluded by such an unholy, religious fraud. Yours respectfully, M. H. Blackford.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I hav been a subscriber to The Truth Seeker for two years and cannot do without it as long as it is published. I see my subscription runs out on the 22d of February. Please send "Champions of the Church," "World's Sages," and The Truth Seeker for one year. Yours truly, James Holt.

VARIOUS THINGS.

St. Joseph, Mo., Dec. 12, 1880.

Mr. Editor: I hav carefully read your correspondence of travel in order to compare your views with my own impressions, as I passed over the greater portion of the same route in 1879 that you did in 1880. I hav been very much pleased with your descriptions, and hav detected but few errors. Like yourself, I became thoroughly disgusted with helpless and dead gods, mothers of gods, holy virgins, sons and crucified gods and saviors, saints, spirits, and ghosts, and cruel, persecuting, grasshopper priests, who obtain the people's money through fraud, false pretenses, force, and robbery, who hav always been in league with robber kings, emperors, and the murderers and oppressors of man. There could not be a king or emperor in power this day in Europe were it not for the religious grasshoppers, the common foes of progress, reform, and liberty.

How long, O Justice, will men and women pay their hard earnings into the treasuries of the priests, who, like the Arkansas long-nosed, roach-backed swine, are always crying, squealing for more, and will greedily and piously take the last mite from the widow and orphan, and in return for all the money which they thus receive under false pretenses as men of God, they will giv a dry, hollow, useless prayer, or which is much worse, use it to deprive the people of their liberties here, and a threat to consign them to a blazing sulphurous hell in the hereafter?

After writing so much concerning the family of gods, religions, and not only their uselessness, but great injury to man, like a loathsome disease, a pig of lead around his neck, or a paralysis of both the body and brain of humanity, I rejoice that you had the opportunity of visiting Europe and beholding with your eyes the works of the grand grasshopper, the pope, and all the lesser ones, in murdering, torturing, persecuting, oppressing, keeping in ignorance and enslavement man in the past, and even up to the present time. But why did you not visit the rooms where are collected and preserved the instruments of torture used by these religious fiends who, like the Southern slaveholder when lacerating or burning the tender human flesh and nerves, turned the whites of their eyes skywards, and exclaimed, "We are doing that for Christ's sake?"

The grasshoppers must hav sat up nights and worked on Sundays to hav ever studied out and invented such saintly instruments to tear, dislocate disfigure, dismember, and destroy the body of the man, woman, or child who was possessed of spirit or courage to refuse their yoke and to contribute to their support.

As an evidence of their false pretenses, they claim that God is love, and that human beings were made by him, in his own image, and then these fiendish priests who claim to be followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, would seize upon those images of God and shut them up in dungeons, bury them alive in tombs, rack and torture them in a frightful manner, and if death would not relieve the sufferer these men of God would throw them in broiling caldrons of oil, break all their bones on the wheel, or chain them to the stake and roast and burn them to death with slow fires made of green wood. (Vide vols. i and ii, Lecky's Rationalism in Europe.)

Let every Freethinker, Rationalist, non-religionist, and Infidel make a solemn vow that from this time henceforth he or she will never giv or donate, directly or indirectly, anything, money, goods, or lands, to the support of a religious grasshopper, or the church, or any institution managed by or under the control of the church.

Our Liberal League is alive, and stands boldly by the National Liberal League in its action at Chicago.

Yours, P. V. Wise

Friend Bennett: Inclosed please find three dollars, which please place to my credit for your paper. If you publish a history of your trip through Europe mark me one copy. I hav been highly interested in reading it. I get more information in reading your description of the different places you hav visited than through any other source.

Watertown, N. Y., Nov. 27, 1880.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I congratulate you on your return from your tour in Europe, but more especially do I greet you for the many interesting items of interest that you sent home to your paper. I see that you make a special call, especially to those in arrears. I am a little behind, and now forward the amount for another year. I wish that all your readers would do the same and sustain the very foremost paper of the age. We need just such a paper as yours to pioneer us over the myths, superstitions, and the bigoted dogmas of the priesthood both past and present.

Fraternally, L. D Olney.

Vineland, N. J., Dec. 16, 1880.

Bro. Bennett: Welcome to your chair editorial again, refreshed by two long sniffs from the saut, saut sea and a ramble on monarchical grounds, through ecclesiastic pomp. Swinging in the opposit of Albany retirement should give equipoise. Welcomes are the contrasted order of greetings after the good hav been forced to bad places; but being compelled to go and feel the pain of malicious power, the welcome-away will not weary nor clog appreciativ sentiments.

I did not swell the crowd at Chickering Hall, but my rejoicing bid your spirit be strong to act its happy part. I was not a listener at the World's Liberal Congress, but was a watcher for every word that pleaded for justice there.

Your letters of travel renew my memory on historic points and supply modern changes. They will serve others in this way, while showing the immense extravagance of priestly pride in wasting wealth and art to deck temples of mockery. The study of cathedrals was not amiss. They are mothers of capital (creeds, color, laws), and must be shown as hoards of gold that would hav been treasures to needy toilers from whom they were wrung. They are emblems of heart's blood extorted from parents that offspring might be blinded by their glare and manacled by their power. They doubtless reassured you that your last winter's pen did not tell too much of human gods and god-duped men. Had Calvin remained Catholic he would hav been made high priest for burning Servetus. Peter is made pedestal and doorway for being so base a malefactor as to be crucified head downward. Cruelest men make the greatest gods. Your welcome and farewell in London was suitable and noble. The event will not be deemed less merited by you if your fellow workers here claim some share of the pleasant offerings. We feel that you hav brought to our philanthropic work a token of the co-operating hands of all at the banquet—a glow of inspiring zeal from all who spoke their sympathy and gladness. The hands of our thankfulness reach out to clasp those of Besant, Bradlaugh, and all the others. We know their words that we hav read, that they daily speak, are solvent rays dividing light and darkness, and coming ages will repeat our gratitude that they loved the truth and labored to disseminate it. How small appears the spirit living but for itself! Rested by change of scenes, cheered by kindly receptions, you will resume reformatory duties so cheerfully as to smile at the missiles of enemies. They will be hurled at the National League—strategy will strive to sunder their forces still—we must redouble efforts, keep an understanding through The Truth Seeker, and gain ten for one that fails.

I think Ingersoll, Green, and Chainey will soon see a mistake in their withdrawing steps. It is hoped the flash that looked like ambition will prove only apparent. Church members, whatever they promis, will not sustain works or candidates that do not favor church power, All such who profess to befriend the new association will be spies and traitors. Stanch characters, seeing the right, will leave churches and come to the Lesgues. The great pity is that measures are not taken to prepare woman for Liberal allies.

Faithfully, Mary E. Tillotson.

Locust Bayou, Ark., Dec. 6, 1880.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I hav been reading your very interesting description of Rome and its churches, priests, etc. What most pleased me was the banquet given to you by all those true and noble men and women honoring you. I feel that they were honoring me.

Castle Hill, Me., Dec. 6, 1880.

D. M. Bennett: I hav been very much interested in reading your letters from Europe and your criticisms on priestcraft. The letters in themselvs are worth what your paper cost. I keep a public place and I always keep it on the table where it can be seen and read by the public. I see the people get interested in reading it. I hope all those that are in arrears will pay up, and your valuable paper liv and continue to liv after you are gone.

Yours respectfully, H. Tilley.

North Benton, O., Dec. 6, 1880.

Mr. Editor, Dear Sir: I congratulate you on your safe return home. I hav followed your travels through the Old Country with muoh satisfaction, and am glad you are safe home to battle for universal mental liberty. There is some superstition here, yet I got our Christian friends in our township a few evenings ago to organize a temperance society. There also met with us a clergyman by the name of Miller. About every sentence he wanted God and the Bible mentioned. I opposed the God part of the affair, and argued that we did not want God and the Bible in a temperance convention, because the old patriarchs got drunk, and Christ was a distiller. He turned water into wine, and commanded his followers to drink it as long as they lived. Rev. Miller did not pretend to answer my reasons for not wanting God and the Bible mentioned in a temperance organization only in this wise, that God is mentioned on our coin, and this was a Christian government, and he ought to be mentioned in everything, even on the knives and forks, and also says that God performs wonders. Now he says he knew a person in his charge that was palsied; for weeks he could not move his tongue, and just a few minutes before he died he commenced singing a beautiful hymn, and sang it through and died. That he calls a miracle. There are a number of his congregation that claim they can perform miracles, such as taking out fire by saying over words in the Bible and stopping blood. I write this to show the ignorance there is in certain localities. J. A. Garfield said at a meeting in Salem, O., that a person might lie and tell it over and over to his hearers till he himself and his hearers believed it to be true.

I think it perhaps is the case with Rev. Miller. He tells his ghost stories to his hearers, and won't allow them to be contradicted till he really believes the lies to be true, and his hearers the same. I heard our reverend gentleman tell another story to excite his hearers to repentance. It was that he held a revival in a certain place, and there were three young boys who were unruly. After meeting, one night, they went to the hotel across the street from the church, and called for their suppers. The landlord asked them what they would hav, when one replied that they wanted steaks of Jesus Christ, seasoned with blood. After supper they started out. One dropped dead on the steps, one dropped dead on the sidewalk, and the other dropped dead while crossing the street. Thus, you see, said the preacher, the judgment of God was visiten on these unbelievers. Part of his flock shook with terror, and flocked to the altar for prayer. Thus. Mr. Editor, you see though we are on the Connecticut western reserv, the home of presidents, we hav the basest of ignorance. The church is the cradle of ignorance. Chester Bedell.

Notes From Illinois.

I want to organize a state League, as soon as a sufficient number of applications for membership to the same can be obtained to warrant me in calling a convention for the purpose. In many localities there are from one to half a dozen or more Liberals who would like to be connected with the Liberal League movement. Yet they do not at present feel able to sustain a local League, and there are others who are already identified with local Leagues, who comprehend what may be accomplished by having a good, strong, working state League. Now, let all such join me in getting up a strong state League—to work as an auxiliary to the National League. Let every man and woman who wishes to join with and become a member of a state League—the same to become when organized an auxiliary to the National L. L.—send me one dollar and I will send them a certificate of membership or a receipt for the same. And as soon as enough names and money are sent in to warrant me in calling a convention for the purpose of perfecting an organization, I will do so by convening a two or three-days' meeting in some convenient place as near the center of the state as shall be consonant with hall and hotel accommodations and railroad facilities. And in case there should be any more money sent in for membership fees than shall be required for hall rent, procuring speakers, and other necessary expenses, the balance will be turned over to the treasury of the State League for the advancement of the Liberal League interest in the state of Illinois.

Having had this object in view for a long time, I hav consulted with many of the Liberals I hav met on my passage through the state, and it has met with an almost unanimous approval. And I hav taken pains to make inquiries as to halls and other accommodations.

Now, friends, what say you? Shall we hav a State League? And shall the state of Illinois be placed in the front ranks in this great onward movement for universal mental liberty, equality, and justice, regardless of church, creeds, and sectarian superstitions? If you say yes to this proposition, then let me hear from you. Address me at St. Johns, Perry county, Illinois, until otherwise advised.

F. F. Follet, Ch. Ex. Sub-Com. of Ill.

"The Best of All."

BY J. L. YORK.

That friendship is the deepest
Which counts its years in growth;
That knowledge is most precious
Which hath cost me most.

That goodness is most worthy
Which, like the light of heaven,
Seeks out the poor and fallen,
And visits those in prison.

That love is best and sweetest
Which seeks another's gain;
That charity the broadest
Which hides a brother's stain.

That faith is best and truest
Which is world-wide in its span;
That church and creed the highest
Which brings most good to man.

That hope is best on earth
Which most inspires my life,
That reaches out beyond the grave,
And saves from earthly strife.

That truth is best and highest
Which helps me on my way,
That lifts the soul from darkness,
And points to endless day.

That world is best just now
Which offers most of duty;
That soul feels most of heaven
Which drinks in most of beauty.

That heaven is best for me
Which brings me to my own,
The dear and loved just gone before
Will meet us when we come.

None will ask, when we get there,
Of the road we chanced to come.
As we left behind all earthly ills,
They'll bid us welcome home.

A heaven of higher life and love,
Which knows no sect or clan,
But opens wide the heavenly gate
To the divine in man.

All are children of the Father,
Sparks from that central sun,
Not a soul, though weak in goodness,
Can be lost to the Infinit One.

I mind at home, in bygone days,
Some miles from Boston's crowded ways,
While bumping on in one horse chaise,
How pleased I saw the pumpkins grow;
The old mare stopped as I said whoa.

Close by a hawthorn hedge she stayed,
Beneath an old elm's cooling shade,
As if for her as well 'twas made.
All through the corn lay pumpkins red.
Thanksgiving cherubs in their bed.

The solemn ruminating ox,
The wayside busy nibbling flocks,
The martins gloating round their box,
The river gliding from the view—
Pumpkins, still to my subject true.

The dim-seen tower that tale did tell
How Warren and his comrades fell.
O Memory, guard thy treasures well,
Lest for the thankless heart and dead
Should blush these very pumpkins red.

Seaward the ocean touched the sky;
Landward Monadnock loomed on high.
Dear land, for thee I'd liv, I'd die
Here, now, upon my nativ plain,
And see these pumpkins ne'er again.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. B. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

A FREE BOOK FOR THE SICK.

Containing nearly 100 pages, in pamphlet form; shows how Chronic Diseases can be positively cured by an original system of practice. It contains valuable and suggestive notes on nearly all the chronic ills to which the human family is subject, besides illustrative cases, and will be sent by mail to any one sending their address and a three-cent stamp to pay cost of mailing.

Six Lectures on Astronomy.

By PROF. RICHARD A. PROCTOR.

Five of them were delivered at Steinway Hall, this city, in the winter of 1875-6, and were reported phonographically expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER by Miss M. S. Gontcharoff. This is the most popular course of Lectures ever delivered by Professor Proctor, and ought to be in the possession of every person. Price 20 cents.

The titles of the Lectures are:

I. Growth of Worlds.
II. Life and Death of Worlds.
III. Other Worlds than Ours.
IV. Other Suns than Ours.
V. The Great Mysteries of the Universe.
VI. Religion and Astronomy.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Busts of R. G. Ingersoll,

By the celebrated sculptor, CLARK MILLS.

Cabinet size, price $2.50.

Small Busts, on Pedestal (mantel ornament), price $1.25. Neatly packed and boxed ready for shipment. Every admirer of this great Apostle of Liberty should hav at least one.

OPEN LETTER TO THE

ST. JOHNS SCHOOL BOARD.

BY

M. BABCOCK.

This book contains an inspired PHOTOGRAPH of the GOD that's being worshiped at the expense of the district in our public schools; the God that "overshadowed" Mary; the God that's wanted in the Constitution; the gentleman that owns some three billion dollars' worth of untaxed church property; the "so-help-me" God that makes a lie the truth in court; the God that governors besought to stop the yellow fever, which he didn't do. The picture is worth the price of the book. Price, 25 cents. For sale by D. M. BENNETT,

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

POCKET THEOLOGY.

BY

VOLTAIRE.

Translated from the French by Miss Ellen Carroll. The first time ever published in English. The pamphlet contains nearly 500 of Voltaire's sharp, terse, sarcastic, scathing definitions of theological and ecclesiastical subjects, terms, and dogmas. There is nothing in the world like it. Everybody ought to hav a copy. 190 pages. Price, only 25 cents.

Odds and Ends.

CO'LABORERS—Anthracite miners.

WHEN a Boston man invites you to dinner and heads a postscript N. B., he means "no beans."

AN Ohio newspaper man speaks of a man being bruised by the "emphatic gesture of a mule."

IT was a young housekeeper who set the cake she had baked for a surprise party out of doors one cold night to be frosted.

MANY a book-agent and canvasser has discovered that the "welcome" on a door-mat refers to the third house around the corner.

A LAZY boy was complaining that his bed was too short, when his father sternly replied: "That is because you are too long in it, sir."

ONE of the first requisitions received from a newly-appointed railway station agent was: "Send me a gallon of red oil for the danger-lanterns."

A MEDICAL writer asks, "Does position affect sleep?" Well, rather; if you're hung up by your trowsers on a spiked fence you won't sleep very soundly.

"WHICH do you like best, your father or your mother?" inquired a visitor of little chubby fist. "O, I like ma the best. She spanks me with the soft side of her hand; pa takes a shingle."

"WHY do not more of our young men get married?" asks a recent writer. Whist! till we tell him. There isn't more than about one young man in ten who is worth marrying, and the girls are finding it out.

OYSTERS hav a language of their own, and clam stew, and cabbage s-talk.—Evening Express. Yes, and whale s-pout, cigar s-tump, and mountain s-peak. Oh, go on with it, do!—Truth. Ship's crew and oyster stew.

JONESMITH was intently scanning the stock-list in his bulletin, when his wife entered with her head tied up and began to pace the floor distracted. "O Gus," said she," "I hav such a horrible earache!" "H'm," muttered the brute absently, without looking up, "you must hav it out." "Mr. Jonesmith," said the lady, coldly "don't you think I could save it by having it filled?"

The old story of the man who having hired a horse to attend a funeral, and was cautioned against over-driving, said he would keep up with the procession if he killed the horse, is retold in a different shape of an Illinois candidate for nomination to office. Wishing to reach the convention at a distant town he hired a horse at a livery stable. In spite of the candidate's pounding and swearing, the animal was so slow that the man did not get there until after the convention had adjourned, and so he lost his nomination. He denounced the owner for letting him such a beast. The proprietor of the stable, on investigation, discovered that he had let him hav one of the hearse horses. "Hearse horse, hearse horse!" cried the baffled politician, "Why, if a man should start to a funeral with such a horse as that he would not reach the grave till two weeks after the resurrection."

IT was necessary on a certain occasion in court to compel a witness to testify as to the way in which a Mr. Smith treated his horse. "Well, sir," said the lawyer, with a sweet and winning smile—a smile intended to drown all suspicion as to ulterior purposes—"how does Mr. Smith generally ride a horse?" The witness looked up, innocently, and replied, "Generally astraddle, sir, I believe." The lawyer again asked, "But, sir, what gait does he ride?" The imperturbable witness answered, "He never rides any gate at all, sir; but I've seen his boys ride every gate on the farm." The lawyer saw he was on the track of a Tartar, and his next question was very insinuating: "How does Mr. Smith ride when he is in company with others? I demand a clear answer?" "Well, sir," said the witness, "he keeps up with the rest if his horse is able to, or if not he falls behind." The lawyer, now almost beside himself, asked, "How does he ride when he is alone?" "I don't know," was the reply; "I was never with him when he was alone," and there the case dropped.
